Dizionario di Teologia Dottrinale e Storica

A TABULAR GUIDE TO THE SYSTEMATIC READING OF THIS DICTIONARY

THEOLOGY

Fathers
Rule of Faith
Creeds
Apostles' Creed
Nicene Creed
Quicunque vult
Theology, Speculative and Dogmatic Eclecticism
Syncretism
Neo-Platonism
Antioch, School of Origenism
Alexandria, School of Augustinianism
Scholastic Theology
Mysticism
Thomists
Scotists
Conceptualism
Theosophy
Consent of Antiquity Analogy of Faith
Economy
Disciplina Arcani
Reserve
[See also ERRORS, HERESIES, and SECTS]

THE HOLY SCRIPTURES

Revelation
Scripture
Word, Written Bible
Canon of Scripture
Antilegomena
Deutero-Canonical
Old Testament
Septuagint
Talmud
Targum
Mishna
Hillel
Cabbala
Haggadah
Halacah
Midrash
New Testament Gospels
Diatessaron
Vatican Codex
Alexandrine Codex
Sinaitic Codex Versions
Peschito Vernacular
Canons, Ammonian or Eusebian Inspiration Elements, Divine and Human Genuineness Authenticity Hermeneutics
Interpretation
Literal Interpretation
Metaphorical
Anagogical
Allegorical Mystical Tropological Mythical Accommodation
Exegesis Criticism
Criticism, Comparative Parable Prophecy Weeks, Prophetic

DOCTRINES OF THE CREED

God
Theism
Nature, Divine Incomprehensible
Jehovah
Elohim
Adonai
Lord
Sabaoth
Almighty Attributes Glory
Shechinah
Monarchia
Trinity Circumincession
Theandric Operation
Communicatio Idiomatum Creation
Providence Word, The
A and Ω Messiah Christ
Jesus
Ἰχθύς
Eternal Generation
Hypostasis
Union, Hypostatic
Homoousion
Divinity of Christ
Pre-existence of Christ
Incarnation
Nativity of Christ
"Ignorance" of Christ
Transfiguration
Passion of Christ
Death of Christ
Expiation Atonement Descent into Hell
Resurrection of Christ
Ascension
Session of Christ Propitiation
Vicarious Sacrifice Satisfaction Reconciliation Redemption Universal Redemption Mediation
Intercession of Christ
Presence of Christ
Christology Spirit, The Holy Paraclete
Procession of the Holy Ghost
Filioque Church Congregation Body, Mystical
Notes of the Church
Unity of the Church Catholic Authority of the Church
Indefectibility of the Church
Saint Communion of Saints
Intercession of Saints
Absolution
Invocation of Saints
Intermediate State
Paradise
Limbus
Hades
Purgatory
Resurrection of the Body
Body, Spiritual
Antichrist
Second Advent
Chiliasm Millennium
Last Judgment
Everlasting Punishment
Restoration of the Creature
New Creation
Beatific Vision Heaven Hell

ANGELS

Angels
Guardian Angel

THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY

Mary
Immaculate Conception Mother of God
Theotokos
Deipara
Perpetual Virginity Assumption
Mariolatry

THE PHILOSOPHY OF CHRISTIANITY

Infinite
Eternity
Evil
Matter Substance
Οὐσία Personality Natural Religion
Revealed Religion Nature
Nature, Laws of Supernatural
Miracles Life Light Nature, Human Body, Natural Blood
Head Heart Soul Creationism
Traducianism
Pre-existence of Soul Spirit
Image of God
Fall of Man
Original Sin
Death
Damnation Wrath of God
Free Will Sin Sacrifice
Grace Faith Justification Sanctification
Prayer
Intercessory Prayer
Fasting
Affections Illumination Enthusiasm Doubt Truth

THE SACRAMENTS

Sacraments Mysteries
Means of Grace
Matter, Sacramental
Opus Operatum Intention Character
Baptism
Initiation Regeneration
Infant Baptism
Lay Baptism
Ir[illegible]on

Affusion
Trine Affusion
Aspersion
Exorcism
Sponsors
Catechumen
Competentes
Neophyte Clinic
Perfecti
Chrism Confirmation Eucharist
Communion, Holy Lord's Supper
Mass
Missa
Teleion
Real Presence Representation
Concomitance
Transubstantiation
Consubstantiation
Impanation
Capharnaitism
Ubiquity
Orders, Holy Penance Penitence
Repentance Attrition
Contrition
Exomologesis
Confession of Sins
Auricular Confession Matrimony, Holy Marriage
Banns
Degrees, Forbidden
Consanguinity
Affinity Affinity, Spiritual Divorce
Unction, Extreme
Euchelaion

THE MINISTRY OF THE CHURCH

Hierarchy
Holy Orders
Episcopacy
Apostolical Succession
Jurisdiction, Spiritual Keys, Power of the Clergy
Apostle Patriarch
Archbishop
Bishop Diocese
Chorepiscopi
Suffragan
Archimandrite
Archdeacon Priest Parish
Cure of Souls
Pastor
Parson
Deacon
Subdeacon
Orders, Minor
Readers
Deaconess
Vocation Mission
Celibacy of the Clergy
Re-Ordination
Ἀπολελυμένος

THE LAITY

Faithful, The Christians
Idiotæ
Laity
Lay Priesthood
Lay Co-operation
Benefit of Clergy

THE LITURGIES AND RITES OF THE CHURCH

Liturgy
Ambrosian Rite
Mozarabic Rite Ritual
Adoration Worship Ceremony
Kneeling Benediction
Anointing Imposition of Hands
Ablution Hymns
Agapæ
Hours Compline
Purification of Women
Burial of the Dead
Prayer for the Dead
Diptychs
Beatification
Canonization
Missal
Breviary
Euchologion
Menæa
Menology
Martyrology Gradual Comes Anaphora
Ordinary of the Mass
Missa Catechumenorum
Missa Fidelium
Missa Præsanctificatorum
Missa Sicca
Prothesis Altar
Lord's Table
Wafer Azyme
Wave-Offering Litany
Introit
Gloria in Excelsis
Trisagion Collect Offertory
Kiss of Peace
Ter Sanctus
Oblation
Invocation of the Holy Spirit in the Eucharist
Lord's Prayer
Embolismus Elevation
Intinction Reservation
Antidoron
Invitatory
Antiphon
Canticle
Benedicite
Gloria Patri
Ave Maria
Kyrie Eleëson
Hosanna
Hallel
Alleluia
Amen
Bema
Ambon
Lessons
Capitulum
Preaching
Homily
Postil
Hermeneutæ
Bidding of Prayers
Lavipedium
Cross

CHURCH SEASONS

Year
Calendar
Annual Commemoration Festivals
Fast-Days
Jejunia quatuor temporum
Vigil
Sabbath
Lord's Day
Sunday
Advent Christmas
Circumcision Epiphany
Bethphany
Candlemas Annunciation
Septuagesima
Sexagesima
Quinquagesima
Lent Quadragesima
Ash-Wednesday
Caput Jejunii
Cœna Domini Passover
Easter
Paschal Controversy
Quartodeciman
Annotine Easter
Rogations
Ascension
Pentecost
Whitsun Day
Trinity Sunday

CHURCH HISTORY

Chronological Tables
Popes, Catalogue of Councils
Synods
Convocations
Fathers, Apostolic Apology Fathers Martyrs
Paganism
Persecutions of the Church
Recognitions, Clementine
Hellenists
Paschal Controversy
Image Worship
Iconoclasm Missions
Dark Ages
Monasticism
Jesuits
Gallicanism Interim
Adiaphoristic Controversy
Pragmatic Sanction
Huguenots
Jansenism
Supremacy, Royal Articles Puritanism
Nonconformity
Dissenters
Nonjurors
Toleration
Erastianism
Latitudinarianism Evangelical

CHURCH OF ROME

Popes, Catalogue of Ultramontanism Exemption Provisions
Unigenitus
Supremacy, Papal
Romanism
Protestantism
Propaganda
Popery
Pardons
Antipopes
Annates
Concordat
In Cœna Domini Cardinal
Decretals, False
Decretals
Encyclical
Interdict
Ineffabilis Deus Indulgence
Bull Brief
Chirograph
Reservation of Benefices
Reserved Cases

CHRISTIAN ETHICS

Morality, Natural Law, Moral Law of Christ
Grace Virtues, Theological Conscience
Casuistry Sin
Actual Sin Mortal Sin
Venial Sin
Vice Temptation
Works Merit Supererogation
Love Obedience
Alms
Restitution Oath Adjuration
Abjuration Matrimony, Holy Bigamy Polygamy Adultery

THE ASCETIC LIFE

Counsels of Perfection
Contemplation Mortification
Asceticism
Fasting
Xerophagy
Cenobites
Monasticism
Virginity Widows
Agapetæ Nuns

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW AND DISCIPLINE

Jurisdiction, Ecclesiastical Regale
Law, Ecclesiastical
Canon Law
Civil Law

Apostolic Canons
Apostolic Constitutions
Constitutions of Clarendon
Capitulars
Foundations, Ecclesiastical Consecration
Sacrilege
Secularization
Blasphemy
Benefice
Tithes
Simony
Monition Irregularity Suspension Deposition Degradation Consistory Ordinary Official Visitation
Commendatory Letters
Dispensation
Discipline, Ecclesiastical Excommunication
Anathema
Maranatha
Ἀφορισμός
Lapsed
Libellatici
Flentes
Energumeni
Audientes
Genuflectentes
Consistentes
Libelli Pacis
Articulus Mortis

ERRORS, HERESIES, AND SECTS

Fetichism Magic Zabianism
Polytheism
Atheism
Deism
Buddhism
Sabians
Judaism
Apostasy Infidelity Heresy
Schism
Scepticism
Fanaticism
Dualism
Pantheism
Fatalism
Materialism
Spinozism
Rationalism Positivism
Nicolaitans
Cerinthians
Ebionites
Encratites
Docetæ
Basilidians
Marcionites
Gnosticism
Emanation
Æon
Demiurge
Anthropomorphism
Metempsychosis
Manichæism
Montanism
Priscillianists
Re-Baptism
Monarchianism
Praxeanism
Patripassianism
Sabellianism
Paulianists
Arianism
Semi-Arianism
Homoiousion
Anomœans
Eunomians
Apollinarianism
Macedonianism
Eutychianism Monophysitism
Monothelitism Nestorianism
Novatianism
Cathari
Meletian Schism
Donatism
Pelagianism
Semi-Pelagianism
Adoptionism
Paulicianism
Waldenses
Albigenses
Lollards
Lutheranism
Augsburg Confession
Basle Confession
Belgic Confession
Remonstrants
Sacramentarians
Ubiquity
Solifidianism
Zwinglianism
Anabaptism
Antinomianism
Calvinism
Decrees, Eternal
Imputed Righteousness
Five Points
Final Perseverance
Calvinistic Confessions
Lambeth Articles Election
Indefectible Grace
Unitarianism
Socinianism
Arminianism
Congregationalists
Antitrinitarianism
Sublapsarianism
Supralapsarianism
Pietism
Quietism
Quakerism
Moravianism
Swedenborgianism
Methodism
Mormonism
Universalism

EVIL

Satan
Abaddon
Baal
Evil Sin
Temptation
Demons: Demoniacal Possession
Antichrist

A DICTIONARY

OF

DOCTRINAL AND HISTORICAL THEOLOGY

A AND Ω. The first and last letters of the Greek alphabet are used in a theological sense to express the comprehensiveness of God's existence in relation to created things and persons [Rev. i. 8, xxi. 6, xxii. 13]. In this sense the expression is a Hebraism already represented in the Old Testament [Isa. xli. 4, xliv. 6], and otherwise known to the Jews, who employed Aleph and Tau, the first and last letters of the Hebrew alphabet, to express absolute completeness and perfection. So "Abraham and Sarah" are said to have "performed all the law from Aleph to Tau," and "he that walks in integrity is as if he performed all the law from Aleph to Tau." [Lightfoot, Harmony of the N. T. Rev. of St. John, vol. iii. 1822.] The word את, as comprehending all the letters, was also used by them as a name of the Shechinah. The Syriac Version of the Revelation renders, I am Olaph, also Tau, while the Vulgate retains the Greek letters, Ego sum A et Ω. In the original Greek the definite article is prefixed, and as the terms of contrast are not the Omicron and the Omega, but the Alpha as the first and the Omega as the last letter, the more correct rendering would be, "I am the Alpha and the Omega," the one sole origin and end of all existence.

The meaning intended in the several passages where the formula occurs is apparently that the eternal being, immutability, omnipotence, absolute perfections and truth of the self-existent God, "of Whom, and through Whom, and to Whom, are all things" [Rom. xi. 36], Who is "the First and the Last, and beside" Whom "there is no God" [Isa. xliv. 6], are pledged to the fulfilment of the Revelation given through St. John in an epistolary form to the Seven Churches of Asia, as the representatives of the Church universal; that revelation relating specially to the Second Advent of Christ, and generally to the existence and chequered fortunes of the Church until the final consummation of all things. God, as He Himself is, the Creator and Author of all things, whether old or new, proposes, declares, promises, and will infallibly bring His counsels and promises to pass.

The general tradition of the Church assigns these symbols to our Lord. Commentators, however, are not agreed as to the Person of the Blessed Trinity who is speaking in the different passages of the Revelation. Cornelius a Lapide takes i. 8 (and apparently xxi. 5), of the Godhead in general as common to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, referring in proof of his interpretation to v. 4, to which might be added Isa. xliv. 6, "Thus saith the Lord, the King of Israel, and His Redeemer the Lord of hosts; I am the First," &c. Bengel and Alford understand the speaker to be God the Father, while St. Gregory Nazienzen, St. Athanasius, Ruffinus, Wordsworth, and Trench interpret it of the Son. The last writer grounds his view specially upon the words ὁ ἐρχόμενος, "which is in some sort a proper name of our Lord" [Matt. xi. 3; Heb. x. 37; John i. 15, 27; cf. Mal. iii. 1; Hab. ii. 3]. On the other hand, in xxii. 13, there seems a general agreement that Jesus Christ is the speaker. If, then, we compare this passage with i. 17, 18, and ii. 8, it is clear that our Lord, by applying these words to Himself, claims all the attributes of the Godhead, as being the Source, the Upholder and End of all things, more especially the attribute of coeternity with the Everlasting Father.

The letters Alpha and Omega, sometimes written from right to left, are found together with XP in the Roman catacombs and upon the houses in the deserted Christian cities of Syria near the Orontes. It is also said that in the times of Arianism they were inscribed upon the tombs of the orthodox as a protest against that heresy. They found their way too into ecclesiastical Latin poetry. Thus Prudentius, Cathem. ix. 10, writes,—

> Corde natus ex Parentis ante mundi exordium
> Alpha et Ω cognominatus, Ipse fons et clausula > Omnium quæ sunt, fuerunt, quæque post futura sunt, which was adopted in the Use of York as the Hymn for Compline, and in the Hereford Use for Prime during the Octave of the Nativity. The Sarum Hymn for Compline at Whitsuntide has

Alpha, Caput Finisque simul, vocitatur et est Ω, and the magnificent hymn of Hildebert, Ad Tres Personas SS. Trinitatis, commences

Alpha et Ω magne Deus
Heli, Heli, Deus meus.

[Cornelius a Lapide in Apocalypsim. Bengelii Gnomon. Archb. Trench, Comm. on the Epistles to the Seven Churches, and Sacred Latin Poetry, pp. 323-325. Bishop Wordsworth's and Dean Alford's Greek Testaments. Maitland, Church in the Catacombs (1847). Hymnale secundum Usum Sarum, &c., Littlemore, 1850.]

ABADDON is a Hebrew word meaning "destruction" [Job xxxi. 12]. In Job xxvi. 6, the Chaldee paraphrast renders it by the "house of destruction," or Hades; in xxviii. 22, he places the "angel of death" in apposition with the word. The cognate form of "Abdana" occurs not unfrequently in the Targums for "destruction;" and one of the names for Christian schools in the Talmud is "Be' Abidan." In the N. T. it is the personification of Hades, Rev. ix. 11, king and "angel of the bottomless pit;" where it is interpreted "in the Greek tongue Apollyon," and by the Vulgate, "Latine nomen habens Exterminans." Abaddon is one with Asmodeus, "Malca de Shêdê," king of the devils, as he is styled in Targums and Talmud; one also with Sammael, the angel of death, who in form of serpent deceived Eve. All these notions were developed at Babylon and brought back with the Jews after the Captivity. Evil spirits are referred in Rabbinical writings to a common origin with ourselves, either by a simultaneous act of creation, or by generation from Adam through the spectral Lilith; "Adam's erste Frau" [Göthe]. The Jewish trifling on this subject may be seen at more than sufficient length in Eisenmenger's Entdecktes Jud.; Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. v. Asham; Smith's Dict., art. Asmodeus. The case is, that as the divine attributes were personified in the various grades and Sephiroth of the angelic hierarchy, so human vices and debasing passions were demonized under various grotesque names during the Captivity. Asmodeus has been identified with the spirit of impurity, which would suit Abaddon in the context, Rev. ix. 11. The otherwise ἀβασίλευτον γένος [Prov. xxx. 27] of locusts, as the ἐπιθυμίαι of the human heart, may very justly be derived from the smoke of the bottomless pit [Rev. ix. 3]. Abaddon in this passage may be taken as a synonym for Lucifer, who "as lightning fell from heaven" [Rev. ix. 1; Luke x. 18], i.e. Satan.

ABBA. A Syriac word signifying Father, and expressive of loving reverence. Our Lord applies the designation to the First Person of the Blessed Trinity when addressing Him in prayer [Mark xiv. 36]. St. Paul does the same when speaking of the relation of adopted children in which Christians stand towards Him [Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6]. Selden and other late writers allege that the Jews had a law which forbad bond-servants to use the term father to their masters; and that hence the Apostle is using a term which was especially expressive of a relation of liberty. In the churches of Palestine and Egypt the word is used as an episcopal title, hence no doubt it came to be used in the West also in the form of Abbot. [Abuna.]

ABJURATION. A solemn act by which a person renounces any heresy in which he has believed, or of which he has been accused. No formal provision for such a renunciation of error exists in the formularies of the Church of England. The Roman Church has a modern authorized form of Abjuration which is ordered to be said before Confession, in the presence of the Confessor and two or three witnesses. In substance it is "I receive all the definitions of the Council of Trent, abjure such and such heresies, and wish to remain in the unity of the Holy Roman Church. So help me God and these holy Gospels."

ABLUTION. A liturgical term for any ceremonial washing of the person, or of the sacred vessels.

[I.] Of the Person. 1. In the Eastern Church there is a solemn ablution of the newly baptized, which is performed on the octave of the day of Baptism, for the purpose of washing away the Chrism which has been used in Confirmation. 2. The well-known ceremony of washing the feet of the poor on Maundy-Thursday as a sign of humility and love. [Lavipedium.] 3. The ablution of the celebrant's hands before and after the celebration of the Holy Eucharist. In the Sarum rite the first of these takes place immediately after the offertory, and "ad dextrum cornu altaris," the priest saying, "Cleanse me, O Lord, from every defilement of mind and body, that I may be able with purity to perform the holy work of the Lord." The second is for the purpose of removing any portion of the consecrated elements that may adhere to the fingers, and follows the Communion.

[II.] Of the Sacred Vessels. The ablution of these after Communion is a liturgical custom which has for its object the reverent consumption of every portion of the consecrated elements. According to the Sarum rite, the ablution is twofold—first, with wine and water, and secondly, with wine alone. According to the Roman rite, it is three-fold—first, with wine; secondly, with wine and water; and thirdly, with water alone. The celebrant alone drinks the ablutions, in either case. He also rinses his fingers in them (independently of the second washing of the hands); and it is a modern English custom to rinse the paten with one or both of the ablutions used for the chalice. The Sarum rubric also directs—"Cum vero aliquis sacerdos debet bis celebrare in uno die, tunc ad primam missam non debet percipere ablutionem ullam, sed ponere in sacrario, vel in vase mundo usque ad finem alterius missæ; et tunc sumatur utraque ablutio."

ABSOLUTE. This word is theologically opposed to "relative" and "conditional." For example, [1.] Divine goodness is absolute and not relative goodness, being perfect and infinite, without any admixture of imperfection, and without relation to any standard of comparison. [2.] The grace of Holy Baptism is absolute and not conditional when no bar is placed in the way of its reception, as in the case of infants.

ABSOLUTION. [1.] The sacerdotal act of forgiving a penitent's sins in the Name of God. [2.] The legal release of an excommunicated person from the penalties attached to excommunication. The ecclesiastical use of the word is to be traced to Holy Scripture, where our Lord is found giving a spiritual sense to the idea of unbinding or unloosing; as may be seen by the comparison of John xi. 44; Luke xiii. 16; Matt. xvi. 19, and xviii. 18. The word was also familiar to the early Christians of Europe as an official term for "release" or "acquittal" in the Roman law.

Scriptural statements respecting the forgiveness of sins show that such an institution as that of Absolution formed an integral portion of the Christian system as it was revealed in and by our Lord Jesus Christ. Not, indeed, that it was a new institution, for it was recognised under the Jewish system, and the type of its very fullest development is recorded in the Old Testament, where a confessing penitent says, "I have sinned against the Lord," and an absolving priest replies, "The Lord also hath put away thy sin" [1 Kings xii. 13]. But in the Christian system all things were made new by derivation of grace from the Person of our Lord, and by the operation of His human nature in the work of Mediation and Intercession. And in accordance with this new system, our Lord took pains (if we may venture so to say) to set forth His own Person as the fountain of absolution, and to make His apostles understand that they were the channels through which its stream flowed forth from His Manhood to the Church at large. When a paralyzed man was brought to Him for cure, He uttered the startling words, "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee;" on which the Scribes began "reasoning in their hearts, Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God only? And immediately when Jesus perceived in His spirit that they so reasoned within themselves, He said unto them, Why reason ye these things in your hearts? Whether is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, take up thy bed and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins (He saith to the sick of the palsy) I say unto thee, Arise, take up thy bed and go thy way into thine house" [Mark ii. 5–11]. Thus He illustrated His power of loosing from the bonds of sin by an act of His power of loosing from the bonds of a prostrating bodily infirmity, and showed to the incredulous cavillers that not only was there a Divine Power in heaven to absolve, but also a Human person "on earth," the "Son of Man," the head of the new system.

Our Lord, as Head of His Church, being thus the Fountain of Absolution, He endowed the Apostles with a capacity to become channels for the conveyance of the gift. On two occasions [Matt. xvi. 19, xviii. 18] He had promised to give them the power of binding and loosing in heaven by their acts of binding and loosing on earth; which was equivalent to a declaration that their absolutions [see also EXCOMMUNICATION] would be ratified by God. This power He actually gave to them when He was about to ascend into heaven; and in doing so he again made it unmistakeably evident that He was the original source of the absolving power bestowed. "Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you: as My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you. And when He had said this He breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them, and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained" [John xx. 21–23]. They were to minister the virtue of His Touch by means of Baptism, of His Presence by means of the Holy Eucharist, and of His all-forgiving Word, by means of Absolution. And as His eye could look forward into the darkness of the future, and behold a continuous succession of sinners needing forgiveness, so did His wisdom ordain a succession of ministers to give absolution; and he added the same continuous force to the commission to absolve as He added to the commission to baptize, by saying, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" [Matt. xxviii. 20].

Respecting the form which was practically given to this commission of absolution by the Apostles there has been much controversy. Some have contended that the early Church knew no other form of absolution than that of readmitting her penitents to the participation of the Holy Eucharist after satisfactory evidence had been given of penitence by confession and submission to penitential discipline. But no writer of the early ages, nor down to the sixteenth century, ever identified our Lord's commission to forgive sins with the administration of the Holy Eucharist; nor did they ever associate the continued administration of it with "the remission of sins," for which our Lord declared that His Blood was shed [Matt. xxvi. 28]. In the one great gift of Christ's Body and Blood all other spiritual gifts are doubtless, in a sense, contained; but this concentrated power of the Holy Eucharist does not by any means exclude other ordinances for the bestowal of spiritual gifts, and does not exclude that of absolution for the remission of sins.

Upon the authority of Morinus [De pœnit. viii. 2, xiii. 8] it is frequently asserted that the Church used no other form of absolution than that of a prayer for 1200 years, and that the indicative form "I absolve thee," was first adopted in the twelfth century. St. Thomas Aquinas writes of the indicative form in the thirteenth century as if it had always been in use [Opuscul. xxii.], and he certainly could not have so written if the change had been recently made. Goar also [Euchолog. Græc. p. 673, n.] asserts his belief that it had been used from primitive ages. And notwithstanding the learning of Morinus, many other learned men consider that the evidence adduced by him is insufficient to prove the precatory form to have been the only form used for 1200 years. Probably the truth is, that in the public services of the Church precatory forms were always used, and that an indicative form was used for the absolution of individual penitents, as is the case in the Church of England.[1] The precatory form, "The Lord absolve thee," etc., is alone used in the Eastern Church; but, notwithstanding the adherence of Orientals to ancient usages, this does not prove it to have been the primitive form, for they use an analogous form in baptizing, "N the servant of God is baptized," instead of the ministerial form "I baptize thee," which is undoubtedly primitive,

The precatory or optative form of absolution is illustrated by the general forms used in the English Church after the general confessions at the Holy Communion, Mattins, and Evensong. It must be regarded as an authoritative act of the Church, sown broadcast to become an individualized pardon of sin wherever there is good soil in which it can take root.[2] The circumstances necessitate some reserve in the terms used. The indicative form is intended to be used after a particular confession of particular sins, which has been preceded by a searching examination of the conscience. Both the confession and the absolution are here individualized at once, and therefore no reserve in the terms of the latter is necessary, beyond that which distinguishes the absolution as a ministerial act done on behalf of God, in whose Name it is given. [Confession, Penance. Morinus de Pœnitentia; St. Thom. Aquin. Opuscul. xxii.; Maskell on Absolution.]

ABSTINENCE. Diminution of bodily nourishment for the purpose of self-discipline; a mitigated form, therefore, of fasting. It is to be regulated by the circumstances of the individual case, such as the necessities of health, courtesy towards others, and general rules of sound sense and reason. [St. Thom. Aq., quæst. 146, art. i.; Asceticism.]

As regards what is called "Total Abstinence," it is to be noted that by the ancient custom of the Church any man who has a natural abhorrence of wine, or cannot take it without danger, is incapable of receiving priest's orders. Analogy would make a vow of Total Abstinence inconsistent with the office of the Christian priesthood.

For the application of the word in a sense that applies to married clergy, see Celibacy.

ABSTRACT. A theological term derived from logicians, and denoting quality as distinguished from and independent of person. It is opposed to Concrete, but is often used for it in Holy Scripture, as when circumcised persons or Jews are called "the Circumcision," or the captive Jews "the Captivity." It is often, also, used for the purpose of augmenting an idea; as when God is said to be Wisdom, Goodness, Justice, Holiness, rather than wise, good, just, or holy. So Christ is called our Salvation, Redemption, the Truth, the Life.

ABUNA. The title of the metropolitan of Abyssinia. It is etymologically equivalent to Abbas and Papa. The Abuna is nominated by the Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria.

ACCIDENTS. This term of ancient philosophy has been appropriated by theologians to express the sensible qualities of the consecrated elements in the Holy Eucharist. Transubstantiation involves the principle that the natural elements of bread and wine cease to exist, but that the size, colour, appearance, and taste of them yet remain. These latter are thus called the "accidents," or "species," of the bread and wine, the only substance being that which results from the work of God in causing the elements to become the Body and Blood of Christ. The application of the term is rather a scholastic refuge from a logical difficulty than an explanation of the mystery. [St. Thom. Aq., iii. quæst. 75, art. ii. and 77, art. i.; Concil. Trident. De SS. Euch. can. ii.; Catech. Trident. ii. 44, 45. Transubstantiation.]

ACCOMMODATION. A term used to express the manner in which Divine communications are adapted to the understanding, habits, and circumstances of those to whom they are made. In Patristic theology it is also called οἰκονομία (economy), and συγκατάβασις (condescension); and modern writers have defined two modes of such adaptation, [1.] the accommodation of form, [2.] the accommodation of matter.

[1.] The first of these, accommodation of form, is that adaptation of Divine Truth which consists in the representation of it under figurative or parabolical language: as, for example, when our Lord taught by direct parables, or by such language as "When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none," &c. [Matt. xii. 43]. Such also is the language used respecting God, who is incomprehensible and has neither parts nor passions, and yet is represented as sitting on a throne, as beholding men with His eyes, and as repenting, being angry, jealous, and so forth. [Anthropomorphism.] Such accommodation does not misrepresent the truth, but puts it into a form which represents it more vividly to the human understanding. So the Incarnation itself was by some of the Fathers called the Economy, as bringing the unknowable God within the range of human knowledge. Without such an accommodation, the revelation of some Divine truths would be impossible: but it is important to remember that no communication from God, whatever the language in which it is made, can possibly be inconsistent with truth.

[2.] The accommodation of matter is defined as positive or negative. Negative is when truth is imparted gradually, with a proportion of reserve suited to the circumstances of those to whom it is communicated; or as when a law is not enforced fully, but with relaxations adapted in a like manner to circumstances. Thus St. Paul feeds his converts with milk until they are able to bear strong meat [1 Cor. iii. 2]; and the indissoluble character of marriage was not strictly enforced upon the Jews because of the "hardness of their hearts" [Matt. xix. 8]. Positive accommodation is the deliberate adoption of untruths for the sake of making truth intelligible, or the adoption of wrong customs for the sake of winning persons to right ones. This is fundamentally inconsistent with the character of God, of Divine Revelation, and of our Lord as Man. And being so, no explanation of any difficult passages of Holy Scripture which is founded upon the principle of "positive accommodation" can be admitted by the Christian theologian.

[1] The rubric before the Absolution in the Visitation of the Sick, as it stood in the Prayer Book of 1549, ordered, "And the same form of absolution shall be used in all private confessions," which has been the constant practice of later times.

[2] This use of it is very clearly illustrated in the "Forms of Prayer to be used at Sea," by a rubric preceding the Confession.

ACEPHALI. Certain early schismatics so named from ἀ and κεφαλή, without a head or chief. The name has been used in a very general way, but the persons chiefly indicated by it are:— [1.] Those who refused to follow St. Cyril of Alexandria, or John the Patriarch of Antioch, at the condemnation of Nestorius by the Council of Ephesus. [2.] Certain heretics of the fifth century, whose principles were similar to those of the Eutychians. They were condemned by the Synod of Constantinople, A.D. 536. [3.] Priests who refuse to acknowledge the authority of their bishop, and bishops who refuse to acknowledge that of their metropolitans. [EUTYCHIANS.]

ACTUAL GRACE is distinguished from habitual grace as that which God gives to Christians for the purpose of doing some action acceptable to Him; habitual grace being an inherent quality making them acceptable to Him, such as the grace possessed by baptized infants. The one is grace combined with will, the other grace independent of will.

ACTUAL SIN is in a similar way distinguished from Original sin; the consent of the will, and the power to discriminate between good and evil being required. [SIN.]

ADIAPHORISTIC CONTROVERSY. A fanciful name given to the dispute about ecclesiastical customs not ordained in Holy Scripture, which agitated for a long time the followers of Luther and Melanchthon. The latter comprehended under things indifferent [ἀδιάφορα] almost all the traditions and ceremonies of the Church; being disposed to give them up for the sake of concord. The opposite opinion was defended by Flacius Illyricus, Professor of Hebrew at Wittenberg, and his followers long continued in controversy with those of Melanchthon; the two parties being called Philippists and Flacianists. [INTERIM.]

ADJURATION. The binding of a person by a solemn invocation of the Divine Name, or of something sacred from its association with God. In the one case it is express, as "I adjure thee by the living God," or "in the Name of God:" in the other it is implicit, as "I adjure thee by the gospel of Christ." It differs from an oath in not calling God to witness, and also in the fact that an oath is not in any way binding upon a person until that person has taken it.

An adjuration can only properly be used when it is used with great reverence, and for a proper purpose. It can seldom be necessary or right for a private person to use any adjuration; but the official use of it as a ministerial act is recognised in Holy Scripture: Matt. xxvi. 63, 64; Acts xix. 13. It is also recognised by the Church in the EXORCISM which precedes Baptism in all ancient baptismal offices.

ADONAI. Adonai, Lord, was the term substituted by the Jews in reading Scripture for Jehovah, from fear of incurring guilt under Exod. xx. 7. The Name JEHOVAH was uttered only in the sanctuary by the priests pronouncing the blessing, and by the high priest within the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement [Maimon. More Nevochim, i. 61], and the true pronunciation was said to have been lost. The vowels with which it is pointed do not really belong to the word, but to Adonai; when Adonai, therefore, occurs in juxtaposition with Jehovah in the sacred text, the vowels assumed by the latter are no longer those of Adonai, but of Elohim, which then becomes the substitute, e.g., Jehovih. Philo terms Jehovah the "Incommunicable Name," and even Maimonides, when he has occasion to mention it, does not venture to write it otherwise than by spelling it as the "Shem Hammephorash," the distinctly articulated, Yod, He, Vau, He. The LXX. invariably express the word by the Greek equivalent for Adonai, viz., κύριος, shewing that it was the recognised substitute for the Sacred Name when the Old Testament was translated into Greek. Adonai being a proper name and not an appellative, is always anarthrous, as is Jehovah; all other names for the Deity being affected by the article. The plural form is the expression of majesty as Rashi says [Is. xix. 3]; the longer vowel Kamets being substituted for Pathach to distinguish it from Adonai, "my lords" [Gesen. Lex.] In the Cabbala the combination "Jehovah Adonai" is isodynamical with "Amen," the letters in either case summing, as Hebrew numerals, 91. Adonai is termed by Irenæus nominabile, i.e., ῥητον as contrasted with the ἀῤῥητον, "Jehovah." [Hær. ii.]

ADOPTION (υἱοθεσία). A term of Roman law taken into the theological vocabulary of the Christian Church by St. Paul when writing to the Romans, Galatians, and Ephesians [Rom. viii. 15, 23, ix. 4; Gal. iv. 5; Eph. i. 5], and ever since used with loving reverence to signify the relation of Christians to their Heavenly Father. By the Roman law, adoption was effected by a formal act through the process properly called by the name, when a child still under the authority of its natural parent was made over to another person to whom he was henceforth to be as a son; or else by the process of Arrogation, when one who was his own master was taken into sonship by his own consent.[1] Thus, in the Christian sense, God makes a covenant with the children of men by the force of which they become "children of God, and if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ."

[1] "Cum in alienam familiam inque liberorum locum extranei sumuntur, aut per prætorem fit, aut per populum. Quod per prætorem fit, adoptio dicitur; quod per popu-

The instrumental cause of adoption in the Scriptural sense, is the Incarnation of our Lord, by which human Nature was so sanctified as to be once more in the relation to God which is expressed in Luke iii. 38, where it is said of Adam, "which was the son of God." The human Nature which our Lord took of His human mother was thus spoken of by the angel,—"that Holy Thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" [Luke i. 35]; and St. Paul shews that this relation of sonship thus acquired by the human Nature of Christ possessed a capacity of extension: "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that are under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" [Gal. iv. 4, 5]. But this capacity of Christ's sonship was not at once extended to all by the act of its acquisition in His own individual person. His Incarnation became the instrumental cause of adoption, but the formal act by which each individual person is adopted as a child of God is the act of baptism, in which they receive "the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father" [Rom. viii. 15]: "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus; for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ" [Gal. iii. 26, 27].

It must be remembered that adoption is wholly the work of God. No act of man's own could make him a son of God; but whosoever is baptized being made a member of Christ by God's blessing following on the means used, they thus "put on Christ," and in their union with Him are adopted into the sonship of God.

ADOPTIONISM. The heretical opinion that our Lord Jesus Christ is the Son of God the Father by adoption. It is opposed to the Catholic dogma that He is the "only begotten" Son of God, as stated in the Nicene Creed.

The adoptionist theory was not unknown to the early Church, being refuted by St. Cyril of Jerusalem, St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, St. Chrysostom, and St. Augustine, in the age succeeding the heresy of Arius. Thus, St. Cyril says that Christ "is the Son of God by nature, begotten of the Father, and not by adoption" [Catech. Lect. xi.]; St. Hilary that "the Son of God is not a false God, or God by adoption, or mere metaphor, but true God" [Hilar. de Trinit. v. 5]; St. Ambrose that "we do not speak of an adopted son as a son by nature, but we do say that a son by nature is a true son" [Ambros. de Incarnat. viii.]; and St. Augustine that "we to whom God has given power to become His sons are not begotten of His nature and substance as His 'only begotten,' but adopted by His love: the Apostle often using the word for no other purpose than to distinguish the 'only begotten' from the sons by adoption" [Aug. de Consens. Evang. ii. 3]. From such expressions it is sufficiently evident that adoptionism was already known in the fourth century. [Arianism.]

But it was in the eighth century, and in the Church of Spain that this heretical opinion became distinctly formalized, its chief disseminators being Elipand, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel. The latter was a subject of the Emperor Charlemagne; but the diocese of Toledo was within the bounds of the Mahometan rule, and it is probable that the theory of adoption was revived as a means of conciliating the Mahometans, and of making the reception of Christianity easier to them. They acknowledge "Deum, Dei Filium, ante omnia tempora sine initio ex Patre genitum coæternum et consubstantialem, non adoptione, sed genere," but denied that perfect union of the human nature of Christ with His Divine nature by which the Man Christ Jesus was from the beginning of the Incarnation the very Word, the eternal and only begotten Son of God. [Communicatio Idiomatum.] This was substantially a denial of the basis of Christianity, and although many followers were attracted by the new teaching, it was at once opposed by orthodox theologians as involving the same dangerous principles found in the heresy of Nestorius.

The earliest opponents of adoptionism were an abbot named Beatus, and Etherius, Bishop of Osma; but the most effective was Alcuin the friend of Charlemagne, who was summoned by the Emperor from England for the purpose of refuting Felix, and bringing him back to orthodox opinions. After a full examination of the adoptionist statements, Alcuin wrote a treatise against Felix, in seven books, and another in four books in reply to Elipand, besides letters addressed to both. His arguments are founded on the Unity of the Person of Christ, which precludes the possibility of His being at the same time Son of God by nature and Son of God by adoption. His two natures cannot make Christ two sons, for they are perfectly and inseparably united in one Person.

Adoptionism was formally condemned in the first instance by the Synod of Ratisbon [A.D. 792], where Felix abjured and anathematized his errors in presence of the assembled bishops, and of Charlemagne himself. He was, however, sent to Rome as a prisoner by the Emperor, and only obtained his liberty by making a full confession of his faith in orthodox terms, and subscribing to it before the Holy Eucharist. On returning to his diocese of Urgel, however, Felix relapsed into his former opinions, and fled out of Charlemagne's dominions to Elipand, whose diocese was in the Mahometan part of Spain. Elipand and his suffragans pleaded with the Emperor in favour of Felix, and his tenets were referred to the Council of Frankfort, which was then sitting [A.D. 794]. The heresy was condemned in the first canon of that Council, and declared to be one which "ought to be utterly rooted out of the Church" [Hard. Concil. iv. 904]. This condemnation was followed up by that of a Council held at Friuli in A.D. 796, which stated the true theology of the case, viz., that Christ is one and the same Son of man and Son of God; not putative but real Son of God; not adoptive but proper; proper and not adoptive in each of His natures, forasmuch as after His assumption of manhood, one and the same Person is inconfusibly and inseparably Son of God and of man" [Ibid. iv. 756]. The heresy was condemned again, and again retracted by Felix, at Aix-la-Chapelle, in A.D. 799; but Elipand defended it until his death.

lum arrogatio." Aulus Gellius, v. 19, where a full explanation will be found of the Roman system of adoption.

ADORATION. Exactly defined, adoration is an act of reverence, interior or exterior, towards a person entitled to receive it. The Latin adorare is supposed to come from "manum ad os mittere," kissing the hand as a sign of respect; as the corresponding Greek term, προσκυνειν, refers primarily to genuflexion. The corresponding English word of native origin, "worship," has always been, and still is, used with reference to human persons, and, of course, in an inferior sense to that with which it is used towards the Divine Persons; but the naturalized word "adoration" has been generally applied exclusively to acts of reverence towards God. Hence "adoration," or its correlative "divine worship," answers to the Λατρεία of St. Thomas Aquinas and other exact theologians.

Interior adoration is the devotion of the mind, soul, and heart; that is, of the spiritual part of our nature. Exterior adoration consists of bodily acts, such as kneeling, speaking words of prayer, singing praise, or reading Holy Scripture in the offices of the Church. The first must co-exist with the second, to make the latter acceptable as a personal offering to God; but the absence of it does not vitiate ministerial acts of adoration. [Worship, Latria, Dulia, Hyperdulia.]

ADULTERY. The sexual intercourse of a married person with a man or woman other than the married person's husband or wife; or of an unmarried person with one that is married.

The moral criminality of adultery is implied in the inspired words of Adam [Gen. ii. 24] and declared in the seventh commandment. Our Lord confirmed the former in very distinct language, as is recorded in Mark x. 7; and besides the confirmation of the seventh commandment which is implied in the same discourse, and in His general confirmation of the whole Decalogue, He gave an additional force to the commandment in question by the words "But I say unto you, that whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" [Matt. v. 28].

The punishment of adultery under the Mosaic law was death [Lev. xx. 10; Deut. xxii. 22]. Our Lord's forgiveness of the woman taken in adultery [John viii. 11] may be taken as sufficient authority for the mitigation of this punishment, and it is certain that it was abolished among Christians, although, sometimes, inflicted in Christian times under non-Christian laws. But the words of Christ do not in any degree extenuate the crime, and the Church has always condemned those guilty of it with the severest ecclesiastical censures, and enjoined the strictest penitential discipline upon them.

Several degrees of guilt are distinguished in respect to adultery by moral theologians. [1.] The most heinous form of the crime is when both the man and the woman are married. [2.] The second degree is when the woman is married, a confusion of offspring ensuing which makes the crime worse than it is per se. [3.] The third degree is when the woman is unmarried. These distinctions, however, relate rather to the social aspect of the crime than to its relation to the law of God. [Divorce.]

ADVENT. There is an old tradition, handed down by Durandus, that the season of Advent was appointed by St. Peter. [Durand. vi. 2.] But no historical trace of it is to be discovered before the time of St. Jerome and the early Sacramentaries. In the latter, and in the "Comes" of St. Jerome, epistles, gospels, and collects are found for five Sundays before Christmas, and for the Wednesdays and Fridays of the weeks included. There are Sermons De Adventu Domini by Maximus, Bp. of Turin, in the year 450, and also by Cæsarius of Arles [A.D. 501-542], which give a full account of the season; and St. Gregory of Tours writes that one of his predecessors, Perpetuus, had ordered the observance as fasts of three days in each week from the feast of St. Martin [Nov. 11] to that of the Nativity. In the Ambrosian and Mozarabic liturgies Advent also commences with St. Martin, and it was anciently known as Quadragesima Sancti Martini: from which it seems likely that the ancient Church kept a forty days' fast before Christmas, as is the habit of the Eastern Church at the present day.

The season of Advent was always observed in the same manner as Lent, but with less strictness. The Council of Maçon [A.D. 581] ordered the observance of the Monday, Wednesday, and Friday fast-days by the clergy of France; but Amalarius writes in the ninth century that Advent was kept strictly only by the religious. The Church of England retained the epistles and gospels for Wednesdays and Fridays in Advent until the Reformation of the Liturgy.

The rule by which Advent Sunday is fixed is that it is the nearest Sunday to St. Andrew's Day, that is, the first Sunday after November 26th. In the Western Church that Sunday has long been considered as the beginning of the Christian year. But the ancient Sacramentaries began it with Christmas Day; and until 1752, notwithstanding the arrangement of the Sundays in the Prayer Book, a note stated that the supputation of the year of our Lord was reckoned by the Church of England from Lady Day.

ÆON. [Gnosticism, Eternity.]

AËRIANS. A sect of heretics who derived their name and their principles from Aërius, a priest and monk of the Armenian Church, who was still living in the year 376, when St. Epiphanius wrote against him. The Aërians held the same errors respecting our Lord and the Blessed Trinity as those of the Arians; but they added to them the notion that the office of a bishop differs in no respect from that of a priest, the one being able to do all that the other can do. Aërius also opposed the observance of Easter as a Jewish superstition.

For further details see the Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.

AËTIANS. Heretics who followed the teaching of Aëtius,[1] a contentious tradesman of Antioch, who was ordained deacon by the Arian bishop Leontius about the middle of the fourth century. He taught Arianism in its boldest form, alleging that the Son differs from the Father in will as well as in substance. The heresy was condemned by the Council of Seleucia, A.D. 359. [ANOMŒANS. EUNOMIANS. Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

AFFECTIONS: "as joy and grief, fear and anger, with such like, being as it were the sundry fashions and forms of appetite," "can neither rise at the conceit of a thing indifferent, nor yet choose but rise at the sight of some things. Wherefore it is not altogether in our power whether we will be stirred with affections or no." [Hooker, E. P. i. 7.] "Appetite," the same writer goes on to describe, as "that inferior natural desire," the object of which is "whatsoever sensible good may be wished for" [ibid].

This passage appears to take too materialistic a view of the Affections in confining them to modes of the desire for sensible good, but describes them correctly as purely passive, and as in a relation of necessary dependence on the object before them. The substitution, for "Appetite," of the word Feeling avoids the error, and at the same time indicates the notions of passivity and necessary dependence. Feeling is negatively defined by Bain as any mental state, not being volition or intelligence; i.e. any state in which man is not active in relation to the world without.

[1.] Feeling and the Feelings. The Affections or Feelings (plur.) never exist by themselves in isolation, but always imply an act of transformation by the Reason, whereby alone they can become what they are. In other words, Feeling (sing.) per se as a purely passive state, can give no account of itself, cannot distinguish itself from any other state, cannot of itself assure us of its presence as opposed to its absence, is unable to distinguish different forms of itself, such as love, joy, fear, &c., until formed, determined, defined, by the Reason. Until then, it is as vague and indescribable as mere Matter destitute of any definite attributes. It is mere "inwardness" in the mind, as Matter per se is mere "outwardness" in the world. Even this amount of distinction is not possible to Feeling as such; it cannot of itself become aware even of "something outward" as felt, because the distinction of within and without is again an act of reason. Feeling as such, without the intervention of reason telling of an outward world, can only feel itself; and itself, having no definite character, until it becomes differentiated as a series of Feelings, this feeling of itself is feeling of nothing in particular, and as such is unrealizable as a state of consciousness. Until, then, a distinct object can be presented to be felt, a man to be loved, a course of action to be admired, until (in short) I feel this as contrasted with that, Feeling does not become nameable and cogitable as love, admiration, &c., as "the Feelings (plur.) or Affections." But an object can only be presented as distinct, if it be distinguished from some other object with which it is compared; and this comparison is an act of the Reason. Similarly, one feeling, such as awe, can only assume a definite character as what it is and no other, by being compared and contrasted with another feeling, (say) joy or terror, as what it is not; and this comparison is again an act of the Reason. It follows, therefore, that Feeling is either indefinite, totally devoid of attributes, or it is definite as a series of particular Feelings or Affections called up by the presentation of particular objects: in the former case it is inappreciable, in the latter it is no longer unmixed Feeling, but a series of formations by the Reason out of the passive material of Feeling, corresponding to different sets of relations into which man is brought.

[2.] The so-called appeal from Reason to Feeling is, therefore, either an appeal from something to nothing, from that which, whatever the value of its verdict, has a verdict to give, to that which has no verdict to give; or it is an appeal from the creations of Reason in one sphere (ideas, images, proofs, &c.) to the creations of the same Reason in another (the separate feelings or affections). On the other hand, it is true that in the development of reason in us, it may express itself through the medium of Feeling before it emerges in the sphere of Thought and Reflection. We may be, and often are, in possession of a truth as a sentiment before we attain it as a proposition. And hence in this way an appeal may be valid from a more rudimentary development of Reason in the form of reflection, to a higher and later attainment of the same reason in the medium of Feeling. Thus, the appeal of the Mystics from the mechanical dualism of the mediæval intellect to the ἕνωσις already manifesting itself in religious feeling, was a legitimate one. What they felt, we, their posterity, are thinking.

[3.] The Affections as the Basis of Religion. A school of German theologians, of whom Schleiermacher is perhaps the best known, have endeavoured to shelter Religion from the attacks of opponents, by withdrawing it wholly into the province of Feeling, "as the pagan gods used to rescue a nymph from her pursuer by changing her into a river or a tree." For "Religion" Schleiermacher substitutes the word "Piety," which is neither knowledge nor action, but a certain state of feeling. Feeling, according to him, is the immediate consciousness that we are completely dependent upon God; and Piety is a changeless condition of the mind, independent of time and external circumstances. This consciousness of absolute dependence involves no distinction of subject and object, but is a simple oneness of the self. This higher state of feeling cannot, however, be realized for or become cognizable by itself. It exists for us only in connection with an inferior feeling which embodies and reveals the higher: as the material chill of the earth condenses and makes visible the more ethereal dew. This feeling of the finiteness of our estate, which lies at the root of experience, prevents our being wholly lost in the feeling of absolute dependence: by limiting the latter, it makes it definite and appreciable; and whilst thus awakening it, is always present to modify it. In the association therefore of these two feelings lies the religious life.

[1] An African general of the same name flourished in the earlier half of the fifth century and supported the Donatists.

The different modes of pious feeling being made the subjects of reflection, are capable of description in propositions, and these constitute Dogma. The Redemption, e.g., is a deliverance of the soul from the inability to develope the feeling of a common life with God. Faith in Christ is the certainty of the occurrence of an event within us, viz., that our spiritual need has been supplied by Him. To preach Christ is to bear witness to our individual experience of this event, &c. There is thus no room for evidence or argument in Theology, nor any fear of the attacks of unbelief; because every dogma in Theology is nothing but the statement of an individual's experience, of which he alone is judge. The unbeliever is, accordingly, not so much deaf to argument as deficient in self-knowledge. In short, according to the saying of Luther, which was adopted by this school, Pectus facit theologum.

The criticism applied by a contemporary to Schleiermacher was coarse, but apt: "If religion consists in modes of the feeling of absolute dependence, then the dog is the best Christian." We may paraphrase this by saying, that feeling cannot be by itself a permanent basis for religion, because man in relation to God is not merely passive and receptive, but active, i.e., as a rational agent. And this is only saying that man holds communion with his Maker on that side of his nature in virtue of which he is, more truly than on any other, the divine image.

A further objection to the absorption of religion into states of the affections is, that it effaces all definite attributes from the conception of God, and "reduces religion to a prolonged monotonous sigh." The eyes may be lifted up, but they know not whither: the breast may be thrilled with awe, but is forbidden to say of whom. [See Schleiermacher, Reden über Religion, and Die Glaubenslehre; British Quarterly Review, May 1849; Hase, Dogmatik, § 44. On the analogous results of a theory of feeling as applied to morals and politics, see North British Review for March 1868, "Popular Philosophy in relation to Life." Mysticism, Pietism, Quietism, Molinist, &c.]

AFFINITY. The relationship contracted between a husband and his wife's blood relatives, or between a wife and her husband's blood relatives. By the ancient canon law affinity is contracted by unlawful intercourse as well as by that of marriage.

Within certain degrees affinity is laid down as an impediment to marriage (as well as blood relationship) by the Law of God, as stated in the 18th chapter of Leviticus. The principle there laid down was embodied in the canon law, which anciently forbad marriage between persons related within the first four degrees of affinity. The existing canon law of the Church of England is stated in the "Table of Kindred and Affinity," set forth in 1563, and endorsed by the 99th canon. [Consanguinity; Degrees, Forbidden.]

AFFINITY, SPIRITUAL. By the ancient law of the Church a kind of affinity was contracted between a god-parent and his or her child, and marriage between them was forbidden in consequence. The same law also held good respecting a person baptizing and the person baptized by him. The present law of the Roman Church is laid down by a decree of the Council of Trent, Sess. 24, cap. 2.

AFFUSION. The administration of Holy Baptism by pouring water on the person to be baptized, instead of by immersion or sprinkling. [Baptism.]

AGAPÆ [ἀγάπαι]. The Agapæ were feasts of the early Church, of apostolical origin, though not of divine institution, and were universally connected with the celebration of the Holy Eucharist. St. Jude alludes to "feasts of charity," or ἀγάπαι, which were doubtless the feasts here treated of. Their origin appears to have been as follows:—The first believers lived together, and had all things common [Acts ii. 44], but when, from the increase of their numbers, and from the diversity of the social ranks out of which converts to Christianity were drawn, a strict and literal community of goods became impracticable, this one common meal was retained or came in its room, as an emanation from and witness to that principle of love and charity which found its fullest expression in having all things common.[1]

From early sources we learn that the Agape was of a plain and frugal character. Pliny the Younger, governor of Bithynia, in his famous letter to Trajan [A.D. 104], says that the Christians were in the habit of meeting, firstly, before daybreak on certain days, and singing alternately a hymn to Christ as God, and that, secondly, later in the day they partook in common of a simple and innocent meal.[2] The materials of the feast were partly or entirely furnished by the oblations of bread and wine made by the wealthy, after a sufficient portion had been set aside for the due celebration of the divine liturgy. Whether the feast preceded or followed the Holy Eucharist is a difficult point to determine: the general testimony of antiquity points to the latter. St. Jerome says that the Christians when they met in church made their oblations separately; and, after the communion, whatever remained of those sacrifices they ate and consumed in a common supper together.[3] In the fourth century it became the custom to mark the anniversaries of martyrs by a celebration of the Holy Eucharist, and this was often followed by a love-feast. Of the licentiousness which sometimes accompanied them, St. Augustine complains strongly.[1] The stringency of the rules on the subject of fasting before Communion is inconsistent with a preceding agape. St. Chrysostom [A.D. 398] writes: "They say that I gave the Communion to some after eating; if I have done this let my name be wiped out of the catalogue of bishops, and not be written in the book of orthodox faith: since, lo, if I have done any such thing, Christ also will cast me out of His kingdom. St. Augustine [A.D. 396] says: "It seemed good to the Holy Spirit, namely, for the honour of so great a Sacrament, that the Lord's Body should enter the mouth of a Christian previous to other food, and for this it is that this custom is observed throughout the whole world." The third Council of Carthage [A.D. 397] has one express canon to this purpose:[2] "That the Sacrament of the altar be never celebrated by any but such as are fasting, except on one anniversary day, when the Supper of the Lord is solemnized." More modern writers,[3] however, assert that the feast preceded the Communion in accordance with the practice of Christ Himself, who first partook of the Last Supper with His twelve disciples, and then instituted the Sacrament of His Body and Blood; and this view certainly tallies best with that passage in the First Epistle to the Corinthians [1 Cor. xi. 18-22], where St. Paul reproves them, because when they met together for the Lord's Supper they did not wait for each other, but every one took his own supper, and one was hungry and another was drunken. Bingham arrives at the conclusion that there was no certain rule in the matter, but that the first Christians sometimes had their feast before, sometimes after the Communion.[4] For the first three centuries these love-feasts were held in church; but it was in consequence of the abuses that had grown up that the First Council of Laodicea [A.D. 372] made a law against having them there, forbidding any to spread tables or eat in the house of God; and twenty-five years later the Third Council of Carthage [A.D. 395] forbade the clergy to feast in a church, unless it were by chance on a journey, or for want of other entertainment.

[1] Chrysos. Hom. 27, in 1 Cor.
[2] Plin. lib. 10, Ep. 97.
[3] Hieron. in 1 Cor. xi. 20.

The heathen charged the Christians with abominable uncleanness at their assemblies, with holding Thyestæan orgies, feeding upon human flesh and infants' blood; and though these extravagant charges were successfully refuted and proved to be calumnies by the early apologists, Athenagoras,[5] Tertullian,[6] Justin Martyr,[7] &c.: yet there is little doubt that it was owing to the insobriety and gluttony sometimes displayed at these agapæ, that it was found necessary to suppress them, and that bishops and councils exerted themselves much with this view during the latter part of the fourth century, as St. Augustine says in his letter to Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage.[8]

But these celebrations, when dissevered from their necessary connection with the Holy Eucharist, and forbidden to be held in church, had become in the eyes of the multitude a substitute for the heathen parentalia, and had taken such hold on the laity that their abolition could not be effected at once. They were not finally forbidden in France till the Council of Orleans [A.D. 541]; and, later still, in the seventh century, the Quinisextan Council in Trullo [A.D. 692] was compelled to reinforce the canon of Laodicea under pain of excommunication.

A relic of the original agapæ remains in the blessed bread which is distributed after the Eucharist in many French churches, and which was commonly given in the mediæval Church of England. [ANTIDORON.]

AGAPETÆ. A name given, in the primitive Church, to the virgins who lived in common, and served the Church. Some scandal arose from communities of Agapetæ living in the same establishment with communities of priests and monks. St. Jerome [Ep. xxii.] asks, "Unde agapetarum pestis in Ecclesiam introivit?" St. Chrysostom also wrote strongly on the dangers attending such double communities, and they were forbidden by the Council of Lateran held under Innocent III. in the year 1139. The Agapetæ appear to have been distinct from the deaconesses of the early Church.

AGAPETÆ. A sect of Gnostic heretics which arose about A.D. 395, and was principally composed of women, who went astray on an exaggerated interpretation of the principle, that "to the pure all things are pure."

AGENDA. 1. In the mediæval Church the term usually designated the mass for the dead, "Agenda Mortuorum;" 2. Notices of business and motions before convocation; 3. Things to be done—the practical parts of religion—in distinction to credenda, matters of belief; and 4. The ritual of a Church as contained in its ceremonial and service books. The term, as applied to the Eucharist, is found in the 9th canon of the Council of Carthage [A.D. 390]; and, as agenda mortuorum, in the Antiphonary going by the name of St. Gregory.

AGNOËTÆ. Two sects of heretics are known by this name. [1.] Followers of Theophronius of Cappadocia, who denied that God has knowledge of the future. These arose A.D. 370. [2.] A sect of Monophysites who branched off from the parent heresy about the year 535, on the opinion that the WORD had no knowledge respecting the day of judgment; an opinion founded on a mistaken interpretation of Mark xiii. 32. [See Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

ALBIGENSES [Albigeois]. A French sect which originated at Albi in Languedoc in the twelfth century. They appear in history under many other names, such as Petrobrussians, Cathari,

[1] St. Aug. de Moribus Eccles. Cathol. can. 34. tom. i. p. 331.
[2] Conc. Carth. III. can. 29.
[3] Suicerus, Thesaur. Eccles. sub. ἀγαπή. Estius in 1 Cor. xi. 20.
[4] Bingham, Antiq. xv. 7, 7.
[5] Athenag. Leg. p. 34.
[6] Tertull. Apol. cap. 7, 11.
[7] Justin. Apol. 1, 2.
[8] Aug. Epist. 64, ad Aurelium.

Arnaudists, Bonhommes, &c., and some of these names probably represent offshoots from the parent sect. They were in some way derived from the Paulicians, and were deeply infected with Manichæan errors. Opposing the Church in respect to almost all its doctrines and ceremonies they became very obnoxious to the orthodox, and were condemned successively by the Council of Lombez [A.D. 1176], that of Lateran [A.D. 1179], another of Lateran [A.D. 1215], and the Council of Toulouse [A.D. 1228]. In the end they became very troublesome to the Crown of France, and were in a state of constant rebellion, which brought down upon them the full power of the sword. They were exterminated, with such cruelty as was too common in those ages, early in the thirteenth century. [See the Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES for further particulars.]

ALEXANDRIA, SCHOOL OF. The schools of Alexandria were many in the three first centuries of the Christian era. They all partook, in greater or less degree, of that which had ever been the characteristic feature of Alexandrian learning, and were of a critical rather than of an imaginative complexion. The principal schools were the Neo-Platonic, the Eclectic, and the Christian or Catechetical, the subject of this article. The influence of this school cannot be properly understood without referring to the peculiar character of the population. Syncreticism was the principle that pervaded the whole intellectual history of Alexandria; the causes that encouraged it being laid in the very foundation of the place. It was built by Alexander, B.C. 332, and designed by him as the southern metropolis of the Macedonian empire; and it rapidly superseded Athens as the centre of Greek civilization. It was colonized at once by the indigenous Egyptian race, the Greek, and (more numerously than either) by a Jew population, who, as mercenaries, had assigned to them two out of the five districts of the city. Philo computed the Jew population at a million, μυριάδων ἑκατόν, for which Mangey proposes ἑπτά. Diodorus Siculus only places the entire population of freemen at 300,000. The Greek or residential quarter occupied a third of the entire area, with a circuit of about fifteen miles. It contained the famous library consumed under Caliph Omar as fuel for baths, the books as he said being useless if only confirmatory of the Koran, pestilential if adverse. The Museum also was here, designed originally as a place of resort for learned leisure, but converted into a place of systematic instruction by the more practical Roman. Alexandria seemed destined from the first to amalgamate the different forms of philosophical and religious opinion. It was with this view that Alexander built a temple of Isis in close juxtaposition with the Grecian temples; and his successors founded the museum and library to receive and perpetuate the literature of a mixed population. Thus the civilization of man which unfolded its first germs in Egypt, once more collected these scattered elements of thought; and theories that owed their origin to Aryan immigrants into Egypt came back again variously developed, as the wild flowers of warmer climes are improved by European skill, and are sent back again to their native habitats, radiant with more varied colouring and "flore pleno." The eclectic process had been going on from the beginning, though its origination is usually attributed to Ammonius Saccas [A.D. 231]; and so it always has been; principles, whether right or wrong, long float loosely upon the minds of men and hover upon the lip until the destined man stands forth and gives his name to a novel system that adds another element to the intellectual history of man. [Encyclop. Metrop. xi. 209, Plotinus.] Thus Clement, writing full thirty years before Ammonius began to draw attention to his system, says,—"But in speaking of philosophy, I mean not Stoic nor Platonic, Epicurean nor Aristotelian, but whatsoever things have been well put by these sects, teaching goodness with religious knowledge, all this (τὸ ἐκλεκτικον) collectively I call philosophy." [Strom. i. 7.] It was a principle of the Alexandrian school to extract good from everything. The DISCIPLINA ARCANI had been unable to veil sacred truth entirely from heathen gaze; therefore the catechist in teaching secular knowledge took care that it had its definite bearing upon divine wisdom. While Origen taught pagan philosophy to Gregory of Neocæsarea he led him on insensibly to adopt the Christian faith. [Eus. H. E. vi. 18.] Theon, as Bishop of Alexandria, [A.D. 290] charges those about the court to be careful not to give unnecessary offence. The librarian should make himself master of every branch of literature, incidentally commend the Scriptures, introduce the name of Christ, and, as opportunity offered, disclose the real dignity of His Nature. [Newm. Ar. p. 73.] It was at Alexandria that the first principles of Hellenic thought were traced back to Moses by Aristobulus; the hymns of Orpheus and Musæus, and the Sibylline verses were as sagas that travestied deep truths revealed to God's people from the beginning. A figurative meaning began to be sought in everything. The Egyptian hieroglyphics were allegories. The Stoic philosophy had long made use of allegory to soften down and rationalize the absurdities of heathen mythology. The same method was applied by Philo to the sacred writings, and an impulse was given to the allegorical exposition of Scripture that formed so marked a feature in Alexandrian hermeneutics, and served to supplement the "disciplina arcani."

The Church of Alexandria was founded by St. Mark, and Jerome [Catal. Scr. 36] says that there was a school of instruction there and teachers from the time of the Evangelist. The first name that is given by a writer of no high authority [Philip. Sidens. ap. Dodw. Iren. Galland. B. P. IX. xi.] is that of Athenagoras the Apologist. There is greater certainty that Pantænus, the disciple of Apostolic men, was head of the catechetical school about A.D. 179 [Eus. H. E. v. 10]. He was of Hebrew extraction, but as he was either a Stoic [ib.] or Pythagorean [Phil. Sid.] philosopher, Clement's appellation of Sicilian bee [Strom. I. i] may not improbably allude to the place of his birth. He did not consider it to be incumbent upon him to give up his philosophical studies on becoming a Christian. While he was head of the catechetical school, Julian [A.D. 179], Patriarch of Alexandria, was petitioned by the Indians, who were most probably Æthiopians or Nubians, to send to them a Christian instructor. Pantænus was the teacher employed; and from that time may be dated the missionary efforts of the Church of Alexandria. After some years' absence, Pantænus resumed his post at the head of the school, and died A.D. 212. The effect of the school may be traced in the development of the Alexandrian Church. When Demetrius became bishop on the death of Julian [A.D. 189], he had under him only the twelve metropolitan presbyters [Eutych. Orig. Eccles. Alex.] and no suffragan sees; but during his incumbency the metropolis of southern Christendom increased so as to surpass in number of population and churches the sees of Antioch and Ephesus. [Wetzer u. Welte, K. Lex. art. Demetrius.] Yet there were enormous difficulties in the way of progress. Egyptian superstitions were inveterate; Jewish prejudices almost invincible. Philosophy regarded with contemptuous hate the simple teaching of Christian faith. Gnosticism, as a strange mixture of heathenism and the more superficial elements of Christianity, stood in bitter antagonism with the Church; and the blood-red hand of persecution allowed but little respite to the harassed churches of Egypt. Basilidian Gnostics swarmed to such a degree that Hadrian mistook them for the entire body of Christians in Egypt. A succession of three such men as Pantænus, Clement, and Origen, showed that they were fully equal to the work before them; acting as they did under the intelligent superintendence of Demetrius, a man of great practical and administrative skill, though of not much learning, having been occupied through his early years as a vine-grower. Under these men a scheme of evangelical gnosis was developed that threw into the shade the Basilidian and Valentinian medleys. Their establishment became the chief Christian school of the whole world. Every branch of profane learning was included in its curriculum, as a preparative for Christian instruction; while Christian doctrine was made the subject of close and accurate study, both in its theoretical and practical bearing. Crowds of educated heathen flocked to hear these Christian philosophers of the schools, and were gradually drawn within the fold of Christ. Heresy was gradually extirpated, and a multitude of sees were erected in desert places, as dependencies of the patriarchate of Alexandria.

It was during the episcopate of Demetrius, most probably, that catechumens were regularly classified according to the progress made. While the heathen were debarred from entering the porch of the church, the lowest grade of catechumens were admitted within, and having permission to hear the prayers, of which they were partly the object, and the sermons, they were termed ἀκροώμενοι, "hearers." Next being allowed to join in prayers, and receive the imposition of hands they were "worshippers," γονυκλίνοντες. Lastly, within a short time of their baptism, they were taught the Lord's Prayer and the Creed as φωτιζόμενοι. [CATECHUMENS.]

Clement of Alexandria was born in heathenism, at Athens as it has been said. An intense thirst for knowledge impelled him to make himself master of literature in all its branches. Egyptian and Grecian antiquities had been thoroughly explored by him, and he had facilities that have never been known since the destruction of the Alexandrian library. Truth was the object of his search, and God's mercy led him to the truth in His Church. Like his predecessor, and under his guidance, he still carried on his secular studies after his conversion; and he made it part of his work to vary his teaching by such rays of reflected light as heathen antiquity could throw on the doctrines and traditions of the Church. He fixed his residence at Alexandria for the express purpose of profiting by the instruction of Pantænus, [Eus. H. E. v. 11], whom he succeeded [A.D. 180]. His instruction was most methodical; and he modified it to suit each particular intellect with which he was brought in contact—the teacher's highest praise. In him deep and comprehensive erudition was combined with refined Christian wisdom. The eloquent teacher of Christian ethics shines forth conspicuously in the closing section of his "Cohortatio." This treatise and the "Pædagogus" very possibly contain the substance of catechetical lectures.

Among the many valuable characters formed by Clement were Origen, his successor, and Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, who always spoke of him with filial affection, and declared the debt that both he and his friend Origen owed to his teaching. [Eus. H. E. vi. 14.]

Origen, surnamed from his powers of studious endurance ἀδαμάντιος, and by later writers χαλκέντερος, was born at Alexandria of Christian parents. From his earliest years he was brought up as it were for his future labours. His father daily made him learn by heart passages of Scripture. When still young he heard Pantænus. He was a youth of seventeen when his father Leonidas suffered martyrdom under Sulpicius Severus, and his family property was confiscated. He then applied himself more closely to the grammatical studies that had been commenced under his father, those studies embracing the whole encyclopædia of literature; and he shortly commenced teaching. [Eus. H. E. vi. 2.] While the catechetical school was closed in time of persecution, two young heathens, Plutarch, afterwards martyr, and Heraclas, the next patriarch of Alexandria, came to him for Christian instruction; he discharged the duty of catechist so ably that Demetrius appointed him to the superintendence of the school vacated by Clement; who from a real sense of duty, both to save a labourer and to rescue the persecutor from blood-guiltiness, when persecuted in one city fled into another, and had retired to Cappadocia. Origen, taking a different view of duty, was instant in seeking out Confessors and Martyrs, and exhorting them to contend nobly for the faith; many of them having been his pupils [Euseb. H. E. vi. 3-5]. He carried on with diligence the work of instruction in general literature and Christian doctrine [A.D. 202], finding time also for study on his own account. At length his health gave way under hard mental work and a severe bodily ἄσκησις, and leaving Alexandria for a time he went to Rome. But he could be ill spared, and [A.D. 212] he was soon at his post again in the catechetical school. In the persecution under Caracalla, Origen fled to his friend Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, who had also been his fellow student. Contrary to the canons of the Church he received from him ordination, for which offence he was synodically censured on his return to Alexandria, and he then finally left the place. Heraclas succeeded him, and on his promotion to the see of Alexandria [A.D. 232] Dionysius, his successor in the patriarchate, after an incumbency of fifteen years, received from him the charge of the school. The record of the school under Dionysius would have been especially valuable, as nearly synchronizing with the rise of the eclectic system under Ammonius Saccas, but it has unfortunately perished. Possibly it may have been closed for a time, since Dionysius has recorded the saying that in his day, owing to the disturbed state of the population, it was easier to journey from east to west than to have gone from one part of Alexandria to the other. [Eus. H. E. vii. 21.]

Little is known of the school after this period beyond the names that stand in succession as principals. Athenodorus, Pierius, Theognostus [v. Athanas. de Syn.], Achillas, Serapion, Peter, Patriarch and Martyr, Didymus, an instance of erudition mastered by one totally blind [340-395], and Rhodon, the instructor of Philip of Side. Arius the heresiarch also seems to have held high office in it. [Theod. H. E. i. 2.] The Catechetical School ceased to be a school of learning as adult converts from heathenism became more rare. The causes of its decline may also be traced back to the peculiar notions of Origen, and the controversies to which they gave rise; as well as to the fiercer heats produced by the Arian, Nestorian, and Monophysite heresies. Before the middle of the fourth century it had relapsed into its first condition as a nursing school for younger neophytes. [Matter, Ecole d'Alexandrie. Guerike, Schol. Alexandr. Dodwell, Diss. Cypr. vi. 11, in Iren. Oxon. 1689, 488, 497. Neale, E. Ch. i. 3. Le Quien, Oriens Chr. Gieseler, K. Gesch. § 60. Gieseler, Dogm. Gesch. § 11. Neander, K. Gesch. IV. iii. Newman's Arians, i. 3.]

ALEXANDRINE CODEX. A very ancient Greek MS. of the Old and New Testament, formerly belonging to the patriarchal library of Alexandria, and probably written in that city, but now preserved in the British Museum. It is known among biblical critics as Codex "A."

This MS. was presented to Charles I. by Cyril Lucar (then Patriarch of Constantinople, but previously of Alexandria), in 1628, and by the hands of Sir Thomas Rowe, the English ambassador at Constantinople. It remained in the Royal Library, where it was numbered 1116, until that valuable collection became part of the library of the British Museum in the year 1757.

The Alexandrine Codex is written on thin vellum in capital letters, the material and the writing being of the most beautiful description found in ancient books. It is about 13 inches high, 10 wide, and is bound in four volumes, the first three of which contain the Old Testament, and the fourth the New Testament. Some other ecclesiastical writings are also contained in each volume. The following is a list of the whole contents in the order in which they are written in the MS.:—

Genesis.
Exodus.
Leviticus.
Numbers.
Deuteronomy.
Joshua.
Judges.
Ruth.
4 Books Kings.
2 Books Chronicles.
Hosea.
Joel.
Amos.
Obadiah.
Jonah.
Micah.
Nahum.
Habakkuk.
Zephaniah.
Haggai.
Zechariah.
Malachi.
Isaiah.
Jeremiah.
Baruch.
Lamentations.
Epistle of Jeremiah.
Ezekiel.
Daniel.
Bel and Dragon.
Susannah.
Esther.
Tobit.
Judith.
1 Esdras.
Ezra.
Nehemiah.
4 Books Maccabees.
Epistle of St. Athanasius to Marcellinus.
The Psalter.
Hymns (including the Gloria in Excelsis).
Job.
Proverbs.
Ecclesiastes.
Song of Solomon.
Wisdom.
Ecclesiasticus.
4 Evangelists.
Acts.
James.
1 Peter.
2 Peter.
1, 2, 3 John.
Jude.
Romans.
1, 2 Corinthians.
Galatians.
Ephesians.
Philippians.
Colossians.
1, 2 Thessalonians.
Hebrews.
1, 2 Timothy.
Titus.
Philemon.
Revelation.
1, 2 Epistles of St. Clement.
18 Psalms of Solomon.

Of the New Testament about sixteen folios are missing at the beginning, St. Matthew commencing at the word ἐξέρχεσθε in xxv. 6, one is missing in St. John,—vi. 50 to viii. 52,—and three in 2nd Corinthians, from iv. 13 to xii. 6. The Old Testament is nearly complete.

Each folio of the MS. is written on both sides, and each page is in two columns; and the Eusebian canons, with the Ammonian sections, or κεφάλαια, are marked in the margin. There is also some ornamentation, of which a portion has a distinctly Egyptian character. [Cowper, Cod. Alexand. Introd. xxiii.] The writing is much faded in some parts, but not anywhere so much so as to be actually illegible.

The following inscription is contained on a fly-leaf of paper at the beginning of the first volume:

"Liber iste Scripturæ Sacræ Novi et Veteris Testamenti prout ex traditione habemus est scriptus manu Theclæ, nobilis fœminæ Ægyptiæ, ante mille et trecentos annos circiter paulo post Concilium Nicænum. Nomen Theclæ in fine libri erat exaratum, sed extincto Christianismo in Ægypto a Mahometanis, et libri unà Christianorum in similem sunt reducti conditionem, extinctum ergo et Theclæ nomen, et laceratum, sed memoria et traditio recens observat. ✠ Cyrillus Patriarch. Constanti."

An ancient Arabic note on the back of the first folio also states that the MS. was written by the hand of Thecla the martyr. If this tradition were correct, the MS. must have been produced in the early part of the fourth century, Thecla being one of the martyrs of Palestine, and contemporary with Eusebius. The tradition has not been disproved, but the general opinions of critics are that the MS. is of later date. Dr. Grabe considered it to have been written not long after the Council of Nicæa. Archbishop Ussher assigned it to the middle of the fourth century, some years before the death of St. Basil in A.D. 378. Mill and Walton thought it even earlier. Tregelles and Cowper agree in thinking it belongs to the middle of the fifth century. There seems, however, some probability that it was one of the copies written under the direction of Eusebius by command of the Emperor Constantine [De vita Const. iv. 36]; and the tendency to give late dates to MSS. of the Holy Scriptures is one which has been so unreasonably indulged in, that where it comes into conflict with ancient tradition it should be received with caution.

The Codex Alexandrinus has been printed in facsimile under the editorship of Woide in 1786, The O. T. by Baber in 1816; and in 1860, the N. T. portion, in a portable form, was re-edited from Woide's edition by Cowper. The Introduction of the latter may be referred to for a very full account of the history and criticism of the MS.

ALLEGORICAL interpretation assumes that something is intended—usually something more spiritual—different from that which the words or form of speech express. The sense thus elicited is either something different from the primary import of the words—e.g. Gal. iv. 24, ἅτινά ἐστιν ἀλληγορούμενα; or such that, under the obvious signification, there lies a yet deeper meaning, or many deeper meanings—e.g. Eph. v. 32, marriage is "a great mystery." The allegory, accordingly, expresses or explains one thing under the image of another:[1]—the Song of Songs, for instance, as signifying the relation of Christ to the Church; Isaac bearing the wood for the sacrifice, as setting forth a scene during Christ's Passion. To this head some reduce the type, which, however, is more properly a concealed prophecy explained by its completion—e. g. Jonah [St. Matt. xii. 40]; the brazen serpent [St. John iii. 14]. [Prophecy.] The Allegory differs from the Metaphor in that the latter is concerned with part only of a proposition. It differs from the parable in form rather than in essence, as containing an historical or literally true sense; while the Parable, although "never transgressing the actual order of things natural," is a fable. In the Allegory, the thing signifying and the thing signified are blended together; in the Parable they are kept distinct. Ps. lxxx. 8-16 is an Allegory; Isa. v. 1-6, resting on the same image, is a Parable. [See Trench On the Parables.]

[1] Suidas defines the allegory—ἡ μεταφορά, ἄλλο λέγον τὸ γράμμα, καὶ ἄλλο τὸ νόημα.

ALLELUIA. The Greek and Latin form of the Hebrew Hallelujah, Praise ye the Lord. The adoption of this simple, but technically expressive word by the Church receives an early illustration from Rev. xix. 6, "And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." But St. Jerome is the first writer who refers to it as being actually used in Divine Service. It was at first only sung at Easter by the Western Church; but the Eastern Church used it more freely, and St. Jerome mentions its use at the funerals of holy persons. St. Gregory ordered the Alleluia to be used constantly in the celebration of Divine service, and was reproached for introducing a Greek custom, but he claimed the authority of his predecessor Damasus for the usage. For some time it was used at the burial of the dead, and even in Lent, but this was forbidden by the Council of Toledo [A.D. 633].

In our first Prayer Book the ancient custom of the Church of England of singing the Alleluia in its original form was continued, as also that of singing it only from Easter to Trinity. In 1552 it was altogether expunged, and restored in the English words "Praise ye the Lord" in 1559. "The Lord's name be praised" was added to the Scottish Prayer Book in 1637, and to the English in 1661.

ALMIGHTY. This word, like its Latin equivalent Omnipotens, represents the LXX. Παντοκράτωρ, which in its turn represents "The Mighty God" and "The Lord God of hosts" of the Hebrew Scriptures.

It is an appellative of God, used by Himself in making His covenant with Abraham [Gen. xvii. 1], and frequently found afterwards in Holy Scripture, especially in the Book of Job and the Revelation. It appears in the earliest known form of the Christian Creed, that given by Irenæus [Hær. i. 10], and in nearly every subsequent one that has come down to us.

Thus used it indicates comprehensively the relation of the objective Creative power of God to the subjective phenomena of all existences that are not God. Giving force to the word κρατεῖν (which is represented in the Greek), as well as to the Latin and English forms, this relation is to be taken as threefold: [1] Comprehensive, as containing all things; [2] Originative, as creating all things; [3] Preservative, or Providential, as sustaining all things. [Theophil. ad Autolyc. i. 4. Cyril Jer. Catech. iv. Gregor. Nyss. Or. ii. c. Eunom.] Hence it is the highest appellative of the Deity, and as such is used in the eternal praises of Heaven. [Rev. iv. 8; xix. 6.]

The term applies to the First Person of the Holy Trinity as the original fountain of all being, and therefore the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds say "The Father Almighty;" but since He communicates His power to the Second Person by eternal generation, and to the Third Person by procession, therefore the Athanasian hymn enlarges the statement, and declares, "So likewise the Father is Almighty, the Son Almighty, and the Holy Ghost Almighty; and yet there are not three Almighties, but one Almighty."

ALMS. The word is a contraction from the Greek ἐλεημοσύνη, mercy. The German almosen, the French aumone, and the old English almose, shew how the final word has been arrived at. We use it now as a plural that has no singular; but it was originally a true singular, notwithstanding its apparent plural form, and as such appears in our Authorized Version. [Acts iii. 3. Shakespeare also uses "an alms."]

It will be convenient to consider the subject under the heads of Scriptural Authority, and History.

I. Scriptural Authority. [1.] The express commands of God, His Son, the Apostles, &c., as Deut. xv. 11; Prov. v. 15, 16; Matt. v. 42, vi. 2, 3, 19, xix. 21; Luke vi. 30, xii. 33; Rom. xii. 13; 1 Cor. xvi. 2. [2.] Promises of blessing upon the bountiful, as Prov. xix. 17, xxviii. 27; Eccl. xi. 1, 2; 2 Cor. ix. 6, 7; 1 Tim. vi. 18, 19. [3.] Threatenings of punishment upon the covetous and stony-hearted, as Prov. xi. 24, xxi. 13, xxviii. 27; 2 Cor. ix. 6.

II. History. The various provisions made in the Mosaic code for the support of the poor would partake more of the nature of a poor-law than a voluntary offering: a rate, rather than a contribution. The release of the debtor every seventh year [Deut. xv. 1-6], the leaving the corners of the field ungathered [Lev. xix. 9], the right of the poor to what grew during the year of rest [Ex. xxiii. 11], and similar regulations, could only be included under the head of alms in that they formed a provision for the poor: the voluntary self-sacrifice which we attach to the word is wanting. But the duty of giving alms, besides the payments required by the law, was recognised before Christ. Our Lord and His disciples practised alms-giving [John xiii. 29]. In the early church it was reduced to a system. For the proper administration of relief to the poor, among other objects [Acts vi. 1], the diaconate was instituted. The disciples at Antioch made a general collection for the impoverished church at Jerusalem [A.D. 43: Acts xi. 29]. So also did the disciples of Macedonia and Achaia [A.D. 60: Rom. xv. 26]. And St. Paul especially urges that this practice should be regular and systematic, and not fitful and impulsive: that the contributions should be habitually made weekly in small sums, rather than in larger donations at special occasions of excitement. "Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come" [1 Cor. xvi. 2]. And we have evidence that this was done at the weekly services of the early church. Justin Martyr describes the collections during the Holy Communion[1] [A.D. 150]. Chrysostom mentions the custom, and indeed urges it, of bestowing alms on the poor at entering a church.[2] In the fourth century deaconesses collected and administered alms for prisoners. Frequent journeys were made to carry collections of alms to suffering brethren, after the Apostolic example. So Sisinnius went from Gaul "ingenti pecunia" to assist the monks of Palestine, and from thence to Egypt on a like errand [Baron., A.D. 406, xxxv.]. We are told that the Emperor Anastasius attempted to bribe Theodosius in a subtle way by offering him thirty pounds for the poor [ib., A.D. 511, xvi.]. The distribution of the alms was not confined to members of the Church, although the injunction to do good, "specially to them of the household of faith," was not forgotten. Pope Gregory the Great, writing to John, Bishop of Ravenna [A.D. 592], says, "Nobis considerandum fuit, quia misericordia prius fidelibus ac postea Ecclesiæ hostibus est facienda" [Lib. ii. Ep. 32]. The practice was recommended to the lapsed, inter alia, as a solace, a means of grace, and a comfort in penitence. In the English Church the weekly collection has always been recognised; since, as well as before, the Reformation.

In addition to the usual collections of alms, extraordinary ones have also been customarily made in England by means of briefs:[3] and as a specimen of the objects for which these briefs were issued, the following extracts are given. They are from a copious list in the register of Elton, Hunts:—1661, for the Protestant Church in Lithuania, 11s. 3d.; 1666, for the sad fire at London, £10; 1671, for the English captives under the Hungarians, 5s. 1d.; 1679, for St. Paul's, London, £2, 13s. 9d.; 1680, for redemption of English slaves at Algiers, £3, 5s. 6d.; 1681, towards training up ministers for the Protestant churches in Lower Poland, 8s. 6d.; 1699, for a fire in Drury Lane, London, 5s. 4d.

It should be stated that some sectarians have forbidden almsgiving. The Manichees did so, as administering to a bad principle. "Eo dementiæ pervenerunt, ut execrarentur eos qui pauperibus eleemosynam darent, quod eo actu faverent mali principio."[4] But perhaps both they and the Arians were bountiful to those who sided with them. Bale[5] names also the Publicans, and the Family of Love, as opponents of this duty. Those of the Anabaptists, who maintained a community of goods, of course rejected almsgiving [Art. xxxviii.].

ALTAR. The structure of stone or wood upon which the Holy Eucharist is consecrated. The name of altar is given to it on account of the

[1] Opera, Cologne, 1686, 98 E. Apol. 2.

[2] Hom. 25 and Hom. 1 on 2 Tim., quoted by Bingham, iv. 517, 518.

[3] The collection of money under briefs became very general in the seventeenth century. A more inconvenient or expensive machinery could not have been devised. Upwards of half the amount collected was usually absorbed in the cost of collecting. In the Statute, 4 Anne, many of the grosser abuses of the plan were abolished, and fresh regulations passed. These were in turn abolished by 9 Geo. IV. The right to issue briefs still exists, but the Crown has issued none since the year 1854.

[4] Baronius, iii. 277, xxix. Cf. ib. iv. 356, xl. and vi. 406, li.

[5] Mystery of Iniquity, 53; Geneva, 1545. He quotes Aug. de Mor., Manich., lib. ii.

sacrificial character of the Eucharist; but it is very commonly called "The Lord's Table," as being not only that from which the Holy Eucharist is offered to the Lord, but also that from which the Lord distributes His good gifts to men. So the Jews used both terms indifferently. [Mal. i. 7.]

The Eucharist being so distinctly commemorative of the sacrifice of our Lord's death, the idea of sacrifice was of course associated with it from the first [EUCHARIST. SACRIFICE], and hence also the idea of an altar with its celebration. [Heb. xiii. 10.] But the comprehensive character of the Eucharist is such as to make the idea of the Christian altar a congeries of the ideas belonging to several parts of the Temple furniture, rather than to any particular one. The altar of burnt sacrifice was associated with the sacrifice of the "Lamb as it had been slain" [Rev. v. 6]; the table of shewbread with the Bread which is broken and the Wine which is poured forth to become the Body and Blood of Christ; the altar of incense with the Church's greatest act of prayer; the ark and mercy-seat with the Eucharistic Presence of the Lord. It seems to have been the last of these upon which the mind of the early Church rested in its idea of a Christian altar; and the most ancient altar known, that of St. John Lateran at Rome, is, substantially, in the form of the ark, a hollow chest, on the lid or mensa of which the Eucharist was celebrated. This altar is traditionally said to have been used by St. Peter, and a figure of it will be found in Webb's Sketches of Continental Ecclesiology, p. 508. That this was the original form is also confirmed by considering Rev. vi. 9 in association with the early Christian custom of placing the relics of martyred saints—the ashes or few bones that friends could recover from the fire or the arena—under their altars. The modern table form of the Lord's table is associated in the minds of many persons with the table at which our Lord partook of the Last Supper before instituting the Eucharist, and hence with the Eucharist itself. But there is scarcely anything in common between the form of it and that of the ancient Triclinium, which made three sides of a square; and moreover, the term "table" was applied rather to the entertainment and the provision than to that on which it was served. Hence, when St. Paul speaks of the Table of the Lord, and the table of devils [1 Cor. x. 21], he refers to the substance partaken of, not to that from or on which it was eaten. Although, therefore, there are not wanting very early instances of the table form of altar, it must be considered that not it, but the ark form, was that originally adopted by the primitive Church. Upon the ark of the tabernacle and the temple rested the outward sign of the Divine Presence; towards it all the rites of the Jewish service tended, and there they all culminated. Nothing more exactly typified the Christian altar and the Eucharistic Presence, the sacred climax of all Christian worship.

Wood and stone were indifferently used in the construction of altars for a long period. Stone was ordered by councils of the fourth century from an association of the altar with the sepulchre of Christ; but wood seems to have been generally used in England until the Conquest. But archæological details cannot here be entered into.

AMBON [ἀναβαίνειν]. An elevated platform, or tribune [βῆμα], placed in the midst of the nave in early churches, and to which the clergy ascended for the purpose of reading the Holy Scriptures used in Divine service, and also of preaching. In the mediæval Church it was represented by the rood-loft, a gallery across the chancel arch, which was used for the same purposes. In modern churches the ambon is represented by the lectern and the pulpit.

The use of the ambon in the early Church is a strong illustration of the principle that the reading of Holy Scripture in Divine service is intended to be for the instruction of the people as well as for an act of worship.

AMBROSIAN RITE. The archdiocese of Milan retains in use a very ancient form of liturgy, which goes by the name of St. Ambrose, but is probably of even earlier date than the age of that saint. It is alleged by Visconti [de Ritib. Missæ, ii. 13] that it originated with St. Barnabas, being afterwards revised by St. Mirocles, and brought into its existing form by St. Ambrose. The truth appears to be that it is a local form of the primitive liturgy of St. Peter, coming therefore from the same original source as the Roman Liturgy. When St. Gregory the Great revised the ancient Roman liturgy, his revision was, for some now unknown reason, not received by the Church of Milan, although the "diesque nostros in tua pace dispone" which he is said to have added to the Roman Canon is also found in the Ambrosian.

The Emperor Charlemagne formed a design of making the Roman rite compulsory in all the Churches of the West. The opposition of the Milanese clergy and laity to its introduction into that diocese eventually succeeded, and they retained their old form of divine service. As in the case of the Mozarabic rite it is said to have been preserved by a miracle. It was decided to shut up copies of the Gregorian and the Ambrosian rite in a church for three days; and when the church was opened at the end of that time, each volume opened spontaneously with a loud noise, and a voice was heard, "Let the mystery of Gregory and the mystery of Ambrose both be honoured and preserved in their integrity by the whole Church." About A.D. 1060, Pope Nicolas II. made another attempt to introduce the Roman rite into Milan, and secured the aid of St. Peter Damian. But Nicolas died before he had accomplished his end, and was succeeded by Alexander II., who was himself a Milanese, and would not allow the matter to proceed further. Since that time the Ambrosian rite has held its place comparatively undisturbed, and at the present day the clergy of the city will not permit strangers to use the Roman in their Churches. It was introduced into the Church of St. Ambrose at Prague in 1450 by Charles IV., and the tripartite rite of St. Gall was formed from a combination of it with the sacramentaries of St. Gelasius and St. Gregory. With these exceptions it has always been confined to Milan.

A full acount of the Ambrosian Liturgy is given by Bona [Rer. Liturg. lib. i. cap. x.], and the liturgy itself is printed at length in the Liturgicon of Pamelius. The canon is almost identical with the Roman, the chief differences being that the fraction of the bread takes place immediately before the Lord's Prayer, and that there is no second oblation. There is, however, much variation between the two rites in the introits, collects, epistles, and gospels; different names are used for portions of the office (as Ingressa for Introitus); and there is a collect "super sindonem," which has quite dropped out of the Roman liturgy. It should be added that gradual approximations to the Roman form of the liturgy have been made by that of Milan, although it is still quite a distinct rite.

The Breviary of Milan also differs from that of Rome. A full account of it is given by Grancolas in the 10th chapter of his Commentary on the Breviary. [Bona Rer. Liturg. Mabillon, Museum Italicum. Gueranger, Institutions Liturgique. Grancolas, Comm. Hist. in Rom. Brev.]

AMEN. A Hebrew word mostly left untranslated in the Greek of the New Testament, and thus introduced without alteration into the liturgies of the Church. The root, in the original, signifies "to be true," the verb aman, "to prop," having that signification in the passive. The different meanings of the word are easily to be referred to this root. In its ritual use it has but two significations—[1.] "So be it," as at the end of the prayers; and [2.] "So it is," as at the end of the Gloria Patri, the Creeds, and the denunciations in the Commination service. A misconception of the meaning of the word, assigning the first meaning instead of the second, in the latter service has given rise to a popular but unfounded objection to the use of the it.

To the early liturgical use of the word there is frequent allusion in the Old Testament. The woman's answer in the trial of jealousy, when adjured by the priest, is "Amen, Amen" [Num. v. 22]. At the curses from Mount Ebal the direction is, "All the people shall say, Amen" [Deut. xxvii. 15-26]. Of the five great divisions of the Psalter, the first three end with "Amen and Amen." [See also 1 Kings i. 36; 1 Chron. xvi. 36; Neh. v. 13, viii. 6.] In these passages the Septuagint translation is γένοιτο, except in the last three, where we find ἀμήν. The Vulgate in the Psalms has "Fiat, fiat;" elsewhere "Amen." In old English books of devotion it was always translated "So be it," the original word coming gradually into use in the tenth century. In two instances the variety in the translation well illustrates the slight variety in meaning. Hananiah [Jer. xxviii. 3; in LXX. xxxv. 6] prophesies falsely the return of Jeconiah; Jeremiah, "wishing it to be true" [heading of chapter], says, "Amen: the Lord do so." The Latin has "Amen," the Greek ἀληθῶς. And the English version, "Shall swear by the God of truth" [Isa. lxv. 16], is a translation of the same Hebrew word, rendered in the Septuagint τὸν Θεὸν τὸν ἀληθινόν, and in the Vulgate "jurabit in Deo amen."

Except where St. Paul attests its congregational use [1 Cor. xiv. 16], the N. T. use of the word is not liturgical. In St. John's Gospel it is always repeated and translated "Verily, verily." St. Luke, in corresponding passages, has often ἀληθῶς or ναί. Once it is used very emphatically, of a strong affirmation, "in Him Amen" [2 Cor. i. 20], τὸ ἀμήν, the consummation of God's promises. And once of Christ, ὁ ἀμήν, "the Amen, the faithful and true witness" [Rev. iii. 14].

St. Paul urges the incongruity of a response being made to a prayer not understood [1 Cor. xiv. 16]. Three cases were noted in which the response would be invalid. "Amen pusillum" when the respondent does not understand the prayer; "Amen surreptitium" when the response is made before the prayer is concluded; "Amen seetile" when the respondent has some reservation, "aliquid aliud agit."[1] The earliest patristic mention of the use of the word in the liturgy is by Justin Martyr. The people, he says, answered Amen at the consecration prayer in the Eucharistic service.[2] Jerome compares[3] the fervency with which Amen was answered in service to an heavenly thunder. St. Ignatius sometimes concludes his epistles, as that to the Ephesians, with "Amen—Gratia." The same form is used by later bishops. The word has been placed at the end of the New Testament epistles in our version; but it is in nearly every case an unauthorized addition.

The different type in which the word is printed in the Prayer-book has a significance which should not be passed over. When in a different type to the prayer itself, it is a response; when in the same type, a conclusion. In the latter case the same person or persons recite both; in the former, different persons. It seems therefore clearly intended that the word is not a response at the Invocation of the Trinity in the Baptismal service and the Ordinal, at the first Lord's Prayer in the Communion service, at the Exhortation in the Commination service, and other similar places.

The communicants in the early Church always answered, "Amen," at the reception of the elements. The Scotch office retains the use in these words, "Here the person receiving shall say Amen." Though no longer enjoined in the English liturgy, the practice is very common among devout persons.

AMMONIAN SECTIONS. [Canons Eusebian, Diatessaron.]

[1] Eadem ratione in Talmudicis Massecheth Berachot, dum reprehenditur audientium oscitantia, legitur triplex Amen illegitimum. Baron. Annales [ed. 1738], i. 57, clxv.; quoting Angelo Canini in 1 Cor. xiv.

[2] οὗ [sc. τοῦ προεστῶτος] συντελέσαντος τὰς εὐχὰς καὶ τὴν εὐχαριστίαν, πᾶς ὁ παρὼν λαὸς ἐπευφημεῖ λέγων, ἀμήν. Just. Mart. Apol. ii. 97, D.

[3] Ad similitudinem cœlestis tonitruis. Hieron. pref. lib. 2, in Galat. apud Baron. l.c.

ANABAPTISM. A name given to the leading principle of a sect of heretics which arose during the early part of the Reformation period, and spread widely both in Germany and in England. [See Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.] The second baptism is adopted on the ground that the first was not valid, either from being administered during infancy, or by aspersion instead of immersion. As baptism is undoubtedly valid if administered by actual contact of the water and the person, and with the proper form of words, the ceremony used on the principles of Anabaptism is of course no baptism at all but a mere ceremony. But as the use of such a ceremony is a practical repudiation of the previous gift of the Holy Ghost it involves a very grievous sin. [BLASPHEMY.]

ANAGOGICAL interpretation (from ἀνάγειν, to lead upwards, to exalt the mind) is where, from thoughts of earth or time, the mind is raised to thoughts of heaven or eternity. Thus Ps. xcv. is interpreted in Heb. iv. The Sabbath is the emblem of rest in heaven. Ps. xlv. denotes not an earthly king, but Messiah.

ANALOGY OF FAITH. This is a phrase used by St. Paul in Romans xii. 6. The passage stands thus:—"Having therefore gifts, differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of the faith [κατὰ τὴν ἀναλογίαν τῆς πίστεως], or ministry, let us," &c.

It is clear that the word πίστις here is not "fides quâ creditur," nor "fides salvifica." It has no reference to the subjective faith of the individual Christian. It is rather the "regula fidei" or rule of faith, the faith which is believed in and handed down by the Church; that which St. Jude speaks of [v. 3] as ἅπαξ παραδοθείσα, "once for all delivered" unto the saints; that which St. Paul in another place [Eph. iv. 5] calls the "one faith"—μία πίστις. It is the one body of Christian doctrine, the one objective faith—the belief of Christendom embodied in the creeds, and "to be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture."

As there is one Lord Jesus Christ, and one body the Church, and one baptism, the entrance to that Church, so there is one uniform confession of faith for the members of that one body[1]—the "form of sound words" [ὑποτύπωσις ὑγιαινόντων λόγων, 2 Tim. i. 13], "the good thing committed" [ἡ καλὴ παραθήκη, ib. 14] by apostles to their successors, and so ever handed on for the Church to transmit, to declare, but not to add to nor diminish from. "It is not now that the faith began, but from the Lord, through the disciples, hath it come to us." [St. Athan. Ep. Encycl. n. 1, p. 111, ed. Ben.]

"The Church has received the faith from the apostles and their disciples, and this faith she carefully guards, as though she dwelt in one house, and were not dispersed throughout the world." [St. Irenæus, Adv. Hæres. lib. i. cap. 2 & 3]. "For us, it is not lawful to bring in any doctrine of our own choice, as neither is it to choose that which any one hath brought in of his own choice. We have for our authority the apostles of the Lord, who . . . faithfully delivered over to the nations the religion which they had received from Christ." [Tertullian, de Præscr. c. vi. p. 440, Oxf. Tr.][2]

The word ἀναλογίᾱ is defined by Aristotle [Eth. N. v. iii. 8] as ἰσότης λόγων ("equality of ratios"), hence our use of it as signifying "analogy" or "proportion."[3]

The words "analogy of faith," then, point out to us that all prophesying (i.e. preaching, or expounding Christian doctrine) must be in agreement with the faith of the Church from the beginning, and according to the harmony or proportion which exists between the several doctrines of that faith. To this private notions and fancies must be subordinated, nor may particular doctrines or single parts or texts of Scripture be unduly exalted to the depreciation of others. The articles of the Christian faith are in perfect harmony, and according to that harmony or proportion must all interpretation and exposition of doctrine be set forth. "We must receive God's promises in such wise as they be generally" (generaliter, i.e. universally) "set forth in Holy Scripture" [Art. xvii]. It has been the practice of heretics in every age to take up small portions and often single texts of Holy Writ, and to interpret them in such a way as to contradict its general tenor. This is to violate that law of analogy or proportion which the Bible itself lays down for us, which the Church in purest times has ever striven to follow, and which right reason also no less plainly commends.[4]

ANAPHORA. Eastern liturgies, like those of the Western Church, are divisible into three distinct portions, as follows:—

Western.	Eastern.
Præparatio.	Office of the Prothesis.
Ordinarium.	Pro-Anaphora.
Canon.	Anaphora.

The latter of these three divisions is the most important, and the most ancient portion, and may be called the liturgy proper. In the English liturgy it consists of all that follows "Lift up your hearts," the preceding portion properly belonging to the offertory and preparation.

The Anaphora consists of four principal divisions, as follows:—

[I.] The great Eucharistic prayer, including, 1. The Preface: 2. The Prayer of the Triumphal Hymn: 3. The TRIUMPHAL HYMN OR TRISAGION: 4. Commemoration of our Lord's life: 5. Commemoration of the Institution of the Eucharist.

[1] Cf. Athan. Creed. "This is the Catholic faith, which, except a man believe," &c.; so also in the office for the Visitation of the Sick, "Here the minister shall rehearse the articles of the faith." Then follows the Apostles' Creed.

[2] So also de Virgin. Veland., c. 1, "Regula quidem fidei una omnino est, sola immobilis et irreformabilis."

[3] See instances of this analogy in 1 Cor. xii. 12, &c.

[4] That the Church of England at the Reformation held to this rule may be seen abundantly from the Homilies, e.g. those "Against Peril of Idolatry," and on Fasting. See also Preface to Ordinal. Archbishop Cranmer and our Reformers [Reformatio Legum, i. 13] wished all preachers and expositors to have always before their eyes the creeds "ne quid contra symbola aliquando interpretemur." [See Wordsworth, G. T., on Romans xii. 6.]

[II.] The Consecration, including, 1. THE WORDS OF INSTITUTION: 2. The Oblation: 3. The Invocation of the Holy Ghost.

[III.] The great Intercession, including, 1. An Intercession for the living and the dead: 2. The LORD'S PRAYER, preceded by a prayer of preparation, and followed by the Embolismus.

[IV.] The Communion, including, 1. The Prayer of Inclination, or humble access: 2. The Elevation: 3. The Fraction: 4. The Confession: 5. The COMMUNION: 6. The Thanksgiving and Dismissal.

In each of these four divisions that portion printed in small capitals forms the central point; and thus the Anaphora may be said to consist of a great act of Praise, the Consecration, the Intercession, and Communion: the words of Christ in instituting the Eucharist, and the Lord's Prayer, being the true centre of the whole.

ANATHEMA. The word anathema (ἀνάθεμα) is a Greek one, and, like the cognate form anathēma [ἀνάθημα, Luke xxi. 5, 2 Macc. ix. 16, with which it is confused in the various readings of the LXX. text, and by some even of the Greek fathers, e. g. by Theodoret on Is. xiii. 13, Zephaniah i. 7], is derived from ἀνατίθημι, to set up upon (the wall of a temple), hence to dedicate. Both words contain the idea of that which is set apart from common uses, and made over or devoted to God; the latter properly in the good sense of a votive offering, especially some costly gift to be hung up or preserved in a sacred place, the former in the bad one of being marked out as the object of His wrath and ban. [Cf. the use of ἅγιος, ἅγος, sacer.] Anathema occurs six times in the original Greek of the New Testament: Acts xxiii. 14, E. V., under a great curse; Vulgate, devotione. Romans ix. 3, accursed; V. anathema. 1 Cor. xii. 3, accursed, anathema: xvi. 22, where the original word is retained in the E. V., "let him be Anathema Maran-atha;" so the Vulgate. Gal. i. 8, 9, "let him be accursed;" anathema. And the derivative verb ἀναθεματίζω is found in Mark xiv. 71, "he began to curse;" V. anathematizare. Acts xxiii. 12, 14, 21, "bound themselves under a curse," oath; devoverunt. The word is also used in the LXX. as the rendering of חֵרֶם, kherem or cherem, that which is shut up or cut off [cf. Haram, from the same root, the secluded apartments of women in the East], devoted irrevocably to God, and hence to destruction or curse, because it could not be redeemed. See Lev. xxvii. 28, 29, and of חָרְמָה, Khormah; E. V. Hormah, a proper name, margin utter destruction, Numbers xxi. 2, 3. In like manner the Syriac version of Rom. ix. 3, &c., gives kherem as the equivalent of anathema, which is thus brought into connection with the Jewish forms of excommunication. Of these there were three kinds:—1. Niddui, נִדּוּי, "banishment" or "exclusion of the offender from the synagogue and the society of his brethren for thirty, sixty, or ninety days, the condition of its removal being repentance.

2. Kherem, חֵרֶם, which answers to anathema or cursing. This was the more solemn, being accompanied with execrations from the law of Moses, and used against those whom the milder form had failed to reclaim. The sentence was, "Let N. N. be anathema and accursed. Upon him is the imprecation, upon him the oath, upon him exclusion." The person so excommunicated was forbidden all dealings with his brethren, except the buying of necessary food.

3. Shammatta, שַׁמָּתָא, the last and most grievous form, which handed over the offender as hopeless, totally and finally, to the judgment of God. The name, though explained by Rabbinical writers as meaning either שָׁם מִיתָה, there is death, or שִׁמְמָא תֶּהֱא, there shall be desolation, has been thought, apparently not without reason, to be derived from שֵׁם אֶתָא, i.e "the (incommunicable) name" (often used for Jehovah or God Himself) "cometh" to execute judgment, and thus to have suggested to St. Paul the form of expression [1 Cor. xvi. 22], "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema," (for) "the Lord" Jesus "is at hand [see Wordsworth, G. T., in loco] to take vengeance upon him, or "is come" already in the flesh, and so he is without excuse. [MARANATHA.]

Whether or not this view be correct, it is certain that the expression of St. Paul [Gal. i. 8, 9] was adopted by the Christian Church as a formula of spiritual censure. The word maran-atha is not found in any early form of excommunication, but anathema constantly recurs. It is explained by the fathers to mean separation or alienation from God and from Christ, and His body the Church, also the person so separated. St. Chrysostom, de Anathemate, says, "Anathema wholly and entirely cutteth off," and Zonaras on Canon III. of the council held in the Church of St. Sophia, "As the votive offerings made to God are separated from common and human uses, so also is he who hath become anathema cut off and divided from the assembly of the faithful who are devoted and consecrated to God, and from Him, and he is assigned to the devil as his portion, and devoteth himself to him."

It is not proposed here to enter into the subject of excommunication generally. We have seen that the synagogue exercised this power of discipline over irregular and unfaithful members. The Church, in like manner, resting upon the commission and promises of Christ [Matt. x. 14, 40, 41; Luke ix. 5, x. 10-16; Matt. xvi. 15, 19, xviii. 15-18; John xx. 22, 23], has ever claimed, though in an elevated and spiritualized form, the right of subjecting to spiritual censures and penalties those of her members whose lives or doctrines contravene her mission as a society ordained to further the salvation of souls, and to embody before the world the truth of God and holiness of life. As a link of connection between the two systems in after times, we may instance the expression used in the Council of Antioch, A.D. 264, where Paul of Samosata was proclaimed to be ἀποσυνάγωγος, lit. "cast out of the synagogue" [cf. John ix. 22, xii. 42, xvi. 2; Heb. x. 25; James ii. 2].

Passing by the Apostolic age, where we see St. Paul delivering to Satan not only the incestuous Corinthian [1 Cor. v. 1-5], but also Hymenæus and Alexander for blasphemy, the former apparently for the denial of the "resurrection of the body" [cf. 1 Tim. i. 20 with 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18], and, in Gal. i. 8, 9, making false doctrine the ground of a twice-repeated anathema:—we find that the Church subsequently continued to claim a like power, and to censure and excommunicate for offences against the faith and morals. The Fathers and the Councils attribute to the sentence of the Church the greatest solemnity and efficacy.

We may observe in passing that there were two kinds of excommunication—the lesser or ἀφορισμὸς, "separation," "suspension," which excluded from partaking of the Eucharist and the prayers of the faithful; and the greater, παντελὴς ἀφορισμὸς, called also "anathematism," "total separation," by which persons were totally expelled from the Church, and shut out from all communion whatever with her members. With reference to this, the terms used were to be "kept out," "shut out," or "cast out of the Church," "to be without the pale," &c. The greater excommunication at a later period disqualified for civil rights and offices, and in the eighth century was followed by temporal punishments. Its effects have been summed up in the lines,—

> Si pro delictis anathema quis efficiatur
> Os, orare, vale, communis, mensa negatur;

which may be rendered—

> With the person, who for his sins anathema is made,
> To eat, communicate, pray, kiss, or greet him is forbade.

For the effects of the greater and lesser excommunication in more recent times, see Suarez, de Censuris, vol. xxxiii., Paris, 1861;[1] or the Bishop of Brechin upon Article XXXIII., vol. ii. p. 616, 1868. The distinction which was afterwards made between the greater excommunication and the anathema does not seem to have been clearly marked in early times. The latter is sometimes defined by the epithet ἀιώνιος, and then applied more especially to those cases in which the offender was finally and irrevocably cut off from the communion of the faithful, and left to the judgment of God, [Bp. Jer. Taylor, vol. xiii. Heber's ed. p. 604], and the Council of Pavia [Canon x.], [Synodus Regia Ticina] A.D. 850, in the reign of Lothaire and Popedom of Leo IV. [Labbe, vol. ix.] At this Council, with a view to enforcing discipline more stringently, a distinction was made between excommunication, anathema, and interdict. The second of these is thus described [Canon. xii.]: "Abjiciendi sunt anathematizandi scilicet, tamquam putrida ac desperata membra ab universalis ecclesiæ corpore dissecandi, cujusmodi jam inter Christianos nulla legum, nulla morum, nulla collegii participatio est, quibus neque in ipso exitu communicatur et quorum neque post mortem, saltem inter defunctos fideles, commemoratio fit." It is said to be "irrevocabile judicium," which is not to be arrived at by the priest without every endeavour on his part to reclaim the guilty person, nor without the cognizance of the metropolitan and common judgment of the provincial bishops. According to Suarez, the major excommunicatio and the anathema are the same substantially with the accidental difference that the latter, when incurred by sentence of a judge (a judice) is more public and solemn in its ceremonies and accompanying circumstances. When incurred a jure it is for the commission of some very grave offence (as heresy or schism), prohibited by existing laws or canons ecclesiastical, under the express penalty of anathema.[2]

The anathema may take a twofold form, in the one case being a sentence pronounced by a competent authority, such as a council or bishop; in the other being part of the abjuration required from the person who renounces a heresy.

In early times anathemas were formally directed against heresies, especially against false teaching with regard to the Person of the God-Man as the central verity and keystone of the Christian faith, and they are appended to the decrees and definitions of councils to enforce the truth under penalty of such censure. In the present day we can but faintly appreciate the vivid realization by the primitive Church of the Lord's Person and twofold nature, and of all that was involved in the maintenance of that sacred deposit.

Kindled with the dauntless and heroic ardour for the defence of the faith which long persecution had only served to invigorate, the Church viewed with a keen and instinctive abhorrence any form of erroneous teaching which derogated from the perfect Godhead and perfect Manhood of the Incarnate Word, and refused to endure it within her pale. Accordingly she did not hesitate to apply to what she looked upon as treason against her Divine Lord, and as involving the forfeiture of the title deeds of her inheritance, that solemn formula with which St. Paul denounces the "preaching of another Gospel."[3]

One of the earliest instances is the declaration against Arius and his followers originally ap-

[1] As some of our readers may be interested in the quaint English of the old form, we subjoin it from a Sarum Manual of 1530, in the Bodleian Library:—"That, we call the lesse curs, is of this strength, that every man and woman that falleth ther inne, it depertet them fro all the sacramentis that ben in holy chirehe, that they may none of them recyue till that thei ben asoiled.

The more curs is miche wers and is of this strength: for it departeth a man fro God, and fro holy chirehe, and also fro the companie of all christen folk, neuer to be saued be the passion of Crist, ne to be holpen by the sacramentis that ben done in holy chirche, ne to have part in prayer with no cristen man, as witnesseth wel Seynt Austyn."

[2] Lyndwood [Provinciale, lib. iii. tit. 13 sq.], says:—Unum tamen scias quod anathema differt ab excommunicatione, quia excommunicatio fit sine solemnitate, anathema cum solemnitate, and "Ista verba, sub pœnâ anathematis, possunt duplicitèr intelligi, sc. anathematis latæ (sub. sententia) et anathematis ferendæ: unde in dubio præsumitur ferendæ." The former is incurred ipso facto by the commission of the thing denounced; the latter requires the formal sentence to be pronounced by the judge who has jurisdiction in the case; but see Sir W. Palmer's Church of Christ, part iv. c. xvi. sec. ii.

[3] The story related of St. John's treatment of Cerinthus, and his disciple Polycarp's speech to Marcian, are pended to the Creed of the Council of Nice, A.D. 325, immediately after the words "and in the Holy Ghost." "But those who say, Once He was not; and Before He was begotten, He was not; and He came into existence out of nothing; or who say that the Son of God is of another substance, or essence, or is created, or mutable, or changeable, the Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematizes." The phrase is also found in the canons of the Council of Gangra, between A.D. 325 and 380, in those of the Council of Carthage, A.D. 418 (against the Pelagians), of the Councils of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and Chalcedon, A.D. 451, both of which decree that, if any dare to compose any new creed beside that which was settled by the holy Fathers, who were assembled in the city of Nicæa, with the Holy Ghost, if they are bishops or clergy they shall be deposed, but if they are of the laity they shall be anathematized." In A.D. 430, S. Cyril of Alexandria, after assembling a council in that city, wrote a synodical epistle calling upon Nestorius, Bishop of Constantinople, to anathematize his tenets in writing, and upon oath after a prescribed form. This letter after stating its confession of faith, concludes with twelve propositions to which anathema is appended. These are known as the twelve anathemas of Cyril. Nestorius replied with counter anathemas, but was eventually condemned by the Council of Ephesus. [Vide Fleury's Eccl. Hist. bk. xxv. vol. iii. p. 37 sq., Oxford Translation, and Rev. W. Bright's History of the Church.] The second canon of the Council of Constantinople, or fifth Œcumenical Council [A.D. 553], is as follows: "If any one does not anathematize Arius, Eunomius, Macedonius, Apollinarius, Nestorius, Eutyches, Origen, together with their impious writings, and all other heretics who have been condemned and anathematized by the four before-mentioned holy councils, and those also who have thought or do think like the before-mentioned heretics, and have continued or do continue in their wickedness to their death; let them be anathema."

Later times continued the practice, and subsequent councils, both general and provincial, down to that of Trent, fortified their decrees and definitions by anathemas.

It may be observed that the ultimately binding force and validity of anathemas must in great measure depend upon their accordance in each particular case with Holy Scripture, with the primitive definition of the faith as held "semper ubique et ab omnibus," and also upon their general reception by the great body of the faithful. It is clear also that the sentence and the offence or error must be proportionate.

The offences against which anathemas are denounced by the pre-Reformation Church of England may be seen in Johnson's English Canons, A.D. 601-1518 [Anglo-Cath. Lib.], in Lyndwood's Provinciale Liber, iii. tit. 13, note cf. lib. v. 17, sq., and in Maskell's Monumenta Ritualia, vol. ii. 288-301. Forms of the greater excommunication formerly in use in England, and in which the terms anathema and anathematize occur, are given in Collier's Ecclesiastical History, bk. iv. vol. ii. 257, in Maskell, M. R. i. 226, and ii. 286, and in Bp. of Brechin, vol. ii. art. xxxiii., together with the ceremonies by which it was accompanied. The church bells were tolled, and the cross was to be used. The sentence was pronounced by the bishop sitting before the altar vested with a violet cope, stole, and plain mitre, attended by twelve priests in surplices. All held lighted candles, which were dashed upon the ground at the concluding words, "and as these candles are extinguished, so may their souls be extinguished in hell. So be it, so be it, so be it. Amen." Other forms may be found in Martene, De Antiquis Eccl. Ritibus, vol. ii.

In conclusion, it may be observed, that this tremendous weapon of spiritual power, during a considerable portion of the Middle Ages, inspired the greatest terror, and alternately with deeds of rapine and violence, (especially against the rights and property of the Church, which it was intended to repress,) served greatly to increase the gloom and misery of that turbulent period. If St. Leo [Epist. 89, c. 6] even in his time thought it necessary to caution against its too frequent use in trifling matters and occasions, we may well believe that there were ample grounds at a later period for the complaint of Peter Damiani, A.D. 1060 [Epist. 12, lib. i.], touching the abuses which surrounded the exercise of this awful power. Passing by the solemn denunciation recorded in Matthew Paris against those who should violate Magna Charta, we are startled to find [A.D. 1467] in the time of Edward IV., "cursing by the clergy," together with a fine of twenty shillings, held out as a penalty, not even in a grave matter of state, but in order to repress the fashion of wearing shoes with pointed toes of inordinate length. Chaucer too mentions as one of the commendations of the "pourè persone of a toun" [Prologue, the Canterbury Tales],—

> "Ful loth were him to cursen for his tithes."

The irritation produced by the vexatious proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Courts has been assigned as one of the causes which, at least in this country, prepared the way for the Reformation. In like manner the frequency with which anathemas were denounced in the Middle Ages, and the secular character which they assumed, at length tended to produce a reaction against all ecclesiastical authority, and to throw doubt and contempt upon excommunication as an organ of spiritual discipline.

It is remarkable that the Church of England in her later dogmatic formularies has abstained from pronouncing anathemas except in one instance, Art. XVIII., "They also are to be held accursed" (Latin version, "Anathematizandi"), &c.

The ipso facto sentence of excommunication, however, is appended to certain of the canons of 1603, viz., canons 3, 4, 6, 7, 9, 10. [See further, but in strict accordance with the teaching of his epistles [1 John ii. 22-26; 2 John 6-10; cf. Jude 3, 4; Titus iii. 10], and illustrate the value set by the early Christians upon dogmatic truth.

EXCOMMUNICATION. Archb. Trench's Synonymes of the N. T. Suicer, Thesaurus, vol. i. ἀνάθεμα and ἀφορισμὸς. Bingham's Eccles. Antiquities, bk. xvi. xvii. Morinus, de Pœnitentiâ, lib. iv. Saurez, de Censuris (or Van Espen). J. D'Avezan, de Excommunicatione in Meursi Thesauro Juris Civ. et Can. Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. vi. p. 153. Robertson's Ch. Hist., vol. ii. part ii. p. 541. Bp. of Brechin and Bp. Harold Browne on Art. XVIII., XXX. Fleury, Institut. au Droit Eccles. Dupin, de Antiq. Disc. 272. Canons of the Church (Rev. W. A. Hammond, 1843).]

ANCHORITE. [ASCETICS. MONASTICISM.]

ANGELIC SALUTATION. [AVE MARIA.]

ANGELS. It can hardly be unnecessary, in attempting to deliver the Catholic doctrine of Angels, to preface that doctrine with two truths: 1st, the self-evident truth that the distance between man and any other created being vanishes in comparison with the distance between the highest created being and the Creator; that the great, the immeasurable descent is from the Infinite to the finite: 2d, the truth of our creation, that the spiritual part of man is to be referred directly to the Creator, who breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life whereby man became a living soul. For as we contemplate those glorious beings, who are so far above us now, the error may insensibly creep in of considering them to be midway between God and man; and as we contemplate the scale of creation the error may creep in of arguing that as we stand in the place of God to the lower animals, having dominion given us, so the angels stand in a similar relation to us, and that worship is due to them. On these accounts the arguments for the existence of angels need stating with great care. For example: the observation—"Men must needs think too highly of themselves and too meanly of the great and glorious God if they are not minded sometimes of those more excellent beings that are between God and themselves"—might with no great difficulty be pressed into a "voluntary humility;" whereas true humility, which ever goes along with true greatness, lies in the thought that while "man is akin to the beasts by his body," he is saved from being "a base and ignoble creature" by being "akin to God by his spirit:" and again, the argument—"that as man's animal nature exists apart in the brutes, so his more noble nature must exist separately in creatures above him, i.e. the angels"—might be perverted, and brought to weaken the truth of our creation by representing it thus, that God took of the angelic nature and infused it into man, whereby man became a living soul. It may be doubted indeed whether Bull's argument which has been quoted is not stated too unhesitatingly. Man's finite spiritual nature implies the existence of a self-existing spiritual nature to be the source of the finite nature, but the fact that the finite spiritual nature is joined to a body, and the fact that there exists a brute nature, cannot imply (though it may make probable) the existence of another finite spiritual nature. It is sufficient to give the cautions with which such à priori arguments must be stated, if stated at all: and it is better to turn at once to Holy Scripture.

In what light, then, are we to regard certain statements of the Old Testament, such as those of the accusing angels in heaven, Job i. 6, 1 Kings xxii. 19-21, and of the sin of the angels, Gen. vi. 4? Are these authoritative statements of revelation, or are they (in a word) myths. Not to enter into theories of inspiration—these statements will be regarded here as authoritative revelations. And for this reason, that the former are verified not only by St. John, Rev. xii. 10, but also by our Lord, Luke x. 18: the latter is verified by St. Peter and St. Jude, 2 Pet. ii. 4, 5, Jude 6. These statements which present the greatest difficulty, being thus verified, carry with them all statements which present less difficulty.

In the beginning of the mystery,[1] then, Almighty God, by His Word [Col. i. 16], created invisible beings, thrones, dominions, principalities, powers; in whom, as in man afterwards, to express His glory.[2] At the creation of the heavens and earth these sons of God shouted for joy, Job xxxviii. 4-7. Of the angels some fell. "It seemeth that there was no other way for angels to sin, but by reflex of their understanding upon themselves; when being held with admiration of their own sublimity and honour, the memory of their subordination to God and their dependency on him was drowned in this conceit: whereby their adoration, love, and imitation of God could not choose but be also interrupted. The fall of angels therefore was pride." [Hooker, Eccl. Pol., I. iv. 3, Keble's ed. i. p. 267.] With this agrees the intimation of 1 Tim. iii. 6, where the "condemnation of the devil" is the condemnation into which the devil fell.

We next find a distinction in scripture between "angels which kept not their first estate and are reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day" [Jude 6], and other angels, to whom great freedom is allowed, who were present in heaven as accusers of the brethren, who went forth as lying spirits to deceive men. The former are identified by St. Jude and St. Peter [2 Pet. ii. 4] with the sons of God [Gen. vi. 4] who came in unto the daughters of men. For from the apostle's words it follows that the further sin of these fallen angels for which they are delivered to chains was going after strange flesh.[3]

[1] "There are three times, if times they may be called, or parts of eternity. The first, when the Godhead was only, without the being of any creature: the second, the time of the mystery, which continueth from the creation to the dissolution of the world: and the third, the time of the revelation of the sons of God; which time is the last, and is everlasting without change." [Bacon, Conf. of Faith.]

[2] "All the ministration of angels, damnation of devils and reprobates, and universal administration of all creatures, and dispensation of all times, having no other end, but as the ways and ambages of God, to be further glorified in His saints, who are one with their head the Mediator, who is one with God." [Ibid.]

[3] For this mysterious subject see Maitland's Eruvin, The Fallen Angels, p. 124. Maitland fully shows the absurdity of the common interpretation, which makes the

That the accusing spirits are fallen angels follows from the thought (if we may allow ourselves to reason on such deep subjects) that God made all things in their first estate good, and removed from himself the beginning of all evil and vanity into the liberty of the creature. And this conclusion agrees with the Scriptures, which speak of Satan as a spirit [Eph. ii. 2], with angels subject to him [Matt. xxv. 41, Rev. xii. 7-9]. The Scripture then represents the Almighty on His throne surrounded by angels, among them these angels of accusation [Job i. 6, 1 Kings xxii. 19]. Nor until the Incarnation was the accuser cast out of heaven [Luke x. 18, Rev. xii. 10]. This subject will be further handled in another article, SATAN. We may now confine ourselves to the angels which kept their first estate.

And first we are carefully to distinguish between the Theophanies of the Old Testament and the appearances of angels. "That the Angel of the Lord who preceded the children of Israel from Egypt in the cloud and in the fire, was [agreeably to Exod. xiii. 20, 21, and xiv. 19, 20; Num. xx. 6, &c.] the Lord Himself, possessor of the incommunicable Name יהוה; and that this Angel of the covenant, as he is termed in Mal. iii. 1, and Gen. xlviii. 15, 16, &c., is the uncreated Word, who appeared in visible form to Jacob and Moses, and who was in the fulness of time incarnate in the person of Jesus Christ, is the known undoubted faith of the Church of God, and needs not to be enlarged on here." [Mill on Panth. Princip. part ii. p. 92.] The Christian fathers frequently speak of the Son of God as appearing in the Old Testament.[1] [Id. p. 94.] It must be sufficient here to note this, leaving the subject of the Theophanies for a subsequent article.

We are thus brought to the λειτουργικὰ πνεύματα of Heb. i. 14, as the description of the holy angels. They are πνεύματα. Most certainly not such spirits as God blessed for ever is, i.e. they are not ὁμοούσιοι, of the same nature and essence with God; but of all created beings the most subtle, defecate, pure, active, and so the most perfect and noble substances. They are styled λειτουργικὰ, ministering to God, not to us. Although they minister for our good, they are not our ministers or servants. Owing their being and all that they have to God's bounty, they pay Him all adoration, service, worship, and obedience. [Bull, Sermon on Angels, i. p. 276: Burton.]

To the question whether angels are pure and simple intelligences or have a SPIRITUAL BODY [q. v.], no express answer is given in Scripture. That they have a spiritual body is probable from our Lord's statement that hereafter men with their glorified bodies will be ἰσάγγελοι. It may be then that Almighty God has reserved to Himself the prerogative of acting as pure mind, without any kind of corporeal vehicle. In which case, let it be considered whether μορφὴ δούλου in Phil. ii. 6 does not express this condition of all created beings, and mark the first and great step in our Lord's humiliation, the descent from God to take the form of the creature: then ὁμοίωμα ἀνθρώπων [= ὁμοίωμα σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας, Rom. viii. 3], is the taking our nature, not the nature of angels, ὁμοίωμα being used lest μορφὴ should imply our sinful nature; then σχῆμα ὡς ἄνθρωπος is the guise in which He appeared as a man among men.

Angels have various titles, or are divided into several classes, according to their functions. Among them are the Cherubim. [Compare Ps. civ. 4 and Ps. xviii. 10.] The cherubim appear as guards at the gate of Eden; cherubic forms cover the ark; cherubim minister to the Almighty when He goeth forth; to Ezekiel by the river Chebar they appear in the midst of the glory of the Lord; and again [ch. x.] beneath the glory. The cherubim, then, are angels in immediate attendance on the Almighty, or where there is a special manifestation of His presence. They symbolize His glory. Next the Seraphim. These appear only in the vision of Isaiah. They are spirits of fire; and that fire is the fire of love. They are engaged in ceaseless praise, in great nearness to God; yet as concerned about us below, for part of their song is "the earth is full of His glory," and one of them touches the prophet's lips with a coal of fire from the altar. Their chant is antiphonal. Other titles derived from office are not made known to us, except that the spirits employed to minister for us are more specifically angels or messengers.

Besides these distinctions of office, there is also at least one distinction of rank and authority. There are Archangels. This distinction first appears in Josh. v. 13. "We do not find that the Christian Fathers, when speaking as they frequently do of the Son of God as appearing in the Old Testament, and as the special object of the provocation of the Israelites, include this appearance to Joshua among the θεοφάνειαι. But to this there are two distinguished exceptions—the one is Justin Martyr, the other is Eusebius." [Mill, Panth. Princip., part ii. p. 92—note on the Captain of the Lord's Host.] Referring to that note[2] for the discussion of this partisons of God to be pious men. There seems in truth to be no middle course between accepting honestly an authoritative revelation, as Maitland does, or asserting on the other hand, that the statement is a record of popular error overlaying some remains of truth, that as such, not as a statement of revelation, it found a place in the history of mankind, that the errors were left to be cleared off, and the truth brought to light by the growth of knowledge and by added revelation. Whether this view is reconcileable with the recognition of the statement by the apostles, or if it be said that the statement only lingered in the Jewish Church to be exploded with other Jewish errors, whether this further supposition is reconcileable with the consensus of the early fathers—let the reader judge.

[1] Compare however Pusey, Lectures on Daniel, p. 515, &c. Dr. Pusey's doctrine is that the Angel of the Lord was probably a created angel with special presence of God. We have followed Mill, on account of the force of the comparison of Exod. xxiii. 20-23, with Exod. xxxiii. 2, 3, and these both with Mal. iii. 1.

[2] The argument of most weight to show that this appearance to Joshua is to be reckoned among the Theophanies, is the command to Joshua to loose his shoes, com-cular instance, we pass to the fuller revelations during and after the captivity, these revelations occurring, not as if the doctrine of angels were the primary object, but in the course of the apocalypse of kingdoms to Daniel, in the course of the Messianic prophecies of Zechariah, at the time when the last breath of old prophecy was to be uttered. We will take first Zechariah's prophecy, iv. 10. This prophecy was remarkably prepared for by Hanani, Asa's seer [2 Chron. xvi. 9]. Hanani refers to the destruction of the Ethiopians "before the Lord and before His host" [2 Chron. xiv. 13]; where "His host" can be no other than the angelic host, as in Ps. xxxiv. 7, "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about," &c., the captain, i.e. of the Lord's host with his army; and regarding this host Hanani speaks, "the eyes of the Lord run to and fro through the whole earth." In Zechariah's prophecy the word of the Lord refers to the seven lamps of the golden candlestick, "they are the eyes of the Lord which run to and fro through the whole earth." Even from the Old Testament, then, we learn that these lamps represent the seven vigils or prime ministers of God's providence, seven archangels. In Rev. iv. 5 and v. 6, we have Zechariah's very words, seven eyes sent forth into all the earth, seven spirits of God, and these represented by the seven lamps which burned before the Throne. [See Mede. Disc. on Zech. iv. 10; Works, i. p. 53.] This gives the interpretation of Zech. iii. 9. "Upon one stone seven eyes:" perhaps it may lead us to think that in Micah v. 5, "seven shepherds and eight princes of men," the shepherds are archangels, and the princes riders of the four celestial chariots [Zech. vi.], two, as was usual, in each chariot. In Zechariah we have the mysterious vision of the contest between the angel of the Lord and Satan regarding Joshua the high-priest. The words of the angel are the same as Michael's words in the no less mysterious contest over the body of Moses. [Jude 9; comp. 2 Pet. ii. 11.] Is not the connection more than a mere coincidence? Does it not shew that the two transactions are of the same nature, referrible to one idea? The opposition to Joshua was an attempt to interrupt the succession of the witnesses [Rev. xi. 3, 4], who were represented by the two olive branches which connected angelic ministrations with the ordinary ritual and service of God's Church. The secret and divine burial of Moses may have been a symbol that Moses lived in his successor; and the attempt of Satan an attempt to make it appear that his authority ceased with his death—an attempt to interrupt the succession of lawgivers, as in the other case to interrupt the succession of the priesthood. In Daniel we have [iv. 13] "a watcher and an holy one," to be compared perhaps with the riders of the four chariots of Zechariah: for these go forth, as in the vision of Zech. i., and make report, and give account of their mission to the Angel of the Lord.

The one fact then regarding angels peculiar to Daniel is that as God set His chief angels as the deputed guardians of His people, so he set other, and apparently inferior angels over other nations. And this revelation to Daniel is in harmony with Daniel's position as a prophet. He was employed to disclose God's care and providence over heathen nations. Two of the archangels are named by him, Michael and Gabriel, who are named also in the New Testament. In Tobit, the most probable date of which is about 350 B.C., Raphael describes himself as one of the seven holy angels which present the prayers of the saints, and which go in and out before the glory of the Holy One. This is in perfect accordance with canonical Scripture. The office of the archangels then appears to be: first, to be the universal inspectors of the whole world, and the rulers and princes of the whole angelical host: secondly, to have the peculiar charge and guardianship of the Church, while the rest of the world is committed to the care of subordinate angels. That the charge of the Church belongs thus peculiarly to the seven, may appear from St. John's saluting the churches with a benediction of grace and peace from their ministry, and from the typing of them by the seven eyes and horns of the Lamb, as powers which the Father, since He exalted Him to be head of His Church, hath annexed to His jurisdiction. [Compare Pusey, Daniel, p. 522, and Mede, i. p. 57.] For full discussion of the objection that the later knowledge was borrowed from heathenism, see Mill, part ii. sect. iv. p. 52, and Pusey, p. 513, &c. It is sufficient here to notice that the later knowledge is only a strict and legitimate development; that it appears, as has been said, in the final working up of prophecy, not detached as if imported from without; and lastly, that if it were so that it was in any degree borrowed, there is nothing inconsistent with the inspiration of the prophets to seize remains of truth that may be found in heathen nations, or truths which the philosophy of heathen nations may have attained, and incorporate them, sublimed and corrected, in the deposit of truth committed to God's Church.

Besides the ratifications of Jewish doctrine which have been noticed in the New Testament it appears also to be probable (perhaps rather we should say, certain, for the Jews no doubt held the doctrine, and the Church of Christ has for the most part received it) that each child of God is from his childhood assigned to the care of his own guardian angel. Considering that this belief was held by the Jews it can hardly be but pared with the like command to Moses. Mill writes: "As with the example of all the earlier, as well as the later Scriptures before us, it seems most natural and obvious to conceive that the Lord sent this message to Joshua [cf. vi. 2] by the mouth of His archangel, so there seems no derogation to the Divine honour in believing, with the fathers of old, that the ground was hallowed which was trodden by such an exalted servant of God," &c. To which ought to be added the thought that in this case, more than in ordinary cases of angelic ministration, the archangel appears strictly as the vicegerent of God, executing an office which the Son of God had undertaken, and was prevented by the sin of the people from discharging in person. That, in ch. vi. 2, it is said, "The Lord said to Joshua," does not shew that the captain of the host was the Lord. The same mode of speech occurs in Zech. iii. 1, 2.

that Heb. i. 14, Matt. xviii. 10, Acts xii. 15 both countenance and prove the doctrine.

We may now turn to notice briefly the examples of the ministration of Angels:—

I. The elder Sinaitic dispensation was subjected to created angels. Acts vii. 53, "at the injunction of angels" [see Alford's note], Gal. iii. 19. In St. Stephen's speech the angels are mentioned to glorify the law, being opposed to mere human mediators. Here the motive is different. The interposition of created beings is contrasted with the direct agency of God Himself. [So also in Heb. ii. 2, Prof. Lightfoot in loc.], Heb. i. and ii. For the verification of this see Exod. xxxiii. 2, 3; Deut. xxxiii. 2; Josh. v. 13; Psa. lxviii. 7, 8, and 17. But to the angels God hath not put in subjection, τὴν οἰκουμένην τὴν μέλλουσαν περὶ ἧς λαλοῦμεν, the Christian dispensation. Here the angels appear, 1st, as ministering to the Mediator the Angel of the Covenant, and 2ndly, under Him, as ministers of grace to us, as they will be ministers of the final judgment.

II. It will be observed also that before the call of Abraham we have only the cherubim forbidding the approach to Eden, Enoch's prophecy of the holy ones attending the Lord when He comes to judgment, and the accusations and temptations of Satan. The ministrations of angels on behalf of God's people appear with the designation of the chosen seed. Lot is to be considered as belonging to Abraham. With the patriarchs, again, before the establishment of the covenant of works, the intercourse of the angels was more familiar, more affable. To this character of intercourse there is a return when the Gospel admits believers to the society of the "innumerable company of angels."

III. The opening the eyes of Elisha's servant [2 Kings vi. 17] was an instruction to those who doubted the Psalmist's word, "The angel of the Lord tarrieth round about them that fear Him:" and an instruction to us, if we ever doubt the "more sure word" of Christian prophecy. To us, in this as in still higher matters, seeing is denied, that we may obtain the higher blessing of those who believe, and therefore act, without seeing. The more we can realize the presence of God's angels, as in Christian assemblies so in private, the more closely shall we keep to the ordinance and rule of God's government, and therefore the more nearly shall we live to Him who has appointed such ministrations. In Christian assemblies angels are present, and regard is to be had to their presence [1 Cor. xi. 10], they present the prayers of the faithful before the throne of God [Rev. viii. 3, 4], they are watchers on God's part of the fulfilment of the duties of the ministry [1 Tim. v. 21], and of the discharge of the vows of the worshipper [Eccles. v. 6].

As in the assemblies of the Church, so in the private life of each heir of salvation, they watch over Christ's little ones [Matt. xviii. 10], they rejoice over each sinner that repenteth [Luke xx. 10], they present to God alms and prayers, and return with blessings of fuller light [Acts x. 4], they continue their ministrations to Christ by ministering in behalf of His members (for to them, as well as to us, belongs the word, "Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of these little ones, ye have done it unto Me), they unceasingly carry on that warfare whose first great victory was won when Satan was cast out of heaven, they convey the souls of the faithful to paradise [Luke xvi. 22], and at the end of all things they will be ministers of the last dread judgment.

ANNATES. These, which were also called First Fruits, were payments made by bishops to the Pope at the time of their consecration; and were a practical recognition of his supremacy, being of the nature of a tribute. The first step of the Reformation in the Church of England was the repudiation of this tribute by the clergy. [Blunt's Reformat. Ch. of Eng. i. 250.]

The origin of Annates appears to be traceable to the presents which were made to the Pope by all bishops at the time of their consecration; and it is alleged that this custom was so early as to be abolished by Gregory the Great. If the custom existed at such an early period, it probably did not extend beyond those bishops who were consecrated by the Pope's own hands. Nor was the amount paid very definite; but it was understood to be not less than a year's income, and sometimes even much more was required. The sum paid by the bishop was, however, partly made up to him by the first fruits which he received from his clergy on their preferment. The payment of these was not regularly established until A.D. 1253, when by granting the revenue derived from them to Henry III. for three years, Pope Innocent gained the co-operation of the Crown in fixing them upon the clergy. In 1288 Nicolas IV. made a similar grant of them for six years to Edward I. for the expenses of the Crusade.

Between A.D. 1486 and A.D. 1531, a sum equivalent to £45,000 a year had been paid to the Popes by the English bishops in the form of Annates. In the latter year the Convocation of Canterbury petitioned the Crown for relief, and a conditional Act [23 Hen. VIII. cap. 20] was passed, by which a compromise was offered to the Pope. No notice being taken of this offer, the Act was confirmed by Letters Patent (according to the terms of its enactments) on July 9, 1533.

First-fruits in a less onerous form have since been paid to the Crown by every priest and bishop on acceding to a benefice, if above a certain annual value. But the tax was applied to the benefit of the clergy by Queen Anne's Bounty Act, and is now chiefly used for building parsonage houses.

ANNOTINE EASTER. A day observed by primitive Christians in commemoration of their baptism. The festival was kept only by those who had been baptized in the previous year, and was nominally the anniversary of the day on which they had been baptized. There seems to have been some variation in the day itself. The fourth Sunday after Easter, the Thursday after the Sunday which was the actual Dominical anniversary of the previous Easter, the third Saturday after Easter, and Low Sunday, are the four days named by ancient writers. But Low Sunday, or the octave of Easter, appears to have been the usual day. [Micrologus, lvi.; Martene, IV. xxvi. 6.]

ANNUAL COMMEMORATION. It was an early practice of the primitive Church to commemorate the martyrs on the anniversary of their deaths: and when the days of persecution had come to an end, the habit was extended, or continued to be practised, in respect to others of the departed, besides martyrs, such as relatives, friends, and benefactors. Hence were derived the Obits and Year-minds of the Church of England, which are still kept up by many people in their private devotions, and which are publicly recognised in the Obit Sunday service of St. George's, Windsor, and the "Commendation of Benefactors" at the colleges of our Universities. For the offices used on these occasions see the Annotated Book of Common Prayer, Appendix to the Burial Office. The University "Commemoration" at Oxford is a secular corruption of this religious custom.

ANNUNCIATION. [1.] The fact. In St. Luke's Gospel it is narrated that at a certain time there indicated the angel Gabriel was sent from God to the Virgin Mary, and that on coming into her presence he saluted her with the words, "Hail, thou that are highly favoured, the Lord is with thee. Blessed art thou among women." This angelic salutation was followed by the announcement, "Fear not, Mary; for thou hast found favour with God. And behold thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call His Name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David: And He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of His kingdom there shall be no end." And when the Blessed Virgin inquired how this should be, Gabriel answered her, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" [Luke i. 26-35]. The overshadowing of the Holy Ghost appears to have ensued at once, and from the time of the Annunciation is to be dated the beginning of the Incarnation of the Word of God.

[2.] The festival. At what date this great mystery began first to be commemorated is uncertain. There is a collect for the day in the Sacramentary of Gelasius [A.D. 492], and also in that of St. Gregory [A.D. 590], and a homily exists which was preached upon the day by Proclus, the Patriarch of Constantinople, some time in the earlier half of the fifth century. The Council of Toledo [A.D. 656] passed a canon changing the date of its observance to December 18th, so that it should never occur during Lent: but this latter day became eventually the feast of "The Expectation of the Blessed Virgin," and the Annunciation was still commemorated on March 25th. Whether or not that is the actual day on which the event occurred is to be determined by the chronology of the Christian era, as associated with the Nativity of our Lord. [INCARNATION. CHRISTMAS. AVE MARIA.]

ANOINTING. How the ceremonial use of oil originated is utterly unknown. Its first appearance in history is in the book of Genesis, where Jacob is twice recorded to have set up a pillar and poured oil upon it [Gen. xxviii. 18, xxxv. 14, cf. xxxi. 13]. There is no evidence whatever to warrant us in associating this early ceremonial use of oil with any habit of anointing the person for the sake of health or luxury, and anything that could be said to the effect would be mere conjecture. Of its ceremonial use in the consecration of persons and things among the Jews there are abundant instances. [I.] PERSONS. Priests were so anointed by special command of God [Exod. xxviii. 41, xxix. 7, xl. 15]. Kings were also anointed, equally by express Divine command [1 Sam. x. 1 and xv. 1, xvi. 1, 13; 2 Kings ix. 1, 3]. It appears also from the way in which the anointing of Elisha is mentioned, as if it was a Divine precept in respect to the ordinations of prophets [1 Kings xix. 16]. [II.] THINGS. God also commanded Moses to anoint the tabernacle, the ark, the table of shew-bread, the altars, and all the vessels, saying in addition "And thou shalt sanctify them that they may be most holy" [Exod. xxx. 26-29, xl. 9-11]. The unction was to be made with a special kind of oil, or ointment, made of ingredients named by God in certain fixed proportions [Exod. xxx. 23-25], and no person was to be permitted to make any like it, or to use it for any other purpose, under pain of excommunication [Exod. xxx. 33]. A special class of men, called "apothecaries," were afterwards appointed for the purpose of compounding it, and the "ointment of the apothecary" is the "precious ointment" of the sanctuary.

Whether or not the ceremonial anointing of persons and things found its way among the Gentile nations from the Jews, it is certain that it was so common that it would be no exaggeration to call it an universal custom: and this fact seems to show that it had its roots deeply planted in some religious instinct or primeval revelation. Associating this with the solemnity of the Divine ordinances respecting it, the evidence tends towards a high probability that, like many other customs, anointing looked towards the Messiah, or Anointed One, as the Redeemer for whom the world was waiting: a conviction which is strengthened by the fact that our Lord first announced His office by adopting the words of Isaiah, "The Lord hath anointed Me," [Isa. lxi. 1; Luke iv. 18]. In some mysterious way oil and precious ointment became symbolical of the mission of the Holy Ghost, in the power of which the Messiah, the Christ, the Anointed One, went forth to His redeeming work. And thus the anointings of prophet, priest, and king, were supremely typical of a delegation of Divine authority and Divine assistance.

The practice of ceremonial anointing was adopted into the Christian Church from the very first. The Apostles used it, doubtless by our Lord's command, in restoring the sick to health [Mark vi. 7, 12, 13], and St. James speaks of it as if of a well-known custom [James v. 14, 15]. It also became part of the ceremonies of Baptism, Confirmation, Ordination, and Coronation. [CHRIST. EXTREME UNCTION. BAPTISM. CONFIRMATION, &c.]

ANOMŒANS [α, and $\ddot{o}\mu o\iota o\varsigma$]. A sect of semi-Arians, condemned by them in their Council of Seleucia [A.D. 359.] They denied the likeness of God the Son to God the Father, as well as His consubstantiality, and hence their name. [AËTIANS, EUNOMIANS.]

ANTELUCAN. A term of reproach given to the early Eucharists of the primitive Christians. These were celebrated before daybreak for the sake of safety, in times of persecution: but the heathen imagined that such secrecy was adopted on account of immmoral or criminal rites.

ANTHEM. [ANTIPHON.]

ANTHROPOMORPHISM [i.e. in the likeness or form of man]. A name given to the opinion that the Deity has a human form, and that passages of Scripture which speak of God's "eye" or "ear," His "smelling a sweet savour," and His creating man in "His own image or likeness" [Gen. i. 27, vi. 8, viii. 21; Neh. i. 6], are to be understood in their literal sense. This gross error is inconsistent with the teaching of Scripture, that God is a Spirit, infinite and omnipresent, and that it is impossible by man's art or device to delineate the form of Him whom no man hath seen or can see [Isa. xl. 18; Acts xvii. 20]. Melito, a writer of the second century, has been supposed to hold Anthropomorphic errors; but only fragments of his works are extant, and his alleged errors may fairly be questioned.[1] Tertullian also has been supposed to have held similar opinions. He says that God has a body, though not the same as ours,[2] and passions, though not as man's;[3] meaning perhaps by "body" the Divine essence, or in other words that God is not a mere phantasm, but has a personal and substantial existence. His orthodoxy on this point is maintained by Natalis Alexander[4] and others.[5]

About the middle of the fourth century [A.D. 340], Audæus, a monk of Syria, was expelled from the Church, chiefly at least for censuring the immoral lives of the clergy, and then fell into the errors of Anthropomorphism. The sect originating from him, called Audæans, were probably extinct at the close of the fifth century.[6] The ecclesiastical historians, Socrates,[7] Sozomen,[8] and Theodorus,[9] give an account of the general prevalence at the close of the fourth century of Anthropomorphism amongst the monks of Egypt. Thus Sozomen says: "Most of the monks of that region believed that God had eyes, ears," &c. Probably such opinions had been derived from the Audæan sect, or from a want of education and instruction they had fallen into similar errors.

The latest work of St. Cyril of Alexandria is written against the Anthropomorphism of some of the monks of Mount Calamon in Egypt. Nor were such opinions extinct many centuries afterwards. In the tenth century Ratherius, Bishop of Verona, had a controversy [A.D. 939] on Anthropomorphism; "for in the neighbourhood of Vicenza there were many persons not only amongst the laity, but the clergy, who supposed that God possesses a human form, and sits upon a golden throne in the manner of kings, and that his ministers or angels are winged men clothed in white robes."[10]

Anthropomorphism, though a gross error, does not exclude or necessarily lead to separation from the communion of the Church. St. Augustine[11] speaks of some who held such views (carnales et parvulos nostros), which he considers more tolerable than the heresy of Manichæism. Anthropomorphism is not professed by any modern sect.

ANTICHRIST. Ὁ Ἀντίχριστος is four times referred to by St. John [1 John ii. 18, 22, iv. 3; 2 John 7], but the name itself is not used by any other New Testament writer. It is plainly a designation formed from the name which indicates the office of our Lord, and by which He was known in prophecy: "The Antichrist" being etymologically related and set opposite to "the Christ." An analogous designation Ἀντίθεος

[1] See the fragments of Melito [Migne's ed.] He was accused of Anthropomorphism chiefly on the authority of Origen and on account of the title of a work which is no longer extant, περὶ ἐνσώματου Θεοῦ, which is supposed to mean "On God in human form," but may be translated "On God, i. e. Christ, incarnate." St. Jerome in his tract "De illustribus viris" [sec. 24] gives an account of St. Melito's works, and refers without censure to this treatise, and could not therefore have given to the title an uncatholic meaning.

[2] Quis enim negabit Deum corpus esse, etsi Deus spiritus est? Spiritus enim corpus sui generis in sua effigie. Sed et invisibilia illa quæcunque sunt, habent apud Deum et suum corpus et suam formam, per quæ soli Deo visibilia sunt, quanto magis quod ex Ipsius substantia missum est [scil. Filius ejus] sine substantia non erit! Quæcunque ergo substantia Sermonis fuit, illam dico personam, et illi nomen Filii vindico; et dum Filium agnosco, secundum a Patre defendo. [Advers. Praxeam, c. vii.]

[3] Nam et dexteram et oculos et pedes Dei legimus, nec ideo tamen humanis comparabuntur, quia de appellatione sociantur. Quanta erit diversitas divini corporis et humani sub eisdem nominibus membrorum, tanta erit et animi divini et humani differentia sub eisdem licet vocabulis sensuum, quos tam corruptorios efficit in homine corruptibilitas substantiæ humanæ, quam incorruptorios in Deo efficit incorruptibilitas substantiæ divinæ. . . . Omnia necesse est adhibeat [Deus] propter omnia; tot sensus quot et causas: et iram propter scelestos et bilem propter ingratos, et emulationem propter superbos, et quicquid non expedit malis. Sed et misericordiam propter errantes et patientiam propter non resipiscentes et præstantiam propter merentes, et quicquid bonis opus est. Quæ omnia patitur more suo. . . . [Advers. Marcionem, lib. 2, c. xvi.]

[4] In Hist. Eccles. sæc. 11, dissert. ix.

[5] In Tertull., Apologet. auct. Nourry, c. vii. 3.

[6] An account of Audæus is given in Fleury's Ecclesiastical History, lib. x. sec. 44, and by Natalis Alexander, Eccles. Histor., tom. iv. de secta Audæorum.

[7] Lib. vi. 7. [8] Lib. viii. 6. [9] Lib. iv. 10.

[10] Mosheim, tenth century, History of Heresies, cap. v. § 4.

[11] Contra Epistol. Manichæi, c. xxiii. See also De Hæresibus, l.

is found in classical writers, and also in St. Chrysostom's Commentary on the second chapter of the second Epistle to the Thessalonians. The word is undoubtedly intended to signify an opponent of Christ, as St. Augustine says, "Antichristus, id est contrarius Christo" [Ep. Johan. ii. tract. iii. 4], and as is also said by St. Hilary [Ep. contra Auxent.] and others: but ἀντὶ in composition bears the sense of usurpation not less than that of opposition, and this seems to have been included, at least, in the original idea of the Antichrist, if it was not the primary sense in which the designation was understood. As the early Church was familiar with the idea of the great enemy of God transforming himself into an angel of light [2 Cor. xi. 14], so was it with the idea of "the Antichrist" being a counterfeit Christ as well as an opponent of Christ.

The manner in which St. John writes respecting the Antichrist shews that the subject on which he was writing was one that formed a common topic of early Christian teaching, "as ye have heard that Antichrist shall come," and again, "this is that spirit of Antichrist, of which ye have heard that it shall come." There are no other parts of the New Testament in which anything is said that can be directly associated with these words, and it must therefore be supposed that he refers to oral teaching. But from the earliest times two passages in the prophet Daniel, and one in an Epistle of St. Paul, have been considered to refer to the Antichrist. The Old Testament prophet, speaking of his vision of the day of judgment, describes it as preceded by the appearance of a little horn, in which "were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things" [Dan. vii. 8, viii. 8-14], and afterwards of "a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences," whose "power shall be mighty, but not by his own power," &c. [Dan. viii. 23]. St. Paul, also writing of the day of judgment, says, "that day shall not come except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God" [2 Thess. ii. 3]. And the apostle adds that he had already spoken of this man of sin: "Remember ye not, that when I was yet with you, I told you these things," an expression corresponding with the "as ye have heard" of St. John.[1] It may also be observed that these passages from Daniel and St. Paul are in close keeping with Rev. xiii. 4-18, the mystical allusions of which have been constantly interpreted of Antichrist.

These passages of Holy Scripture might be supplemented by many more, especially from the Psalms, in which there are mystical allusions to some great personal antagonist of Christ, but as mystical allusions are always open to dispute it will be better to rest upon the above, as setting forth the generally received view of Antichrist as it stands in the Old and New Testaments.

There was no doubt in the early Church that by the Antichrist of these passages was intended a real person. In more recent times they have been supposed to refer to systems or principles, as the Roman Empire, Infidelity, the Church of Rome, Worldliness. But this mode of interpretation is much less consistent with the language used in both the Old and New Testaments than that which, with the ancient Church, regards it as setting forth a personal Antichrist. Attributes of personality, life, and individual action are assigned to the Antichrist of Scripture. He is to sit in the temple of God, to exalt himself, to work miracles, to be "that wicked one," to be destroyed, and so forth. The use of the article, Ὁ Ἀντίχριστος, is also of no small significance in the same direction. And lastly, more than all, the nature of the opposition which is to be shown by Antichrist towards Christ is manifestly characteristic of a person. Although, therefore, any system which directly opposes itself to Christianity may very naturally be called Antichristianity, yet as the one is the system of a personal Founder and Centre, so also is the other; as Christianity grows from and converges towards Christ, so Antichristianity grows from and converges towards Antichrist.

The idea of the Antichrist is indeed that of a person setting up a kingdom in opposition to, and for the purpose of supplanting, the Kingdom of God. Thus, in the prophecy of Daniel, he is represented as (to use the word of Chrysostom) the Antitheos. But after the Incarnation of the Son of God, the kingdom of God became revealed as the system of which Christ is the Head. And thus the Antichrist must be defined to be a person setting up a religious system antagonistic to that of our Lord Jesus Christ.

From this we may see how various persons have come to be stigmatized as Antichrists, though none of them exhibit in anything like completeness the characteristics set down as those of the Antichrist. So Antiochus Epiphanes was generally called, of those who lived before the coming of our Lord; and so Mahomet, of those who have lived since. Each offered direct and systematic opposition to God's kingdom, and Mahomet practically offered himself to men as the supplanter of Christ. These are the two most conspicuous of what may be called typical Antichrists; but as St. John wrote, "even now are there many Antichrists," so we must regard as belonging to the same class such persons as Simon Magus, Dositheus, Bar-Cochab, Menander, and others, who not only denied Christ, but also set up visible "false Christs" in opposition to Him who had been received out of the sight of His disciples. "As the Saviour," said St Jerome, "had Solomon and the other saints as types of His coming, so we may rightly believe that Antichrist had as a type of himself that most evil king Antiochus, who persecuted the saints and profaned the temple" [Jerom. on Dan. xi. 21]; a principle which may plainly be extended to such persons as those above named without any violation of the sobriety of sound interpretation.

[1] The same familiarity with such teaching is indicated by the use of the relative, "that man of sin."

Among the great variety of opinions entertained respecting Antichrist by ancient writers, there is one opinion in which they are unanimous, viz. that he will appear in the age immediately preceding the Second Advent of Christ, and that he will be a person specially under the influence of Satan. Thus Origen quotes Celsus as having said that Christ had declared Satan would come as He Himself had done, work miracles, and usurp the glory of God [Orig. cont. Cels. vi. 42]; and in the Apostolic Constitutions Antichrist is called "the deceiver of the world, the enemy of the truth, the champion of that which is false," [Const. App. vii. 32], this person being directly afterwards named the Devil. St. Cyril of Jerusalem expresses the same belief: "When the true Christ is about to appear a second time, the Adversary, taking advantage of the expectation of the simple, will actuate a certain man who is a magician, and very expert in the art of deceiving" [Catech. xv. 4]; and so also does Theophylact: "Now this Antichrist is a man who carries Satan about with him" [Theophyl. in 1 John iv. 3]. And in the second of the Clementine Homilies it is said that "towards the end Antichrist will appear (preceded by a forerunning prophet), and after him ὁ ὄντως Χριστὸς, the true Christ" [II. xvii]. The opinion was also very general among the Fathers that Antichrist would not appear so long as the Roman Empire endured, but that when it had been broken up into ten kingdoms, he would come, and reunite them into an universal empire under his own sovereignty. This idea, that τὸ κατέχον of 2 Thess. ii. 6 was the Roman Empire is first found in Tertullian [de Resurrect. Carn. xxiv.]; and the same writer says in his Apology [xxxii.] that Christians prayed daily for the prosperity of the emperors and the empire, and for the interests of Rome, because they knew that the continuance of these would hinder the approach of Antichrist. Lactantius [Divin. Instit. vii. 25] speaks in a similar strain.[1] Lastly, it was a common opinion that he would be a Jew, of the tribe of Dan, of which tribe no mention is made in the book of the Revelation.

It seems to be indicated in the little which is said about Antichrist in Holy Scripture that this last great enemy of Christ and His kingdom will directly and definitely simulate the Person and Power of Christ. To this the very language of the Apostles witnesses, for they speak of the "coming," or advent, of Antichrist, of his "appearing," and his "revelation:" the "mystery of iniquity," in 2 Thess. ii. 7, opposes itself to the "mystery of godliness" in 1 Tim. iii. 16: Antichrist's presence in the world is to be signalized by great "signs and wonders," i.e. miracles wrought by him: and the one characteristic by which his appearance is set forth in the Apocalypse is that he is like a lamb, though speaking as a dragon [Rev. xiii. 11]. This idea took a strong hold upon some divines of the early Church. Thus Hippolytus wrote in his treatise on Christ and Antichrist: "The deceiver seeks to liken himself in all things to the Son of God. Christ is a Lion, so Antichrist is a lion; Christ is a King, so Antichrist is also a king. The Saviour was manifested as a Lamb; so he too will appear as a lamb, though within he is a wolf. The Saviour came into the world in the circumcision, so also will he. The Saviour sent apostles among all nations, and he in like manner will send false apostles. The Saviour gathered together the sheep that were scattered abroad, and he will likewise bring together a scattered people. The Lord gave a seal to those who believed in Him, and he will give one in like manner. The Saviour appeared in the form of man, and he too will come in human form. The Saviour raised up and shewed His holy flesh like a temple, and he will raise a temple of stone in Jerusalem." By some eminent Fathers it was, indeed, believed (and the belief is a very probable one) that Antichrist would be an incarnation of the Evil One, who seems to have assumed the form of a serpent when trying to win our first parents from some dim foresight of the Incarnation which was to win mankind for God. Thus Theodoret writes: "For the devil will imitate the Incarnation of our God and Saviour, and as the Lord was manifested by the instrumentality of man's nature, and wrought our salvation, so shall the devil also take a meet instrument of his own wickedness, and by means thereof shew forth his own operation, deceiving such men as are indolent and off their guard with false signs and wonders, and a parade of simulative miracles" [Theodoret, in Dan. vii. 26]. In the tract on Antichrist attributed to St. Augustine there is also language of a somewhat similar kind: "But let us now see what is the beginning of Antichrist. He will be born in the usual way, like other men, and not, as some say, of a virgin alone. . . . But at the very moment when he begins to be conceived, the devil will enter at the same time into his mother's womb, and of the power of the devil will his substance be compacted, quickened, and nourished: and the power of the devil will ever be with him. . . . Thus shall the devil descend on the mother of Antichrist, and fill her entirely, surround her entirely, hold her entirely, and possess her entirely within and without; that by the cooperation of the devil she may conceive through a man, and that the thing which shall be born may be altogether sinful, altogether damned."

Some confirmation of this opinion that Antichrist will be Satan incarnate is given by the fact that the course of opposition to Christianity has been that of a continuous development from coarse and broad forms of antagonism, such as heathen persecutions and absolute impostures, to those of a more subtle kind. It would thus seem that the great enemy was slowly acquiring a more perfect knowledge of the Christian system; and as the incarnation of God is the very foundation of that system, so the knowledge of that truth at last acquired by Satan may be the great climax of knowledge respecting Christ and His work, out of which he will develop an imitation "coming with all deceivableness" among men. If this be a true opinion, then the great crowning feature of the last assault on Christianity will be the setting up the person, kingdom, and worship of Satan incarnate in the human form of Antichrist, as a substitute for the Person, kingdom, and worship, of our Lord Jesus Christ. As the "mystery of Godliness" is the manifestation of God in the flesh, so a dreadful simulation of it will be the "mystery of iniquity." The "abomination of desolation" may then be truly said to "stand in the holy place" when "the son of perdition, that wicked One, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped," does, in his final pride, "sit in the temple of God" by proclaiming himself as the object of Divine worship, and "declaring himself that he is God." The seduction of mankind to this new system of faith and worship will, of course, be the great "falling away," or apostasy, predicted by our Lord and St. Paul.

[1] There was also a singular opinion that Antichrist would be Nero resuscitated. See Lactant. de Mortib. Persec. ii.; Jerom. in Dan. xi.; Aug. de Civit. Dei, xix. 3, xx.

The subject of this article is dealt with by every commentator on the books of Daniel and the Revelation. There is also much useful information in Greswell on the Parables, i. 370-396. But the most exhaustive work is Malvenda de Antichristo, a folio in eleven books, published at Rome in 1604.

ANTIDORON. A Greek liturgical word for the remains of the unconsecrated bread which had been blessed in the Office of the Prothesis. Its name is derived from the original purpose of its institution, that of distribution to the non-communicants "instead of the gift" of the Eucharistic bread itself. Its origin is referred by Balsamon to the Council of Antioch, by the Latins to Pope Pius I. [Neale's Introd. Hist. of Eastern Ch. 525.] There is no doubt a close association between the modern "pain beni" or "l'offrande" of the French, the "blessed bread" of the old English Church, the Eulogiæ of the ancient Latins, the Antidoron of the Greeks, and the primitive love feasts. [AGAPÆ.]

ANTILEGOMENA. The ancient ecclesiastical term for disputed books claiming to be part of the Holy Scriptures. [CANON.]

ANTINOMIANISM means, literally, opposed to law, or as the word is generally understood, to the moral law of God. We first read in ecclesiastical history of the Antinomianism of various Gnostic sects, not only held as a pure theory, but in its development of gross licentiousness. The principal Gnostic teachers maintained that there was a radical difference amongst men: some, created evil, were incapable of salvation; and others who were of celestial or divine origin would finally be saved, however licentious their lives.[1] There are allusions to Gnosticism in the New Testament —its strange and monstrous creed and gross immoralities—by St. Paul [1 Tim. vi. 20, 21; Col. ii. 18, 19; 1 Tim. iv. 1-5] and St. John [1 Epist. ii. 18-22, iii. 7-9]. Cerinthus, a Gnostic teacher, was contemporary with the latter Apostle [CERINTHIANS], and St. John speaks of the Nicolaitanes [Rev. ii. 6, 15], a profligate sect,[2] which probably originated from one of the seven deacons, Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch [Acts vi. 5].

But we should wholly mistake the theory of Antinomianism did we suppose that it merely flowed from man's corrupt nature, or was an excuse for the gratification of his evil desires. Antinomianism, or such opinions as generally or necessarily lead to it, alleges in its support the teaching of Holy Scripture, and we cannot doubt from the allusions to "faith" by Gnostic teachers, that they attempted in some degree to justify their licentiousness from the supposed meaning of St. Paul's teaching.

At the period of the Reformation, Antinomianism, generally free from the immoralities of Gnosticism, reappeared on an alleged scriptural foundation under the name of justification by faith only, or Solifidianism. The teaching of St. Paul on justification by faith "without the deeds of the law" was so interpreted by Luther and others as to exclude justification by works, or to contradict the teaching of St. James, that we are justified by works and not by faith only [JUSTIFICATION]. Bishop Bull[3] has shewn that St. James probably wrote his epistle for the purpose of correcting the erroneous impression which prevailed of the meaning of St. Paul's teaching.[4]

That Luther held the heresy of Solifidianism is unquestionable, as will elsewhere be proved [JUSTIFICATION]. One of his disciples, John Agricola, openly taught Antinomianism at Wittenberg [A.D. 1538], and though his teaching was disclaimed, and (we are told) refuted by Luther,[5] it was un-

[1] St. Irenæus (lib. i. c. 24) gives an account of the gross immorality of the followers of Simon Magus, from whom all heresies were derived (ex quo universæ hæreses substiterunt), and of Carpocrates and the Cainites.

[2] S. Iren. de hær. lib. i. c. 26, § 3.

[3] On Justification, dissert. ii. c. iv.

[4] Dr Burton says: "James (i.e. St. James the Apostle, Bishop of Jerusalem) must have witnessed the effect of this false philosophy (Gnostic errors) in the neighbouring country, of Samaria, where Simon Magus, as I have stated, met with great success. That impostor perverted the doctrines of the Gospel, and probably quoted St. Paul as saying that good works were of no importance. I have conjectured that Simon was at Rome about the time of St. Paul addressing his epistle to the Christians of that city. He may himself have seen that epistle, and may have spread a false account of it upon his return shortly after to Samaria. The Bishop of Jerusalem would feel himself called upon to repress an evil which came so near; and we may thus arrive at a probable cause, as well as an approximation to a date of the catholic Epistle of James. It was perhaps written between the year 53, when St. Paul wrote to the Romans, and the year 62, when James himself was put to death." [Lectures on Ecclesiastical History, ix. 1844.]

[5] Sleidan [History of the Reformation, book xii.] gives the following account, from which it appears that Luther only refuted, or attempted to refute, some of the reasons on which Agricola founded his Antinomianism. Luther did not, and was unable to shew that, admitting his own theory, obedience to the moral law was not by fair inference virtually set aside as necessary for salvation: "This year 1538, the sect of the Antinomians began. Their opinion is, that repentance ought not to be urged from a consideration of the breach of the Decalogue, and they dispute against those who maintained that men are not questionably a legitimate result of his own system or theory. The erroneous belief of the Anabaptists, which during the Peasant War[1] was accompanied with gross profligacy, we may say was logically derived from Lutheranism, since, if faith only justifies, infants, who cannot believe, are not the fit subjects of baptism.

Again, the Calvinistic doctrine of IMPUTED RIGHTEOUSNESS may be justly charged with Antinomianism, since a believer clothed in the robe of Christ's righteousness is represented as being in a state of absolute perfection, and thus his individual merits or demerits cannot alter his state in the sight of God. The Antinomianism which has been the result of Calvinistic teaching in modern times (during last century) is strikingly set forth by Fletcher in his Checks to Antinomianism [2d Check, 3d Letter].

The teaching of Holy Scripture on the subject will be seen in the passages quoted below.[2] The Church, following its guidance, has ever represented as of primary and indispensable importance the duty of obedience to God's commandments, which is the only satisfactory proof of love to Him; and has condemned such theories as are above noticed, not merely as presumptuously intruding into those "secret things" which belong to God only [see Deut. xxix. 29], but as likely to set aside our bounden duties and obligations as Christians: assuring us that "in keeping God's commandments we please Him both in will and deed."[3]

ANTIOCH, SCHOOL OF. The "Royal city" [1 Macc. iii. 37] of Antioch, partly insulated on the outflow of the Orontes, and with its harbour of Seleucia, was built by Seleucus Nicator [B.C. 300], and colonized by Jews, who were placed on the same municipal and political level with the Greek population [Jos. Ant. III. i. c., Ap. ii. 4]. It was one main gate of the East, through which India and Persia poured their wealth into Europe. The Romans, who "where they conquered dwelt" [Seneca ad Helv. § 6], freely resorted to Antioch, so that the social habits of the Antiochean reflected the civilization, and, as Chrysostom says, the vices also of the forum. "In Tiberim defluxit Orontes" was true as regards the origin of Oriental superstitions in Rome, but the tidal action was reciprocal, and the Orontes received back a broad wave of population from the Tiber, with much also of its alluvium. The population in fact was, as Mr. Conybeare has stated, "a worthless rabble." Antioch, as the head of a despised group of provincial towns, the Roman capital of Syria, was itself a servile imitator of the great metropolis; but it was Rome Hellenized, and Italo-Greek fashions prevailed, modified by the barbaric luxury of Eastern life. Antiochus Epiphanes, a great affecter of everything Roman, built a temple of Jupiter Capitolinus on the Silpian height, and introduced the Roman costume, himself wearing the toga in the streets of Antioch; and altogether he gave to the city a more European cast than otherwise it would have had. As at Alexandria so at Antioch: the Macedonians established schools of Greek learning, but with this difference, that while the Platonic philosophy was chiefly represented at Alexandria, the Peripatetic was the popular form at Antioch, the system of Aristotle being of more easy Oriental assimilation. Neo-Platonism had its Oriental analogies, received through Philo and other Hellenistic sources; but in whatever degree the Oriental mind has shewn any spontaneous proclivity towards Greek learning, Aristotle has been the master followed. Thus Avicenna and Averroes initiated the Moors of Spain in the dialecties of Aristotle; who became known to the schools of the Middle Ages at fourth hand through Latin translations of Arabic versions from original Syriac renderings of the Greek text. [Munk, Mélanges de Ph. Juive et Arabe, p. 314.]

The schools of Antioch also resounded with discussions derived from the Lyceum; and here, as at Rome, the Sophist jangled and quibbled, when the oratory of an early period had been forgotten. The schools of Antioch were wholly in the hands of the Sophists. Antioch was the place where the people of Christ first obtained the name of Christians; but it was also the place where the spirit of scepticism developed the first germs of the heresy that has done more than anything else to scatter and harass the flock of Christ—the Arian heresy. Gnosticism, the product of Egypt, was scarcely within the Church. The arch-heretic Simon Magus had introduced it at Antioch [Justin M., Apol. i. 26]; and his disciple Saturninus obtained a considerable following there as a teacher of ascetic Gnosticism. The epistles also of Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, shew that he had been brought into close contact with one form or other of that many-headed pest. Origen, when his father suffered martyrdom under Sulpicius Severus, and when his family property was confiscated, was admitted by a lady of family into her house; and his faith was put to a severe trial by reason of her adopted son, named Paulus, being a Gnostic teacher of Antioch. Gnosticism, however, came ab extra, while Arianism was purely endemic, and may be traced back in its rise to the sophistical disputa-

to have the Gospel preached to them till their minds are alarmed and worked into compunction by the doctrine of the law. But they assert, on the contrary, that let a man's life be never so scandalous and debauched, yet if he does but believe the promises of the Gospel he shall be justified. Johannes Islebius Agricola was their leading man, but this heresy was soon confuted at large by Luther, where he sheweth that the law was not given that we might be justified by it, but to discover the nature and malignity of sin, and to terrify the conscience; and therefore it is to be pressed in the first place, afterwards the Gospel is to be explained, which represents the Son of God as a mediator and propitiation for the whole world." He then says that Agricola, being better instructed afterwards, came over to Luther's opinion, and made a public confession of his error. [Bohun's translation, p. 244, 1689.]

[1] There were two risings of the Anabaptists, under Munzer and Storck [1521-25] and under John of Leyden [1534-5].

[2] Deut. v. 29, vi. 24, 25, x. 12, 13, xxx. 9, 10; Psa. lxxxi. 11-16, cxii. 1-4; Isaiah i. 16-20, xxxii. 17, lviii. 6-11; Eccles. xii. 11; Micah vi. 8; Matt. vii. 16-27, xxv. 31-45; John xiv. 15, 21, 23, 24, xv. 2, 8, 10; Rom. ii. 6-10; Gal. vi. 7, 8; Ephes. ii. 10; 1 John ii. 3-6, 17, 29, iii. 4, 6-10, v. 3, 18; 1 Peter i. 14, 15; 2 Peter i. 3-11; Rev. xxii. 12, 14, 15.

[3] Collect for First Sunday after Trinity.

tions of the Antiochean schools; though Arius, from his Alexandrian extraction, was called by Jerome "demonium meridianum" [adv. Ruf. ii. 149]. Nothing could be more pernicious than the practice of making deep religious truth the subject of scholastic discussion; nothing more likely to give a sceptical bias to inconstant minds. Arianism in its first rise was at once referred back to Paul of Samosata, the heretical and judaizing Bishop of Antioch, who had elicited the first sparks of mischief that were destined to envelop the whole religious world in flames. [Alex. Ep. ad Constant. Theod. H. E., i. 4.] He exactly exemplifies the tendency of such schools as the Antiochean. The hopes of the Sophist lay in points of attack rather than of defence, in weakening and demolishing an enemy's position rather than in building up a sound rampart of doctrine for self-defence. Thus Paul endeavoured to undermine the Catholic faith by a sophistical use of the term "substance;" and his attack so far met with success as to cast discredit for a time on the term ὁμοούσιος, which afterwards became the test of orthodoxy. The word in heretical language meant "one individuality;" in Catholic acceptance "one nature." Paul at first gave way before the weight of Catholic tradition brought to bear upon him in the first council of Antioch, A.D. 265; but he continued to propagate his error, and a brother Sophist, Melchion, was the means of detecting and procuring its condemnation. It was not without reason, therefore, that Epiphanius styled Aristotle the Bishop of the Arians. The practical morality of Peripatetic doctrine, as expounded by Lucian the Martyr, commended it to men whose adhesion to the Arian cause would otherwise have caused our surprise. The schools still kept the discussion alive; until Arius followed with singular precision in the steps of Paul. Being well versed in dialectics, οὐκ ἄμοιρος τῆς διαλεκτικῆς [Socr. i. 5], he attacked in syllogistic form Bishop Alexander's doctrine of the Eternal Filiation of the Word as Sabellian, and from love of disputation flew to the opposite extreme; "endeavouring to exhibit the Divine Nature by Aristotelian syllogisms and mathematical data" [Epiphanius, Hær.], he naturally got very wide of the truth. Syllogisms, however, are as pointless arrows for the many, whether as regards the propagation of truth or of error. "Non in dialecticâ complacuit Deo salvum facere populum suum" [Ambros. de Fid. i. 3]; neither would Arian error have been so formidable if its teachers had confined themselves to a dialectical method. But as Paul set forth his views in hymns for popular use, so Arius conveyed his blasphemies home to the people in verse. The subject need not be followed out here to a greater extent; it is sufficient to have indicated the first impulse that Arianism received from the schools of Antioch.

Yet if the dialectical school of Antioch was a hotbed of mischief, there was also a sound school of biblical exegesis, following a straightforward line of grammatical interpretation [Conybeare, Bampt. Lect. iv.], rather than the allegorizing mysticism that gained such head at Alexandria. Its method is best seen in the exegesis of Chrysostom. Antioch in this respect stood second only to the Rome of the three first centuries. Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, [A.D. 168], in his work ad Autolycum indicates the learned Platonic Christian; he also wrote a Commentary on the Gospels [Jerom. de Vir. ill.]; and the valuable religious training that was organized at Antioch may be seen in the labours of such men as Serapion; as Lucian the Martyr, led by generosity of feeling as a pupil rather than by theological conviction to cast in his lot with Paul of Samosata, and who made a careful revision of the LXX. text, copies of which were known by his name as Λουκιάνεια, "Constantinopolis usque ad Antiochiam Luciani martyris exemplaria probat" [Hieron. adv. Ruf. ii.]; as the learned presbyter Dorotheus, made by Diocletian prefect of an establishment for manufacturing purple dye, his reward for Hebrew scholarship; as Meletius, with whom Chrysostom studied for a year with lifelong benefit, and afterwards as Bishop delivered his celebrated homilies, "De statuis," in the church of Antioch; as Flavian, Diodorus of Tarsus, Cyril of Jerusalem, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and others. It is to be regretted that our knowledge of the orthodox teaching communicated at Antioch is so slender, though perhaps something may yet be had from the Nitrian Syriac MSS. of the British Museum collection.

A good understanding was maintained between the schools of Antioch and of Alexandria, until the heterodox tendencies of the latter in the Nestorian and Monophysite periods caused a permanent estrangement. Gieseler has judiciously enlarged the area of the Antiochean schools, so as to embrace the whole of Syria, under the title of the Syrian historico-exegetical school, and adds to the above names Eusebius of Emesa, Apollinaris of Laodicea, and Ephraem of Edessa. [Herzog. Newman's Arians, Ch. Antioch. Neander, ii. p. 659, 1847. Gieseler, K. Gesch., sec. 63.]

ANTIPHON. This name has been given, time out of mind, to the short sentence (mostly taken from Holy Scripture), which is sung before and after a psalm or canticle, as a "key-note" to its application. The etymological sense of the word in this case is not that of an alternate chant, but of a verse "ex opposito respondens" to the psalm or canticle. An ancient Antiphonarium for the year is attributed to St. Gregory the Great, and is printed by Pamelius in the first volume of his Liturgicon. The facsimile of a MS. copy that belonged to the Monastery of St. Gall, with the original musical notation, has also been printed recently at Paris. [Grancolas, Comm. in Brev. Rom.]

The English word ANTHEM is derived from the Greek Αντίφωνα, the plural of Antiphon, through the Anglo-Saxon Antefn. [See Annotated Book of Common Prayer, p. lxii.]

ANTIPOPES. Pretenders to the bishopric of Rome. It is almost impossible to make a perfect list of them, because we cannot now, in many cases, decide which of the two claimants was canonically elected.

Joseph Gautier gives us a chronological index of them, with brief notices of each case;[1] and as his view may be taken to be that held by writers of the Roman Church as to the true succession, his list is fully tabulated below, so as to present the series in a compendious form. Michael Geddes, chancellor of Sarum, has written a history of the schisms thus caused, which he numbers at twenty-four.[2] He does not always pretend to decide between the rivals, and he omits a few named by Gautier. The latter gives the number of thirty-eight, but two of his cases embrace each a pair of invalid elections, and the whole number of antipopes may therefore be reckoned at forty. Bergier,[3] without giving any names, says there have been twenty-eight. There are two classes of antipopes, distinguished below as (a) those elected during the lifetime of a pope canonically in possession, and (b) those whose own election was in itself invalid.

List by Gautier.	Geddes' Schisms.	Date.	Antipope.		Pope.
1	1	c. 251	Novatianus (a).		Cornelius.
2	2	c. 356	Felix II. (a).	Although schismatic, esteemed a [martyr.	Liberius.
3	3	366	Ursinus (a).		Damasus.
4	4	418	Eulalius (b).		Boniface I.
5	5	498	Laurentius (a).		Symmachus.
6	6	530	Dioscorus; Bp. of Nocera (a).		Boniface II.
7	7	537	Vigilius (a).	Sylverius died 538, and Vigilius [was then canonically elected.	Sylverius.
8		686	John (b).		Conon.
		686	Peter (b).		Conon.
9		687	Pascal (b).		Sergius I.
		687	Theodore (b).		Sergius I.
10	8	757	Theophylact (b).		Paul I.
11		767	Constantine (b).	Held the See one year before [Stephen's election.	Stephen III.
12	9	824	Zinzinus (b).		Eugenius II.
13	10	855	Anastasius III.; Card. (a).		Benedict III.
14	11	897	Sergius III. (b).		John IX.
15	12	963	Leo VIII. (a).	Died in possession.	John XII.
16	13	974	Boniface VII. (b).	Included also in list of Popes.	Benedict VII.
17	14	c. 996	John XVI.; Bp. of Placentia (a).		Gregory V.
18		c. 1013	Gregory (a).		Benedict VIII.
19	15	1044	Sylvester III.; John, Bp. of Sabinum (a).		Benedict IX.
20	16	1058	Benedict X.; John, Bp. of Velitræ (b).		Nicolas II.
21	17	1061	Honorius II.; Cadolaus, Bp. of Parma (a).		Alexander II.
22	18	1080	Clement III.; Guibert, Bp. of Ravenna (a).	In succession to 21.	Gregory VII.
23	18	1100	Albert (a).	In succession to 22.	Pascal II.
24	18	1100	Theodoric (a).	In succession to 23.	Pascal II.
25	18	1102	Sylvester III.; Maginulfus (a).		Pascal II.
26	20	1118	Gregory VIII.; Bourdinus, Abp. of Braga (a).		Gelasius II.
27	19	1130	Anacletus II.; Peter Leoni, Card. (a).		Innocent II.
28	19	1138	Victor IV.; Gregory, Card. (a).	In succession to 27.	Innocent II.
29	21	1159	Victor IV. (or V.); Octavianus (a).		Alexander III.
30	21	1164	Pascal; Guido, Card. (a).	In succession to 29.	Alexander III.
31	21	1170	Callixtus III.; Abbot of Struna (a).	In succession to 30.	Alexander III.
32		1180	Innocent III., Lando (a).	In succession to 31.	Alexander III.
33	22	c. 1328	Nicolas V.; Peter Corbarius (a).		John XXII.
34	23	1378	Clement VII.; Robert, Card. (a).		Urban VI.
35	23	1394	Benedict XIII.; Peter de Luna, Card. (a).	In succession to 34.	Boniface IX.
36	23	1425	Clement VIII.; Ægidius, Can. of Barcelona (a)	In suc. to 35. Made Bp. of Majorca.	Martin V.
37		1426	Benedict XIV. (a).	In opposition to 36.	Martin V.
38	24	1438	Felix; Amadeus, Duke of Savoy (a).	Made Bp. of Sabinum.	Eugenius IV.

This table shews how enduring were some of the schisms occasioned by disputed elections. Very often the dispute was the occasion of much bloodshed. The uncertainty is well seen by the fact of Bonifacc VII. being placed by Gautier in both lists. [Some are noticed by Gibbon. See, more particularly, for the 3rd, iii. 255 (ed. Smith, 1854); for the 7th, v. 144; for the 22nd, vii. 128; and for the 34th (where is an account of the great schism in the West), viii. 251. Numerous references are given to his authorities.]

ANTITRINITARIANISM. [Unitarianism. Arianism.]

ANTITYPE. The word Antitype means either the converse of Type, as substance is the correlative of shadow; and the reader will find various examples of the antitypal fulfilment of prophetic type under this word itself; or it means simply the copy or similitude of anything: "die von einem Gemälde genommene copie" [Schl.], in which sense it occurs twice in the New Testament [Heb. ix. 24[4] and 1 Pet. iii. 21]. In the same way the sacred utensils of the tabernacle were the antitypal copies of the things shewn to Moses: "See thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount" [Heb. viii. 5], (κατὰ τὸν τύπον). Now this pattern is scarcely applicable to the outward form of the various parts and vessels of the tabernacle, neither can we imagine that their counterparts should have an existence in heaven, there the type, here the antitype in temporal similitude, any more than we can suppose that the likeness of God in which man was created was the outward likeness of form, and not the spiritual similitude of purity and holiness

[1] Printed in Migne's Theologiæ Cursus. Paris, 1841.

[2] Miscell. Tracts, vol. iii. tract 4. Lond. 1706.

[3] Dictionnaire de Théologie, i. 135. Paris, 1863.

[4] Where Chrysostom says of the word—τύπον ἔχει μόνον ὀυ τὴν ἰσχύν.

and unison with the Divine will. The scheme of man's salvation having been decreed from all eternity, we may believe that the divine ἰδέαι of this scheme were revealed to the Lawgiver of Israel, and a direct connection established by his inspired mediation between the holy things of the tabernacle and the verities of which they were gross earthly shadows. The sacrifices of the law also were standing memorials of the sacrifice to be made once for all, prophecies, eloquent though mute, of the Blessed Lamb of God that "taketh away the sin of the world." Antitypes they were in one sense of the word, as being earthly images of the scheme foreordained from the beginning of the world; but types of Christ, the substance of that scheme, Himself the only Antitype of all that they foreshadowed. And in the end we may expect that every part and portion of our earthly worship will be found to be the reflex image of heavenly verities, broken it may be and distorted, as the face of heaven is reflected in broken beams of light from the face of the lake; still there we may believe them to be, the truth and its forecast, part and counterpart, type and antitype, the beauty of holiness on earth perfected in the glories of the heavenly Jerusalem, of which God is the Sun and the Lamb is the Light thereof for ever.

One peculiar use of the word Antitype may be noticed as occurring in Greek ecclesiastical writings, and having reference to the Holy Eucharist in the earliest times. Irenæus, in a fragment, after speaking of the Eucharistic offering of bread and wine as a thank-offering for the fruits of the earth, says "the Holy Spirit is then invoked, that He will vouchsafe that the bread may be the body and the cup the blood of Christ, that they who receive these antitypes may obtain remission of sins and everlasting life" [ii. 504, Cambr. Ed.]. Not widely distant in time, the writer of the Apostolical Constitutions uses the word in the same way, in speaking of the first institution of the Lord's Supper [v. 14], "He having administered the antitypal mysteries of His precious body and blood went forth;" and again, "Offer also the antitypal acceptable Eucharist of the royal body of Christ" [vi. 30]; and elsewhere, "We give thanks, O Father, for the precious blood of Jesus Christ that was shed for us, and for the precious body, whose antitypes we offer." The Liturgy also that bears the name of Basil M.: "We, offering the antitypes of the holy body and blood of Christ, beseech Thee that Thy Holy Spirit may descend upon us and upon these gifts." The word therefore is "mediæ significationis," and is used of the sacred elements both before and after consecration. The interpretation is probably correct which makes it synonymous with ἰσότυπα, i. e. "Eadem cum Corpore et Sanguine Christi etsi tecte et relate" [Leo Allat. de Cons. Eccl. Occ. et Or. III. xv. 29]. John Damascene declares, "If some have termed the bread and wine antitypes of the body and blood of Christ, they mean the elements in their unconsecrated state, not after consecration" [Fid. Orthod. iv. 14]; which is the more noteworthy since all later Greek commentators have followed his lead. But this does not invalidate the genuineness of the Irenæan fragment, which speaks of the elements as yet unconsecrated.

'ΑΦΟΡΙΣΜΟΣ. A term used in the Primitive Church for the lesser form of excommunication, and also for the SUSPENSION of the clergy. As regarded the laity, such a form of separation or suspension excluded them from the Holy Eucharist, but still permitted them to be present in church during those portions of the service when catechumens were allowed to be present. In the case of the clergy, suspension did not involve excommunication. The παντελὴς ἀφορισμὸς was the greater excommunication, or ANATHEMA.

APHTHARTODOCETÆ. A sect of heretics which arose in the middle of the sixth century at Alexandria. Their distinctive tenet was that the body of our Lord Jesus Christ was incorruptible, immortal, and impassible, through its union with the Divine Nature. It was one of those subtle forms of misbelief which, seeming to honour our Lord with high attributes, did, in reality, strike at the very root of Christianity.

'ΑΠΟΛΕΛΥΜΕΝΟΣ. Ordination without title, as distinguished from the ordinatio localis, which fixes the diocese or parish within whose bounds the ordinary ministrations of a bishop or priest are to be restricted. The 6th Canon of the Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451] contains the word, and condemns the practice. This canon even decrees "that such an ordination is to be held void, and cannot have any effect anywhere, to the reproach of him who ordains." [JURISDICTION. MISSION.]

APOLLINARIANISM. The founder of this heresy was Apollinaris or Apollinarius, son of an Alexandrian rhetorician of the same name. In his earlier life Apollinarius was a friend of St. Athanasius, and about A.D. 362 he was consecrated to the see of Laodicea. Apollinarianism was founded on the Platonic trichotomy of σῶμα, ψυχή, and νοῦς. It denied to the human nature of Christ the possession of the νοῦς or rational soul, and supposed that the Divine Word, or Λόγος, supplied its place, subduing and counteracting the evil tendencies of the ψυχή, or animal soul. During the lifetime of St. Athanasius this heresy was kept within bounds, but on his death Apollinarius proclaimed it more boldly, and his followers adopted in addition the tenets of the Sabellians and the Patripassians, and also maintained a notion that the body of Christ was brought down from heaven, where it had a long pre-existence. The heresy was condemned by Councils at Rome [A.D. 374], Antioch [A.D. 378], and by the General Council of Constantinople [A.D. 381], yet Apollinarius remained Bishop of Laodicea till his death in A.D. 392. [See Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

APOLOGY. When the knowledge of Christianity had passed the limits to which it was at first confined, there arose from time to time a need for such an explanation and defence of its tenets as could command the attention of those with whom it had now come into contact. Calumnies respecting the faith, the morality, and the loyalty of the Christians were circulated among the heathen, and enemies were not wanting to carry these reports to the ears of those on whose will the lives of the Christians depended. Hence arose the early Christian Apologies. The first of these, that of QUADRATUS, was presented at Athens to Hadrian [A.D. 126]. Quadratus appeals to the many persons who had been healed by the Saviour, and to those of them especially who had lived even in the writer's own day, as witnesses for the truth of Christianity. At the same time the Apology of ARISTIDES was presented to Hadrian. Eusebius says that in his time this work was in the possession of very many Christians. [Euseb. iv. 3.] The first Apology of the philosopher-Christian, JUSTIN MARTYR, was addressed [A.D. 138 or 139] to Antoninus Pius, to the senate, and to the whole Roman people. The preface to this Apology states it to be "on behalf of those who of all nations are now unjustly hated and aspersed." The answer Justin obtained was an epistle from Antoninus Pius to the Assembly of Asia, in which it was desired that the Christians should not be molested unless they made attempts against the government, and that if any person were arraigned on the sole ground of Christianity, the accuser should be held guilty, the accused set free. Justin's second Apology [A.D. 161-166] was addressed to Marcus Aurelius.[1] In addition to a defence of the faith it contained a severe attack upon the Cynic philosopher Crescens, whom he charges with impugning the doctrines of Christianity without understanding them, and with writing merely to gain popular applause, even at the expense of honesty and truth. The Cynic revenged himself by instigating the death of Justin, who suffered martyrdom by order of Marcus Aurelius [A.D. 161-168]. Justin was also the author of a dialogue with Trypho the Jew—a work which Eusebius highly eulogizes as evincing the philosophical zeal with which Justin had applied himself to the discovery of Christian truth. [Euseb. iv. 18.] To Marcus Aurelius Apologies were also presented by MELITO, Bishop of Sardis, and APOLLINARIS, Bishop of Hierapolis. The former declares that the treatment which the Christians, who were loyal subjects of the Emperor, had received was such as ought not to be shewn even towards barbarous enemies. The period of the Antonines was more fruitful than any other in Apologetic writings. In the same period was written the Apology of MILTIADES, "a work against the philosophers of the age in favour of the philosophy which he embraced;" of THEOPHILUS, the sixth bishop of Antioch, addressed in three books to Autolycus [A.D. 160-170], and containing the elements of the faith; and the λόγος πρὸς Ἕλληνας of TATIAN, a disciple of Justin, but after his master's death an apostate from the Church. The celebrated dialogue called the Octavius, written by MARCUS MINUCIUS FELIX, a Roman lawyer, belongs, according to some authorities, to this period, and is therefore the earliest Latin Apology which has come down to us. On the testimony of Jerome, however, others have assigned a later date [A.D. 220-230] to the Octavius. It is written in the style of Cicero, and contains a clear account of the great questions at issue between Christianity and heathenism. The date of the Διασυρμὸς τῶν ἔξω Φιλοσόφων of HERMIAS cannot be fixed with accuracy; some writers have even placed it so late as the fifth century. It abounds in ridicule of the philosophers of the day, and caricatures the subjects which engrossed their attention. The Apology of TERTULLIAN was written in Latin [A.D. 194], and afterwards translated into Greek. While defending the Church, and deprecating the severity shewn towards Christians, Tertullian attacked the ancient gods, and wrote with bitter scorn and contempt of the actions attributed to them by their worshippers. Origen composed at the age of sixty [A.D. 246] a reply in eight books to the work of Celsus against Christianity. About A.D. 303, ARNOBIUS, a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca, in Africa, wrote (while yet a catechumen) a defence of Christianity, in seven books, as a proof of the reality of his conversion. The objects of the Apologists are: [1.] To shew the reasonableness of their faith, and the emptiness of the objections brought against it. [2.] To prove the folly of the popular beliefs, and the unworthiness of the heathen deities, a task which the heathen philosophers had themselves rendered easy. The view of Euhemerus that the deities were dead men is in fact quoted and appealed to by Minucius Felix [Oct. i. 21]. [3.] To refute the false accusations of Atheism, immorality, and sedition which were perseveringly made against the Christians. The arguments of the Apologists are drawn from the prophecies of the Old Testament, the miracles of the Saviour, the rapid growth of Christianity, the constancy of the Christians in their cruel sufferings, their strict and self-denying lives, their peaceable obedience to the laws, and from the absurdities of the popular superstition, which they hold up to unsparing ridicule.

APOSTASY. This term, originally signifying desertion from and revolt against the commander to whom a soldier owed loyalty and obedience, has come to mean, in respect to Christianity, desertion from the faith of Christ, and revolt against it. The influences which have chiefly led persons into apostasy have been persecution, worldly interest, and speculative unbelief. [1.] It was the peculiar temptation to which Christians were subjected under the persecuting emperors and their subordinates, renunciation of Christ being the one condition on which a person accused of being a Christian could escape martyrdom. The gentlest test of such a renunciation was that of offering a few grains of incense to a heathen deity; the most coarse form of it that of a verbal blasphemy against the Lord. [2.] In all times there have been apostates who have forsaken Christianity for some other religion on account of their interest. Such cases not unfrequently occur in modern days when Christians have become Mahometans for the sake of a good position in the service of a Mahometan sovereign. [3.] Many heresies are constructive apostasy, but the term is more properly applicable to such wilful renunciation of all belief in Christ as that of the Emperor Julian—always surnamed the Apostate—or of infidels like Voltaire and others during the French Revolution.

[1] So according to Mosheim and Semisch; according to Valerius and Alexander it was written, like the first, under Antoninus Pius.

Respecting the Ἀποστασία of the last days [2 Thess. ii. 3; 1 Tim. iv. 1] see the article on ANTICHRIST.

APOSTLE. The primary idea of an Ἀπόστολος is that of a person having a mission to do certain things as the representative of the authority by which he is sent. Hence he goes forth as "one sent," not in his own name. In this sense the term is once used respecting the Lord Himself, Who is called "The Apostle and High Priest of our profession . . . faithful to Him that appointed [τῷ ποιήσαντι] Him" [Heb. iii. 1], the expression being thus used with reference to the mediatorial and ministerial mission of Christ.

The name was first given to twelve of our Lord's followers, whom He so designated when He sent them forth with power to work miracles, and authority to proclaim the coming of His spiritual kingdom; and so to prepare the way for His own visitation of particular towns or districts of Palestine. But it was doubtless given by Him in an inclusive sense by anticipation, and thus we must look for the entire meaning of the title in the specialities by which the office was subsequently distinguished when in full operation, rather than in those characteristics which marked its earlier phase. It will thus be found that each Apostle had authority and power to exercise all the functions of the ordinary Christian ministry [BISHOP; PRIEST], that he received the "gift of tongues," and the "gift of miracles," and that he was referred to as the supreme visible head of the Church in regard to that particular district of it in which he was working. Thus each Apostle became to Christians, within the limits of his own sphere of work (however these limits may have been defined), what Moses, in spiritual matters, was to the Jews. He was the ultimate visible point of association between them and the invisible Head of the Church, the deputy of the Great Apostle, the one Supreme Bishop of souls.

The office of Apostle was a temporary one, and instituted with special reference to the vast work of establishing the Church of Christ. The direct knowledge which all who were called to it had of our Lord, the evidence which had been given to them of His resurrection, the special training and teaching which they received from Him, the fulness of the gift of the Holy Ghost bestowed upon them, and the comprehensive character of their ministerial capacity, were the special qualifications which fitted them for this unprecedented labour. By means of these gifts they were able to set the Church on a permanent and substantially unalterable footing; so that the ultimate appeal in all matters of faith and practice is still to them, to their testimony, and to their rule of discipline.

Out of the office of Apostle was developed every inferior office of the Christian ministry, as that of Apostlo itself was developed out of the ministerial office of Christ. When the management of the Church at Jerusalem became too much for them they ordained Deacons; when they dispersed to their work elsewhere, they ordained Elders in all the churches which they founded; and, at a still later period, when their personal labours were coming to an end, they ordained substitutes and successors under the name of Bishops. Thus the ministerial offices of the Church, which were concentrated in Christ —the great "Apostle and High Priest" [Heb. iii. 1]—in combination with His special mediatorial office, were so concentrated in the Apostles in combination with their special Apostolic office; and when separated off from the latter in the persons of their first successors, became at once and unalterably established as a fixed form of the Christian ministry.

The original number of Apostles ordained by our Lord was twelve. There seems to have been some unrevealed reason for the choice of this particular number, and it appears that it was in some way associated with the number of the twelve tribes [Matt. xix. 28]. Thus associated, there are many types of the Apostolate to bo found in the Old Testament: such, e.g., as the twelve "princes of Israel" [Numb. i. 44, xvii. 2]; the twelve explorers of the promised land [Numb. xiii. 3]; the twelve men who passed over Jordan before the Ark of the Covenant, and placed twelve stones taken from the midst of Jordan as a memorial [Josh. iv. 8]; and the twelve judges by whom the government of Moses and Joshua was carried on to the time of the monarchy. In the New Testament similar typical references are observed in the twelve baskets full of fragments [Matt. xiv. 20]; the twelve fruits borne by the Tree of Life [Rev. xxii. 2]; the twelve gates of the New Jerusalem [Rev. xxi. 12, 21], and the twelve foundations of its wall [Rev. xxi. 14, 19].

A list of the twelve Apostles is given in four places of the New Testament, by three of the Evangelists, one of whom was himself an Apostle, and there are points of identity and variation between these four lists which will make it useful to give them in a tabular form, as follows:—

	MATTHEW X. 2.	MARK III. 16.	LUKE VI. 14.	ACTS I. 13, 26.
1.	Peter.	Peter.	Peter.	Peter.
2.	Andrew.	James.	Andrew.	James.
3.	James.	John.	James.	John.
4.	John.	Andrew.	John.	Andrew.
5.	Philip.	Philip.	Philip.	Philip.
6.	Bartholomew.	Bartholomew.	Bartholomew.	Thomas.
7.	Thomas.	Matthew.	Matthew.	Bartholomew.
8.	Matthew.	Thomas.	Thomas.	Matthew.
9.	James, son of Alpheus.	James, son of Alpheus.	James, son of Alpheus.	James, son of Alpheus.
10.	Lebbeus Thaddeus.	Thaddeus.	Simon Zelotes.	Simon Zelotes.
11.	Simon the Canaanite.	Simon the Canaanite.	Judas, brother of James.	Judas, brother of James.
12.	Judas Iscariot.	Judas Iscariot.	Judas Iscariot.	[Matthias.]

In these lists it will be observed that St. Peter is always named first, St. Philip fifth, St. James the Less ninth, and Judas Iscariot last. As regards the other Apostles, no two of the lists exactly agree in the order of naming them, not even the two which were both written by St. Luke. It is, however, noticeable that St. Andrew, St. James the Great, and St. John are never named after St. Philip; St. Bartholomew, St. Thomas, and St. Matthew are never named before St. Philip, or after St. James the Less; while St. Jude and St. Simon Zelotes always occupy the two places before Judas Iscariot.

It seems improbable that this uniformity should be purely accidental; but it is difficult to assign any good reason for it. That St. Peter should always be named first and Judas Iscariot last, is nevertheless a fact of much significance, the one having evidently been placed last on account of his sin, the other first as being in honour, if not in authority, the chief of the Apostles.

The number of twelve Apostles appears to have been maintained till the civilized world had received the message which the Apostolate had to carry to it. St. Matthias made up the number after the death of Judas Iscariot, St. Paul probably took the place of St. James the Great, who was slain by Herod, and it may be that St. Barnabas was actually an Apostle, elevated into the place of one of the original twelve after his death. But there is no good historical reason for alleging that others than those who belonged to the current twelve were properly called Apostles. In Rev. xxi. 14, when the organization of the Church had been existing for nearly two generations, "the twelve Apostles of the Lamb" are still spoken of as if the mystic number had never been exceeded. But that others called themselves apostles is evident: for St. Paul speaks of "false apostles . . . transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ," as "Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light" [2 Cor. xi. 13]; and St. John also distinctly mentions some who in the Church of Ephesus "say they are apostles and are not," and whom the Church itself had "tried" and "found liars." Although, therefore, there is some trace of the title "apostle" being used loosely by a few early writers, there is no evidence that it can be properly given to any but those who were actually of the number before the office expired with the death of St. John.

There is no complete record existing of the several fields of labour undertaken by the Apostles; but there are indications that it was their custom to keep to those parts of the world to which they had been originally appointed, and not to interfere with "another man's line" [2 Cor. x. 13-16]. There are also traditions of their work in parts of the world not associated with it in the Acts of the Apostles, or any of the Epistles. Taking the evidence of the New Testament, and that of these traditions, the substantial result is indicated in the following table:—

PROBABLE FIELDS OF APOSTOLIC LABOURS.

Apostles.	Churches.
All of them	Palestine and Syria.
St. Peter, St. Jude	Mesopotamia [Turkey in Asia].
St. Bartholomew, St. Jude	Persia.
St. Bartholomew, St. Thomas	India.
St. Andrew	Thrace [Turkey in Europe]. Scythia [Russia].
St. Simon Zelotes [assisted by St. Mark]	North Africa [Egypt and Algeria].
St. Matthew	Ethiopia [Central Africa].
St. John, St. Paul	Asia Minor [Turkey in Asia].
St. Paul	Macedonia [Turkey in Europe]. Arabia. Greece. Italy. Spain. Gaul. Britain.

There is no reliable tradition respecting the labours of the remaining Apostles, and there are few of the twelve of whom we really know much more than the names. It was the general belief of the early ages of Christianity that all of them passed from this world by martyrdom except St. John.

APOSTLE. The book of the Epistles used in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist is known by this name in the Eastern Church. It is not unlikely that the name was applied generally to the Apostolic Epistles by the early Church, as the narrative of our Lord's words and work, though contained in four separate books written by four separate authors, was called the Gospel.

APOSTLES' CREED. [CREEDS.]

APOSTOLIC CANONS. [CANONS.]

APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS. [CONSTITUTIONS.]

APOSTOLIC FATHERS. [FATHERS.]

APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION is the transmission, through the episcopate, of the power and authority committed by our Lord to His Apostles for the guidance and government of the Church. The doctrine of the Apostolical Succession is necessarily implied in the teaching of Holy Scripture. Thus our Lord says to His Apostles: "As my Father hath sent Me even so send I you" [John xx. 21]. The Church being a society chosen out of the world, and having its own peculiar laws, duties, and privileges, a governing authority must always be indispensable, not only at its commencement, but equally so during its continuance. Its permanence could not otherwise be secured. Our Lord, moreover, thus gave His commission to the Apostles: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature; and lo I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world [Matt. xxviii. 18-20]—a promise which could not have been fulfilled unless He were also with their successors or representatives: with you, that is, with those who represent you or succeed in your place. The Apostles being mortal, and a literal fulfilment of the promise impossible, we cannot understand our Lord's promise in any other sense.

But the need of Apostolical Succession may be proved from another consideration. No one can have a right to preach the Gospel, or administer the sacraments to which are annexed the promises of grace and pardon of sin, without a Divine commission. The Church is called God's kingdom upon earth, and its constituted order is always spoken of as regulated by Himself. Thus St. Paul clearly intimates the need of a Divine call to the ministerial office: "How can they preach," he says, "except they be sent" [Rom. x. 15]. But we only know two ways by which a Divine commission can be given, either through apostolic or episcopal succession, or by miracle, i.e. God designating by a supernatural sign those whom He appoints to the ministerial office. As He has not been pleased to adopt the latter mode, which could hardly have been expected in the ordinary government of His Church, we must necessarily admit the doctrine of an episcopal succession as the only means for the perpetuation of the ministerial office. The need of a Divine commission is virtually acknowledged even by those who, uncalled, take upon themselves the office of the priesthood. They dare not, in opposition to the clear teaching of Scripture, and even from the obvious necessity of the case, say that their authority or commission to minister in Christ's stead, as the Apostle says, originates from themselves; they assert that they are called of God, but that the Divine call is a secret one, manifest only to their own heart and conscience. But this alleged mode of conveying the ministerial commission would obviously leave the Church exposed to the craft or evil designs of wicked or self-deceived men. It may also be remarked, judging from analogy in earthly matters, that if God send a messenger or ambassador to communicate His will to the world [2 Cor. v. 20] his credentials will be clear and manifest, not only to himself, but especially to those to whom he is sent, since otherwise they would have no safeguard against the pretensions of false teachers.

The Apostolic Succession was not only appointed, however, for the conveyance of the ministerial office through bishops, the successors of the Apostles, but also for the transmission from the Apostles of Catholic doctrine and tradition. This conveyance of truth through the episcopate is clearly intimated in Holy Scripture. Thus St. Paul says to Timothy [2 Tim. i. 13, 14], "Hold fast the form [ὑποτύπωσιν, sketch or outline] of sound words which thou hast heard from me: that good thing which was committed unto thee, keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us:" "the things which thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men who shall be able to teach others also"[1] [2 Tim. ii. 2]. This "good deposit" committed to Timothy, or the essential doctrines of the faith, the Apostle says, a few verses afterwards, had been perverted or denied by Hymenæus and Philetus, who said that the resurrection was past already. It is called by St. John "the doctrine of Christ" [2 John 9, 10], and by St. Jude "the faith once delivered to the saints" [ver. 3]. It was probably a short summary of faith such as we have in the Apostles' Creed.

On referring to the teaching of the Fathers we shall further see the importance of the transmission of truth from an apostolic original. The argument of Tertullian in his Præscription against Heretics is mainly founded on the fact that what is first must be true as being apostolic, and what is of later origin must be false as being afterwards invented, and that apostolic doctrine is conveyed through the episcopate, a fact which is proved and guaranteed by the unanimity of belief in different churches. Thus Tertullian argues, that what the Apostles preached "must be proved in no other way than by those same churches which the Apostles themselves founded: themselves, I say, by preaching to them as well viva voce (as men say) as afterwards by epistles. If these things be so, it becometh forthwith manifest, that all doctrine which agreeth with these apostolic churches, the wombs and originals of the faith, must be accounted true, as without doubt containing that which the churches have received from the Apostles, the Apostles from Christ, Christ from God; and that all other doctrine must at once be judged to be false which savoureth of things contrary to the truth of the churches, and of the Apostles, and of Christ, and of God" [§ 21]. And afterwards, in answer to the objection of heretics, that different churches might have believed or understood differently the apostolic teaching, he says: "Is it probable that so many churches and so great should have gone astray into the same faith? Never is there one result among many chances; the error in the doctrine of the churches must needs have varied. But where one and the same thing is found among many, this is not an error, but the deposit. Let not any one, therefore, dare to say that those were in error who delivered it" [§ 28]. And afterwards [§ 32] he speaks of the episcopate being appointed for the transmission of apostolic seed or doctrine, challenging heretics "to unfold the roll of their bishops, so coming down in succession from the beginning, that their first bishop had for his ordainer or predecessor some one of the Apostles or apostolic men, provided he were one that continued steadfast with the Apostles." And afterwards he says that churches founded in later times are counted not the less apostolical than those which the Apostles founded, by reason of their agreeing in the same faith, and their consanguinity of doctrine.

[1] Explicat hoc loco quod paulo superius et priori Epistola vocavit depositum; id est, doctrinam Christianam a se traditam et concreditam Timotheo, atque ab eo aliis porro commendandam. Doctrinam inquit quam per multos testes, vel, ut alii vertunt, inter multos testes, id est, in presentia multorum, qui testes esse possunt, me docente audivisti, tu fac, docendo tradas et commendes aliis hominibus pari fide depositum hoc tractaturis. Voluit Apostolus coram multis Timotheum instituere; ut tum ad multos doctrinæ fructus pervenirct, tum vero ne, si Timotheum aliqui calumniari vellent quod non traderet rectam doctrinam, testes ei non deessent ad probandum se non aliud docere quam quod a Paulo acceperat. . . . Estii Comment. in S. Pauli Epist. in loc.

Thus in the primitive Church an appeal was made to apostolic faith and tradition transmitted through the episcopate as a sufficient refutation of novel or heretical teaching,[1] and the unanimity of this belief in different churches was alleged in proof of its divine origin;[2] while by shewing the time when and the person by whom a new doctrine was introduced, its novelty and want of apostolic sanction was clearly evidenced.[3]

Through Apostolical Succession in all ages has been preserved the "one faith," the "faith once delivered unto the saints." Whatever differences may now exist amongst the separated portions of the Catholic Church, the "charisma veritatis," as in the three Creeds and in essential doctrines of the faith, is preserved unchanged and incorrupt throughout the one Body of Christ.

The doctrine of the Apostolical Succession has been held by the best and most learned writers of the Church of England, as Andrewes, Bramhall, Hammond, Hall, Taylor, and Wilson, and is the only foundation on which Episcopacy can rest as a divine institution. On rejecting it, the only alternative can be that Episcopacy has merely ecclesiastical sanction or authority; and thus (if the exigencies of the Church should seem to require it) is a form of government that may be changed or wholly set aside. The duty of obedience to a bishop, in that case, would not rest upon the apostolicity of his office, nor could he have any authority but such as is founded on the voluntary submission of those over whom he was placed. Hence we cannot be surprised that they who reject the rightful authority of the episcopate as founded on its Divine institution, and yet admit, as they must, that the bishop, for the due discharge of his office, ought to have some authority, notoriously lean to Erastianism, regarding the Church as an appendage to the State, and the bishop as a State officer, who is furnished by the secular Government with all needful authority and power.

The supposed uncertainty involved in this doctrine forms the principal objection against it by modern writers; the bishops ordaining others may not, it is supposed, have been themselves consecrated, and thus a succession of orders from the Apostles would not have been transmitted. A [1] "Traditionem itaque Apostolorum in toto mundo manifestatam in omni ecclesia adest perspicere omnibus qui vera velint videre; et habemus annumerare eos qui ab Apostolis instituti sunt Episcopi in Ecclesiis et successores eorum usque ad nos qui nihil tale docuerunt neque cognoverunt quale ab his deliratur" [S. Irenæi ad hæres. lib. iii. § 3]. "Quapropter eis qui sunt in Ecclesia presbyteris obedire oportet, his qui successionem habent ab apostolis sicut ostendimus; qui cum episcopatus successione charisma veritatis certum secundum placitum Patris acceperunt" [Ibid. lib. iv. c. xxvi. § 2].

[2] Eusebii Eccles. Historia, lib. v. c. vi., where, in referring to the Church of Rome, the historian says that Eleutherius is now the twelfth from the Apostles in the episcopate, "in the same order and the same doctrine [διδαχή] in which the tradition of the Apostles in the Church and the preaching of the truth has come down to us.'

[3] Thus the heresy of Artemon on the divinity of our Lord, as Eusebius shews [Eccles. Histor. v. c. 28], was opposed to the unanimous belief of the Roman Church from the Apostolic age.

Apostolical Succession

mere supposition, resting on no evidence, might fairly be dismissed without notice, but a few words will shew that it was wholly improbable and, humanly speaking, impossible. In the words of a learned writer at the beginning of last century: "Scarce any synod met but in their acts, their method of proceeding, or their canons, they act as men that took the greatest care that none should be admitted bishops, or to the holy orders but by bishops only; and that if any invaded the holy offices by any clandular or indirect means they should be deposed. A great part of these canons were made for regulating ordinations, especially those of bishops, by providing that none should be ordained, except in extraordinary cases, except by three bishops of the same province, with the express consent of the majority of the rest; that strange bishops should not be admitted to join with those of the province on such occasions, but those only who were neighbours and well known, and the validity of whose orders was not disputed. And they who have looked into Church history further, know how jealous both clergy and people were of the regularity of their bishops' ordination; and how even schismatics and heretics were ready upon occasion to raise objections against those who came into their sees without the usual and established forms; and that there were frequent provincial synods whose chief business it was to inquire into any omissions of that sort: so that one may safely pronounce it morally impossible for any one to possess himself and continue for any tract of time in a bishopric but he who came in by the canonical method." And again: "Christ Jesus has taken more abundant care to ascertain the succession of pastors in His Church than ever was taken in relation to the Aaronical priesthood. This last descended by inheritance or traduction from father to son, and the right that any priest or Levite had to his office, and the validity of their ministrations depended upon the legitimacy of their birth; and how could the sons of Aaron certainly know that they were his posterity, or how could they be able to demonstrate it to others? Certainly upon no principles but what are more dubious than those upon which we believe our bishops to be the successors of the Apostles in an uninterrupted line. For in this case the succession is transmitted from seniors to juniors, by the most public and solemn action, or rather process of actions, that is ever performed in a Christian Church; an action done in the face of the sun, and attested by great numbers of the most authentic witnesses, as consecrations always were. And I suppose it cannot bear any dispute, but that it is now more easily to be proved that the Archbishop of Canterbury was canonically ordained, than that any one person now living is the son of him who is called his father; and that the same might be said of any archbishop or bishop that ever sat on that or any other Episcopal see during the time of his being bishop; nor is it easy to see by what method Providence could have made the succession of pastors more clear and indubitable than by this which has actually been used."[1]

Having thus shewn that the very highest degree of certainty which the case admits of is involved in this doctrine, let us now see the inevitable consequences of rejecting it. "This point is beyond controversy; and I would request my brethren of the clergy to look well to it: there is no middle course to take; we must either maintain an Apostolic succession in its full and exclusive meaning, or sanction Robert Brown's plan of ordination by persons who have never been ordained themselves. If we deny the validity of such ordination, and hold that persons who have been ordained themselves can alone ordain others, the Apostolic succession follows of necessity. It is thus we trace back the authority of the English priesthood to the Apostles, and to Jesus Christ, who first ordained ministers of His Word. There is not a foot of ground to stand on between the Apostolical succession and the Independent system. And it is for this reason the Independent triumphed when the Church of England fell; for his remaining opponents had nothing either in reason or Scripture which they could oppose to the progress of his opinions."[2]

AQUARII. [EUCHARIST.]

ARCANI DISCIPLINA. [DISCIPLINA.]

ARCHBISHOP. Bishop Beveridge says the names of Metropolitan, Archbishop, Exarch, and Patriarch, came into use in the Church, some at the Council of Nicæa or shortly before, and others at a time scarcely anterior to that of Chalcedon. [Cod. Can, de Metrop. c. v. vol. ii. p. 173.] Isidore of Seville, in his Etymologies [ch. xii.], says Archbishop is a Greek appellation designating the chief of bishops, that is, a primate; for he is the vicar of apostles, and presides over both metropolitans and bishops. The distinction between an archbishop and metropolitan has died out, and no difference except that which is nominal exists between them: but it has been questioned whether, correctly speaking, an archbishop, such as those of Rossano and Luciano, who have no suffragans, may be called metropolitan. The latter derives his name from the mother Church, not from a number of cities. St. Athanasius, who lived in the fourth century, first used the title of Archbishop, and under it mentioned Alexander his predecessor in the see of Alexandria. At the Council of Chalcedon, [A.D. 451], the Greeks bestowed the title upon Pope Leo V., having already applied it to the bishops of the chief cities of the East. In the West it does not appear to have been adopted before the age of Charlemagne. The order of Bishops by the canon law is divided into four—1. Patriarchs; 2. Archbishops; 3. Metropolitans; and 4. Bishops: in spiritual power and pontifical dignity they are equals; but in respect of the exercise of the ministry the archbishop is the superior of the bishop, from the extent, honour, and privileges attached to his office. So we must understand Thorndike when he says "an archbishop is a chief among bishops, not a person to govern divers churches and seats of bishoprics." [Prim. Episc. ch. iv. § 11.] In the form of his consecration (and before the Reformation in England, by his use of the distinctive pall) the archbishop differs from bishops, but within his archdiocese has no authority superior to their own. The Apostolical Canons require bishops to recognise their metropolitan as their superior, to obey him, to undertake no business of importance without his advice, just as he was bound in a similar manner to deliberate beforehand with the suffragans of his province before he took any step of moment. The Council of Nicæa only regulated the rights of dignities already in existence. The archbishop confirms the election of bishops; consecrates them or appoints some other prelate for that purpose; he enforces the canons and synodal constitutions within his province, and convenes provincial councils, in which he sits as president and principal judge. He had the care of the whole province, and took measures so that his suffragans held a diocesan synod every year and appointed rural deans. He had the right of visitation within his province, and appeals could be made to him for the purpose of reversing the judgments of his suffragans. In the vacancy of a see he administered the diocese when a chapter failed to appoint administrators within eight days. The archbishop has the right of carrying his cross throughout his province, unless in the presence of a papal legate or cardinal. The archbishop wore a purple mantle over his rochet, and gave the benediction with his hand raised and with the sign of the cross, but could exercise neither jurisdiction nor office without the consent of the diocesan, except in the consecration of churches, by the Council at Cealcythe, c. 11, in 816.

In the East the Patriarch of Constantinople had 1031 metropolitans and 37 archbishops under him; probably the latter had no suffragans. Primates, formerly called Catholic, and patriarchs are eminent above ordinary archbishops and metropolitans, and constituted by the Church with the assent of the State, such as the Primate of Germany (Nuremburg), of Spain (Toledo), of France (Lyons), of Belgium (Mechlin), of England (Canterbury and York), of Poland (Gnesen), of Denmark (Lunden), of Ireland (Armagh and Dublin), of Hungary (Gran), of Bohemia (Prague), of Scotland (St. Andrew's). A primate presides over the ecclesiastical capital in a country, and, properly, is the superior of many archbishops; but the distinction has been drawn between the primate of a province and those primates with a divided primacy, such as those of Bourges and Sens, who claimed to be Primates of France: in England the nice distinction has been drawn between York as Primate of England, and Canterbury as Primate of All England; the latter title is implied at an early date [Bede, H. E. lib. iv. c. 2], in the seventh century [Wilkins' Conc. i. 35, 41], and York was constituted metropolitan by Pope Gregory [Bede, H. E. lib. i. c. xxix]. [PATRIARCH, VISITATION.] In the eighth century there was a partition of the province of Canterbury, Lichfield being constituted an archbishopric under Hygebert for about eleven years [see Johnson's Canons, vol. i. p. 287, Oxf. ed. note *], and until A.D. 1148, St. David's claimed to be an independent archbishopric. [Haddan and Stubbs' Councils, i. pp. 317, 348, 352, 355.]

[1] Johnson's Clergyman's Vade Mecum, containing the Canonical Codes of the Primitive Church. Præf. lxxxviii.-xcii. [1709].

[2] Barter's Tracts in Defence of the Christian Sabbath, the Church, her Priesthood and her Sacraments, p. 152. Ed. 1851.

The Scotch had no metropolitans [Counc. at Cealcythe, A.D. 816, c. 5] until 1472 [Spotswood, p. 58, ed. 1677], the Bishop of St. Andrews hitherto having ranked as chief pontiff of Scotland [Ang. Sac. ii. p. 235]. Appeals were allowed from the bishop to the archbishop by the Articles of Clarendon [A.D. 1164], § viii. [Du Maillane, du droit Canonique, i. 193; Beyerlinck, Theatrum, iii. 97; Frances, de Cathedralibus, cap. i. xxxiii.]

ARCHDEACON. The primitive meaning of this title was "head" or "chief of the deacons," and St. Lawrence is said to have been chief of the seven deacons of Rome in the middle of the third century. The chief of the deacons ministered to the bishop during the celebration of the holy Eucharist, as ordinary deacons ministered to their respective priests; and hence probably arose the intimate association between the bishop and the archdeacon, which led to the latter being called "oculus Episcopi." In early ages the archdeacon was always a deacon (as in the case of St. Athanasius), and the custom of his remaining in the lowest of the three holy orders continued to be observed in some instances as late as the twelfth century. But, as the bishop's deputy in many ecclesiastical transactions, the archdeacon became the superior officer of the archpriest [RURAL DEAN], and was ordained to the higher order in consequence, though still retaining the name of deacon. In modern times they act in many things as deputies of the bishop, have an ordinary jurisdiction over the clergy and the churches within their archdeaconries, and are ex officio examiners of candidates for holy orders. They also sit ex officio in Convocation.

ARCHIMANDRITE [ἀρχὸς and μάνδρα]. The superior of a Greek monastery, as it were the chief of the fold. In this sense it was sometimes given to all ecclesiastical superiors, both amongst Latins and Oriental Christians; and is synonymous with abbot, as M. de Montalembert mentions that a French priest thus addressed Aldhelm, the Abbot of Malmesbury.[1] In its true acceptance the title was given to the abbot-general, the president of a number of abbots [Ἡγουμένοι]. It was an oriental title, and occurs in the Novels of Justinian and the decrees of the Councils of Ephesus and Constantinople. In Italy it appeared in 1094, when Roger I., King of Sicily, founded an archimandrite as superior to all the Basilian abbots in his kingdom, and they yearly, on the feast of St. Saviour, August 6, made their profession of obedience; at length a secular prelate was appointed by the King of Spain as archimandrite in commendam of St. Saviour's monastery at Messina; by a brief, dated 1635, he is now a bishop of the exempt diocese. His office was in the patronage of the crown; he wears rochet and cope in the papal chapel, and ranks after bishops: he is not bound to residence. In France and Germany the name was used generically for all bishops, and even by an archbishop. The Greek archimandrite is appointed by the patriarch, and can ordain readers.

ARIANISM, so called as being derived from the teaching of Arius, a presbyter of Alexandria [A.D. 319]. Socrates, the ecclesiastical historian, gives the following account of the beginning of the heresy: "Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, setting forth in the presence of his clergy the mystery of the Holy Trinity, was accused by Arius, one of his clergy, of Sabellianism, or denying the distinction of the Persons of the Godhead; but, in attempting to refute the bishop, he advanced an opposite error. If, said Arius, the Father begat the Son, He that was begotten had a beginning of existence; and thus it is evident there was a time when the Son did not exist (οὐκ ἦν ὁ Υἱός). It thus necessarily follows that He had His being from things which are not[2] (ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων ἔχειν ὑπόστασιν). Arius' opinions are thus summed up in his letter to Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia:—"But we say, and think, and have taught, and do teach, that the Son is not unbegotten, nor a part in any way of the unbegotten; nor (derives His substance) from any subjacent matter (ἐξ ὑποκειμένου τινός), but that by will and counsel, (i.e. of the Father), He has existed before time and ages, perfect God, only-begotten and unchangeable; and that He existed not before He was begotten, or created, or purposed (ὁρισθῇ), or established (θεμελιωθῇ). For He was not unbegotten. We are persecuted because we say that the Son had a beginning, and God was without beginning. On this account we are persecuted, and likewise because we say He is from things which are not (ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων ἐστίν). For this we say, since He is neither a part of God, nor of any subjacent matter" (ὑποκειμένου τινός).[3] Arius and his followers were excommunicated by Alexander, who, in his letter to the bishops of the Catholic Church, gives an account of the opinions and theories of Arius, which, as he says, were novel and hitherto unknown, which themselves boasted of as a proof of their own superior knowledge and discernment in the interpretation of Scripture. Their system, on their own shewing, was not that which, taught by Christ and His Apostles, had been handed down by successive bishops from the earliest age. It was novel they admitted, and had originated from themselves, which was sufficient to shew its human origin.[4] Bishop Alexander not only confirms and illustrates the account already given of the opinions of Arius and his followers, but further shews

[1] Cellani, Epist. ad Aldh. Aldhelmi Opera, 1844, p. 331.

[2] i. c. 5.

[3] Theodoret, Eccles. Hist. book i. c. 4.

[4] Thus they boast themselves as wise inventors of dogmas (δογμάτων εὑρετάι), and that to them has been revealed what was hitherto unknown to any person under heaven (ἀυτοῖς ἀποκεκαλύφθαι μόνοις ἅπερ οὐδενὶ τῶν ὑπὸ τὸν ἥλιον ἑτέρῳ πέφυκεν ἐλθεῖν εἰς ἔννοιαν). Theodoret, Eccles. Hist. lib. i. c. 4.

the consequences which followed, and which they themselves deduced from their theory of our Lord's worship. They said that our Lord was by nature of a changeable (τρεπτῆς) nature, and capable (ἐπιδεκτικόν) of both virtue and vice, and that He was elected to be the Son of God, not that He had by nature any qualifications (οὐκ ἔχοντά τι) superior to those of other sons of God, but that God foresaw that, though mutable by nature, He would be vigilant and zealous in avoiding evil. They add that if Paul and Peter had made similar efforts (τοῦτο βιάσαιτο) their filiation would in no respect have differed from His.[1]

The divinity of the Son of God had been denied by others before Arius. The Gnostics in the first two centuries rejected it, though not absolutely, or, we may rather say, held it on a novel and uncatholic theory. [DOCETÆ.] Ebion [s. v.], Theodotus, and Artemon or Artemas [A.D. 200], his disciple, denied the doctrine of Christ's divinity, asserting He was a mere man. Of the first little is known, and his personality is even denied; of the other two an account is given by Eusebius, who says that Theodotus was excommunicated by Pope Victor [A.D. 200], and calls him the author and father of the God-denying apostacy.[2] Paul of Samosata, about the middle of the third century [A.D. 263] revived the heresy of Artemon, and was excommunicated by the Council of Antioch.[3]

The teaching of Arius, though resembling in a certain sense that of these heretics, by no means exactly coincided with it. He did not think that Christ was a mere man, but that He was "perfect God" (by adoption), though not of the substance of the Father, and, as the Scripture teaches, that He created all things. Besides, Gnostic opinions respecting our Lord, or the teaching of Theodotus and others, that He was a mere man, were theories peculiar to a few individuals and their followers which did not widely prevail in the early Church. Arianism, on the contrary, was not only widely and rapidly disseminated, but at one time was predominant throughout Eastern Christendom, and was the scourge of the Church for more than four centuries. It can also urge in its defence more plausible and apparently scriptural proof than any previous heresy on the same subject, especially than that of our Lord's mere humanity.

But let us fairly look at its alleged Scriptural proof, and we shall see, under whatever modifications proposed, that it is not only destitute of the sanction of the Word of God, but wholly irreconcileable with its teaching. There are, it must be admitted, apparently discordant statements respecting our Lord: but when we discover the true theory or hypothesis, all apparent contradictions will necessarily disappear, as the Word of God must in all parts be in harmony with itself, nor can separate truths be discordant with each other, or with the truth in its fulness as revealed by God.

But the Arian hypothesis will not explain such difficulties, nor enable us to reconcile the seemingly discordant statements of Scripture. Taking it, as the Arians boasted, as an ingenious theory which themselves had devised, we can show its untenableness—that it will break down even from its own weakness and inconsistency.

The Scripture uses certain figures and illustrations suited to our present earthly state, and founded on our earthly experience and knowledge: such illustrations must necessarily be imperfect and inadequate, and cannot be understood in their full sense and bearing. Earthly things, as we know, are not homogeneous with heavenly, and can only partially and imperfectly represent them. Hence such illustrations at the best must be very inadequate and defective.

Thus our Lord was called the Son of God [Matt. xxvi. 63, 64], the only-begotten of the Father [John i. 14, 18], God's own Son [Rom. viii. 32; Gal. iv. 4]. Undoubtedly, if the metaphor of Sonship be understood in its full sense, and in accordance with an earthly relationship, we must admit, with Arius, that the existence of the Father was prior to that of the Son. But on this point, as we find from other statements of Scripture, the illustration before us fails. By admitting it, we shall contradict Scripture both negatively and positively. Thus we are not told in Scripture that the Father existed before the Son; on the contrary, God is called the Everlasting Father, which shews that the Son must be also everlasting, none being a father until he have a child.[4] Besides, as we shall presently see, the Son is declared to be God, and eternal existence is the necessary attribute of Godhead.

But let us look further at this figure of Sonship, and we shall not only find that it conveys a true idea of the relationship of the Father and the Son, but that it is also founded on the main and prominent idea which we ourselves should attach to such relationship. An earthly son is of the same nature, or co-essential with, his father: this fact is inseparable from the relationship, and is primarily implied by it, and would indeed first occur to us on naming or alluding to it. Again, obedience is very prominently implied in the relationship of son, the duty of submission to a father's will or command [Heb. v. 8].

Now with these obvious truths or inferences before us, let us consider two passages, one prominently brought forward by Catholics, and the other by Arians—"I and my Father are one" [John x. 30]; "My Father is greater than I" [John xiv. 28]. Arianism is obviously inconsistent with the first of these passages. For in what consists this oneness of the Father and the Son? Not in will or purpose only, as might be said of one of the prophets; since, if thus understood, the Jews would not have attempted to stone our Lord as a blasphemer—but it can only be a oneness of nature, such as must belong to the Father and the Son—oneness which necessarily issues on the part of the Son in a perfect unity with His Father in the works and counsels of Godhead [See Matt. xi. 27; John v. 17, x. 15, xiv. 9-11, xvi. 15, xvii. 10]; a perfect union which could not have existed had one been a creature and the other a Creator; which illustrates and is solely founded on a belief of the one Deity of the Father and of the Son.

[1] Theodoret, Eccles. Hist. lib. i. c. 4.
[2] Euseb. Eccles. Hist. bk. v. c. 28. [3] Ibid. vii. c. 30.
[4] An argument, as Petavius shews, often brought forward by the Fathers. See De Trinitate, lib. iv. c. 4.

Arianism may also be shewn to be really inconsistent with the true meaning of the second passage. It is only in accordance with the Catholic theory that the two passages can be reconciled; they are parts of one great truth, equally necessary for a true conception of the Doctrine of the Incarnation—that our Lord, perfect God, is the Everlasting Son of the Father, and was sent as His ambassador to a sinful world. But let us more particularly consider the second passage, in which no less than in the other is implied the relationship of Son. As a Son Christ was subordinate to the Father, and also as being sent by Him, His messenger and ambassador to the world. Thus the two passages are not even apparently contradictory. The Son and the Father are equal as united in the same Godhead, and yet in another point of view, as implied in their very relationship, and in our Lord's mediatorial office, it is equally true that the Father is greater than the Son, or, in St. Paul's words, "the Head of Christ is God."

But Arius and his followers maintained that the passage before us ought to be so understood as if Christ had asserted, "My Father is greater than I," just as God is greater than man. But, allowing this interpretation (which per se the passage will admit of), our Lord is thus supposed to have said that God is greater than man: in other words, He enunciated a mere truism, or self-evident proposition, which can hardly be supposed; and, in fact, His words would really have been far more objectionable. Let us suppose, for instance, that Moses or one of the prophets had said, "The Almighty is greater than I," such language, worse than an unmeaning truism, would be intolerable and blasphemous. The words before us could only have been used in comparing persons, who, as the very comparison implies, might be compared together, though one, it is admitted, in some respects is greater than the other. But how can God and man be really compared together at all? The idea of comparison in such a case is mere blasphemy. And though Arius did not assert that Christ was a mere man, he maintained that He was only a creature, however exalted; and thus these remarks in reference to his theory will equally hold good. But our Lord, it may be added, was not stating a self-evident truism, He was making a declaration required by His previous teaching. He had said that He was the Son of God, was one with the Father, that He dwelt in the Father and the Father in Him, thus declaring His participation of the Divine Nature. On the other hand it was needful to declare, for the confirmation and sanction of His mission, that He was a messenger sent to deliver God's will, that, as a Son, He could do nothing of Himself, but as the Father gave Him commandment—"My Father is greater than I." In the following passages, of which Petavius [De Trinitate, lib. ii. c. 1-4] gives an explanation from the Fathers, &c., will be seen the alleged Scriptural proof of Arianism: Prov. viii. 22; Matt. x. 17, xix. 17, xxiv. 36; Mark xiii. 32; John i. 30, v. 19, 26, xiv. 28, xvii. 3; Acts ii. 36; Col. i. 15; Heb. iii. 2; 1 Tim. vi. 17.

Again, the theory of Arius is equally untenable in other respects. He maintained that Christ was God, though not of the Divine Nature; hence he was justly charged with teaching a plurality of Gods, thus contradicting a fundamental truth of Divine revelation, and advocating a sort of heathen Polytheism.[1]

The untenableness of his theory is owing in some degree to the attempt to reconcile it with the language of Holy Scripture; its un-Scripturalness is thus clearly and unmistakeably manifest. Thus, as was just said, by admitting that our Lord was God, he taught a plurality of Gods: he asserted also with Holy Scripture that Christ is the Creator of all things, and yet, according to his own theory, Christ was a creature, and made by another.[2] Hence, as we might suppose, the peculiar characteristic of Arianism is its changeableness, an utter want of consistency and stability: his followers were soon divided into mutually conflicting sects and parties, continually issuing new and inconsistent creeds.[3] St. Athanasius speaks of their being variable and fickle in their sentiments as chameleons in their colours, "not having one opinion, but changing to and fro, and now recommending statements, and now dishonouring them, and in turn recommending what just now they were blaming."[4] Thus the rationalizing system of Arius, tried by Scriptural proof,

[1] S. August. contra Maxim. lib. ii. sec. 31.

[2] "It appears," says Dr. Waterland [Sermons on the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, pp. 100, 101 (1720)], "to have been a rule and maxim of the Church in Irenæus' time [adv. Hæres. lib. iv. c. 41], and probably all along, that no creature whatever could have any hand in creating, but that creating was an indisputable mark of a Divine immutable nature. These principles seem to have obtained constantly in the Church before the Nicene Council. No sooner did the Arian controversy arise, but the Catholicks, upon their old principles, charged the Arians with great inconsistency, in making a creature of the Son of God, and yet admitting Him to be Creator. They scrupled not to tell them that this was copying after Valentinus and reviving the principles of the Gnostics: that it was confounding the ideas of Creator and creature, and was all over contradictory and repugnant. No argument bore harder on the Arians than this, as appears by the perplexity and confusion they were in upon it; not being able to come to any certain and fixed resolution on it, Scripture and Catholic tradition appeared clear, full, and strong for the Son's being properly and strictly Framer and Maker of the world, and there were but few in comparison who durst go such lengths as openly to deny it; on the other hand, to make a creature Creator was in a manner unheard of except among hereticks, and was besides harsh and shocking even to common sense." Waterland refers in a note to St. Ambrose, de Fid. lib. i. c. 5: "Quis Auctorem inter opera sua deputet ut videatur id esse quod fecit?"

[3] The Arians in about twenty years held fourteen synods, issuing new and discordant definitions of faith. [Petavius, Dogm. Theol. de Trinitate, lib. i. c. 9. See also Tillemont's Eccl. Hist. (Deacon's transl.), vol. x. p. 353, 1737.]

[4] Treatises of St. Athanasius, pp. 2-7 (Oxf. transl.).

(which he admits) is untenable and self-destructive; it could not be the truth, or the Divine revelation, which is necessarily one and unchangeable, and so proved by internal consistency and permanence. The unscripturalness of Arianism, and its want of primitive sanction, was also clearly shewn at the Council of Nice [A.D. 325]. The bishops, assembled at the council[1] from all parts of the world, after listening with impatience to what they deemed the blasphemous language of its author in his defence, not only declared his system unscriptural, but contrary to the belief and tradition which was from the beginning in the Church. They adopted the word ὁμοούσιος,[2] of the same Divine Nature, as expressing the true doctrine of our Lord's Godhead; that, in the words of the creed which the council put forth, our Lord is "God of God, Light of Light, true God of true God, begotten, not made, consubstantial (ὁμοούσιος) with the Father." Seventeen bishops present at the Council opposed, at first, the definition of homoousion, not as being in agreement with Arius, but thinking that the word might be misunderstood or interpreted in a Sabellian sense: yet, in the end, all complied with the definition of the Council, and signed the anathema against Arius, with the exception of Thomas and Secundus, who were excommunicated with the heretic, and afterwards banished into Illyricum. A few years later the Empress Constantia, who was under the guidance of an Arian priest, persuaded the Emperor Constantine to recall Arius from banishment [A.D. 330], who, presenting a profession of faith, persuaded the Emperor of his orthodoxy. Arius then, after being refused admission into the church at Alexandria by St. Athanasius, the successor of the bishop who had excommunicated him, was shortly afterwards received into communion at Jerusalem by Eusebius, Bishop of Nicomedia, and by others agreeing generally with his heretical opinions, who were then present at the dedication of a church. But this acknowledgment of his orthodoxy by suspected friends or followers could be of little real service to his cause. It was obviously important that he should be received into communion by a bishop of unsuspected orthodoxy, and also at the imperial city Constantinople. On his arrival there, he was treated as excommunicate by Alexander the bishop. The Emperor also, to whom he appealed, probably suspecting his professions, demanded whether he really held the Nicene faith. Arius replied in the affirmative, confirming his assertion with an oath. Constantine then added, almost prophetically, that if his profession was false, God would avenge the perjury. The Emperor then commanded the Bishop of Constantinople to receive Arius into Catholic communion; but the evening before, like the traitor who betrayed our Lord, he suddenly perished by a miserable death.[3] The progress of his opinions, unhappily, was not hereby checked. On the death of Constantine, his son Constantius [A.D. 337-361], falling under the guidance of an Arian priest, recalled the Arians from exile; St. Athanasius and other Catholic bishops were persecuted and banished; and Arianism, with many modifications, changing in various degrees its distinctive character, prevailed throughout the East. An account of these and of the chief Arian and Semiarian synods will be given elsewhere [SEMIARIANISM].

We may now, before proceeding with the history, give a short account of the parties who may be said to represent the opinions of their founder—called pure Arians.[4] Aëtius, a goldsmith, a man of disreputable character, revived the true Arian theory [A.D. 358]. He taught that the Son was not ὁμοούσιος, of the same substance with the Father, but ἑτερούσιος, of a different substance: that our Lord was not like the Father, but unlike Him in all things; and hence his followers were called Anomæans (ἄνομοιοι). They were also termed Exucontii (from ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων), a phrase of Arius, who said that Christ was made of non-existing things. Eunomius [A.D. 358] was the disciple, and one of the chief supporters of Aëtius in the revival of Arianism; and their followers were called Aëtians, Anomæans or Eunomians. Eunomius, afterwards made Bishop of Cyzicus, was deposed for his gross heresy. He was often banished, and is said, on their joining his sect, to have rebaptized Catholics

[1] The number of bishops present was probably 318, though Tillemont says the first authors who mentioned the number have differed therein very much, but have always made them near three hundred. They were accompanied by a great number of priests, deacons, and others. [History of Council of Nice, sec. ii. (Deacon's transl.)].

[2] The word homoousion (ὁμοούσιος) had been used, as St. Athanasius shews, from an early period in the Church, as expressing the Catholic doctrine of our Lord's consubstantiality with the Father. We also find a similar phrase in the Latin Church used by Tertullian, who speaks of the Divine Persons as being "unius substantiæ" [Advers. Prax.]. The word had been condemned at the Council of Antioch, as used by Paul in a Sabellian sense; it might indeed be so used, though the Catholic interpretation seems to have been genuine and primitive, and was first altered to countenance Paul's novel and heretical teaching. St. Athanasius says that it was intended at the Council of Nice merely to state that our Lord was "God of God," the "only Begotten," or, to use other similar phrases of Scripture, but that Eusebius of Nicomedia, a friend and secret supporter of Arius, persuaded his party to assent to this definition, as admitting an Arian explanation, all creatures being, in a certain sense, "from God." Other similar phrases of Scripture might also be plausibly interpreted in accordance with the Arian theory. The assembled bishops, determined to exclude the possibility of evading their meaning, thought it necessary to add homoousion (of the same substance) as the most explicit definition possible of our Lord's consubstantiality with the Father. [See Petavii Dogmat. Theol. De Trinitate, lib. iv. c. 5.]

[3] Socrates, Eccles. History, lib. i. c. 38.

[4] Three views or theories have been given of Arianism: [1] That of its founder, which is described in the text, that Christ was of a different substance to the Father; [2] the Homoiousian (ὁμοιούσιος) that Christ was of a substance like that of the Father; [3] the Homoion (ὅμοιος), the theory of Acacius, suggested by Eusebius of Cæsarea, that Christ was like the Father, which might obviously have an orthodox meaning (ὅμοιος κατὰ πάντα), or be used in an uncatholic sense; it was also suggested to avoid the Catholic ὁμοούσιος. The last two theories, however, only verbally differ—Christ can only be either of the substance of the Father or of another substance, whether like or unlike.

and Semiarians; altering the form of baptism, and baptizing with one immersion only: thus, says Sozomen, corrupting the apostolical tradition handed down to that day.[1]

We may also shortly follow up the history of Arianism in the East, where it originated and chiefly prevailed. Constantius was succeeded by Julian [A.D. 361-363], who recalled Arians and other heretics who had been banished, thinking that the downfall of Christianity would be hastened by its own internal dissensions. The short reign of Jovian followed [A.D. 363-364], who recalled from banishment Athanasius and other Catholic bishops. Jovian was succeeded by Valens in the East [A.D. 364-378]. Arianism was now triumphant, and the orthodox persecuted, banished, and sometimes put to death.[2] The Goths and other barbarous nations during his reign were converted to Arian Christianity under circumstances related by ecclesiastical historians.[3] Valens was succeeded by Theodosius [A.D. 378-395], who banished Arianism from the empire. Various edicts were passed against its professors, who took refuge amongst barbarous nations converted to Arianism. The Vandals (Arian) having obtained possession of Africa, through the perfidy of Count Boniface [A.D. 427], persecuted the Catholics, who were more grievously harassed by Hunneric [A.D. 481-484], at which time occurred the wonderful miracle of the Confessors, who spake as clearly after their tongues were cut out as before. The Visigoths, or Western Goths, who conquered France and Spain, had been converted to Arianism [A.D. 348]. About two centuries afterwards, by the Council of Toledo [A.D. 589], the Catholic faith was established amongst them.[4]

Other barbarous tribes (Arian) were not converted to the Catholic faith till the close of the seventh century. The Lombards (Arian) conquered Italy [A.D. 570], and a hundred years afterwards [A.D. 673] were converted to the Catholic faith: and thus Arianism was extinct.[5]

During the sixteenth century, or at the period of the Reformation, Arianism was revived. Servetus held Antitrinitarian opinions, though of what precise kind is hardly known. Œcolampadius, in a letter to Bucer [A.D. 1531], speaks of his denying that Christ was co-eternal and consubstantial with the Father.[6] He was burnt by Calvin at Geneva [A.D. 1553]. Gentilis, who was condemned at Berne in Switzerland for heresy, and beheaded [A.D. 1566], held Arian opinions.[7] But it was chiefly in Poland that Antitrinitarianism obtained the widest prevalence. A modern (so-called) Unitarian writer says: "Up to this period all the synods held in Poland were composed indiscriminately of the members and ministers of all the Reformed Churches of every communion, Lutheran, Calvinistic, and Antitrinitarian. The consequences of the discordant opinions held by the parties forming these assemblies were, as might be expected, continual disputations, which were frequently conducted with great warmth and violence." After many fruitless attempts to make peace and reconcile differences, the Unitarians finally separated from other Protestant sects, having their own churches and collegiate establishments entirely to themselves. The writer from whom we quote thus states the differences in their religious opinions: "They all concurred in maintaining the supremacy of the Father: but with respect to Jesus Christ some thought Him to be a god of inferior nature derived from the supreme Deity: others held the doctrine of Arius, conceiving Him to have been the first created Spirit, who became incarnate with the view of effecting the salvation of mankind: while a third party believed Him to be a human being. These last were again divided into two classes, the one believing the miraculous conception of Jesus, the other considering Him to have been the son of Joseph as well as of Mary. Another point on which they differed amongst themselves was the worship of Jesus Christ; some of those who believed in His simple humanity maintaining that He was entitled to Divine honours on account of the high rank and authority with which He had been invested after His resurrection as the King and Lord of the Church; whilst others held that Divine worship was to be paid to the Father alone." We next read, as might be expected from such wide differences of opinion, of bitter disputes amongst "Unitarians" respecting the worship and invocation of our Lord, which Socinus maintained, and Francis David, and others denied. Held in abhorrence by Catholic and Reformed, they gave occasion, by their zeal in maintaining their heresy, to the triumph of their adversaries and their own expulsion from Poland. Some students belonging to their college at Racow beat down a crucifix with stones [A.D. 1638]: a decree was in consequence passed (by the Diet at Warsaw) enjoining that "the Unitarian Church at Racow should be closed, the College be broken up, the printing-house be demolished, and the ministers and professors be branded as infamous, proscribed, and banished the state. These misfortunes were shortly afterwards aggravated by an invasion of the Cossacks, who marked out the Unitarians as especial objects of their outrage and vengeance. In the year 1655 the peasants of Poland also, being instigated by the Catholics, rose up in arms against them in several districts, and pursued them everywhere with sanguinary ferocity, pillaging

[1] Sozom. Eccl. Hist. lib. vi. c. 26.

[2] Ibid. lib. vi. c. 10.

[3] Socrates, lib. iv. 33; Sozomen, lib. vi. c. 37; Theodoret, lib. iv. c. 37.

[4] Concilium Toletanum III., in quo Ariana hæresis in Hispania condemnatur.

[5] This word must not be strictly interpreted: we read of Arians in Italy in the tenth century, but they were only the relics of a heresy which no longer openly appeared as a sect. Such Arians must outwardly have professed the Nicene faith and joined in the worship of the Church.

[6] Abutitur omnibus in suum sensum, tantum ne confiteatur Filium coæternum Patri et consubstantialem. See Rees' Historical Introduction to his Translation of the Racovian Catechism, p. xi. [1818].

[7] He maintained "that the Father alone was God, and that He had created before all worlds a mighty Spirit who afterwards became incarnate in the human body of Jesus." Ibid. p. xxvi.

their property, burning their houses, and putting all to death who fell into their hands." "Under the pretence that the Unitarians had violated the former edict, a more rigorous decree was passed against them [A.D. 1660]; they were all banished from the kingdom. "Four hundred proceeded to Transylvania and Hungary; many bent their steps towards Prussia, Silesia, and Moravia, others emigrated to Holland and the Low Countries, and some passed over to England."[1]

Thus ended the public profession of Unitarianism in Poland, about one hundred and twenty years after its first introduction. Some who held Arian opinions, on their revival in the sixteenth century took refuge in England, as Ochinus, who was strongly suspected of such views. One person, George Paris, a Dutchman, in the reign of Edward VI., was burnt for Arianism. Archdeacon Philpot wrote a work against the same heresy; but we have no reason to think that Arianism widely or extensively prevailed. It was revived in England at the beginning of last century by Whiston and Dr. S. Clarke, but they did not form any sect or party and are only to be considered as learned theorists, who attempted with abstruse modifications to revive Arianism. Dr. Clarke's opinions were brought under the notice of Convocation [A.D. 1713].[2]

Arianism does not at present exist as a sect or denomination: its want of coherence and permanence cannot only be proved; as was remarked, from its own inherent weakness, but is also evident from experience. There are only two systems or theories logically defensible—a belief in our Lord's true Divinity, or in His mere Humanity as the Son of Joseph and Mary. Many of the Arians who lived at the period of the Reformation, as we find from the Racovian Catechism, believed that Christ, in a certain sense, may be called God, that He was born of the blessed Virgin (having an immaculate conception), that He is an object of worship to be invoked by Christians, and that they are unworthy of that name who refuse to invoke and worship Him.[3] But such opinions have long since been abandoned by modern Unitarians, who acknowledge only the mere Humanity of our Lord. We may learn from this that the permanency of Arianism is impossible; it inevitably wastes away, as we have seen in ancient and modern times, and perishes from its own weakness and divisions. But very strangely in modern times it has developed into a system widely differing from itself—a system which Arius himself would probably have anathematized. There is a common saying which is here verified, that everything is sure at last to find its true level. The Nicene Creed, unchanged, has continued for fifteen hundred years the faith of Christendom, whilst Arianism, after giving up one after another of its distinctive opinions and theories, develops into a system wholly differing from itself, but still be it remarked, into a system which is really consistent and tenable, though opposed in the most marked degree to the obvious sense and teaching of Holy Scripture. [Tillemont's History of the Arians (Deacon's transl.). Petavii Dogmata Theologica De Trinitate, lib. v. and vi. De Incarnatione Verbi. Bull's Defence of the Nicene Creed (Burton's ed.). Waterland's Works, 6 vols. (Oxford ed.). Berriman's Account of Controversies on the Holy Trinity, 1727 (Lady Moyer's Lectures).]

ARMINIANISM. A system of theology which originated in Holland in the sixteenth century, and so named from its author Arminius, the leading particulars of whose life it will be necessary to give. James Harmensen (Latinized into Arminius) was born at Oudewater in 1560. After a course of study at the University of Leyden, he went to Geneva, where, under the instructions of Beza, he embraced the doctrine of Predestination in its most rigid form [SUPRALAPSARIANISM]. On returning to Amsterdam in 1588, he was appointed a pastor or minister of the Reformed congregation. Called upon by Martin Lydius, a professor of Frankfort, to defend the doctrine of Predestination, as held by Beza, from the objections made against it by the ministers of Delft, he was led to a more careful examination of the subject, which issued in his rejecting the doctrine he had previously held, or predestination in its extreme form. Lectures which he afterwards delivered on the eighth and ninth chapters of the Romans gave offence to his Calvinistic brethren, and were the means of maturing and setting forth his altered opinions.[4] In 1604 he was made Professor in the University of Leyden, and gained many converts to his opinions. His greatest opponent, who was of the Predestinarian school of Beza, was Francis Gomarus, his colleague in the University. Controversy, with its usual bitter fruits, prevailed between Arminius and his followers and their Calvinistic opponents until his death, which was probably thus hastened in 1609. Arminius held Catholic doctrine on the Holy Trinity and the Incarnation, believing in the unity of the Three Divine Persons in one Godhead, and the eternal generation of the Son of God.[5] As regards his

[1] Rees' Transl. of Racovian Catechism, pp. xxvi.-xl.
[2] Lathbury's History of Convocation, p. 425 [1853].
[3] Rees' Translation of the Racovian Catechism, pp. 189, 197, 198 [1818].

[4] "As for Armiuius, he had been fifteen years a preacher (or a pastor as they rather phrased it) to the great church of Amsterdam, during which time, taking a great distaste at the book published by Mr. Perkins, intituled Armilla Aurea, he set himself upon the canvassing of it, and published his performance in it by the name of Examen Predestinationis Perkinsoniæ, as before was said. [Mr. W. Perkins (1592), an eminent divine of Cambridge, published his book called the Armilla Aurea, &c. containing such a doctrine of predestination as Beza had before delivered, but cast into a more distinct and methodical form, p. 521.] Encouraged with his good success in this adventure, he undertakes a conference on the same argument with the learned Junius, the sum whereof being spread abroad in the several papers, was afterwards published by the name of Amica Collatio. Junius being dead in the year 1603, the Curators or Overseers of the University made choice of this Van Harmini (Arminius) to succeed him in his place."—Heylin, Quinquarticular History, p. 526 [1681].

[5] See Declaration of his Sentiments before the States of Holland, October 30, 1608, No. viii. (Works of views on Predestination and the doctrines connected with it, he seems at first to have taken a middle course between the Supralapsarian teaching of Calvin and Beza, and Sublapsarianism, or predestination held in a modified form—in other words, was what would now be called a moderate Calvinist. He afterwards went further, rejecting or calling in question portions of the distinctive teaching of Calvinism, but probably to the end of his life did not go beyond moderate or semi-Calvinism. Thus in the Declaration of his Sentiments we have just quoted, only delivered a few months before his death, he says, on the possibility of a final fall from grace: "Though I here openly and ingenuously affirm that I never taught that a true believer (vere credens) can either totally or finally fall away from the faith and perish (a fide deficiat sicque pereat) yet I will not conceal that there are passages of Scripture which seem to me to wear this aspect, and those answers to them which I have been permitted to see are not of such a kind as to approve themselves on all points to my understanding (mihi per omnia probaverint). On the other hand, certain passages are produced for the contrary doctrine (of unconditional perseverance) which are worthy of much consideration."[1]

Again, with regard to Predestination: "My sentiments upon it are the following. It is an eternal and gracious decree of God in Christ, by which He determines to justify and adopt believers (fideles) and to endow them with life eternal, but to condemn unbelievers and impenitent persons, as I have explained in the theses on the same subject, which were publicly disputed, and in which no one found anything to be reprehended as false or unsound (tanquam falsum)." In the theses referred to, Arminius says, that "the cause of the decree of Predestination is God's good pleasure, by which being moved with and in Himself He made that decree. This good pleasure not only excludes every cause which it could take from man, or which it could be imagined to take from him; but it likewise removes whatever was in or from man that could justly move God not to make that gracious decree [Rom. xi. 34, 35]." "We circumscribe the persons (who are the object of predestination) within the limits of the word believers (fidelium), and give the name of believers (fideles) not to those who would be such by their own merits and strength, but to those who by the gratuitous and peculiar kindness of God, would believe in Christ." Again, he says, the decree of predestination "comforts afflicted consciences who are struggling with temptation, when it renders them assured (certiores) of the gracious goodwill of God in Christ, which was from all eternity decreed to them (ab æterno ipsis decreta), performed in time, and which will endure for ever." The decree of predestination necessarily infers reprobation, which Arminius thus explains, that God "resolved from eternity to condemn to eternal death unbelievers—who, by their own fault and the just judgment of God, would not believe—for the declaration of His wrath and power."[2]

On the subject of justification he agrees with Calvin, holding the doctrine of imputed righteousness;[3] and speaking of grace and free will, he says, "That teacher obtains my highest approbation who ascribes as much as possible to [divine] grace; provided he so pleads the cause of grace as not to inflict an injury on the justice of God, and not to take away the free will to that which is evil"[4] (liberum arbitrium ad malum tollat). We shall now briefly state the opinions of Arminius on the Sacraments. He says: "The virtue and efficacy of the sacraments of the New Testament do not go beyond the act of signifying and testifying (obsignationis). There can neither [actually] be, nor be imagined, any exhibition of the thing signified through them, except such as is completed by these intermediate acts themselves (quo istis actibus intermediis non peragatur). And therefore the sacraments of the New Testament do not differ from those used in the Old Testament, because the former exhibit grace, but the latter typify or prefigure it." Hence Arminius says of baptism, that "the covenant people (fœderati) of God are sprinkled with water to signify and to testify (obsignandum) the spiritual ablution which is effected by the blood and spirit of Christ;"[5] and of the Lord's Supper, "by the legitimate external distribution, taking, and enjoyment of bread and wine the Lord's death is announced, and the inward receiving and enjoyment of the body and blood of Christ are signified; and that most intimate and close union and fellowship (sive κοινωνια) by which we are joined to Christ our Head is sealed and confirmed on account of the institution of Christ and the analogical relation of the sign and the thing signified. But by this believers (fideles) profess their gratitude and obligation to God, communion among themselves, and a marked difference from all other persons.[6]

We shall now go on with the history of the Arminians or Remonstrants, as they were called[7] after the death of their leader. Their opinions as opposed to Calvinism were set forth in five articles addressed to the States of Holland in 1610. The five articles will afterwards be given at length [Five Points]. The substance of them was as follows: [1.] That God decreed to bestow salvation on those whom He foresaw would believe on Jesus Christ, and persevere in faith and obedience. [2.] By Christ's death expiation was made for the sins of all men, though none but believers will finally reap the benefit. [3.] As Arminius, translated by Nichols, vol. i. p. 627; also vol. ii. p. 690 [1825].

[1] Works, vol. i. p. 603 (Nichols).

[2] Ibid. ii. 26.

[3] Ibid. i. p. 636. See also ii. 405.

[4] Ibid. p. 700.

[5] The translator has omitted an important clause, "grafting into the body of Christ." The original is, "Aqua tinguntur ad ablutionem spiritualem quæ per sanguinem et Spiritum Christi fit, inque corpus Christi insitionem significandam et obsignandam."

[6] Works, vol. ii. p. 440, 442.

[7] So called, as Mosheim says, from the petition they presented to the States of Holland and West Friesland in 1610, which was called a Remonstrance.

man is by nature born in sin, and unable to think and to do what is good, it is necessary for salvation that he must be born again and renewed by the Holy Spirit. [4.] That Divine grace which begins, continues, and perfects all that is truly good in man is not invincible or necessarily effectual, but may be resisted by man's perverse will. [5.] Whether those who are united to Christ by faith and furnished with sufficient strength to resist the temptations of evil, can lose their faith and fall finally from a state of grace does not yet appear, but must be ascertained from a careful study of the Holy Scripture. The concluding part of this article was afterwards altered into an explicit assertion that a man might fall finally from a state of grace and salvation.

The opinions of the Remonstrants making great progress, and the controversy between themselves and their opponents being aggravated by political dissension, the Synod of Dort was assembled (entirely under Calvinistic influence) [Nov. 1618[1] —May 1619] for the termination of religious disputes. The Five Articles presented as the symbol of Arminianism were condemned, and Arminian preachers were persecuted and exiled. But religious liberty was proclaimed in Holland in 1625.

It is impossible to trace the history of Arminianism as of any other sect or denomination of Christians characterized by holding certain opinions, and having a form of Church government, and who also substantially retain, with whatever modifications, the teaching of their founder. Arminianism, viewed in reference to its author, had no consistency or permanence as a form of religious belief, and has never been adequately represented in any religious body or denomination. It may be described as a reaction against Calvinistic errors, and a restoration as regards the doctrine of Predestination of Scriptural and primitive teaching. It leavened in various degrees other religious bodies widely differing from each other, and from the Reformed community in Holland, where it originated. Archbishop Laud and the Caroline divines have been called Arminians, but the charge was really untrue, as their system of theology differed essentially from that of Arminius, not only on Church government, but especially on the doctrines of sacramental grace. They were Arminians, or agreed with the Remonstrants, on the Five Articles, but no further.

It is difficult to state exactly the opinions of Arminius even in respect to the Five Articles; his theology was probably in an inchoate or transitional state, and owing to his premature death not fully developed. Thus he held universal redemption, though according to his own statement in a sense which a Calvinist might hold it: he describes free will as being in the unregenerate "imprisoned, destroyed, and lost," and that man in this state "hates and has an aversion to that which is truly good and pleasing to God, but loves and pursues what is evil."[3] His views on Predestination which have been given afford no proof that he believed it was founded on God's foresight of a Christian's perseverance in holiness, though in his last Declaration, he explicitly maintains this view.[4] He was also to the end of life doubtful of the possibility of a final fall from grace. His views on divine grace were most emphatically opposed to Pelagianism and kindred heresies, though from an early period such heresies have been found amongst his followers, and have since generally characterized them. It can only be positively asserted, that the opinions of Arminius tended towards the Five Articles, and found in them their legitimate development, and indeed were probably nearer to them than appears from his published works. His early followers could best judge of his real opinions, whilst we have chiefly for our guidance cautious statements made before powerful opponents, and which adhere as much as possible to Calvinistic terminology and its doctrinal system. However this may be, it is right to state that Arminius often complained of the opinions of his so called followers, which were naturally attributed to himself, some of which, as heresies on original sin and the divinity of our Lord, he strongly opposed and condemned.

On the death of Arminius, his system, however modified, was, through the writings of Episcopius, Grotius, Curcellæus, Limborch and Le Clerc, Hallam says, in despite of obloquy and persecution, spread over much of the Protestant region of Europe.[5] A tendency to Socinianism soon appeared in the Arminian body, and Bossuet accused Episcopius and Grotius of that heresy. It may be more correctly stated that Arminianism soon developed into Latitudinarianism, or a rationalistic theology which solely depended for guidance into Divine truth on man's reason and judgment, neglecting or casting aside when opposed to them the teaching of God's Word and Church. Hence, as might have been expected, Arminianism was soon characterized by a rejection of the mysterious doctrines of Christianity, as on the Holy Trinity and the Incarnation, and by Pelagian and semi-Pelagian heresies. Hallam gives an account of Arminianism in England about the epoch of the Restoration. They were called, he says, "Latitude-men or Latitudinarians, trained in the principles of Episcopius and Chillingworth, strongly averse to every compromise with Popery, and thus distinguished from the High Church party; learned rather in profane philosophy than in the Fathers, more full of Plato and Plotinus than Jerome and Chrysostom, great maintainers of natural religion, and of the eternal laws of morality, not very solicitous about systems of orthodoxy, and limiting very considerably beyond the notions of former ages the fundamental tenets of Christianity." And he afterwards

[1] An account by an eyewitness of the injustice with which the Remonstrants were treated at the Council of Dort is given in one of the letters published by Limborch [cccxvi]: Epistolicà Narratio eorum quæ in Synodo Dordracena gesta sunt. Epistolæ Ecclesiasticæ et Theologicæ [1684].

[2] Apology against Thirty-One Theological Articles, xii.

[3] Public Disputations, xi. § 7, § 9.

[4] Works, vol. i. p. 389 (Nichols).

[5] Literary History of Europe, vol. ii. p. 431 [1855].

[6] We may thus see the absurdity of classing Laud with mentions that, according to the statement of Nelson in his life of Bishop Bull, the Theological Institutes of Episcopius were at that time [A.D. 1685] generally in the hands of our students of divinity in both Universities as the best system of divinity that had appeared.[1]

During the last century, Anglican Arminianism was equally characterized by its Latitudinarian or heretical theology. Hoadly, a bishop for nearly fifty years, was a Socinian. Whitby, the great defender of Arminianism, left at his death for publication a work in defence of Arianism.[2] Tillotson, who died at the close of the previous century [A.D. 1694], wished that we were well rid of the Athanasian Creed,[3] and as Dr. S. Clarke shews there were many bishops and others of his own day who held a similar opinion. In the last half of the century Blackburne's Confessional was published, in which he endeavoured to prove that the imposition of articles of faith was contrary to the fundamental principles of the Reformation. A petition was sent to the House of Commons in 1771, signed by two hundred clergy and a few laymen, whose opinions were Latitudinarian, and in many cases Arian or Socinian, praying that subscription to the Articles might no longer be required, either on admission to the universities or from the clergy. Waterland, the great defender of Catholic doctrine on the Holy Trinity, shews the impossibility of reconciling, as some proposed, Arian or Socinian doctrine with the teaching of the Articles and Prayer Book.[4]

Arminianism—the sect and doctrinal system lineally descended at least from the early Remonstrants—still exists in Holland, though it appears to be fast approaching extinction. The number of Remonstrants is now only about 5000, and is still decreasing. In 1809 they had 34 congregations, with 40 preachers, in Holland, but in 1829 only 20 congregations, with 21 preachers. The largest society of Arminians is in Rotterdam, and numbers only 600 members. [Arminii Opera Theologica, Bertii Ed. Limborch, Epistol. Ecclesiasticæ et Theologicæ. Works of Arminius, translated by Nichols. Calvinism and Arminianism Compared; by Nichols. Heylin's Quinquarticular History.]

ARTICLES. This word has acquired an ecclesiastical sense, especially in England, which is not very different from the ancient sense of Canon [q. v.], being used to include statements respecting the practice as well as statements respecting the doctrine of religion. Thus we speak of "the Articles of the Christian Faith," meaning the Creeds; and we also speak of "the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion," in which there are many statements regarding the discipline as well as the doctrines of the Church. The following are the principal applications of the word :—

1. ARTICLES OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH. These are the several statements of the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, which are so called in a distinctive sense because they have been generally accepted by the Church as containing the substantial truths revealed by God and necessary for a Christian's belief. This usage is not modern, being found in the Catechism and the Visitation Office of the Book of Common Prayer, and also in the mediæval "Instructions for Parish priests" by John Myrk, who writes,—

> "The artykeles of the fey > Teche thy paresch thus, and sey."

This primary application of the word "Article" in an ecclesiastical sense was extended at the time of the Reformation to such documents as those named in the following paragraphs.

2. THE TEN ARTICLES. These "articles to stablish Christian quietness" were composed by Convocation and promulgated by the Crown in the year 1536. The first five relate to the Creeds, Baptism, Penance, the Sacrament of the Altar, and Justification; the latter five are on Images, the honour due to Saints, praying to Saints, Rites and Ceremonies, and Purgatory. They were all substantially embodied in the "Institution of a Christian Man," which was set forth in 1537 as a full statement of the principles of the Church of England.

3. THE SIX ARTICLES. These formed part of the "Act of Six Articles" [31 Hen. VIII. cap. 14] passed by Parliament in the year 1539. There is reason to think they were composed by Henry VIII. himself, and they had no authority from the Church. The Six Articles were on Transubstantiation, Communion in both kinds, Clerical Celibacy, Vows, Private Masses, and Confession. The Act containing them was repealed by 1 Edw. VI. cap. 12.

4. THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES originally appeared in 1552 as "the Forty-two Articles," and having been repealed in the reign of Queen Mary, were re-formed in 1562 as they stand at present. They were composed by Convocation, and promulgated by the Crown; and Acts of Parliament, originating with 13 Eliz. cap. 12, require that they shall be subscribed by the clergy before ordination, before institution, and read in Church after induction. The Thirty-nine Articles are so well known, and there are such excellent commentaries upon them and their history, that it is not necessary to treat of them in detail here. [DOGMA. AUGSBURG CONFESSION. J. H. Blunt's History of the Reformation, A.D. 1514-1547. Hardwick's History of the Articles. Lloyd's Formularies of Faith.]

ARTICULUS MORTIS. It has always been a rule of the Church to exercise a large charity the Arminian party. The opinions of Arminius, of his followers the early Remonstrants, and of the Latitudinarian divines of our Church during the last and the latter part of the previous century (assuredly the legitimate successors in doctrine of the early Remonstrants), were opposed in the most marked degree to the theology of the Church of Rome.

[1] Literary History of Europe, vol. iv. p. 35.

[2] Ὕστεραι φροντίδες, or the last thoughts of Dr. Whitby [1727].

[3] Dr. S. Clarke says of Tillotson's oft-quoted saying, "The account given of Athanasius' Creed (saith the excellent Archbishop Tillotson in a letter written from Lambeth, October 23, 1694, to a Right Reverend Prelate) seems to me in nowise satisfactory. I wish we were well rid of it." [Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, p. 416, 1732].

[4] Works, vol. ii. p. 261 [1856].

towards persons in articulo mortis, especially in case of sudden accidents or violence by which the dying person is prevented from having time for any acts of penitence, restitution, or holy reformation. This charity also extends itself to persons in imminent danger of death, although no mortal blow has yet been struck. The approach of shipwreck, battle, or any similar peril has therefore been considered to put those who have no reasonable expectation of escaping death in the same position as persons actually dying; absolution and the Holy Sacrament being then bestowed with much less restriction than under other circumstances.

ASCENSION. [1.] The fact of our Lord's ascension is stated in the Gospel of St. Mark [xvi. 19], in that of St. Luke [xxiv. 51], and in the Acts of the Apostles [i. 9]: and a further confirmation is given to these three statements by the dying words of St. Stephen, "Behold I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God" [Acts vii. 55, 56]. The three narratives also contain abundant evidence that our Lord ascended in His true human nature, the body and soul which had come together again at the Resurrection. It is a pious opinion of most theologians that our Lord was surrounded by the heavenly host as He went up into Heaven, and that He led in His train the Saints who had arisen at the time of His Resurrection, of whom "many" had previously gone "into the Holy City, and appeared unto many" [Matt. xxvii. 52, 53].

[2.] The festival of the Ascension dates from the primitive age of the Church, and St. Augustine attributes its institution to the Apostles. [Ep. liv., al. cxviii., ad Januar.] Several of the Fathers of the same age have left sermons preached on the day, and Proclus, Patriarch of Constantinople, speaks of it as one of the days which the Lord Himself has made by the acts with which He has consecrated them.

ASCETICS. [Hermits. Cœnobites. Monasticism.]

ASCETICISM, or practice, means the habitual practice of the exercises of the higher life for the purpose of advancing in virtue. Originally applied to the gymnastic exercises by which the bodily powers are developed, the word has naturally passed on to the discipline of the soul. The consciousness of such discipline being necessary has not been wanting to men in every form of religion. As, however, the ideas of virtue must vary with the forms of religious opinion or of faith peculiar to each system, it follows that Asceticism will assume various developments for good or for evil proportionate to the end which is sought, and allied to the dogma from which it proceeds. In forms of natural religion, the endeavour to bring the body into subjection to the enlightened will resulted indeed in much elevation of life; but even the noblest philosophers of antiquity could not escape from the remains of evil which vitiated not only the body, so that its baser passions were ever rising up in new and sometimes exaggerated forms, but also the faculties of the soul itself, so that the evil was often unrecognised, or excused and accepted. Experience shewed that evil was not limited to that infirmity of human nature which the heathen poet expressed in the words

> "Video meliora proboque, > Deteriora sequor."

The evil lay deeper. The light within became but darkness. God gave them over, by a chastisement which was the natural consequence of continued sin, to a reprobate, undistinguishing mind. Losing sight of God, they lost sight of holiness, and even whilst striving to triumph over nature, they were obliged to accept the terrible consequences of the Fall. They could not raise nature to that true law from which it had fallen without the aid of a power greater than themselves.

The evil became exaggerated when a pure system of Deism gave way to a corrupt theosophy, or a degrading idolatry. Oriental speculations upon the origin of matter led men to seek to eliminate the soul as much as possible from the body. Bodily existence was regarded as a necessary evil, and the escape of the soul into nothingness, its absorption into the universal spirit, where its individuality should cease, became the only possible hope of freedom and purity. The maceration of the body was in this system not so much for the training of a self-sacrificing spiritual gymnast, but rather for the destruction of a hostile element of nature which was incompatible with the soul's true life. The body was treated as a necessary accident of this present state, essentially evil, but external to the real self, which would rise to freedom as soon as the necessary penalty of imprisonment in matter had been completed. We find the heathen fakir to the present day combining the most terrible self-torture with the most revolting indecencies, because he looks upon his body not as a part of his true nature, the instrument of a Divine service, but as a prison-house of evil, from which he must hasten his escape by increasing his fleshly miseries, an external enemy for whose foulness he is not responsible, and which he has to subdue by constant antagonism.

The Israelite, possessing as he did the oracles of God, was able to carry on the work of Asceticism in a far different spirit. He knew God as the Creator of all things, visible and invisible, and, however corrupt the material nature might be, he knew that this corruption was not inherent in matter. He recognised it as being the result of the Fall. The body was to be disciplined and brought into subjection to the soul, but it would not have been given by God if it were not intended to be the instrument of the soul for purposes of good. By voluntary vows he might put away from himself certain indulgences as a means of devoting himself with greater reverence and purity to Divine contemplation, and separating off his intercourse with God from the grosser pleasures of earthly enjoyments. In the law of Moses rules were given for stated fasts, and for abstaining from connubial pleasures when preparing for acts of special sanctity. One class of persons was marked out from the first as devoted pre-eminently to bodily discipline. The Nazarite was the exhibitor of a life separated unto God. This law of separation might no doubt be more or less complete. In such a character as Samson it would seem as if little were invoked beyond the two more prominent restrictions. However, the more spiritual mind recognised a higher call of God. The Nazarite's countenance, "whiter than milk," spoke of the heavenly atmosphere of his self-disciplined life.

In the later period also God raised up another race of Ascetics in the schools of the prophets. Their rough clothing was a type of their rough living. By prolonged habits of fasting the spiritual faculty was cultivated. It was evident that God blessed the life of Asceticism, and vouchsafed great gifts of illumination and supernatural power to those who thus diligently sought Him. Amongst the Ascetics of the Old Testament after Elijah, we find the most prominent character in a sphere of life altogether different. Daniel carried the ascetic life to its highest pitch during the many years of his career, from his boyhood in the royal seminary and the Chaldee university, to the later years when he occupied a lofty position amongst the great men of the empire as the privy counsellor of Nebuchadnezzar. We find him using his ascetic practices as a special means of attaining Divine light. Nor could it, indeed, be otherwise, since the evangelical beatitude is but the revelation of an eternal law of God in His dealing with mankind,—"Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God."

Those, therefore, who sought to see God, strove specially to purify themselves. This rose to its highest fulfilment in that ascetic who was "more than a prophet." His eyes were to be opened that he might see, and his lips to proclaim the Incarnate Son of God. His life was accordingly one of special ascetic self-preparation, and his preaching was also preparatory to the Great Advent, "Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." His disciples were trained in the observance of frequent and regular practices of prayer and fasting.

Nor did the Son of Man neglect the duty of asceticism. In His own Person He exhibited it more triumphantly that any before Him. Although He mingled with the feasts of sinners, yet He kept Himself apart from His brethren. His life of virginity, poverty, and obedience, His prayer, His fasting, His unwearied charity, became the foundation of the religious life and spiritual exercises of the Christian Church. The revelation of the grace of Christ transfigured the discipline of the Church with the glory of the communication of God, and voluntary sufferings endured from a sense of devotion to Jesus crucified, strengthened the faithful in their conflict with Satan for the endurance of the Cross, and shone bright with the hope of an everlasting glory. The law of Christian life in the days before the first love had grown cold, was felt to be one of continual prayer, of watching, of fasting, whereby the worshipper offered his body a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God through Jesus Christ. The type of life which is exhibited in the Apostolical Epistles as belonging to all is indeed of an ascetic character which in the present day it is difficult to realize. Mortification (both outward and inward), habits of separation from the world, watching unto prayer, fasting, revenges upon ourselves after lapses into sin, a large-heartedness making all superfluities of wealth suffice for the supply of others' needs, while we remain content with the moderate gratification of our own desires, is a mode of life with which modern habits are sadly at variance. But Holy Scripture represents to us that some are to strive to live by stricter rules than are imposed on all. The counsels of perfection which our Lord sanctified by His own observance, and enforced upon a few, were plainly living on in the mind of the Apostolic Church. Anna the prophetess, and widow of fourscore and four years, who departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day, was to be succeeded by many, who in the Christian Church should be enrolled as widows (under which name the consecrated virgins were included,) abiding in loneliness of heart, trusting in God, and continuing in supplications and prayers night and day. The elder ones, if necessitous, were supported by the alms of the Church. Some, as probably the four daughters of Philip the Evangelist, remained in their homes, although dedicated as virgins, and prophesying.

The practice of Asceticism, as a professed law of life, thus passed on from the earlier dispensation to the Christian Church, and, passing on, it could not but be ennobled by the change. It passed on through the medium of our Lord's own ministry and example. This necessarily attached to it a sacramental value, which it had not had before. The Christian revelation also shining upon it could not fail to develope new features within it. The higher law of morals must take its form from the dogma which accompanies it; and, as in heathen countries these higher efforts crystallized in the abominations of fakirism, so did Christian asceticism rise into spirituality by association with the great doctrines now fully declared of man's responsibility, his fallen estate, the Incarnation of the Son of God, and the resurrection of the flesh. That which had been the despairing effort of the few in their sharp struggle with unconquered evil became the necessary aim of the many, who having sought in baptism to be admitted as members of the crucified Saviour, felt themselves pledged to mortify their members which are upon the earth; as persons dead to the world, whose life was hid with Christ in God to be revealed hereafter when they should reign with Christ in His glory. True, they were still in the world, and had to take part in its businesses. The requirements of the world held them back from giving themselves altogether to the special exercises of devotion. The infirmity of nature was such that none, whilst living in the world, could realize habitually the perfection of the mixed estate, in which the highest perfection, that of our Lord Himself, was found. He in His spotlessness could be in the world and yet untainted by it. His soul ever remained in the undimmed contemplation of God, whatever might be the accidents of His external position. To His members this mixed estate was impossible without forfeiture of perfection. To most, it was almost necessarily attended by serious decline. Consequently, we find the Church of God gradually dividing itself with more and more of definiteness into two classes, those whose calling was in the world and those who were called to the regular practice of asceticism in one or more of its features.

Such a division within the Christian body had always been contemplated by our Lord Himself, for He speaks at times not to all, but to those who are able to receive His words. In fact, without some such partition of duty the Church must have ignored the natural laws of Divine Providence, and the world must have died out as the faith spread over it. The Unity of the Body of Christ, however, was such that the whole body might grow towards perfection whilst the several members glorified God in their several vocations. It was felt to be no matter of mere human option whether men lived by ascetic rule or no. It was as God called any man: every man being called to the highest perfection within his reach. But God may give us indications that this or that form of service are not intended for us, and then we must seek the highest perfection in some other manner. We do not lose anything, for, whatever our calling be, all perfections are plainly not within the reach of every one. We become most perfect by following perfection in that state which God marks out for us.

Unhappily the large body of Christians were soon content to assume that the world was their true sphere, and living in it they lived for it. The consequence was that even in the Apostolic age the first fervour of love declined. The New Testament epistles bear witness to us that the standard even of secular Christianity was rapidly lost. For some time the continuance of persecution did indeed check the spirit of worldliness. There must have been some consciousness of a supernatural call in those who could brave the dangers of professing Christianity. There must have been in such persons a readiness to aim at the Divine life. But intuitions of truth are not always lasting, nor resolutions always strong, nor hated passions always easily subdued. Many who had grown up in the faith from childhood, as well as many fresh converts, would gradually fall away into sloth. So the division became more and more marked between Christians living in the world and those who professed asceticism. Asceticism could scarcely be practised at all without separation from the bulk of Christians, who ignored even that part of its practice which was incumbent upon all.

The immediate occasion, however, of local separation, was the violence of persecution. When many were giving way on all sides under its pressure, Paul the hermit fled from the danger of lapse to live as a solitary, and thus becoming perfected in practices of communion with God, he remained to carry on his life of devotion in solitude when the persecution was passed. The instincts of Christendom recognised the blessedness of a life thus separated, and fled into the desert from the pleasures of the world as the greatest of all their foes. Others in other places retired to live austere lives in seclusion. These gradually formed themselves into communities, each having a recognised head. The principles of the ascetic life thus came to be developed in the three great evangelical counsels,—chastity, poverty, and obedience, which form the basis of the "religious" life. [Counsels of Perfection]. Each subsequent age saw fresh forms of religious life arising to meet its own requirements; but all the monastic orders rested upon this threefold foundation. The enemy was threefold; threefold was the root of the sin of his nature with which the ascetic had to struggle; threefold therefore were his attacks. The lusts of the flesh were met by the stern discipline of chastity, the lust of the eye by poverty, and the vow of obedience undertook to fence away the subtle spirit of pride. Of course there were many living in the world who practised these ascetic counsels with more or less of perfection; but that which had been comparatively easy when the Church was a persecuted community existing in a hostile world, became a great difficulty when the world had become nominally Christian. True, indeed, the religious houses themselves were continually falling away into laxer practices. As they were specially erected to be bulwarks of Christendom against the assaults of Satan, it was not to be expected that he would fail to direct his most vigorous attacks against them. The monastic houses in far too many cases became subject to great abuses, but the war did not cease. Reformed communities arose recalling men to the original principles of the order when it was necessary, and the asceticism regularly developed in the religious houses was a lamp of holy light handed on from generation to generation, and from place to place, amidst the dark storms of barbarism in which, but for them, the mediæval Church would have entirely perished.

We are not, however, to suppose that the benefits of Asceticism have been merely of a kind immediately religious. As the soul of man was formed to be religious, to have religion for its highest energy, it could not fail but that the higher developement of the religious element of our nature would involve an elevation of the whole being. Many indeed are apt to regard the ascetic as gloomy, narrow-minded, and ignorant, because they close their eyes to the light which constitutes his joy, and interpret his words in a carnal sense, at variance with his own true meaning. History, however, has fully vindicated the law of nature and the truth of God. "Them that honour Me I will honour" [1 Sam. ii. 30]. The promise was fulfilled. They who fled from the world found the world coming after them, to seek their guidance, their counsels, their arbitration. The world did homage to those who had spurned it; the recluse became powerful in the world of politics; they who sought to live unknown were remembered with world-wide gratitude when they themselves were dead. But if the promise was thus fulfilled, it was because it was the promise of Him who made man what he is. The laws of God's natural kingdom are fitted to enshrine and carry out the promises of His grace. Asceticism, being the systematic cultivation of man's religious nature, was, as we have seen it ought to be, the real means of elevating all his faculties. It was no mere homage to sentiment which brought stout warriors to accept the decision of the monk. Too often the monk, being untrue to his own profession, was the object of their well-merited satire and scorn. It was when he was true to his ascetic rule that he rose before them in a manifestly supernatural character. Individual ascetics, and whole communities of Religious, extorted the submission of the world at large. Monasteries stood out in prominence as homes of all wisdom, natural and Divine. The religious houses were centres of civilizing influence to a barbarous society, and of cultivation to a land primeval in its wildness. The energies which were disciplined for the struggle with self were strengthened for the subjugation of the world. Not only material difficulties gave way before them; the regions of thought became as fruitful of beauty and wealth by the bold speculations of their reasoning, as the stone became beneath their chisel, or the marsh which learnt to blossom by their careful tillage. In our age, indeed, many stores of nature have been opened which were closed to them, but their powerful grasp of thought had reasoned out as possibilities results which come very often to the most unthinking of ourselves as scientific facts, and which we consider the pride of our own age. Asceticism was no dull spirit which took for gospel whatever it was told. As it was an endeavour to carry out the spiritual morality of the Gospel in its fulness, so it searched unfearingly into all Gospel truth, and scrutinized with a lively interest the mysteries of science.

It is much to be deplored that at the time of the Reformation the religious houses were so ruthlessly abolished. Many indeed had earned their fall by having turned to luxury (in violation of their vows) the wealth which they had inherited from the ascetic toil of their predecessors. Yet there were many which perished only through calumny, and their loss has been severely felt. The Church of England has certainly never been without many individuals cultivating in unobtrusive ways the principles of asceticism, but she has lacked communities devoted to this high aim. The mere collegiate life of her universities fails in its intellectual energy, because its members are wanting in the self-denying stimulus and cumulative labour and life-long perseverance which an avowed cultivation of the religious life alone can ensure. He who would triumph in anything must begin by triumphing over self, and no community which is not pledged to this fundamental endeavour can achieve collective glory or progressive victories in any department of inquiry. In no age or country have secular canons as a community escaped the snare of the wealth they enjoyed. In like manner do wealthy endowments in a university tend certainly to sap that spirit of study which they were intended to foster. It is needful to have ascetic principles recognised as a basis of life which all accept.

Modern movements. The Church of England has felt various movements of asceticism. Although there may have been a widely-spread popular feeling tending to depreciate a strict life under rule, yet the divines who have been most true to her principles have constantly maintained the importance of the evangelical counsels and the subordinate practices of austerity which all Christians ought to follow. That movement which eventuated in the mighty secession of the Wesleyans gained its moral vigour in the ascetic principles which indeed are still commemorated in the very name of Methodism. The movement commonly known as Evangelical was distinguished more by nothing than by the abstraction from the world and the rigorous simplicity of life which its leaders, living as they did in special devotion to Holy Scripture, could not fail to urge as the ideal of Christianity, and which they moreover exhibited in their own lives. Ascetic practices failed in their system, because they were left to the short-lived impulses of individual piety. When the fervour of this piety began to decline, asceticism came to be more definitely and prominently put forward, in accordance with the principles of the Church of England, by the leaders of the so-called Tractarian party. The observances of the appointed fast-days and prayers of the Church, the duty and blessedness of almsgiving, were strenuously enforced.

There is another movement of modern times which seems at first sight to deserve to be reckoned as one of the forms of asceticism; that is Teetotalism. It differs, however, from asceticism because it is founded upon a principle altogether different. Though it inculcates abstinence, it does so mainly upon the score of physical improvement, not for the purpose of cultivating any supernatural virtue. This is not the place to discuss its abstract merits or demerits, but probably the adherents of the system may be divided into two classes. Those who advocate Teetotalism upon grounds consistent with Christianity do so upon practical grounds, because of the immense evils arising to society from excess in drink, and they advocate it especially as a remedial measure to be adopted by those persons who cannot restrain themselves within the bounds of moderation. The objects which they set before their disciples are advancement in domestic comfort, intelligent happiness, social wellbeing. They do not urge them to this practice as a means of mortifying the earthly nature which comes between them and the perfect apprehension of God; they only shew that man as a rational creature ought to seek the higher happiness rather than the baser gratifications which the world offers to him. This may be, if properly guarded, a very useful substratum for religious teaching and higher training, but it contains within itself no idea of supernatural elevation to be communicated to the soul. The ascetic, on the other hand, seeks not natural comfort, but a higher life with God by the same discipline of the flesh. He seeks to unite himself by suffering, as a sacramental link, to his Saviour's Passion, and to offer himself a living sacrifice to God through Jesus Christ, looking forward to the joy of the resurrection. He accepts the law of the Cross as a practical law of his life, taking holy vengeance upon his sinful nature for those sins which made Christ die, and resting in the love of God to accept and bless the expressions of his penitential love. He does not conceive that he could be more pleasing to God merely by rising in the scale of natural vigour. He realizes that the fallen nature must be subdued through the power of Christ's Passion willingly accepted, and recognises henceforth only one object of joy, finding his entire satisfaction in the love of God. Teetotalism is purely natural, and stops short in nature. Asceticism is the reaching out of the soul after the supernatural, while it realizes, claims, and surely finds the supernatural assistance and reward which God has provided.

There is another class of Teetotalists who differ from the true ascetics for quite another reason. They hold wine to be an unlawful indulgence. That which was harmless as a mere disciplinary system becomes distinctly heretical when thus propounded. Like Vegetarianism, it falls into the errors with which the early Church was familiar, and of which St. Paul spoke when he prophesied of some who would command to abstain from meats which God hath provided to be received with thanksgiving. The ascetics of the early Church never tolerated any such abuse. Their abstinence was, as a means of individual perfection, not enforced by any law of universal obligation. Every creature of God is good, even though it may be desirable for us, either through discipline for the future or penitence for the past, to abstain from partaking of it.

Objections. There will be some to whom Asceticism presents an unnatural aspect, if by it is intended the endurance of privation in matters not essentially sinful. This arises from men losing sight of the Fall. Had we been unfallen creatures, all the gifts of our Father would doubtless have been abundantly at our disposal. There would then have been no excess to grieve over nor to guard against. The evil is not in matter but in man. All God's creatures are good, but it is necessary for man to suffer ere he can be admitted to the higher gifts which are not of this world. God has exposed him to suffering in this world, and has revealed to him a further state of suffering in the next; and man is not acting in a manner unnatural, but entirely consistent with the natural appointment of Providence experienced here, and revealed as existing hereafter, when he voluntarily takes vengeance upon himself, and confesses himself to be unworthy of the good things which God has left within his reach. How truly natural this law of self-abnegation is becomes the more manifest when we find, as we do, that such a law tends more than anything else to rescue man from the poison of sinful impulses with which his fallen nature is tainted. Suffering is a merciful provision, ascetic endurance a wise self-discipline for wearing out those evil tendencies which exist only the more strongly in the fully developed organism of perfect natural health and vigour. So we find St. Paul saying that he kept under, or browbeat, his body, and brought it into subjection, lest that by any means when he had preached to others he himself should be a castaway. If man in natural health were at one with the purpose of his creation, then natural temperance would suffice to his sanctification; but since the natural man in his most perfect condition is sinful, all his faculties by which he clings to this world have to be browbeat—the word is a very strong one—and mortified. 'He that liveth after the flesh will mind the things of the flesh, but he that liveth after the spirit the things of the spirit.

One further objection to asceticism remains to be noticed. It is thought by many to develope spiritual dangers worse than the bodily evil which it strives to quell, and is also supposed to foster self-righteousness in the very struggle of penitence. To this it must be replied that every religious practice is liable to the same perversion, but we are not to reject the good because of possible dangers. In truth there is, as we have seen, an inherent tendency in the life of simple and natural temperance to forget the essential evil of our nature in its present fallen state. When we feel ourselves to be at peace with ourselves because the faculties of our nature are in health and harmony, we fancy ourselves to be at peace with God. For this reason our Lord said that the publicans and harlots had not so great an impediment to their entrance into the Kingdom of God by the greatness of their sin, as the Scribes and Pharisees had by their well-regulated but self-satisfied morality. The ascetic must constantly keep in mind that he is a sinner, and all his bodily privations are meaningless if they are not the expression of a hearty conviction of his own unworthiness. Asceticism without penitence would be the most degrading form of cruelty. This, indeed, it is when it is placed upon the foundation of a false dogma, as in heathen countries, where the ascetic regards himself as a pure spirit struggling with the impurity, not of his own nature, but of the matter in which he is temporarily imprisoned. The Christian ascetic, on the contrary, is carrying out God's work of vengeance upon himself as a sinner, and seeking to be conformed to the likeness of Christ as his Redeemer, while he acknowledges that if his body is to be offered a living sacrifice acceptable unto God, it can only be through the merits of the Body of Christ and His Sacred Passion with which he is united. He seeks not to be quit of his body like the Manichee or the Buddhist, but to rise into freedom from the sin which enthrals him, that his body may be the more capable of a glorious resurrection through its sympathy and participation in the suffering of Jesus. He does, indeed, believe that God will not be unrighteous and forget his works and labour which proceedeth of love, as well in the fulfilment of the first law of charity, which is devotion to God, as in the second law, which is beneficence to our neighbour. He is, therefore, not discouraged by a harsh view of the Divine disregard, but strives to work out his salvation, knowing that it is God who worketh in him both to will and to do of His good pleasure, and the feebleness of his own efforts leads him the more fully to rest upon, while his sufferings teach him to realize, the atoning work of Jesus his Redeemer. Those who have suffered most, whether by Providence or by devotion, will be the fullest in their acknowledgments of the alone sufficiency of the merits of Christ.

Indeed the experience of all ascetics has been, that in this struggle with sin they have been brought, not to an easier life of holiness, but a more difficult contention with Satan. Their temptation is rather to despair than to self-complacency. Many persons fail to recognise the supernatural character of this struggle with Satan; and, indeed, some scarcely realize practically the existence of Satan himself. If we wrestle not with flesh and blood, but with principalities and powers and the rulers of the darkness of this world, it is plain that we must betake ourselves to some supernatural exercises. The soul enters upon its struggles with Satan, especially, in acts of bodily suffering. At such times Satan comes especially to assail. We have the example of our Lord's Temptation in the wilderness, and of the Agony in the Garden. Times of special devotion are times of Satan's special assault, but God gives grace in proportion to the need of His people. Spiritual temptations, therefore, are no reason for declining the conflicts. They have to be expected. They must be endured if we are to be partakers of the higher grace, but then they are also the very means appointed by Almighty God for making the higher gifts of grace secure to us, and the higher exercises of devotion possible. The messenger of Satan is given to the ascetic to buffet him, lest he should be puffed up by any spiritual advancement. He is thus kept mindful of his own continuing weakness and inherent sinfulness in a way more real and terrible than other men know of. When he is weak he becomes strong, always bearing about in his body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be manifest in his mortal body. These spiritual struggles of the ascetic far outweigh any mere bodily mortification which he may practise. Indeed they cause him to rise above the sense of many bodily sufferings by the intenser anguish which his soul endures. But then, too, he knows a consolation and a joy far beyond what can otherwise be known. He does not look upon his life as a gloomy portion of misery beyond others, but he knows himself to have a joy unknown to the world in proportion as he feels himself to be identified with the Cross and Passion of Jesus Christ.

[Body, Natural. Buddhism. Counsels of Perfection. Fasting. Monasticism. Mortification. Nazarite. Theology, Mystical. Vocation.]

ASH WEDNESDAY. [Lent.]

ASPERSION. [Baptism.]

ASSUMPTION. This term has been not unfrequently used for the taking up into bliss of the souls of departed saints, the day of their death being called the day of their assumption. But its more distinctive application in recent times has been to the taking up of the Blessed Virgin, both soul and body, into Heaven.

The idea of the Blessed Virgin's assumption rests on no historical basis, there being no record of any value respecting the circumstances of her death, much less of any that may have followed after her death. Epiphanius says that nothing whatever was known in his time as to the death of St. Mary: but a tradition of the seventh century asserts that all the Apostles were brought together miraculously to witness it, with the exception of St. Thomas, that on his arrival (three days afterwards) her grave was opened that he might see her once more, and that nothing was found there except her grave clothes. It seems sufficient evidence against this tradition having come down from Apostolic times, that there is not the slightest indication in Christian writings for the first six centuries of what would have necessarily attracted the heart of the Church had it been a well-known fact.

It is true that a festival now observed as that of the Assumption by the Roman churches has been dedicated in honour of the Blessed Virgin from primitive times. It was originally held on January 18th, and was changed to its present day, August 15th, in the time of Gregory the Great. But in all early Calendars this is called the "Dormitio," "Κοίμησις," or "Μετάστασις" of the "most holy Mother of God," and "Assumption" is a comparatively recent name for the day. Thus the festival gives no evidence whatever in favour of the belief that the body of the Blessed Virgin has already arisen from the grave, but merely commemorates her holy death, the departure of her soul from the Church on earth.

On the other hand, those who do not feel themselves bound strictly by historical evidence in such a case as this, will find little difficulty in believing that the tradition represents a truth. It is certain that the bodies of some of the holy dead have already risen, for one of the many marvellous circumstances attending our Lord's death was that "the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves after His resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many" [Matt. xxvii. 52]. Thus there is no à priori difficulty in the way of supposing that the body of St. Mary arose from the grave shortly after death: and, indeed, if such a resurrection would have ministered to the glory of her risen and ascended Son (as the resurrection of the other saints apparently did), it seems as probable in her case as in that of others.

Apart from the historical difficulty, it would also seem very fitting that the holy body which was the vehicle of so mighty an event as the Incarnation of God should be preserved from the corruption of the grave; and should be at once received into that blessed place where He who had taken His Manhood of its substance had Himself gone, in that Manhood, to dwell.

From a purely historical point of view, therefore, there is no evidence for the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the traditional evidence for it is not strong; but on à priori grounds there is no valid objection to a belief in it. The exaggeration of such a "pious belief" into a dogmatic article of the faith would be unwarrantable: and much exaggeration and credulity have undoubtedly surrounded the observance of the festival.

ASSURANCE. Out of the word πληροφορία [Col. ii. 2; 1 Thess. i. 5; Heb. vi. 11, x. 22], or rather out of the word as rendered in the A. V., a doctrine has been developed which substantially assigns to truly converted persons a perfect assurance of peace with God—that is, of present pardon and future salvation. This tenet prevails chiefly among the Methodists, and those sections of "the religious world" which take their colour from the teaching of Wesley. As in all other misbeliefs, there is a nucleus of truth in the doctrine of assurance, though its gross exaggeration destroys Christian modesty, and leads to Antinominanism. Most persons who are really serving God faithfully will have some degree of consciousness that they are in God's favour; but when they have done all they will say that they are "unprofitable servants," and that they dare not do more than hope through the mercies of God that they shall be saved. Such a hope, founded on a strong faith, may be scarcely distinguishable in some pious persons of strong feeling from what is called assurance, but the nearer it approaches to an intellectual or dogmatic form, the greater becomes the danger of its lapsing into Antinomianism.

ATHANASIAN CREED. [Creeds.]

ATHEISM. The denial of the existence of God. Ἄθεος ὁ μὴ νομίζων εἶναι Θεόν [Clem. Strom. vii. ch. i.]. In discussing this subject we shall investigate—I. The name; II. The thing; III. Its causes; IV. Its arguments; V. The verdict of the Bible upon it; and VI. The books, tracts, &c., written in favour of and against it.

I. The name has been applied variously and widely: to Mezentius [Virg. Æn. 7] and the Cyclops [Hom. Od. 9] in Beyerlinck's Magnum Theatrum, &c.; by the Athenians to Diagoras of Melos, and thence to all the Melians, whence Melius is applied in the sense of ἄθεος to Socrates [Aristoph. Nubes 831: see Suidas, s.v.]; to Anaxagoras, Aspasia, &c.; to Euemerus of Messena [Lactantius, and Eusebius, Præp. Evan. lib. 2]; to Theodorus and Bion [v. Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 1]; to the Christians by the Pagans [Julian ap. Sozomen, v. 15, cf. Athenag. Apolog. and Clem. Strom. vii. 1, who adds elsewhere, καὶ ὁμολογοῦμεν τῶν τοιούτωι Θεῶν ἄθεοι εἶναι]; to the Pagans by the Christians [Clem. Protrept. p. 11; Beza ad. Ephes. ii. 12]; to the heretics by the orthodox; to Eunomius by St. Jerome [Ep. 38, ad Pammach. Bened.]; to Arius by Athanasius, &c.; to Anastasius the Emperor by Zosimus and Paulus Diaconus; by Catholics to Protestants [Possevinus, Biblioth. viii. 1-10; Claudius de Sainctes, Tract. Pecul.; Chiconius c. Cuvillum; Campanella, Atheismus Triumph.; Mersenne, Comm. in Genes.]; by the Jesuits to the Macchiavellians [see Voet, de Ath. p. 116, Lessius, de Prov. Dedic. p. 1]; by Perkins to Turks, Jews, and Papists [Works, ii. 526]; to Vorst the Calvinist, to Socinians, to Arminians, by their respective opponents [Voet, p. 120]; to the Mahometans [ib. p. 122]; by Calvin to the Pope and Cardinals [Inst. iv. 7, 27]; to Erasmus by the Jesuits; to Charron by Mersenne; to Aristotle by Tycho Brahe; to Descartes, for rejecting Aristotle; to Taurellus by the Heidelberg Divines [A.D. 1610]; to a usurer by Luther, [Voet, l. c. p. 121-7); to the mystical physicians, and the deniers of magic [ib. 125-9]; to Vanini, Fludd, Montaigne, J. Bruno, Cardan, Macchiavelli, Charpentier, Basson, Charron, Campanella, by Mersenne [L'impiété des Deistes, &c.]; to the Socinians in Poland, Geneva, and elsewhere, by the same; to the Sceptics, Epicureans, Cabbalists, Hermetico-Lullistæ, Hermetico-Paracelsistæ, &c. [Voet, p. 131]; to the Enthusiastæ, Spiritualcs, David-Joristæ, &c. [Voet, 118]; to Ranters [Somers, Tracts vi. 24]; to the followers of Rabelais [Voet, l. c.]; by the Spanish theologians to the French, Venetians, &c., who favoured the house of Austria; by the author of the Vindiciæ Gallicæ to the Spanish theologians [Voet, p. 116]; to the French Deists by Voet, H. Stephanus, and Mersenne [Voet, p. 117; Mersenne, Questions rares et curieuses Théologiques, 112-46, 1630]; to the Japanese, Chinese, Indians, Tartars, the ancient Prussians, the Chicimeci of New Spain and other American peoples, the Souldani of South Africa, the tribes of the middle of Africa, and other barbarians, &c. [Hoffmann, Lex. Univ. s. v., Lessius, de Prov., &c.]; and lastly, by Maréchal to almost every eminent person who has ever lived [Dict. des Athées, passim.].

II. The thing is the denial, by words, in theory, or in practice, of the existence of a spiritual cause of the universe, whether that cause be conceived as one or many; and as a consequence of this, the supposition that visible Nature is the ultimate fact with which the human mind has to deal. Historically we may distinguish two kinds of Atheism—Atheism as a prevailing sentiment, which is the result of moral, political, and other causes, and Atheism as a philosophical theory, which is the conclusion of a reasoned statement from certain premises. Speaking roughly, the Atheism previous to the middle of the eighteenth century was mainly of the former type; that prevailing since that time of the latter. The first, as Bacon, writing at the end of the sixteenth century, said, "is rather on the lip than the heart of man," which is shewn by "nothing more than this, that Atheists will ever be talking of that their opinion, as if they fainted in it within themselves, and would be glad to be strengthened by the consent of others; nay more, you shall have Atheists strive to get disciples, as it fareth with other sects; and, which is most of all, you shall have of them that will suffer for Atheism and not recant; whereas if they did truly think that there were no such thing as God, why should they trouble themselves?" [Essays, xvi.] It was, in fact, a fashion of feeling, speaking, and, unfortunately too, of living—a state of anarchy in the breast of the individual which was the natural reflex of the anarchy—religious, moral, ecclesiastical, political, intellectual—in society at large. The contemporary writers in defence of the Being of God (of whom, especially towards the latter end of the seventeenth century, there was a prodigious number) appear therefore to have made a mistake in meeting the Atheism of their time by the direct assault of counter-argument. For, although Atheism pervaded society, it did not appear in books. Until the year 1750, when the great French Encyclopédie was published, there is scarcely an Atheistic book or tract to be found [see Buckle's Civilization, i. cap. 14]. It became necessary, therefore, both to imagine the individual antagonist, invent the arguments that he would be likely to use, and then refute them. Thus the shots went safely over the heads of the enemy; no one was convinced; and as the same man played both his own and his adversary's hand, there was no winner. The real and only "refutation" was that which history has slowly brought about in the settlement of society and of opinion, the amelioration of the general estate of man, and the consequent elevation of European morals. The Atheism of this period was, in short, not so much an argument to be rebutted as a disease to be cured. "We must not think," says Perkins, "that this wicked thought is onely in some notorious and hainous sinners, but it is the corrupt mind and imagination of every man that cometh of Adam naturally, not one excepted save Christ alone" [Man's Naturall Imagination, Works, ii. 525]. The natural man, as such, has no knowledge of God; and in a period of protracted social disturbance, when the spiritual support of established opinions and institutions gives way, all but the noblest and strongest have a tendency to relapse more or less into a state of nature. It is of this kind of Atheism that Milton speaks—

> "Unless there be who think not God at all;
> If any be, they walk obscure;
> For of such doctrine never was there school
> But the heart of the fool,
> And no man therein doctor but himself."
>
> Sams. Agon. 295.

III. The Causes of Atheism in the seventeenth and first half of the eighteenth centuries, according to the more or less unanimous verdict of contemporary writers, were:—

[a] A widespread libertinism of life. The Atheist, says Bishop Fotherby, becomes "a bad servant unto all his vices, but more especially unto his ambition and his belly" [Atheomastix, book i. c. 19; and to the same effect Merle Casaubon, Glanvil, "Dorotheus Sicurus," Reimmann, Spizelius, Grapius, Meier, Rajesanyi, Jenkin Thomasius, Bishop Dawes, Lessius, Mersenne, Voetius, and others], which Bacon thus explains: "They that deny a god destroy a man's nobility; for certainly man is of kin to the beast by his body" [loc. cit.]. It seems, however, to have been rather the cause of Atheism than its effect: for the Atheism of the later French school, of which the following passage may be taken as characteristic, seems to have been in great measure free from it:—

> "Des coupables plaisirs sectateurs insensés
> Des folles passions esclaves abusés,
> Gardez-vous de penser que ma muse novice
> Daigne vous élargir la carrière de la vice;
> Je n'écrie pas pour vous: ma morale à vos yeux
> O mortels abrutis, paraîtrait exaltée;
> Pour votre châtiment je vous laisse à vos Dieux > L'homme vertueux seul a le droit d'être Athée."
>
> Maréchal.

Connected with libertine Atheism was also the profane and sceptical witticism, which is included by writers of the time under the word "drollery" [cf. Glanvil's Whip for the Droll, Fidler to the Atheist], and which gave rise to the terms "Lucianicus," "Rablæsianus" (follower of Rabelais), as synonymes of Atheist [Voet]; the pride, security, and luxury of life [Bacon, Dor. Sicurus]; the weakening of the family tie, and neglect of parents [Jenk. Thomasius], and unnatural conduct [cf. Massinger's Maid of Honour, Act iii. sc. 3, where the king who refuses to ransom his natural brother is said—

> "To break
> The adamant chains of nature and religion,
> To bind up atheism, as a defence
> To his dark counsels?"]

The term "Epicurean," which occurs in the general sense of a bad man, has several shades of meaning in connection with Atheism. In a squib against the proclamation of liberty of conscience by James II., the imaginary signers call themselves "the Atheists or the sect of the Epicureans" [v. infr.], and go on to speak of "all religion as a cheat." But the name seems originally to indicate, along with "Stoic," "Peripatetic," "Atomist," merely a student or adherent of the later schools of Greek Philosophy, thence an opponent of the Scholastic Aristotelianism, and not unfrequently of the religious belief which it had been used to defend [so Voet]. The licentious and pagan ideal of life which came in with the Revival of Letters, found a theory ready made for itself in the philosophy of Epicurus, and hence the term "Epicurean" became synonymous with a man of pleasure, who was prepared to defend his practice, and hence with the libertine Atheist: τέλος ἐστὶ τοῦ μὴ νομίζειν θεοὺς τὸ μὴ φοβεῖσθαι.

It was against this tendency to shelter libertine Atheism under the name of Epicurus, that Gassendi wrote his great work in three folio volumes [A.D. 1649], to shew first, that Epicurus was not an Atheist, and secondly, not an evil-liver. The book was thus written, not so much in the interests of Atheism, as of Deism; but, by promoting Deism, it indirectly promoted Atheism, and, by rendering the pursuit of pleasure respectable, it indirectly fostered its licentious indulgence. For the inference is easy from the Deist's denial that God has any care for man to the Atheist's denial that man need have any care for God, or for the moral life,—

"Je n'ai pas plus besoin de Dieu que lui de moi."

Thus, as before, the root of Atheistic sentiment is the want of a proper conception of the dignity and spiritual aim of human life.

[b] Enthusiasm, i.e. the religion of excited emotion, is an opposite but co-ordinate effect of a disordered state of society and opinion with libertinism, and, like it, closely connected with Atheism. Voet does not scruple to speak of the "Enthusiastæ," "Spirituales," "Phantastico-Contemplativi, et Sublimantes" of his time as Atheists or tending to Atheism. And for this Henry More gives as a reason that this "temper disposes a man to listen to the magisterial dictates of an overbearing fancy rather than to the calm and cautious insinuations of free reason." By this he apparently means that in his feelings man is purely passive and "overborn," whereas in his reason he is "free," i.e. active [AFFECTIONS]. The Enthusiast's belief in God depends upon physical causes, and "by change of diet, feculent old age, or some present damps of melancholy," may disappear. The Enthusiast thus plays into the hands of the Atheist, even if he do not himself ultimately become one; and while, on the one hand, the pretence of the latter to wit and natural reason makes the former secure that reason is no guide to God, the latter, on the other hand, concludes religion to be merely fancy and "a troublesome fit of over-curious melancholy." [Comments on Glanvil's Whip for the Droll, &c. p. 27, foll.; see also More's Enthusiasmus Triumphatus.]

[c] The state of Theology and the religious world is another cause of Atheism insisted on by the seventeenth century writers. Thus Reimmann complains of clerical scandals; Casaubon of the use of fallacies in support of religious truth (e.g. Achilles and the tortoise); "Dorotheus Sicurus" of the disuse of reasons and learning in religious controversy, and of the quarrels about ceremonies; Voet of the "new method of the Jesuits Arnald and Verron, who, by throwing discredit upon the validity of the natural reason in Divine things, aid the growth of scepticism, so that "non ab hereticis . . . sed a Papistis arma Atheis certatim suppeditari" [De Ath. p. 119; De Ratione Humana in reb. fidei]. With this we may compare the dictum of the Père Mersenne, the friend of Descartes, that none of the proofs of the Being of God are satisfactory to the reason [Letter to Florianus Crusius]. On the other hand, Voet admits with the Romanist theologians that the spirit of private judgment, and the change from one sect to another, was productive of Atheism [De Atheismo; cf. Cornelius a Lapide, ad Ep. Jud. 11, ad 2 Tim. iii. 9: "Lutheranismum et Calvinismum . . . in Atheismum abire;" Glanvil, A Whip, &c., p. 22, and More in his Notes; so also Dor. Sicurus speaks of the factions and divisions of religion, the fierce disputes, wars, and devastations of the Reformation period, the difficulty of choosing the true religion, and weariness and dissatisfaction of changing]. Voet further mentions the reaction against the excessive ceremonial of the Mediæval Church as leading to the abandonment of all outward expression of the religious life, and generally of the "præsentium et antiquorum fastidium," as alike leading many to Atheism. To which Spizelius adds general religious confusion, simulation, and (the result of all) what he calls "Gallio-ism," the neglect of and aversion from theological questions.

[d] The secularization of politics and growth of the utilitarian view of religion as an instrument of police in the hands of the magistrate. It is this notion, as calculated to throw discredit upon all kinds of religion, and therefore as tending not only to antichristian, but to antitheistic habits of thought, against which the defensive writers are contending when they condemn the "Politici" (= the followers of Macchiavelli and Hobbes), who are neutral, "ad cujusque religionis susceptionem . . . modo aiunt, modo negant." [So Lessius and Voet, the last of whom remarks pertinently, "Omnis religio nulla religio."]

[e] The decline of belief in Magic was closely connected with the growth of Atheistic sentiment [Glanvil, A Whip, &c.]. It is curious that, whilst the belief in occult science tended in the mystical physicists (Cardan, Vanini, &c.) to a kind of semi-Atheism by deifying matter, its decay, due partly to the revolution against the ecclesiastical miracles of the Middle Ages, but mainly to the growth of experimental science and the explanation of many phenomena hitherto deemed supernatural, should promote Atheism by leading to a suspicion that the whole region of the supernatural was capable of being explained away. The fact is, that Magic was regarded as a kind of outwork of religion, which it was necessary to defend, lest the citadel should be attacked. "One reason why God permits sorcery," says Meric Casaubon, "certainly is that men, generally so inclinable to Atheism, might certainly know, if not wilfully blind, that there is something besides flesh and blood, and what may be seen with the bodily eyes, i.e. ordinary nature, to be thought upon." "It is certainly a point of excellent use to convince incredulity," and "hence it is that they that deny or will not believe any supernatural operations by witches and magicians are generally observed to be Atheists, or well affected that way," or, at least, "it cannot be denied but that the opinion is very apt to promote Atheism, and therefore earnestly promoted and countenanced by them that are Atheists." For we may reason, he adds, with Origen, that a man who believes magic will probably believe miracles, by a kind of à fortiori argument from the power of the devil to that of God. [Credulity and Incredulity, &c., p. 91, and the Sequel, p. 171.] Similarly, Mersenne writes in defence at once of theology and alchymy, and Voet enumerates the existence of the "novi Saducæi," who refer magical operations and apparitions to natural causes, amongst the causes of Atheism. [v. Glanvil, Sadducismus Triumphatus.]

[f] The growth of Experimental Science and of Mathematics, though not in itself adverse to religious belief, operated for some time prejudicially to religion, and is set down by many as a cause of Atheism. To take the last first: the study of mathematical methods led men to try to apply them to all things in heaven and earth. They appeared to form a standard of certainty, which might serve to divide the true from the false in common belief. Hence the attempt and failure to prove the existence of God by mathematical methods threw a haze of suspicion over the doctrine. Accordingly, we find Casaubon complaining that divinity should be tried by mathematics, and made subservient to them, and Mersenne giving up the Theistic argument as hopeless. It seems to have occurred to nobody that possibly mathematical demonstration, and not the Theistic argument, was at fault, and that the latter might really have an equal without having a similar kind of certainty.

It was a misfortune that the rise of experimental science should have been connected with a revival of the old Atomism of Leucippus and Democritus, and its moral accompaniment, Epicureanism: ἀθείαν ἀτόμους καὶ ἀφιλόσοφον ἡδονήν. It is against Atomism rather than against any conclusions of natural science, as such, that the great argument of Cudworth is directed. [Intellectual System, pref. p. 41.] So Casaubon, Rajcsanyi, J. Thomasius, Voet, Bacon. Apart from this, however, as tending to draw away attention from metaphysics, or to impart an unphilosophical character to them, and as calculated to concentrate study upon secondary and material causes, experimental science was "very apt to be abused or to degenerate into Atheism." "This is a great precipice," writes Casaubon, "and the contempt of all other learning an ill presage," adding that metaphysics, "this secondary kind of theology," is much out of request. The idea of the constancy of natural law which was beginning to dawn upon the world seemed to many, if admitted, a fatal blow to religious belief, as in the existing state of speculation, the operation of Divine Providence by way of suspension and interruption seemed to be a clearer proof of the existence of Deity than the placid and orderly fulfilment of the Infinite Will through the operation of general laws.

[g] The gradual increase of a sceptical spirit in all things seems partly attributable to the resuscitation of ancient Pyrrhonism, partly to the Cartesian theory of doubt as the first step in thought. On this subject see Buckle, Hist. of Civilization, I. cap. viii.

IV. The Arguments of Atheism. As has been said, after the middle of the eighteenth century, Atheism becomes less a morbid habit of character and feeling pervading social life, and becomes much more distinctly a theory, and while gradually ceasing to be essentially libertine, it becomes distinctively literary. We shall endeavour to set before the reader three principal types of the Atheistic argument which have appeared at intervals of half a century since 1750.

[a] D'Holbach's Système de la Nature. Starting from the assumption that nothing exists but matter, and the motion which is essentially inseparable from it, the theory goes on: There is no design or order in Nature but only necessity; the cause of motion is the tendency of things to self-preservation, and at the same time to attract and repel other things. These three conditions of motion are called in Physics, Inertia, Attraction, and Repulsion, and in Morals, Self-love, Love, and Hate. Both Physics and Morals are the same, the only difference being that whilst in some cases the motion of molecules is on a sufficiently large scale to be visible, in others it is not. It is from drawing a qualitative instead of merely a quantitative distinction between the motion of the brain molecules and the other motions of the body or of the world, that man has come to regard himself as an union of two substances of different kinds, one of which, the soul, shews its unreal character, by its only being capable of description by negative predicates. The soul is really only a name for a part of the body, the brain, the molecules of which are set in motion by impact of external things, the result being what we call thought and will: the motion itself being called sensation in the one case, and passion in the other. Moral action is thus wholly a product of the passions, and these of the mixture of fluid and solid elements in the constitution. It followed naturally from this conception of himself as a compound of two substances, that man should extend the same view to the universe of which he is a part. This is the origin of the idea of God as distinguished from the world, an idea which explains nothing, consoles no one, terrifies all, and the unreality of which, as of the soul, is shewn by its being a bundle of negative attributes. Theology is a mass of contradictions, banishing God to the utmost distance from man by virtue of His metaphysical attributes, and on the other hand drawing Him into the closest relations with man by virtue of His moral. True knowledge, the privilege of the few, substitutes force for Deity, and natural laws for His attributes and providence. At the same time it must not be supposed that the idea of God is a pardonable error, or one useful or necessary for the government of the rude and uncultivated. It is hurtful, and its use for any purpose is as unjustifiable as to administer poison to prevent a man from misusing his bodily powers. This noxious character arises from two illusions which it draws with it; freedom and a future life. The doctrine of freedom is merely an artifice to reconcile the conception of God as a moral Being with the existence of evil, and involves the absurdity that if a man can really introduce a new factor into the world, the world is in fact a new world, and the free-agent a creator as almighty as God. The doctrine of the other world is pernicious, because it draws men away from attention to their vocation in this. Materialism, on the other hand, is at once logical and beneficent. It frees man from his fear of God, and from the pain of remorse and longing for what is unattainable; both of which vanish before the knowledge that all action is necessitated, and that it is the part of man to live happily in the present and not sacrifice his enjoyment to a chimera.

Such in substance is the doctrine of this remarkable book; a doctrine perfectly logical and commanding assent at every point from any fair mind—if the premises be admitted. But if the keystone be taken out the whole arch falls to pieces. That keystone is the unproved assumption that matter is an ultimate fact, and capable of being known as such. [MATERIALISM.]

[b] Maréchal, Dictionnaire des Athées [A.D. 1800] represents in many respects the opposite pole of Atheistic thought to the Système de la Nature. Like the latter it is a consistent theory of life; but unlike it, it is wholly unargumentative and dogmatic. There seems no reason why Maréchal should have been an Atheist except that he was so. The instructive part of his work consists of a preface to a Dictionary enumerating the different eminent persons who have been wholly or in part Atheists. The Catalogue is framed on the loosest and most arbitrary principles, and includes along with Charron and Montaigne, St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom, St Gregory, Pascal, Grotius, Fénélon, Bossuet, and our Lord Himself. The preface lays down the following ideas:—"Dieu n'a pas toujours été." He was unknown to the child of nature, who in the age of gold recognised no higher being than the father of the family which constituted the entire sphere of his activity [p. 1]. And the modern Atheist is one who, disengaging himself from social bonds which were contracted without his knowledge or consent, "remonte à travers la civilisation à cet ancien état de l'espèce humaine" [p. 3]. He is not the Sybarite who gives himself out as an Epicurean when he is only a debauchee, nor a follower of Macchiavelli, nor a renegade priest turned savant, nor the fanatical iconoclast who preaches the cultus of reason to the populace who cannot rise above instinct. Neither is he the hypocrite, nor the man of the world and follower of Atheistical fashion, nor the timorous philosopher who blushes at his own thoughts, nor the physician who denies God in order to have the gratification of constructing the world himself, nor, in fine, he who feels no want of God because he can be wise without one. He is no elaborate reasoner against Theism, but simply says, "the question as to whether there is a God in heaven interests me as little as the inquiry whether there are animals in the moon" [p. 4]. A modest and tranquil recluse, he dislikes to make a noise, or to parade his principles; he practises virtue in order to be at ease with himself. Jealous of his honour and too proud to obey even a God, he takes no commands but from his own conscience [p. 38]. He does his duty as a citizen, though declining to enter into politics, but with an activity like that of nature, of which he feels himself an indispensable part, he co-ordinates himself with nature in performing those duties which are imposed upon him by his relation with other beings [p. 10]. "His life is full like that of Nature," and in the quiet uprightness of family life he perceives the nothingness of social distinctions, of the gross pleasures of the herd, while he dismisses the abject terrors of the believer in God [pp. 11-13]. Atheism is thus the most natural and simple thing in the world, and "le plus parfait désinteressement est la base de toutes les determinations de l'Athée."

In this view of Atheism, the following characteristics are remarkable: [a] that it is the picture of an ideal character and not the exposition of a theory; [b] it takes for granted that a discussion upon the subject has gone before, and a conclusion in favour of Atheism has been arrived at, about which argument has ceased; its object is therefore not so much to convince the understanding about the doctrine, as to enlist the sympathies on the side of the ideal practiser of it; [c] that this ideal consciously excludes any approach to the old libertine Atheism; and [d] is intimately connected with the retirement from social relations and duties into the seclusion of family life. In this last point it touches Rousseau on the one hand, and, while giving up all the more offensive and unphilosophical traits of Epicurism, touches Epicurus on the other. And it is only on this last subsidiary point that the theory of Maréchal admits of a refutation. A mere assertion, unsupported by evidence or argument, unless in itself ostensibly probable, can only appropriately be met by an equally naked denial; but an ideal of life which involves the negation of all the wider social economy of man, especially when such a view is not the vagary of the individual but the characteristic of many of the highest minds of the age, is a fair subject of criticism.

In the first place, such an ideal as a life for all is a self-contradiction; for if we suppose society disintegrated into an infinite series of separate families, it is obvious that to continue in this patriarchal isolation it will be necessary for the families to unite in some system of common agreement and protection, as a substitute for that shelter which they have hitherto enjoyed in the state. And such a system is simply the state over again under another name. If, on the other hand, such a life is for the few and not for all, it ceases to be a human ideal, and becomes merely a counsel of perfection for the few, practised at the expense of the many. Secondly, we may argue that, even supposing it possible for modern people to return into the primitive condition of family life, such life must as inevitably develop into the state (unless the nature of man itself could be essentially changed) as it has necessarily developed into the state in the past. Hence, even supposing such an ideal attainable by all, it could never, under existing conditions, be a permanent form of life. But thirdly, a little attention to the subject will discover that society and the state, besides being a mere shelter from violence, sums up in itself all those laws and institutions which have arisen out of the relations of men one to another, and which therefore form a permanent embodiment of the activity of man on the unselfish or spiritual side of his nature. For a man to recede from the state is, therefore, for him to attempt the attainment of a higher life by receding from his nobler or social into his individual and ignoble self. And this point it is important to mark, because it at once reveals the origin and weakness of the Atheistic theory which is so closely connected with it. Whether Nature reveals upon the whole a predominance of good over evil or the reverse may be a matter of question, and therefore its testimony to a beneficent Creator may be matter of question also; but it cannot be denied that society and the state is a standing evidence to the triumph of good in the world. If Nature then, in one of her aspects at least, reveals a Deity, society as a spiritual creation reveals Him much more, and the Atheist of the Maréchal type is open to the same confutation as the libertine, though from a different point of view, viz., that his inability to discern the existence of God arises from his taking too low a view of man. He fails to see the Divine Image in the conscience, because he turns his back upon that social order through which (in the first instance) that image is reflected upon it. Here, then, we have as before rather to account for Atheism by revealing its cause, than to answer its arguments. That cause was the utter rottenness of existing political arrangements before the outbreak of the French Revolution, producing aversion from society altogether. It would follow that here, as before, the best refutation of Atheism is a sound state of the body politic.

[c.] Radenhausen's Isis is important as a type of the more refined Atheism of the present generation. In a dialogue between a modern Atheistic savant and his father, the following ideas are developed:—"The Atheist and Theist have the same facts of consciousness, feelings, &c. to interpret, which the one calls the knowledge of a Divine Being, whilst the other calls them by another name. They thus differ, as Copernicus and Tycho Brahe differed—merely in their mode of formulating the same phenomena" [p. 410]. The belief in God originated in the course of thousands of years, from the observation of nature, and is the result of primitive science. The idea, once formed, was withdrawn by the priests from progress, and therefore has crystallized. These ideas about the universe as a whole, and man's relation to it, are necessary products of the human mind, and therefore imperishable. The form which these ideas assume is that of a series of projections by man of the image of himself, differing from one another as one nation from another. The common elements in these various beliefs, arise—[1] from the general similarity of the outer world as it is known to man, and [2] from the general similarity of men in their capacities and defects; the first as subjecting man to a series of influences, partly favourable, partly unfavourable, which are stronger than he; the second, as possessed of limited powers of sensation, and as having a memory and understanding capable of development. On the other hand, these influences on man differ in different regions, and these capacities are differently developed in different individuals [pp. 422-3]. These differences give rise to local differences in the names and outward expression given to such natural influences, and to a gradual development in the corresponding ideas. The Fetish worshipper, the idolater, the Atheist and the Theist have thus all precisely the same material for thought; viz. the presence of forces and influences in the outward world, in the face of which man feels himself weak or powerless. The Fetish worshipper elevates everything unwonted or inexplicable into a personal agency and worships it. The idolater conceives the operation of these influences—the sirocco, the inundation, the clouds, the thunderstorm, the blazing woods, the sand-storm, &c. under visible forms. Hence among the Egyptians, the Semitic and Aryan races, the images of the gods bear, in their original shape, a strong resemblance to these powers in nature, but shew a tendency to become gradually humanized, until in Greece they attain the perfection of the human form. The fusion of nations and religions then eliminates in the course of ages the local character of these impersonations, or rather produces gradually the mental image of one Supreme Power, whom the Theist worships, and to whom the local deities are subordinate. Thus the thirty-three gods of the Vedic hymns become the limbs of Brama, and the devils and inferior spirits of the Parsees: so, "who is there among the gods or among the clouds that can be compared to Jehovah," and "Thou are exalted above all gods:" so also in Christian countries the saints are merely the ancient local deities of Europe under new names [p. 424]. The character of this supreme personification was determined by the climate and natural conditions of the different localities: in torrid regions, characterized by extreme fruitfulness on the one hand, and wholesale or violent destruction of life on the other, the attributes of the one Deity are great goodness coupled with savage vengeance: in temperate climates, where the alternations are not so violent, and the conditions of life more regular, the divine attributes are conceived as moderation, justice, certainty in rewarding and punishing, &c. The Atheist, then, has the same materials for thought as these three kinds of believers in the existence of God; he is far from holding man to be almighty, or from ignoring that the order of nature is on such a scale that, compared with human motives and limitations, it may rightly be designated omnipotent, infinitely good, wise, omnipresent, &c.; he recognises also that some one pervading force lies at the root of all these powers which bear upon man. What he denies is that these powers, whether one or many, are anything distinct from nature [p. 426].

The remainder of the dialogue is taken up with criticisms of the Ontological, Cosmological, and Physico-theological (Design argument) proofs of the Being of God, for a consideration of which we must refer the reader to the article on THEISM.

On the argument, generally, it may be remarked [i.] that it is not so much a positive theory of Atheism, such as we have had in D'Holbach and Maréchal, as an attempt to explain away Theism: [ii.] that it can scarcely be said that we know enough at present of the growth of mythology and language, or of the genesis of ideas in the mind of primitive man, to enable any sound and duly cautious reasoner to arrive at the conclusion that the idea of God arose in the way described: [iii.] that even granting that it arose from a personification of the powers of nature, the irresistible tendency in man to suppose a being or beings, spiritual like himself, as the creating and sustaining cause of the world, is left unexplained, and is quite capable of being explained as itself an evidence of the existence of a Supreme Spirit, to whom the finite spirit experiences the attraction of affinity. [iv.] Lastly, the argument is only valid against Deism, i.e. against the belief in a Supreme Abstraction remote from a world in which He has never revealed Himself; but proves nothing against the Christian doctrine of a God who has revealed Himself in nature and to the human mind, and who is reconciling the world to Himself.

Besides these three types of dogmatic Atheism, we may mention, as influencing the modern mind, the theory of Auguste Comte, and a host of books on natural science (too numerous to mention, but of which Dr. Büchner's little work on Force and Matter may be taken as a type), which insinuate or profess Atheistic tenets.

As to the first type, which does not so much deny the Being of God, as decline the controversy, whether there be or be not such a Being, as inaccessible to the human mind, we may remark that this is an opinion shared by many Theists, as we have seen in the case of the Père Mersenne, some of the Jesuit writers, &c. [POSITIVISM.]

As to the second, it is important to observe that experimental science, as such, and without trespassing into the region of metaphysics, has not power logically to deny the existence of God; for it confessedly deals solely with physical phenomena and their laws, i.e. generalizations from them; and it is not pretended by any Theist that God is either a phenomenon or the law of phenomena. Science, therefore, can only say with the astronomer, "I have swept the heavens with my telescope again and again, and can discover no God;" it cannot decide whether or not there are other means of arriving at the knowledge of Him. When it attempts to do this, and speaks of matter and force, it has gone beyond the region of phenomena, with which alone it has to deal, into the sphere of metaphysics, and must stand or fall, not as experimental but as philosophical. Its denial of the possibility of metaphysics on the ground that nothing exists but force and matter, is therefore a contradiction in terms; and, as a matter of fact, the ground upon which such a denial is made in scientific treatises will almost always be found to be some modification of the theory of D'Holbach.[1] Theology, it cannot be too often repeated, has nothing to fear from the progress of the natural sciences, but everything to fear from the prevalence of bad metaphysics.

V. The passages in Holy Scripture bearing on Atheism contemplate two classes of persons who deny the existence of God: the "wicked" and the "fool." The "wicked" [Hebr. rasha, deriv. from root = to be tumultuous, to make a noise] is he who [Job xxi. 14] says unto God, "Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways. What is the Almighty that we should serve Him, or what profit should we have if we pray unto Him?" The same word is applied [Gen. xviii. 23] to the Sodomites; [Job ix. 24] to the violent wrong-doer "who covereth the faces of the judges;" [ib. xv. 20] to the "oppressor" [cf. A. V. margin, and chap. xx. passim]; [Ps. vii. 9] to Cush the Benjamite, the persecutor of David; [ib. xi. 6] to "him that loveth violence;" and [Isa. xiv. 5, &c.] to the Gentiles as the oppressors of Israel. In a word, the "wicked" man is, like Plato's tyrant, the wrong-doer on a sufficiently large scale, to override the laws and escape punishment.

The "fool," on the other hand [Hebr. Nabal], who [Ps. xiv. 1, and liii. 1] "hath said in his heart that there is no God," is corrupt and filthy, eats up the people like bread, shames the counsel of the poor, &c., does not call upon God, and who, as one of the workers of iniquity, has no knowledge. The word occurs once [Prov. xvii. 1] in the sense of "stupid," but [in Prov. vii. 22] he "goeth to the correction of the stocks," i.e. comes under the hands of the law. In Jer. xvii. 11, he "getteth riches, but not by right." More often it = "impious, wicked, abandoned:" thus Nabal "the churl" [1 Sam. xxv., esp. ver. 25] is "such a son of Belial, that a man cannot speak to him." So [2 Sam. iii. 33], "Died Abner as a fool dieth? Thy hands were not bound, nor thy feet put into fetters." In Job ii. 10 the word is applied to Job's wife for urging him to "curse God and die."

This induction seems to shew that the "fool" is like the "wicked" in being impure and unjust: he differs from him in being a petty wrong-doer, whose proper place is the stocks. [Compare Ps. xxxvi. 2, &c.]

From such passages no distinct verdict can be extracted as to the theoretical Atheist, if his speculative Atheism is dissociated from practical immorality. Nothing of course can be found in his favour: as the only denier of God there contemplated is the practical Atheist, whether great

[1] The ultimate refutation of these various forms of Atheism consists in the scientific proof of the positive doctrine of THEISM, which will be found under that word. To this head, also, the negative criticism of the Atheistic arguments strictly belongs; but as these arguments have been stated in their strongest form in the present article, it has been thought desirable to anticipate a portion of the refutation, and to indicate in each case the weak point in the Atheistic argument, which the reader may work out more at large for himself.

or small, whose character is the opposite of "just;" that is, the opposite of the man who is fair, law-loving, benign, liberal, temperate, truthful, wise, and generally blameless. [v. Gesenius, s. v. Çadik.]

VI. Literature of Atheism. It may be useful for purposes of further study of this subject to present in one view the different books, pamphlets, &c., which have appeared during the last three centuries. The list does not pretend to be more than an instalment of the great number of treatises for and against this doctrine.

[a] The sixteenth century. 1536, Calvin, Instit. iv. 7, 27, speaks of the prevalence of secret Atheism in the Roman court, mentioning especially Popes Julius II., Leo X., Clement VII., and Paul III. Not long after this we have the story of Cardinal Perron demonstrating the existence of God before the Emperor Henry III., and then offering to disprove it on the morrow. For this he was very properly ordered out of the room [Voetius, Diss. de Atheismo, p. 118]. Towards the end of the century appeared the Abbé Charron's book, De la Sagesse, which led to his being regarded as an Atheist by the Jesuits [v. De la Sagesse, i. 4, 366; see also Buckle, Hist. of Civilization, vol. i. 475, follg.; Reimmann, Hist. Atheismi, s. v.]. 1595, Arcana Atheismi revelata, by Cuper [Rotterd.]. This was an examination of the system of Spinoza, which was erroneously supposed by many to be, or to lead to, Atheism. Cuper, in spite of his criticisms of Spinoza, is supposed by More to have been a covert Atheist [see Hoffmann, Lexicon Universale, Leyden, 1698, s. v. Atheus, who classes also Boulainvilliers among the Crypto-Atheists]. 1597, appeared Bacon's essay on Atheism [Essays, xvi.], and, 1599, Atheomastige, by Guil. de Assonville [Antwerp].

[b] First half of the seventeenth century. 1605, A Confutation of Atheisme, by John Dove, D.D. [Lond.]. 1608, Man's Naturall Imagination, by Perkins, Wks. ii. 446, 525; Engl. wks. iii. 175. 1615, Amphitheatrum æternæ providentiæ divino-magicum, christiano-physicum, nec non et astrologo-catholicum adv. vett. philosophos, atheos, epicureos, peripateticos et stoicos, by Gisbert Voet [Lyon]. 1617, De Providentia Numinis et animi immortalitate, libb. ii. adv. Atheos et Politicos, by Lessius, S. J. [Antw.]. 1616, Vanini de Admirandis naturæ reginæ deæque mortalium arcanis, otherwise called The Dialogues of Nature [Paris]. 1619, Vanini is said to have confessed at the stake that thirty Atheists had set out from Naples to propagate their views in all parts of Europe. Mersenne, too, writing shortly afterwards, speaks of fifty thousand Atheists in Paris alone, and of the circulation of a number of books, partly MS., partly printed, which he does not name, but which insinuated Atheistic opinions. 1622, Atheomastix, a valuable posthumous fragment by Martin Fotherby, Bishop of Salisbury. 1624, L'impiété des Deistes, des Athées, et des Libertins; and 1625, La verité des Sciences contre les Sceptiques [Paris], both by the Père Mersenne. In the latter [p. 15], he says he does not think any of the proofs of the Being of God satisfactory to the reason. 1631, Atheismus Triumphatus seu reductio ad religionem per scientiam veritatis [Rome], by Campanella, was accused of covert Atheism. 1639, Disputatio de Atheismo, by Gisbert Voet [Disput. Select. pt. i. pp. 114-226], one of the most learned and exhaustive treatises on the subject. 1643, L'Atheisme Convaincu [Saumur], by Cappel, who says [p. 2], "Il se voit plus d'Athées et de prophanes qu'il ne semble y en avoir jamais eu, même entre les payens, ce qui paroit par le desbordement estrange et la corruption horrible des mœurs qui se voit aujourd'huy si commune mesmes entre les Chretiens."

[c] Latter half of the seventeenth century. Gassendi, Animadversiones in Diog. Laert. lib. x. qui est de vita, moribus, placitisque Epicuri, 3 vols. fol. 1649. This book, which is a rehabilitation of Epicurus, as one "who did not fear God and yet lived well," is said to have "made many Atheists," so much so that had Gassendi "had the advice of all the Atheists that ever were, had he advised with Hell itself, he could not have lighted upon a more destructive way to all religion" [Meric Casaubon, Credulity and Incredulity in things Natural, Civil, and Divine, Lond. 1668, p. 224, and Additions]. The book, though confessedly written only "exercitationis gratia," was received "with so ready assent and applause" by "so many professing Christians" as to be "an argument to" Casaubon, "with many others of the inclination of the age" [ib. 226].

Gisb. Voet, Apparatus ad controversiam adv. Atheos. Exerc. et Biblioth. stud. Theol., Ultraj. 1651; Spizelius, Scrutinium Atheismi historico-ætiologicum, Aug. Vindel. 1663, and Ep. ad Meibomium de Atheismi radice, ib. 1666; Moore, Divine Dialogues, London, 1668; "The Humble Address of the Atheists or Sect of the Epicureans" to James II., a satire said to be "presented by Judge Baldock, and graciously received," Nov. 5, 1688 [Bodl. Pamphl. 179]; Meric Casaubon, Op. supr. cit. 1668; Reiserus, de Origine progressu et incremento Antitheismi, Aug. Vindel, 1669; Malpighius (anatomist), The Microscope's Evidence to the existence of an intelligent Author of Nature, 1669; Howes' Assize Sermon at Northampton, against Atheists, Independents, Presbyterians, and Anabaptists, 1669; Sir Charles Wolseley, The Unreasonableness of Atheism, 1669 Recantation of Daniel Scargill, B.A., Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, who confesses before the Vice-Chancellor "that he (formerly) gloried to be an Hobbist and an Atheist, . . . agreeably to which principles and positions I have lived in great licentiousness, swearing rashly, drinking intemperately, boasting myself insolently, corrupting others by my pernicious principles and example," July 25, 1669 [Somers, Tracts, vol. vii. 370]; Glanvil, Λόγου θρήσκεια, 1670; also On the Tendencies of the Philosophy of the Royal Society, 1671; Jo. Müller (prof. at Wittenberg, and Lutheran writer against Jansenism), Atheismus devictus, Hamb. 4to, 1672; Glanvil, Sin of Scoffing, &c., Lond. 1676; Wagner, Examen

Elenchticum Atheismi Speculativi, Tubingen, 4to, 1677; Cudworth, Intellectual System, a confutation of the reason and philosophy of Atheism, and a demonstration of the impossibility of it, London, 1678, in which [c. 2] the arguments in favour of Atheism are so well stated, said Dryden, that C. had failed to answer them in c. 5 [Dedic. to Æneid, ii. 378]. The Libertine Overthrown, or a Mirror for Atheists, being the egregious vicious life and eminently and sincerely penitent death of John Earl of Rochester, who died 1680, "abstracted for the use of the meanest capacities" from Burnet and Parsons; Bp. Mannningham, Popery one great cause of Atheism, Lond. 1681; Glanvil, A Whip for the Droll (= the scoffer), Fidler to the Atheist, being Reflections on Drollery and Atheism, a letter to H. More, with comments by More, 1682; Dr. Grew (botanist), The Microscope's Evidence to an Intelligent Author, &c.; Redi (insectologist), to the same effect; J. P. Grüneberg De Atheorum religione prudentum, and Disputationes de Scientiâ Dei—all about this date; Jac. Abbadie, de veritate religionis Christianæ [pt. i. c. 18 p. 129], Rotter. 1684; Origine of Atheisme in the Popish and Protestant Churches, shewn by Dorotheus Sicurus, made English, with a preface by E. B., Esq., 1684; A Discourse upon the Reasonableness of Men's having a Religion or worship of God, by His Grace George d. of Buckingham [Somers, Tracts, ix. pp. 13-19], 1685. To this an answer appeared, only described in Somers, and a rejoinder by the Duke, in which he says he does not understand the answer, but offers to give the author £1000 if he will prove that he is the same George Duke of Buckingham that he was twenty years ago. (The point of the Duke's tract is, that matter is not eternal.) The Atheist unmasked by a person of honour, Lond. 1685; Untereyk, Der narrische Atheist, Bremen, 1689; The Second Spira, by J. S., 1693. This was an account of the last sickness of an Atheist and reprobate, the member of a club, which "within the last seven years" [A.D. 1687-92] "met together constantly to lay down such rules and method as that they might be critically wicked in everything that they could, without the laws taking hold of them." "A deal of company" came to witness his despair during eight days' illness; and hear him "curse the day when he exchanged the Christian faith" for the Creed "of Spinoza and the Leviathan." It is said that the publisher sold thirty thousand copies of this tract in six weeks. [Lowndes' Bibliographical Manual.] By the same author, A conference betwixt a modern Atheist and his Friend, London 1693; Bentley, Boyle Lectures against Atheism, 1693; An Anatomy of Atheisme, a poem by a person of quality, Dawes, Bishop of Chester, 1693; Hoffmann, De Atheo Convincendo, an inaugural lecture delivered at Halle, works. v. pp. 125-30, 1693; Sermon by the Archbishop of Canterbury (Tillotson) on Atheism, circ. 1694; Pritius, Diss. de Atheismo in se fœdo et humano generi noxio, Leipsic, 1695; Jablonsky, Stultitia et irrationabilitas Atheismi, Magdeb. 1695; Edwards, Thoughts concerning the causes and occasions of Atheism, 1695; Grapius, An Atheismus necessario ducat ad corruptionem morum, Rostock, 1697; Hoffmann, Lexicon Univ., s. v. Leyden, 1698; Lidgould (Fellow of Clare Coll. Cambr.) Proclamation against Atheism, 1699.

[d] First half of the eighteenth century. Abicht, De damno Atheismi in republicâ, Leips. 1703; Jenkin Thomasius, Hist. Philosophica Atheismi, Altdorf, 1703; Jo. Rajcsanyi, (S. J.) Itinerarium Athei ad Veritatis viam (A dialogue against the Macchiavellians), Vienna, 1704; Jo. Fabricius, Consideratio Controversiarum, pp. 1-23, 1704; Jo. Christ. Wolfius, Dissertatio de Atheismi falso suspectis, Wittenberg, 1710; H. More, Enthusiasmus Triumphatus (in which Enthusiasm is shewn to be one of the causes of Atheism), also Antidote to Atheism, 1712; Philips, Diss. Historica de Atheismo, Lond. 1716; The Third Spira, memoirs of a young English gentleman at Paris (went through two editions), 1717; Buddeus, Theses de Atheismo et Superstitione, Jena, 1717; Biermann, Impietas Atheistica scoptico-sceptica delecta, Hanov. 1720; Jo. Jac. Syrbius, Diss. de Origine Atheismi, Jena, 1720 (v. Zedler and Jöcher); Reimmann, Historia Atheismi et Atheorum falso et merito suspectorum, Hildes. 1725; J. Alb. Fabricius, Delectus argumentorum, &c., p. 286, ib. Philosophis et gentibus falso imputatus Atheismus, p. 299, ib. Scriptores adv. Atheos, from which this bibliographical notice may be considerably extended, p. 340, 1725; Warburton's Divine Legation, bk. i. sec. 3-5, Lond. 1738.

[e] Latter half of the eighteenth century. In 1751 appeared the celebrated French Eucyclopédie, "the first work in which Atheism was openly promulgated," [Buckle's Civilization, i. p. 786]. "Dans un intervalle de douze années, de 1758-70, la litterature Française fut souillée par un grand nombre d'ouvrages où l'Atheisme était ouvertement professé" [Lacretelle 18*ième Siècle*, ap. Buckle, op. cit. i. 787]. In 1764, Hume met at Baron d'Holbach's a party of the most celebrated men in Paris. Hume raised the question as to the existence of a bonâ fide Atheist, and was told that he was in company with seventeen such [Burton's Life of Hume, ii. p. 220, ap. Buckle]. In 1764, Walpole writes of the educated Parisians, that "their avowed doctrine is Atheism" [Letters, v. 96, ed. 1840, ibid. Boulainvilliers, Doutes sur la religion, Lond. 1767].

In 1770 appeared Le Système de la Nature by Mirabaud, Baron d'Holbach (or, in part perhaps, La Mettrie). It was read very widely by "des savants, des ignorants, des femmes" [Voltaire, Dict. Phil. s. v. Dieu]. "The views it contains are so clearly and methodically arranged as to have earned for it the name of the code of Atheism" [Buckle, l. c.]. An extract from Voltaire's answer to it, in which he states his persuasion that the error "proceeds from no badness of heart," is translated in the Annual Register for 1771, p. 183, Characters. In 1774, Priestley reported that all the philosophical persons to whom he was introduced in Paris were unbelievers in Christianity and even professed Atheists [Memoirs, i. p. 74]. In 1775, the Archbishop of Toulouse, in a formal address to the king on behalf of the clergy, declared that "le monstrueux athéisme est devenu l'opinion dominante" [Soulavie, Règne de Louis XVI., vol. iii. p. 16, ap. Buckle, l. c.]. This, like all similar assertions, must have been an exaggeration; but that there was a large amount of truth in it is known, says Buckle, to whoever has studied the mental habits of the generation immediately preceding the Revolution. Among the inferior class of writers, Damilaville, Delcyre, Maréchal, Naigeon, Toussaint; among the higher intellects, Condorcet, D'Alembert, Diderot, Helvetius, Lalande, Laplace, Mirabeau, and St. Lambert, openly advocated Atheism.

Jacobi, Briefe üb. Spinoza [p. 307], 1789. Platner, Philosophische Aphorismen [i. p. 543, follg.], 1793. Heidenreich, Lettres sur l'Atheisme, Leips. 1796. Malham, A word for the Bible, being a serious reply to the speculative Deists and practical Atheists, London, 1796.

[f] The nineteenth century. Sylvain Maréchal, Dictionnaire des Athées, Paris, 8vo, 1800, reprinted by Didot, 1855. This—"the most extraordinary of Maréchal's books"—appeared just as French society was settling down after the Revolution, "les mœurs dissolues du Directoire s'étaient épurées peu à peu," and religion was reviving under the influence of Napoleon. Silence was imposed upon all journals which desired to criticise or draw attention to the book, embargo was laid upon its circulation, and its author passed over with contempt, and deprived of the éclat of a persecution. The original edition is now only to be found in a few private libraries. Alea, Antidote de l'Atheisme, ou Examen critique du Dict. des Athées, 1800. Feuerbach, Das Wesen der Religion, a set of lectures delivered at Heidelberg in the winter of 1848-9. Iconoclast, God, Man, and the Bible, three nights' discussion with the Principal of St. Aidan's College, London, 1860; also, A Plea for Atheism, and Is there a God? Holyoake, The Limits of Atheism, London, 1861. John Watts, The Logic and Philosophy of Atheism, London, 1865. Arnold Ruge, Reden üb. Religion (founded upon Schwartz, Ueber den Ursprung der Mythologie, and Dupuis, L'origine de tous les cultes), Berlin, 1869. Radenhausen, Isis, vol. ii. p. 409, follg.

The modern books, on general or special points of natural science, which popularize Atheistic views in the present day are too numerous to mention in detail; but their general character has been sketched above. [Theism.]

ATONEMENT. The term Atonement contains a great breadth and depth of doctrine. It is not merely a theological symbol for the sacrifice of the Death of Christ, and the satisfaction that He made for fallen man, but it involves the whole work of the Son of Man, His life of suffering and holy teaching, His bitter Agony and Passion upon the Cross, His Resurrection and Ascension to glory, and His return in the Spirit to abide with His people, individually and collectively, to the end of time and for ever and ever. All the whole work of love whereby man is made one with his Maker, and strengthened for his contest with the powers of evil, is expressed in the word Atonement. Man was wholly lost to God, and alienated by wicked works, but Christ is the At-one-maker; and the entire act whereby man is once more made one with Him Who inhabiteth eternity is the At-one-ment.

For such, doubtless, is the etymology of the word; and however anomalous in form it may seem, it has its Teutonic analogy in such words as Vereinigung, Reconciliation, and Entzweiung, Division: and, viewing the close connection that subsisted between our Reformers and German Divines, it would seem that the word may either have been formed on that analogy; or, if it already had existence, that it was drawn from its obscurity as a rare word in earlier writers, and adapted to the need of a reformed theological nomenclature;

> "notum callida verbum > Reddiderat junctura novum."

In the Scriptures of the Old Testament Atonement and Reconciliation are convertible terms; and there is this proof of their synonymical relation, that they are equivalents for the same Hebrew word, and it is evidently in the Hebrew that we must seek for the meaning of the terms. The earliest authority for the noun Atonement in our language is our Authorized Version. Later, though almost contemporaneous, writers use the verb atone; but this occurs nowhere in our English Bible, either in the canonical Scriptures or in the Apocrypha. In three places where it was necessary to render the idea of "atone" as a verb, we find "reconcile" substituted in its place.[1] We may easily understand that our translators, adopting the idiomatic combination "at one," would avoid the barbarism of converting it into a verb "to at-one," although the analogy of our language might admit of its development into the noun "At-one-ment."

Next, as regards the meaning of the word, a comparison of the Hebrew text enables us to identify the term "reconcile" with the idea of "acceptation." In 1 Sam. xxix. 4, "reconcile himself" is the rendering of the reflexive form of a verb that, in Leviticus, is used of accepted sacrifice; both of the terms, therefore, "to make atonement" and "to reconcile," involve the notion of "acceptation," for they are convertible terms, and one of them clearly has this force assigned to it. And, further, the Hebrew verb "caphar" to reconcile, or, as was said in later English, "to atone for," had this meaning of acceptation, independently of the idea of sacrifice. Moses, when the people had sinned in making the golden calf, sought to make "atonement" for them in praying to God: "Yet now, if thou wilt forgive their sin, and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written" [Exod. xxxii. 30, 32]. The half-shekel capitation tax upon the people was an "atonement," each man for his soul [Exod. xxx. 12, 15, 16]. In the rebellion of Korah, Aaron made "atonement" with incense on behalf of the people [Num. xvi. 46]. Phinehas, by his ready zeal for the honour of God, made "atonement" by his act [Num. xxv. 13]. And the captains of the host of Israel made "atonement" for their souls after a day of slaughter, by offering in the sanctuary the richest of the Midianitish spoil. All these subordinate instances serve to prove the rule, that "to make atonement" in the Scriptures of the Old Testament means to render acceptable.

[1] Lev. vi. 30, xvi. 20; Ezek. xlv. 20. Cf. 2 Macc. v. 20, viii. 29.

Assigning now to the term "Atonement" this signification, we may next inquire into the mode whereby the Divine favour is restored to man. The Hebrew verb "caphar" means "to overlay," as the Ark was overlaid with pitch in preparation for the Deluge; as the altar and various parts of the sanctuary and holy vessels were "overlaid" by the blood of sprinkling; as Aaron and his sons were consecrated by the superficial spot of blood on certain specified parts of the body, to remind them typically of the duties of obedience and active piety; their garments at the same time being "overlaid" with the blood of sprinkling [Exod. xxix. 21; Lev. viii. 30]. In other senses the same root serves to express the Mercy-seat that "overlaid" the Ark of the Covenant; and the obliteration of a word when written by "overlaying" it with ink.[1] Now in what way are we to connect the idea of "acceptation" with overlaying the base of the Altar, or, on the day of Atonement, the Mercy-seat with the blood of sprinkling? There are two main points of saving doctrine involved in the new creation of man in Christ; pardon of sin, whether derived from the first parent or actual; and restoration, in whatever degree, to the original likeness in which Man was created, i.e. in righteousness and true holiness. If we limit the idea of Atonement, as wholly confined in its application to the pardon of sin, we take far too narrow ground; for if, in any degree, we are made through Christ at-one with God, we must in that same degree be built up new men in Him; justified through faith in Christ from sin, and redeemed from its power, each man according to the capacity vouchsafed to him for receiving the good gift of God's grace. And both of these points are symbolized by the blood of sprinkling. The pardon of sin, through the vicarious death of the Blessed Lamb of God, was typified on the day of Atonement by the sacrificing priest laying his hand on the head of the victim, and transferring to it the sins of the whole people. The same verity was set forth in the consecration of Aaron and his sons by a similar imposition of their hands on the head of the victim [Lev. viii. 14]. In acts of individual sacrifice, the person offering laid his hand on the head of the victim in token of sin transferred [Lev. i. 4]; and the blood poured forth on the base of the Altar or sprinkled upon the Mercy-seat completed the expiatory act, sin being "overlaid" and for ever done away by the significant rite. It was the "At-one-ment" for sin.

The blood of the victim is the life thereof; and life for life was the idea that lay at the foundation of every burnt-offering and sin-offering under the law; so that "without shedding of blood is no remission" of sin [Heb. ix. 22]. "For the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls, for it is the blood that maketh atonement for the soul" [Lev. xvii. 11]. Accordingly this atonement for sin formed the very act of consecration, whether of priests [Exod. xxix. 21; Lev. viii. 30], or of the people [Exod. xxiv. 8], or of the altar [Exod. xxiv. 6, xxix. 36; Lev. ix. 9, 18]; and, every year, the altar of incense, that otherwise was of bloodless use, was consecrated by the solemn atonement of blood [Exod. xxx. 10]. The leper, when cleansed, was also finally set free from his ban of disability by the atonement of blood [Lev. xiv. 25]. Thus "almost all things are by the law purged with blood" [Heb. ix. 22], and the ordinance typified clearly the deep mystery of sin pardoned through the sacrifice of the death of Christ.

But the form of Atonement speaks no less surely of that other essential particular, without which man could never have been made at-one with God, his renewal by the spirit of Regeneration, and recovery from a condition of sin to the obedience of Christ. The blood of sprinkling, which is the life, spoke of the life of Christ in the soul of man; the living graces with which He should endue his people. Passages may be multiplied from the New Testament connecting this inward Gift of holiness with the Precious Blood of Christ that was shed for the life of His people. "Much more, being now justified by His Blood, we shall be saved from wrath through Him; for if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more being reconciled we shall be saved by His life" [Rom. v. 9, 10]. "How much more shall the Blood of Christ, Who, through the eternal Spirit offered Himself to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God" [Heb. ix. 14]. "Having boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus . . . let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience" [Heb. x. 19]. "Now the God of peace who brought again from the dead the Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will" [Heb. xiii. 20], where parallelism marks correlation, ὁ ἀναγαγὼν Ἰησοῦν . . . ἐν αἵματι . . . καταρτίσαι ὑμᾶς . . . ἐν παντὶ ἔργῳ ἀγαθῷ. "Elect . . through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus" [1 Pet. i. 2]. "Redeemed, from your vain conversation, with the Precious Blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" [Ibid. 19]. "The Blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth from all sin" [1 John i. 7]. "For thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood . . . and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth" [Rev. v. 9, 10]. "And having made peace by the blood of His Cross, by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself . . . and you, who were alienated . . . by wicked works . . . yet now hath He reconciled in the body of His Flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreprovable in His sight" [Col. i. 20]. And thus He is the At-one-maker with respect to past sin, and the At-one-maker with regard to present strength.

[1] Similarly, the Chaldaic term for hoar-frost that "overlays" the ground with rime is derived from this same root.

This view also of the sanctifying power of the Precious Blood of Christ gives great significance to the ordinance of the year of jubilee [Lev. xxv. 11]. It was proclaimed with trumpets on the day of Atonement. But this day was known as a day of austere fasting and self-mortification [Lev. xxiii. 27, 29]. And this day of sorrow and penitence is selected for the proclamation of the most joyous day that was known to Israel, on the periodical return of the "acceptable year" of the Lord, the year of jubilee, the year of manumission to the captive, and redemption of forfeited patrimonies; giving immunity to the debtor and personal freedom to the bondsman, and restoration, as regards the evicted, to their ancestral possessions. The reason for this apparently incongruous association is most probably to be found in the fact with which this article commenced, that the blood of the Atonement prefigured two great spiritual truths; the Blood of Christ that, as a satisfaction to the offended justice of God, cleanseth from all sin; and the Life of Christ in the hearts of His faithful people, that not only cleanseth from all sin, but purifies the will, and makes the law of their Master to them the perfect law of liberty.

The present article has been restricted entirely to the fundamental idea of the theological term Atonement, as we meet with it in the Bible; the way in which the subject has been most usually treated by divines refers rather to the Satisfaction made by Christ to the justice of God, and the Reconciliation thereby worked out between man and his Maker and Judge. [RECONCILIATION, SATISFACTION.]

ATTRIBUTES. Properties manifested by, or predicable of, the Divine Essence; e.g. wisdom, goodness, truth. [See Articles treating of the Nature and Names of God.]

ATTRITION. The meaning of the theological term Attrition, being unknown in patristical, must be sought in scholastic divinity. It is the correlative of contrition; and the origin of the two terms is to be found perhaps in the Greek ἐπιτρίβειν, atterere, marking the acute and paroxysmal character of Attrition; and συντρίβειν, conterere, as descriptive of the settled, and so to say chronic condition of contrition, the "sorrowing of a godly sort that worketh repentance" [2 Cor. vii. 10]. As used by the schoolmen, the two terms are perfectly intelligible, and define accurately two distinct steps in an onward direction towards the grace of repentance: the first stirrings of remorse, when the conscience is pricked and alarmed; and the state of the soul when fear at length has given place to love, when sin is hated, and obedience marks that complete change which resolves all moral discord in repentance. Contrition, whether perfect or in its imperfect state of Attrition, corresponds with the Greek term μεταμελεία as shewing anxiety and alarm, and with the Latin "pœnitere," derived by etymologists from "pœna;" for Attrition is full of the fear that "hath torment," and Contrition is still subject to ecclesiastical censure and penalty [1 John iv. 18]. Repentance, as God's more perfect gift, coresponds with μετανοία, renewal of mind, and the Latin "resipiscentia," a return to wisdom, when sin is cast out, and the penitent, clothed with grace and in his right mind, is found sitting at the feet of Jesus. The following sequence then is indicated. Attrition denotes the first stings of a conscience charged with sin, and goaded with the horrible fear of punishment; it is the condition described in the Book of Wisdom, "wickedness condemned by her own witness is very timorous, and being pressed with conscience, always forecasteth evil things" [Wisdom xvii. 11; 1 John iv. 18]. At length perfect love "casteth out fear," and by virtue of the love of God Attrition becomes Contrition. Sin is now hated; and love, of necessity, produces obedience; this being "the love of God, that we keep His commandments" [1 John v. 3]. Lastly, a true and cordial repentance, and man's complete recovery to God is the result. The active principle, then, of Attrition is the fear of punishment, or regret for worldly loss or disgrace, and is more like the sorrow of the world that "worketh death" than a step on the ladder of salvation [2 Cor. vii. 10]. As an imperfect form of Contrition, the schools made it referable to the grace of CONGRUITY, leading up to the hearty and permanent repentance which stands in connection with the grace of CONDIGNITY. Attrition, though weak, and, as regards salvation, ineffectual per se, is still a fruit of faith. In the Roman system of theology, by a development of doctrine, Absolution supplements all that Attrition needs, and raises it into Contrition. "Pœnitens ex attrito virtute Absolutionis fit contritus et justificatur" [Bellarm. Pœn. ii. 18]. The practical tendencies of such a doctrine are pointed out by Bp. Jer. Taylor, Diss. on Popery, II. i. end, and D. and P. of Rep. X. v. [CONTRITION. Browne on Art. p. 281, 10th ed. Burnet on Art. pp. 366, 368, ed. 1841. Laurence B. Lect. vi. Luther, de Pœnitentia.]

AUDIENTES. The general name of HEARERS was given in the primitive Church to all those who were permitted to be in Church while the Scriptures were read and sermons preached, but were dismissed before the celebration of the Holy Eucharist. But those to whom the appellation was particularly given, were [1] the second order of catechumens. Bingham shews [Antiq. X. ii. 2] that the first order of catechumens were called ἐξωθούμενοι, being instructed without the Church, and that the other three orders were successively the Audientes. GENUFLEC-

TENTES, and COMPETENTES or ELECTI. [2] The second order of penitents were also called by this name, the several orders being successively the FLENTES, Audientes, GENUFLECTENTES or SUBSTRATI, and CONSISTENTES.

The Audientes of both classes had their places assigned to them in that part of the "narthex," or ante-chapel, of the ancient Basilican churches nearest to the nave; and as soon as the sermon was ended, the deacon dismissed them with the words, "Let none of the hearers, nor of the unbelievers be present." This discipline lasted ordinarily for a year, when the Audientes became GENUFLECTENTES.

AUGSBURG CONFESSION [Confessio Augustana]. A formal statement of opinions on certain points of doctrine and practice presented by the Saxon Reformers to the Emperor Charles V. and the States of the German Empire at the Diet of Augsburg, A.D. 1530.

I. Its history. By the year 1529, the Reformation movement, up to that time an united effort, had been split up by the rise of the Anabaptists, and by the difference between the German and Swiss Divines on the doctrine of the Holy Eucharist. The former had resulted in the Peasant War in 1526, and had introduced such elements of social disorder as to alienate many of the moderate supporters of the new movement. The latter was a still more dangerous breach. Between Luther and Melanchthon on the one side, Zwingle and Œcolampadius on the other, the question had been disputed with the utmost violence of language and feeling. After several attempts, it was found impossible for them to come to an agreement, since Luther and those who held with him regarded the point of difference as fundamental. The general result of these divisions was to give a check to the spirit of reform. It was clear that one section of the Reformers wished to do their work within the Church, not agreeing with those who wished to separate. Accordingly, they were disposed to try whether it was not possible to reconcile differences with the ecclesiastical authorities, and so preserve visible unity. It was in this state of affairs that the Emperor Charles V. proposed to visit his German dominions. He had two great objects in doing so: first, to deliberate upon means of resistance against the Turks; secondly, to deal with the new religious movement, and, if possible, to preserve the unity of the Church. And with regard to this second object he was disposed to try two methods of action. On the one hand he held himself bound, as the faithful son and protector of the Church, to root out heresy; on the other he was firmly possessed with the belief that compromise and agreement were possible. He was inclined to try persuasion, therefore, though at the same time he was resolved to use force if necessary. Accordingly, he urged the Pope (Clement VII.) "to convoke a general and free council for the Scriptural determination of all controversies," and promised to enforce its decisions with the sword. It was a request which the more moderate Reformers had repeatedly made, but the Pope was thoroughly opposed to it. He was persuaded that the new movement could only be repressed by force of arms, and he therefore called upon the Emperor to act as became the son and protector of the Church. At length they agreed to a compromise. The Emperor was to try all that he could do in the way of persuasion, and if that did not succeed he was to resort to force. The Emperor, therefore, called together the States of the Empire, to meet at Augsburg on the 8th of April, 1530, stating in the proclamation that he desired "to allay divisions; to leave all past errors to the judgment of our Saviour, and, further, to give a charitable hearing to every man's opinions, thoughts, and notions; to weigh them carefully; to bring men to Christian truth; and to dispose of everything that has not been rightly explained on both sides."

It was now for the Reformers to decide in what way their "opinions, thoughts, and notions" should be represented, and on the suggestion of Pontanus (or Brück), senior Chancellor of Saxony, it was agreed to present an apology for their religion. For this purpose they took as their basis the seventeen articles drawn up at Schwabach in the autumn of the previous year. These articles were, in the main, identical with another set of articles on doctrinal points compiled at the conference held at Marburg between the Lutherans and the Zwinglians. They had been rejected by the Swiss Reformers, and by Ulric and Strasburg, because of their distinct assertion of Lutheran doctrine on the Holy Eucharist. To the articles on doctrine framed from these sources by Melanchthon, other articles were added relating to matters of practice. A draft of his revision was submitted to the Elector and to Luther, and was again revised by himself at Augsburg, with the aid of Pontanus and others; and on the 31st of May copies of the Confession in Latin were put into the hands of all the Lutheran princes present at the Diet.

On the 25th of June a German and a Latin copy were presented to the Emperor, and, after some dispute as to which should be used, the former was read aloud by Chancellor Beyer in the chapter-room of the episcopal palace.

II. Its contents. The Confession consisted of two parts, the first relating to matters of doctrine, in twenty-one articles, the second dealing with practical abuses, in seven articles. It begins with an address to the Emperor, declaring the earnest wish of the compilers for the restoration of unity by mutual agreement, and appealing to a general and free council in case their present efforts should be unsuccessful. Then follow the articles in the subjoined order:—

PART I.

Doctrinal Articles.

1. De Deo [Francke].
   De unitate Essentiæ [Cœlestine].
2. De peccato seu vitio originis.
3. De Incarnatione Verbi.
4. De justificatione hominum.
5. De ministerio Evangelii [Cœlestine].
   De ministerio ecclesiastico [Francke].
6. De bonis operibus [Cœlestine].
   De nova obedientia [Francke].

7. De Ecclesiâ.
8. De Sacramentorum administratione.
9. De Baptismo.
10. De Cœna Domini.
11. De Confessione.
12. De Pœnitentiâ.
13. De usu Sacramentorum.
14. De ordine Ecclesiastico.
15. De ritibus Ecclesiæ.
16. De rebus civilibus.
17. De judicio Dei [Cœlestine].
    De Christi reditu ad judicium [Francke].
18. De libero arbitrio.
19. De causâ peccati.
20. De fide et bonis operibus.
21. De cultu sanctorum.

PART II.

"Articuli in quibus recensentur abusus mutati."

1. De utraque Specie.
2. De conjugio Sacerdotum.
3. De Missâ.
4. De Confessione.
5. De Discrimine ciborum et traditionibus.
6. De votis monachorum.
7. De potestate Ecclesiasticâ.

The Confession ends with a few brief sentences stating that there were other abuses which might have been discussed, such as indulgences, pilgrimages, wrongful excommunication, &c., but that the compilers have selected the principal ones to avoid prolixity. They state only what is absolutely necessary, that they may not be thought to be introducing anything contrary to Holy Scripture or the Catholic Church.

It was Melanchthon's wish that the Confession should be signed only by ecclesiastics, but this was overruled, and the following signatures were attached :—those of the Elector John of Saxony; George, Margrave of Brandenburg; Francis and Ernest, Dukes of Lüneburg; Philip, Landgrave of Hesse; Wolfgang, Prince of Anhalt; the Senate and Magistrates of Nuremberg; the Senate of Reutlingen.

III. Its reception. The moderation of its tone and the manifest desire for unity expressed in it, won sympathy from the more moderate of the opposite side, including the Prince Archbishop of Cologne, and the Bishop of Augsburg. The rest, however, were more violent, and urged the Emperor to reject it altogether, and at once to put in force the Edict of Worms. After some discussion, it was agreed to authorize the Roman Catholic Divines to write a Confutation. Accordingly Eck, Wimpina, Cochlæus, Faber, and others were intrusted with this work. Their first draft was presented on the 13th of July, and rejected as too violent. Their amended copy was presented and read in full Diet on the 3rd of August. In this document some of the articles of the Confession were approved, others were condemned, a few were in part approved and in part condemned. Under the first head comes those relating to the doctrines of the Holy Trinity and the Incarnation, the necessity of Baptism, and the efficacy of the Sacraments (exception being taken to the fact that the number—seven—was not mentioned), the mission of the clergy, the authority of the magistrates, the last judgment and the resurrection. With regard to the Holy Eucharist, the Lutherans were required to admit that communion in both kinds was not essential. Under the second head comes the article on justification, with its formula "sola fides," together with those on the invocation of saints, the denial of the cup to the laity, the celibacy of the clergy, monastic vows, and the sacrifice of the mass.

The articles "De Peccato seu vitio originis," "De Confessione," and "De Pœnitentia" were in part accepted; though, as regards the former, objection was taken to the term "concupiscence," and the latter was considered to underrate or to deny the necessity of satisfaction.

The Emperor now admonished the reforming party to return to the Church, threatening them at the same time with severe measures in case of their refusal. But the resistance of the Elector of Saxony, and the prospect of a Turkish war induced him to try further projects of compromise. After two fruitless schemes had been tried, a conference took place on the 16th of August between seven representatives of each side :—

On the Lutheran.	On the Catholic Side.
Princes.
John Fred. Prince Electoral of Saxony.	The Bp. of Augsburg.
The Margrave of Brandenburg.	The Duke of Saxony.
Doctors of Canon Law.
Pontanus.	Bernard of Hagen.
Heller.	Vehe.
Theologians.
Melanchthon.	Eck.
Schnepf.	Wimpina.
Breutz.	Cochlæus.

This number was afterwards reduced to six, viz. : Eck, Melanchthon, and the four lawyers; and the consultations continued until the 24th of August. Each article of the Confession was taken separately, and on the doctrinal matters a still closer approximation was attained. On fifteen out of the twenty-one articles, they came to an entire agreement; on three others (Nos. 12, 20, 21), to partial agreement, and the remaining three were held to be matters on which mutual concession might be rightly made. On the practical questions, they came to an agreement with regard to three, viz. those relating to confession, abstinence from meats and other observances, and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but on the rest they entirely disagreed. It was on points of practice, not on points of doctrine, that the final rupture took place. Campeggi, the Papal legate, would not hear of any concession, and succeeded in inducing the States to decree that, until the council was held, no married priests should be appointed to benefices, confession should be enforced as absolutely necessary, the canon of the mass should not be omitted, private masses should not be put a stop to, and communion in one kind should be held to be as valid as in both. This decree the reformers entirely rejected. A few less important interviews, with a view to reconciliation, were held during the last few days of August, but led to no result, and the Emperor then tried to deal with the matter himself. Having had previous communication with the Pope, he could now promise a Council for the settlement of points of difference, if the reformers would meanwhile submit to the Church, and restore everything as far as possible to its original state, but the reformers would accept no such condition. He then urged a renewal of conferences, and offered to preside at them himself, and to use his personal influence to find means of preserving unity, but the terms in which his offer was made only fixed the reformers the more in their determination to concede nothing. He was now personally inclined to use force, but in this he could not obtain the support of the States, for political reasons. A project of a "Recess" was therefore submitted, in which a threat of war was held out as the final measure, but time was allowed until the 5th of May for the reformers to explain themselves on the disputed points. But the publishing of books on matters of faith was prohibited, and other conditions were insisted upon, while it was further asserted that the Confession had been confuted from Holy Scripture. The reformers, therefore, refused to accept the Recess, and took the opportunity to present the Apology for the Confession, written by Melanchthon. At length the negotiations were finally broken off, and the contending parties separated. On the 19th of November the Recess was published, and fresh measures were concerted on both sides.

IV. Its subsequent influence. The Augsburg Confession, besides being the first public form of belief presented by the Lutheran section of the Reformation, was in reality the foundation of their separate system. On the one hand, it put into definite shape their objections to the current doctrines and practice of the Church; on the other, it marked them off from the more violent of the reformers. It became the basis of all subsequent Confessions. The Schmalkaldic league was formed [A.D. 1531] among those who had subscribed and supported the Augsburg Confession. By the peace of Nuremberg [July 23, 1532], it was agreed that the state of things then existing should continue among those of the reformers who recognised the Confession, till disputed points could be settled by a General Council. In 1537, it was the basis of the Schmalkaldic articles, drawn up when Paul III. proposed to hold a council at Mantua. Later still, in 1552, it formed the main part of the two reformed confessions presented at the Council of Trent, the "Confessio Saxonica" and the "Confessio Virtembergensis." Twelve years earlier [A.D. 1540], Melanchthon had published another edition of the Confession known as the "Confessio Variata." It was the original Confession, with several minor alterations and one important one, modifying the Lutheran doctrine on the Holy Eucharist, with the view of a reconciliation with the Swiss reformers. This gave rise to a series of the bitterest contentions between those Lutherans who supported the original Confession and those who agreed with Melanchthon. In course of time discussion arose on other doctrinal points, and the two schools became more and more divergent, until, at length, in 1577, the "Formula of Concord" was issued at Bergen. In this and in the "Book of Concord" [1580], the "Confessio Augustana invariata," with the "Apologia Confessionis," is made the distinctive standard of doctrine for the Lutheran communities, and the Swiss school is condemned along with the Anabaptists and other violent reforming sects. The Confession has continued to be regarded as the distinctive symbolical formula of the Lutheran Church.

In addition to its influence abroad, it also exercised a strong influence on the composition of the XIII. Articles which are supposed to have been adopted as a basis of union by the Conference of English and German divines, which met by request of Henry VIII. in 1538. Through these and the Würtemberg Confession they became the source of several of the Thirty-nine Articles.

[Francke, Lib. Symb. Eccl. Luth. Cœlestinus, Hist. Conf. Aug. Waddington, Hist. of the Reform. Ranke, Hist. Ref. in Germ. Hardwick, Reformation. Hist. of the Articles. Pusey, Real Presence.]

AUGUSTINIANISM. The theological system of St. Augustine, the great doctor of the Western Church; the word being usually applied to his peculiar views on the doctrines of Predestination and Grace. [See CALVINISM.]

AURICULAR CONFESSION. The subject of Confession will be found fully dealt with under that word. It is sufficient here to say that the word "Auricular," when first applied to Confession, bore the meaning which we now express by "Audible" or "Oral." Thus, Shakespeare makes one person say to another, who is to overhear the conference of two persons, "If your honour judge it meet, I will place you where you shall hear us confer of this, and by an auricular assurance have your satisfaction" [Lear, I. ii.]. In this sense, it is also found in the "Institution of a Christian Man" [A.D. 1537], where in expounding the doctrine of penance, it is said, "And therefore, to attain this certain faith, the second part of penance is necessary, that is to say, Confession to a priest, if it may be had . . . Item, That the people may in no wise contemn this Auricular Confession, which is made unto the ministers of the church" [p. 98, Oxford ed., 1825]. The term is also used in the second part of the Homily on Repentance.

It is well to remember this simple meaning of the phrase, as an invidious sense has been given to it in more recent times, which it did not formerly bear. [CONFESSION.]

AUTHENTICITY. By the "authenticity" of a document is meant that it is the production of its professed author; by its "genuineness," that its received text is incorrupt. For example: the first Epistle of St. John is the "authentic" composition of that Apostle; the passage in it relating to the "Three heavenly witnesses" [1 John v. 7, 8], owing to the imperfect support of evidence, cannot be accepted as a "genuine" text. Much confusion has arisen from incorrectly defining these two terms. Archbishop Trench writes as follows:—"A distinction drawn by Bishop Watson between 'genuine' and 'authentic' has been often quoted: 'A genuine book is that which was written by the person whose name it bears as the author of it. An authentic book is that which relates matters of fact as they really happened.' Of 'authentic' he has certainly not seized the true force, neither do the uses of it by good writers bear him out. The true opposite to αὐθεντικός in Greek is ἀδέσποτος, and 'authentic' is properly having an author; and thus, coming with authority, authoritative. . . . Thus an 'authentic' document is, in its first meaning, a document written by the proper hand of him from whom it professes to proceed." Dr. Chalmers[2] adopts the erroneous distinction of Bishop Watson. The words of Tertullian are well known, "Percurre ecclesias Apostolicas . . . apud quas ipsæ authenticæ literæ eorum recitantur,"[3]—the writer referring rhetorically to the (supposed) continued existence of the actual autographs of the sacred writers. So St. Jerome, referring to the autographs of Origen's Hexapla, uses the expression "ex ipsis authenticis."[4]

AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH. The Authority of the Church descends from her heavenly Head and from the throne of God, "As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you" [John xx. 21], were the words of our Lord; and, as all power and authority were given to Him by the Father as His birthright,[5] so He consecrated His Apostles by breathing upon them and saying, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained" [John xx. 22, 23]. It was no evanescent authority, destined to disappear with the Apostles when their course was finished, but it was to endure as long as the Church on earth lasted. "Lo! I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" [Matt. xxviii. 20]. "He promised not only to the Apostles that he would be with them, but absolutely to all His disciples; for the Apostles were not to live to the consummation of all things; to us, therefore, and to those who shall come after us, the promise hath been made" [Theophyl. in Matt. xxviii. 20]. [Hierarchy, Apostles, Apostolical Succession, Episcopacy.]

The true living Authority of the Church, therefore, is vested in the Bishops; "Scire debes Episcopum in Ecclesia esse, et Ecclesiam in Episcopo" [Cypr. Ep. lxvi. ad. Florent.]; hence Chrysostom considers the words, "Tell it unto the Church" [Matt. xviii. 17], to be the same thing as, "Tell it to the rulers of the Church," for it belongs to them to take cognizance of all that affects the peace of the Church and of its members; ruling "in meek and gentle ways, directly influential on the mind and conscience, ways of rational persuasion, exhortation, admonition, reproof; they must be 'gentle to all men, apt to teach, patient; in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves,' convincing, rebuking, exhorting, with all long-suffering and doctrine, that they may finish their course with joy" [Barrow, Serm. xxvi.; 2 Tim. ii. 24, iv. 2. Taylor, Duct. Dub. III. iv. 4]. In practice, "that which belongs directly and immediately to the Episcopal office, is the government of the clergy, as to manners and function, the visitation of the diocese, the detection of vice, the support of churches and ecclesiastical mansions, the care of all things that concern the public worship of Almighty God, and the like; together with the right of inflicting spiritual censures, as the proper means of attaining those spiritual ends" [Gibson, Codex, Introd. xxiv. Consecration of Bishops]. Each bishop is responsible for the godly discipline of his diocese; his engagement, on consecration, being "to maintain and set forth quietness and peace among all men; and such as be unquiet, disobedient, and criminous within his diocese, correct and punish according to such authority as he hath by God's word, and as to him shall be committed by the ordinance of this realm." His authority, therefore, is based upon the Word of God, and his power to enforce discipline "in foro exteriori" is statutable and derived from the State.

Further, the bishops, as the sole depositories of judicial authority in the Church, delegate the power of acting in their behalf to their officials. The bishop, if he so please, may discharge in his own person the office of ecclesiastical judge; but custom, having the force of law, prescribes the appointment of a chancellor, who unites in one person the two offices of official principal and vicar general, with cognizance in both capacities of all causes ecclesiastical; the latter having the additional power of enforcing penal awards. The two offices, however, have been so long united, that it might be difficult now to define their exact jurisdictional duties. To the vicar general, as distinguished from the official, pertains the discharge of episcopal duties, in the absence, or during the incapacity of the bishop; but if such services are not needed, the appointment is not obligatory. In the same way, the jurisdiction assigned to archdeacons, with the power of holding visitations, and the privileges of capitular bodies, descend to them derivatively from the diocesan, however they may seem to be held at the present day in independent privilege; each and all of these being separate offsets of episcopal authority.

The duties of all ecclesiastical judges have been greatly modified and limited by the Church Discipline Acts, which have transferred many of their functions to the commissioners appointed pro re nata by the bishop. [Jurisdiction, Council, Convocation, Royal Supremacy, Synod. Hooker, Eccl. Pol. vii.; Barrow, Unity of Church; Sermons on Obedience to Spiritual Guides and Government; Bingham, Antiq. b. ii.]

AUTOCEPHALI. [1.] Those metropolitans who were independent of patriarchal authority, and claimed final jurisdiction within their own provinces, subject only to an appeal to a General

[1] A Select Glossary, 3rd Ed. p. 15.
[2] Evidences of Christianity, b. ii. ch. 2.
[3] De Præscriptione, c. 36.
[4] Comm. in Ep. ad Titum, c. iii. 9.
[5] ἔδωκεν, τουτέστι ἐγέννησε. Chrys. in John v. 22.

Council. [2.] The title was also given to such bishops as were exempt from the jurisdiction of the metropolitans within whose provinces their dioceses were locally situated, and only in obedience to the patriarch.

The Church of England was autocephalous up to the time of the foundation of the Archbishoprie of Canterbury, and has been perfectly so during the last 330 years. During the Middle Ages its independence was encroached upon by the usurpations of the Popes, which were submitted to by the sovereigns, clergy, and people as an escape from greater evils, but were often protested against as the exercise of an unlawful jurisdiction.

AVE MARIA. A devotional form of words composed of the salutations offered to the Blessed Virgin Mary by the angel Gabriel, and by her cousin Elizabeth [Luke i. 28, 42]. The Roman Church has added to these words a short prayer, "Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners, now, and at the hour of our death. Amen."

The first appearance of the "Hail Mary" as a devotional formula is in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory [A.D. 590], where it occurs as an Offertory Antiphon for the fourth Sunday in Advent. In this early form the words of the angel only are used; and it does not seem to have been used in any other way than as an antiphon for the following six centuries. It first appears in association with the Lord's Prayer and the Creed in a constitution of Odo, Bishop of Paris, A.D. 1195: "Exhortentur populum semper presbyteri ad dicendam orationem Dominicam, et Credo in Deum, et Salutationem Angelicam Beatæ Mariæ Virginis." After that date it appears in several canons of local synods, as of one at Exeter, held in the year 1287. Many councils and bishops had previously ordered the constant recitation of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, but until the end of the twelfth century not one such order can be found which includes the Ave Maria. Nor is it to be found in the rules of monasteries before that time.

The addition of St. Elizabeth's salutation to that of the angel was made by direction of Pope Urban IV. [A.D. 1261]. The addition, "Holy Mary," &c., does not appear in any form of the "Hail Mary" before the sixteenth century; but it began to be used about A.D. 1508, the Franciscans appending the last words, "And at the hour of our death," at a still later date. It was placed in the Roman Breviary in its present form by order of Pope Pius V. in the latter half of the sixteenth century.

The "Hail Mary" was never used in the modern Roman form by the Church of England, although additions began to be made to its Scriptural words by private persons a few years before the Reformation period began. In the Mirror of our Lady, printed in 1530, it is given both in Latin and English, the words of the latter being, "Hayle, Mary, full of grace, the Lorde is wyth the, Blyssed be thou in all women, and above all women: and blessed be Jesu, the fruyte of thy wombe. Amen." At a much earlier date, perhaps in the fourteenth century, the form is given in rude verse by Myrk in his Instructions for Parish Priests, where he directs them to teach their parishioners the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the "Hail Mary," as follows:—

> "Hayl be thow Mary fulle of grace;
> God ys wyth the in euery place;
> I-blessed be thow of alle wymmen,
> And the fruyt of thy wombe, Ihesus. Amen."

From this it is evident that the precatory addition was unknown to mediæval England; and the evidence already given is also confirmed by that of the Primers. Its gradual introduction elsewhere is illustrated by what the commentator on the Hours, who wrote the Mirror of our Lady, adds in his remarks upon it. "Some say at the beginning of this salutation, 'Ave benigne Jesu,' and some say after Maria 'Mater Dei,' with other additions at the end also. And such things may be said when folks say their Aves of their own devotion, but in the service of the Church I trow it must be seiver" [safer], "and most medefull" [acceptable] "to obey to the common use of saying as the Church hath set without all such additions."

In the Institution of a Christian Man, an authoritative statement of Anglican doctrine, set forth by Church and State in 1537, there is an Exposition of the Ave Maria, headed by it in the words, "Hail, Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee. Blessed art thou among women; and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." At the end of the Exposition, which is entirely occupied with setting forth the blessing of the Incarnation, is the following paragraph respecting the true devotional use of this formula: "We think it convenient, that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach the people committed unto their spiritual charge, that this Ave Maria is not properly a prayer, as the Paternoster is. For a prayer properly hath words of petition, supplication, request, and suit; but this Ave Maria hath no such. Nevertheless the Church hath used to adjoin it to the end of the Paternoster, as an hymn, laud, and praise, partly of our Lord and Saviour Jesu Christ for our redemption, and partly of the Blessed Virgin for her humble consent given and expressed to the angel at this salutation. Lauds, praises, and thanks be in this Ave Maria principally given and yielded to our Lord, as to the author of our said redemption: but herewith also the Virgin lacketh not her lauds, praise, and thanks for her excellent and singular virtue, and chiefly for that she humbly consented, according to the saying of the holy matron St. Elizabeth, when she said unto this Virgin, Blessed art thou that diddest give trust and credence to the angel's words; for all things that have been spoken to thee shall be performed." [ANNUNCIATION. MARIOLATRY. Grancolas' Comment. in Brev. Rom.]

AZYME [ἄζυμος]. A designation of the unleavened bread used in the Holy Eucharist. Priests celebrating with unleavened bread have also been called AZYMITES. An exhaustive dissertation "on the Controversy concerning Azymes" will be found in the Introduction to Neale's History of the Holy Eastern Church, pp. 1051-76. [EUCHARIST.]

B

BAAL, the Hebrew term for Lord, represents the Jupiter, or, as Gesenius says, the Hercules of the Shemitic idolatrous tribes, the Canaanites, Phœnicians, Carthaginians; and is the Bel of Babylon, where it was also the name of the planet Jupiter. Baal, as a symbol originally of the sun, was worshipped as the source of light and heat, and as the dispenser of the earth's produce. The devastating effects of nature in storms and earthquakes and volcanic throes, were also referred to Baal as the god of Nature, Energy being the idea symbolized, whether beneficent or, as was most generally the case in ancient demonolatry, malignant. Baal was the male principle of the plastic power of nature, Ashera the feminine, the Ashtaroth of Scripture [Judg. ii. 13]. The tribes of Israel found the worship of Baal established in Canaan; Samuel exterminated it for a time [1 Sam. vii. 4]; but it still lurked amid the hills and groves of Judæa, until it was re-established by the kings of Israel, Jeroboam and Ahab, who formed of it an hybrid religion in conjunction with the worship of Jehovah [Hos. ii. 16]. Baal having been the original deity of this district, his worship and specific name varied into several and distinct Baalim [Judg. ii. 11, &c.] among the different tribes of Canaan.

> "Baalim and Ashtaroth: those male,
> These feminine."

Thus Moloch is identified with Baal by Jeremiah [xxxii. 33]. Baal-Berith (of the covenant), Ζεὺς Ὅρκιος, indicates a compromise made with idolatry by the people at Sichem on Gideon's death. Baalzebub, the Ζεὺς Ἀπόμυιος, was worshipped at Ekron by the Philistines [2 Kings i. 2], as controlling that plague of hot climates, the legions of flies that swarm and sting, murdering sleep and spoiling food; and making it necessary, in the Christian Church, that a deacon should stand on either side of the altar with a ῥιπίδιον, or fan of peacock's feathers, to keep the chalice clear. [Const. Apost. viii. 12.]

The name in the New Testament in many MSS. stands as Beelzebul, "Dominus stercorarius," according to the usual Jewish way of expressing contempt by a change of letter; so Shechem became Συχὰρ, i.e. a lie, in allusion to the false worship of Gerizim. Beelzebub [Matt. xii. 24] is called Prince of the Devils, a title given in Talmudic writings to Asmodeus [Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. voc. Asham], the same demon being known by either name. [ABADDON.] Baal-Peor of the Moabites [Num. xxv. 5; Hos. ix. 10] took its name from Mount Peor [Num. xxiii. 38]. He was the Priapus of Palestine [Jerom. in Hos. iv. 14], whose foul rites were the source of the Eleusinian mysteries and Phallic impurities of Greece. Jerome also identifies this idol with Chemosh [Isa. xv. 2; Creuzer, Symbolik, ii. 976]. Rabbinical etymology refers the name to the abominations that it symbolized rather than to the hill locality. [Talm. Sanhed., f. 60; Targ. Jon., Num. xxv. 1.]

The word stands in combination with various names in the ancient topography of Palestine, marking the principal sites of Baal worship; such as Baal-Tamor, Baal-Bek, Baal-Gad, Baal-Amon, Baal-Zephon, which last however represented the evil principle, Typhon, an object of worship along the flats of the Nile [Creuzer, Symb. i. 317; Movers' Phönizier, vol. i.; Winer, Real W. B.; Bryant's Mythology; Selden, de Diis Syris].

BANNS. A word in common usage with the ancient Franks and Lombards, signifying a fine, a publication, an announcement or proclamation, a convocation, or the place of justice. It is usually both in France and England restricted to the public notification of marriage about to be solemnized. The custom has been traced to the former country in the twelfth century, and the word banna, as used by the Bishop of Beauvais, is repeated by Pope Innocent III. A.D. 1213; and the order of the Council of Lateran, A.D. 1215, was no doubt urged on by the canonical restrictions of affinity, made about that period, which necessitated great precaution on the part of parish priests. In some cases it would seem that the banns were published after marriage in France, for what purpose is not clear.

Beyerlinck derives the word from "band," a rope, or "bahn," a trodden way, or ἀπὸ τοῦ πάντος, and adds, that in Germany it means the bond of excommunication. It seems, however, that "bannire" meant to summon a military contingent to the royal bann or banner, the standard and sign of meeting; hence the word denoted the proclamation, as in the Italian and Spanish "bando," and then public denunciation by ecclesiastical authority, thus passing into the English meaning, ban, a curse or excommunication.

In A.D. 1200 banns in England were required to be published three times before marriage; these were defined, A.D. 1322, to be three distinct Sundays or festivals. Lyndwood suggests that the three first week-days after Easter or Pentecost would be sufficient. The Church of England requires their publication after the Nicene Creed, but if there is no morning service, then after the second Lesson during Evening Prayer.

Baptism

BAPTISM. The sacrament which our Lord instituted for admission into His Church, which was typified and predicted under the Old Dispensation. Thus, when the Holy Spirit moved upon the waters [Gen. i. 2] there was a mysterious figure of the new creation by water and the Holy Ghost.[1] The Deluge typified baptism,[2] a sinful world being destroyed, and Noah and his family saved from destruction in the Ark. The passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea was another type of a death unto sin and a new birth, in the destruction of Pharaoh and his host, and the redemption of God's chosen people.[3] Also the various ceremonial washings of the Old Law [Exod. xix. 14; Lev. xv. xvi. 4], and the rite of circumcision, as we learn from St. Paul [Col. ii. 11-13], prefigured the one ablution from sin. The prophets also predict the sacrament of Holy Baptism [Isa. lii. 15;[4] Ezek. xxxvi. 25-27; Zech. xiii. 1].

Before Christian baptism is spoken of in the New Testament, we have an account of the baptism of John preceding our Lord's ministry. The Baptist intimates that there was an essential difference between his own baptism and that of Christ. John baptized with water unto repentance, but Christ should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire [Matt iii. 11]. Thus the one baptism was figurative, signifying by the purifying properties of water the need of repentance, and of a renewal of heart and life; the other was the appointed means for communicating the gift of the Holy Ghost and its regenerating influences: the one a baptism by water, which can only cleanse outwardly; the other a baptism by the Holy Ghost, which, like fire,[5] burns up the corruptions of a sin-defiled nature, and thoroughly cleanses the inner man. Very great also was the difference in another point of view. In John's baptism the sin-stricken multitudes were warned, from motives most awful and impressive, of the duty of repentance, and many, there can be no doubt, were thus brought to true repentance for sin; whilst in Christ's baptism the gift of the Holy Spirit was imparted to those who had already repented of sin, and cleansed them from its guilt and pollution. Thus John's baptism, though preliminary and inferior to that of Christ, was a preparation for it—the preaching of repentance for the gift of regeneration by water and the Holy Ghost. We are ignorant of the mode of John's administration of baptism, and only know that it must have differed essentially from Christian baptism, since some baptized by him, it is said, knew not whether there be any Holy Ghost [Acts xix. 3].

In illustrating Holy Baptism, our remarks will be given under two heads, theologically defined as the Matter and the Form of baptism: the Matter, water; and the Form, "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

The Matter of the Sacrament is usually divided into materia remota (water), and materia proxima (ablution).

The materia remota, or water, is absolutely necessary for the valid administration of the sacrament. This is clearly stated, as well in the passages here referred to [John iii. 5; Acts viii. 36; Eph. v. 25; Heb. x. 22] as in those previously quoted from the Old Testament, which predict regeneration through the cleansing of water. The teaching of the Fathers is equally explicit. "Tolle aquam," says St. Augustine, "et non est baptismus"[6]—without water there is no baptism. Water is indispensable, as the matter of baptism; and the sacrament, if administered in any other liquid, as wine or milk, would be invalid.[7] Some of the early heretics denied that water was essential. Thus Tertullian [De Baptismo, sec. 1] speaks of the Cainites, who rejected baptism probably on account of the supposed impurity of matter. St. Augustine says that the Manichæans for the same reasons reject baptism by water [De Hæresibus, 46], and also the Seleucians and Hermians, who, he says, "baptismum in aqua non accipiunt" [De Hæresibus, 59]. A similar charge has been made against the Albigenses or Cathari, a Manichæan sect of the Middle Ages.[8]

We now come to the materia proxima of baptism, or ablution. The word baptism signifies generally washing, and is used in this sense in Holy Scripture. Thus it means dipping or bathing [Naaman, 2 Kings v. 14, and Judith xii. 7, [1] S. August. De Diversis Quæst. lib. ii. sec. 5.

[2] Ibid, contra Faustinum M. lib. xii. c. 17, &c. Other illustrations of this type are given by Tertullian, De Baptismo, sec. 8, and St. Ambrose, De Mysteriis, c. iii.

[3] Mare rubrum significat baptismum. S. August. in Joann. Evang. Tract. 45, c. x.; Tertullian, De Baptismo, sec. 9; S. Ambros. De Sacramentis, lib. i. c. vi. St. Ambrose mentions other types, the cleansing of Naaman in Jordan, the axe which Elisha caused to swim, and the waters of Marah made sweet by wood, adding, "ergo si in figura tantum valuerunt baptismata, quanto amplius valet baptismus in veritate."

[4] St. Justin [Apol. i.] quotes Isa. i. 16-20, as typical of the sacrament of the new birth. St. Cyprian says [Epist. 63, sec. 5] that as often as water alone is mentioned in Scripture baptism is alluded to, as is intimated in Isa. xliii. 18-21.

[5] See the remarks of Maldonatus on John's baptism. Comment. in loco.

[6] Tract. xv. in Joannis Evangel.

[7] St. Thomas Aquinas says: In quacumque aqua quomodocumque transmutata, dummodo non solvatur species aquæ, potest fieri "baptismus." A summary of the explanation which Aquinas gives of quomodocumque transmutata may be added in the words of a recent editor [Summa Theologica cum notis, 1867]:—"Hinc docet S. Doctor baptismum fore validum in aqua maris, in lixivio, in aquis balneorum sulphureorum, in aqua decoctionis carnium, sed notandum est talem aquam non est promiscue assumendam, nisi in casu necessitatis" [Summa, tertia pars. quæst. 56, art. 4].

[8] "The common opinions of all the Cathari are these—namely, that the Devil made the world and all things in it; also that all the sacraments of the Church—namely, the sacrament of baptism of material water, and the other sacraments, are not profitable to salvation, and that they are not the true sacraments of Christ and His Church, but delusive and diabolical, and of the Church of the malignants" [Maitland's Albigenses and Waldenses, p. 418, 1832].

LXX.], the washing of cups and dishes [Mark vii. 3, 4; Heb. ix. 10], and also signifies overwhelming sorrows and sufferings [Isa. xxi. 4, LXX.; Luke xii. 50; Matt. xx. 22]. From all which illustrations we may gather the meaning of a thorough cleansing, as by immersion or washing, and not by mere affusion or sprinkling a few drops of water. The bathing of Naaman and Judith was by immersion: cups and dishes were not cleansed by a few drops of water, but by a thorough washing; and the comparison of our Lord's sufferings to baptism is intended to shew how thorough and overwhelming, as it were, was their nature. Hence, as might be supposed, the primitive mode of baptizing was by immersion, as we learn from the clear testimony of Holy Scripture and of the Fathers. Thus John baptized in Ænon, near Salim [John iii. 23], because "there was much water there," and Christ after baptism "ascended up out of the water." We cannot doubt in these cases there was immersion, for it is shewn from the Baptist's reasons for baptizing at Ænon, and Christ's "ascending" from the waters of Jordan. St. Paul's language, however, is even more explicit: he speaks of our being buried with Christ in baptism [Rom. vi. 4; Col. ii. 12], and with the same illustration in view that Christians die with Christ, and are raised with Him [Rom. vi. 11; Col. ii. 20, iii. 3], are immersed in the baptismal water, and rise from it as our Lord from His burial in the tomb.

That immersion was the ordinary mode of baptizing in the primitive Church is unquestionable. Tertullian says, "ter mergitamur,"[1] we are three immersed, and St. Ambrose speaks of immersion in the name of each Divine person.[2] St. Cyril of Jerusalem,[3] and St. Basil[4] also, mention the same usage. Immersion in the name of each Divine person was, indeed, the ordinary mode of baptizing [TRINE BAPTISM] during as long as twelve centuries.[5] The innovation of affusion, or pouring water on the baptized, afterwards began in the Latin Church, and has become the general Western usage. In the Eastern Church baptism has always been by immersion, and as a modern, well-informed writer says, the Eastern Church has never ceased to protest against the innovation in the mode of baptizing of the Latin Church.[6]

But another mode of baptizing was certainly permitted, and was occasionally in use from an early period, called CLINIC BAPTISM, or baptism administered in time of sickness, which was by affusion, or pouring water upon the baptized; and not only in time of sickness, but on other occasions where a sufficient quantity of water could not be procured, baptism by affusion was permitted. This baptism disqualified a person for holy orders, not from any doubt of its validity, but for reasons stated in the Council of Neocæsarea.[7]

In baptizing, as is implied in the scriptural use of the term to which we have referred, the water should be so applied as to constitute, in the proper sense of the word, an ablution, to signify and to convey the inward cleansing of the soul.[8] It is, however, the teaching of mediæval canonists, as may be seen in Lyndwood,[9] that a drop of water touching the baptized will suffice as an outward sign for conveying the inward grace of the sacrament; and there can be no doubt that, from the time of St. Cyprian, the belief has generally prevailed in the Western Church, that the quantity of water used in baptizing does not affect the validity of the sacrament.[10] Admitting this, a practical theologian must protest against the usage of baptizing by aspersion, or sprinkling a few drops of water; an usage which, in cases of haste or carelessness, has often caused grave doubts respecting the validity of administration.

Primitive Ceremonies. Baptism was publicly solemnized in the primitive Church only on great festivals, as Easter, Whitsuntide, and the Epiphany. The sacrament was administered with many ceremonies, varying in some degree in an earlier and later age, and in the Eastern and Western Church; and there can be no doubt that the disuse in the English Church of ceremonies which so strikingly symbolized man's fallen and corrupt state by nature, and the exalted privileges of his regeneration and adoption into the family of God, has been a not unimportant cause in modern times of prevailing irreverence and unbelief.

The candidate for baptism, being unclothed,[11] and looking towards the West (symbolically the region of darkness), first renounced Satan and all his pomps and angels;[12] the font or baptismal

[1] De Corona Milit. c. 3.

[2] Lib. ii. de Sacramentis, c. vi.

[3] Lect. xx. sec. 4. [4] De Sancto Spiritu, c. 27, sec. 66.

[5] St. Thomas Aquinas, who died in the thirteenth century [1274], speaks of the "communior usus" of immersion [Summa, tertia pars, quæst. 66, art. 7].

[6] Catholic Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism. By Mouravieff, late Procurator of the Holy Governing Synod of Russia. [See Neale's Voices of the Church, p. 56.]

[7] "If any man has been baptized in sickness, he must not be promoted to be a presbyter, for his faith was not of his own free choice, but of necessity" [Can. xii., Hammond's transl.].

[8] Devoti says, "Abluendum est autem præsertim caput ac tanta est effundenda aquæ copia, quanta opus est ut baptizandus vere ablutus dici possit. [Institut. Canon. De Baptismo.]

[9] Sufficit quod modica stilla aquæ projecta a baptizante tangat baptizandum. Et concordat ibi Hostien qui hoc putat satis consonum esse juri et æquitati, licet tutius sit quod totus mergatur in aqua. [Immersio, lib. iii. tit. xxv.]

[10] There are various opinions in the Eastern Church respecting the validity of Latin baptisms by affusion or aspersion. Their validity, a modern writer says, though admitted in Russia, is denied elsewhere in the "orthodox" communion [Palmer's Dissertations on the Orthodox or Eastern-Catholic Communion, p. 107, 1853].

[11] The adult heathen was under catechetical instruction and preparation for baptism for three [Apost. Constit. viii. c. 32] or two years [Concil. Elib. c. 42], though the length of time must in some degree have depended on his fitness. Catechumens were divided into two classes—"audientes," those just placed under instruction, and "competentes," those prepared for baptism. A new name, not a heathen but a Christian one, as that of one of the Apostles, was given to the infant by his sponsor [INFANT BAPTISM], or probably selected by the adult himself.

[12] Tertullian, de Corona, c. iii.; S. Cyril, lect. xix.

Baptism

water was then consecrated,[1] the candidate made his profession of faith,[2] and was signed with the cross on the forehead and breast;[3] then followed exorcism and exsufflation[4] to cast out the evil spirit which dwelt in him, being by nature born in sin; the priest then touched his nose and ears with spittle, saying, Ephphatha, be opened,[5] and gave his benediction by imposition of hands,[6] afterwards anointing the catechumen on the breast and shoulders.[7] Salt[8] was given to him as the symbol of a holy life, to which he was now being called and pledged.[9] After these ceremonies followed trine immersion in the font,[10] pointing out, as St. Cyril says, the three days' burial of Christ. The neophyte was then clothed in white, as an emblem of his new birth,[11] and tasted the food of new-born children, milk and honey;[12] a lighted taper was also given to him as a token of his enlightenment by the Holy Ghost.[13] The symbolic use of salt is illustrated in Lev. ii. 13, Matt. v. 13, Mark ix. 49. We have mentioned anointing before baptism; there was also an unction after baptism with consecrated chrism and imposition of hands.[14] This was called σφραγίς, or the seal of the Holy Ghost, and was the completion of baptism. This sealing with the Holy Ghost was afterwards separated by the Western Church from baptism, and called confirmation; in the Eastern Church, in early times as at present, confirmation immediately follows baptism, a child being confirmed by the priest who baptizes, with chrism consecrated by the bishop. In the Western Church confirmation by the bishop followed in the case of infants as soon as possible after baptism. [Confirmation.]

The Form of the Sacrament. In considering the form of baptism, a preliminary point of some importance requires our attention, viz. the time at which our Lord instituted this sacrament. He gave commission to His apostles to baptize immediately before His ascension, but the sacrament, as is generally thought, was previously instituted. Thus our Lord is represented as baptizing soon after His conversation with Nicodemus [John iii. 26], in which He expressly intimated the grace to be conferred in the sacrament, and its necessity for salvation. And though the Evangelist says [iv. 1], that our Lord baptized not, but His disciples, yet these words must not be too strictly or literally interpreted, as if our Lord did not on any occasion baptize, but can only be fairly considered as meaning that He did not usually baptize, but His disciples. The baptism mentioned was at least virtually that of our Lord, as done by His sanction and command. At what time He instituted this sacrament is unknown, but most probably immediately after His own baptism[15] in the river Jordan [iii. 22].

But a more important inquiry remains. Was our Lord's baptism before the effusion of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost properly Christian baptism, communicating the gift of the Holy Ghost, or was it merely identical with the baptism of John. We read in the 25th verse [John iii.] there was a dispute between the disciples of Christ and of the Baptist about cleansing or purifying, or as the words are generally interpreted, on the relative efficacy of the two baptisms, a dispute which could not have arisen had they been known to be identical. Moreover, our Lord would not have instituted a temporary baptism identical with that of John, and which shortly afterwards was to be set aside by His own more perfect institution. It is a more probable belief, therefore, that Christ's baptism from the beginning was a baptism with the Holy Ghost. This, the Baptist seems to imply, was always, or necessarily the characteristic of Christ's baptism as distinguished from his own; the one by water, the other by the Holy Ghost. We read in John vii. 39, that the Holy Ghost was not yet given before Jesus was glorified, but this refers only to the public and visible entrance upon His office on the day of Pentecost, and to the wide diffusion and power of His holy influences afterwards bestowed. So great was the difference before and after this day that in a certain sense the Holy Ghost was then first given. But obviously such words must not be too strictly interpreted [see Gen. vi. 3; Isa. lxiii. 10; Psa. li. 11; Neh. ix. 20; Luke xi. 13.]

It has been thought that the Apostles, of whose baptism no record is given in Scripture, were baptized by our Lord; others have supposed that some of them were baptized, who afterwards baptized their Apostolic brethren. Our Lord would scarcely have addressed the Apostles, as we are told in John xiii. 10, had they been unbaptized, "he that is washed, needeth not to wash except his feet; and ye are clean, but not all."

We may now go on to consider the actual

[1] Tertull. de Bap. c. iv.; St. Cyril, Lect. iii.; Apost. Constit. vii. sec. 43.

[2] Ibid. de Coron. c. iii.; St. Cyril, Lect. 2, c. iv.

[3] St. Basil, de Spiritu S. c. xxvii.; St. Augustine, de Catech. rudibus, c. xx.

[4] St. Augustine, lib. ii. de Gratia et Peccat. c. 40; Ibid de Nuptiis et Concupis. lib. i. c. 20.

[5] St. Ambrose, lib. i. de Sacramentis.

[6] St. Augustine, lib. ii. de Peccat. mer. et rem. c. 26.

[7] Such was the usage of the Latin Church [see Martene, de Antiquis ritibus, lib. i. c. 1, sec. 13]—according to the Eastern custom the whole body was anointed; St. Cyril, Lect. xx. sec. 3.

[8] Concil. Carthag. iii. c. v.

[9] The "exorcism," "exsufflations," touching with spittle and salt of the catechumens, were usages peculiar to the early Western Church, and are not mentioned by the Greek Fathers, or in the Euchologies [see Drouven, de re Sacramentaria, tom. i. lib. ii. p. 220, 1756].

[10] St. Cyril, Lect. xx.

[11] St. Ambrose, de Myst. vii.

[12] Tertull. cont. Marc, lib i. xiv.

[13] St. Ambrose, de Bap. Virg. c. v.

[14] Χρίσεις δὲ πρῶτον ἐλαιῷ ἁγιῷ, ἔπειτα βαπτίσεις ὕδατι, καὶ τελευταῖον σφραγίσεις μυρῷ [Constit. Apostol. lib. vii. 22].

[15] Three reasons may be given why our Lord submitted to be baptized by John: [1.] To set His followers an example of obedience—"Thus," He says, "it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." John, by Divine command, announced the baptism of repentance; our Lord, though without sin, humbly submitted to it, and thus acknowledged its obligation and authority. [2.] He hereby sanctioned the ministry of the Baptist, upon which His own depended. [3.] And also sanctified water—henceforward to be the means for conveying the blessings of His redemption and to be the mystical washing away of sin."

Form of Baptism. It was instituted by our Lord when he commanded the Apostles to baptize in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,[1] and as being so instituted must be essential to a due administration of the sacrament. The first difficulty as regards the Form in Holy Scripture is from the account given in Acts [viii. 16, x. 48], that some were baptized "in the Name of the Lord" or "of the Lord Jesus." But it must be borne in mind that when we read of converts baptized in the Name of the Lord or of the Lord Jesus it is not necessarily to be assumed that the names of the other Divine Persons were omitted: converts might be spoken of as baptized into the Name of the Lord Jesus, since it was into the religion which He instituted (His religion we may say, the disciples being called Christians), that the convert was baptized.

We have no proof, nor is it probable, that during the Apostolic age any other form than that instituted by our Lord was ever used by the Apostles: neither is it likely that they would have altered a form which their Master had so recently instituted. Some of the Fathers have asserted (taking the passages referred to in their literal meaning) that the Apostles were permitted, by a special dispensation, to baptize in the Name of Jesus only, that His Name, as in that early age was especially needful, might be honoured and magnified.[2] This supposition takes for granted, that the Apostles did baptize in our Lord's Name only, which, as we have said, is not merely improbable and unsupported by tradition or the testimony of the early Fathers, but the reasons for the supposed innovation are unsatisfactory, since the Name of Jesus would not have been especially magnified by its use only in the baptismal form, but rather in and through its union with the other Divine Persons.

The Church has always considered the form indispensable, and that its alteration renders Baptism null and void. Thus in the forty-first Apostolical Canon: "If any bishop or presbyter, contrary to the ordinance of the Lord, does not baptize into the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, but into three unoriginated (Fathers), three Sons, and three Paracletes, let him be deposed." St. Irenæus says[3] that one of the sects of the Gnostics baptized "into the Name of the unknown Father of all, into truth the mother of all, and into Jesus who came down" (from heaven). The Paulianists, so called from Paul, bishop of Samosata, who was excommunicated by the Council of Antioch [A.D. 260] for denying the Divinity of our Lord, were ordered to be rebaptized by the Council of Nice [c. 19]. Also in the second Council of Arles [A.D. 451] it is said that the Photinians, or Paulianists, must be baptized.[4] In the Council of Laodicæa [A.D. 320], those who return to the Church from the Phrygian heresy, or the Montanists, were to be rebaptized [c. 8]. In the seventh canon of the General Council of Constantinople [A.D. 381], after mentioning many heretics whose baptism, being in accordance with the form, is allowed—the Council adds: "But the Eunomians, who baptize with one immersion [and also altered the form[5]], and the Montanists, called Phrygians, and the Sabellians, we receive as heathens." The form had been changed, and hence their baptism was set aside as invalid.

The ordinary rule of the Church is given in the first Council of Arles [A.D. 314], that if any one had been baptized in an heretical or schismatic communion in the Name of the Father, &c., he was to be received by imposition of hands, but if not, he was to be baptized [can. viii.].

The Minister of the Sacrament. The minister of baptism is in the first instance the bishop. Christ gave the commission to baptize to His Apostles, and the same right must primarily belong to bishops, their successors. Priests baptize by permission of the bishop, and not from any inherent rights or power of their order; in cases of necessity deacons, and laymen, and women are permitted to baptize [LAY BAPTISM]. St. Ignatius says, "It is not lawful without the bishop to baptize."[6] "The right of giving it (baptism) hath the chief priest, which is the bishop, then the presbyters and deacons, but not without the authority of the bishop."[7] St. Ambrose says that priests baptize, "but the beginning of their ministry (exordium ministerii) is from the bishop."[8] "Neither priest nor deacon," in St. Jerome's words, "has a right to baptize without command of the bishop."[9] "The bishop, after God, is your father; for he, through water and the Spirit, hath regenerated you unto adoption."[10]

The necessity of Baptism for Salvation. Our Lord's words [John iii. 5] declare that except any one be born again of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God: through baptism only are we admitted into the Church, Christ's kingdom upon earth, and by it only

[1] In the Eastern Church the form is thus worded, "The servant (or handmaiden) of God is baptized in the name of the Father," &c. This form is generally allowed to be equally valid with that in use in the Western Church.

[2] Thus St. Ambrose [De Spiritu Sanct. lib. i. c. 3] argues that baptism in Christ's Name only, where the true faith was held, was virtually the same as baptism in the Name of the three Divine Persons (qui unum dixerit, Trinitatem significavit), the Divine Nature being whole in each Person. But even should we admit this theory, also held by St. Basil [De Spiritu Sanct. c. 12] and St. Hilary [De Synod cont. Arian, n. 85], such baptisms were limited to the Apostles, and unquestionably in subsequent ages they would have been set aside as invalid. The matter in dispute may be stated in a few words. The Apostles seem to have baptized in our Lord's Name only, and St. Ambrose, by ingenious and plausible arguments, has attempted to vindicate them. But if the alleged fact is no fact, the usage of the Apostles stands in no need of vindication.

[3] Adv. Hær. lib. i. c. 21.

[4] "Secundum statuta Patrum baptizari oportet," c. xvi.

[5] Bingham, Antiq. xiii. 5.

[6] Ad. Smyrn. sec. 8.

[7] Tertullian, de Baptismo, sec. 17.

[8] Lib. iii. de Sacramentis, c. 1.

[9] Ecclesiæ salus in summi Sacerdotis dignitate pendet, cui si non exsors quædam et ab omnibus eminens detur potestas tot in Ecclesiis efficientur schismata quot sacerdotes. Inde venit ut sine chrismate et episcopi jussione, neque presbyter neque diaconus jus habeant baptisandi. Quod frequenter si tamen necessitas cogat scimus etiam licere laicis. Dial. ad Lucifer, sec. 9.

[10] Apost. Constit. lib. ii. c. 26.

do we become possessed of the inestimable blessings of redemption and salvation [Acts ii. 38, xxii. 16; Eph. v. 26; Tit. iii. 5; 1 Pet. iii. 21]. In the early Church, some sects of Gnostics denied the necessity of Baptism, thinking probably that the faith even of the unbaptized was sufficient for salvation.[1] Theodoret mentions a sect who rejected baptism, the Ascodrutæ or Ascodrupitæ, thinking that Divine mysteries cannot be represented by earthly and visible signs; that redemption is spiritual or intellectual, and not to be conveyed through outward rites[2]—a form of unbelief which has prevailed in all ages, though especially characteristic of modern religionism. "Oh wretched unbelief," says Tertullian, "which denies to God His own proper qualities, simplicity and power. What, then, is it not wonderful that death should be washed away by a mere bath? Yes, but if because it is wonderful it be therefore not believed, it ought on that account the rather to be believed."[3]

The necessity of baptism for the salvation both of adults and infants was very strictly held in the Primitive Church. An exception, however, was made in the case of martyrs: the baptism of blood, or dying for the Name of Christ without the opportunity of water baptism, sufficed for salvation. Also in the case of those who, prepared by penitence and faith for the gift of regeneration, were unavoidably deprived of the outward sign: they were already baptized with the Holy Ghost, which, like fire, had burnt up sin, and purified and sanctified them. Hence theologians speak of three baptisms—of water, of fire, and of blood.[4]

The Grace of the Sacrament. But the necessity of baptism will be further illustrated, and we shall see why so much importance should be given to right matter and form, by inquiring into the spiritual grace of the sacrament as set forth in Holy Scripture and by the Fathers. Our Lord, in His conversation with Nicodemus, calls baptism a new birth [John iii. 3], and St. Paul mentions in detail its spiritual blessings [1 Cor. vi. 11]: "You were rather washed yourselves (ἀπελούσασθε); have been sanctified, have been justified;" cleansed from all sin, original and actual; sanctified by the infused gifts of the Holy Spirit; and thus having been made holy, have been justified. In another passage St. Paul calls baptism "the washing of regeneration and of the renewal of the Holy Spirit," and says that herein "being justified by His grace, we are made heirs according to the hope of eternal life" [Tit. iii. 5-7. See also Acts ii. 38, xxii. 16; 1 Cor. xii. 13; Gal. iii. 27; Eph. v. 25-27; Heb. vi. 4, x. 32]. Thus by baptism are we cleansed from sin, adopted into God's family, being made His children by spiritual birth, so that His first-begotten Son is not ashamed to call us brethren [Heb. ii. 11]. We are sanctified, justified, and enlightened by the vivifying power of the Holy Ghost.[5]

But if we consider the teaching of the Fathers we shall find in their extant writings uniform testimony in illustration of the true nature of baptismal grace. Our quotations will be limited to writers usually considered as belonging to the first two centuries, including a few which probably belong to a later date. St. Clement of Rome says, "Keep the flesh chaste and the soul undefiled, that ye may have eternal life."[6] We read in the Apostolical Constitutions:[7] "Baptism is given into the death of Jesus, oil for the Holy Spirit, the sign of the cross for the Cross; the chrism (μύρον) is a confirmation of the confession." In the Recognitions of St. Clement baptism is said to have been instituted that the Jews, on the cessation of sacrifice, might be absolved from all their sins,[8] and afterwards: "I shewed them (the Jews) that they could by no means be saved unless, through the grace of the Holy Spirit, they hastened to be washed in the baptism of the trine invocation."[9] And in the catholic Epistle of St. Barnabas: "We go down into the water full of sins and pollutions, but come up again bearing fruit."[10] In the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs

[1] S. Irenæi, lib. i. c. ult. Tertullian, de Baptis. c. 1.

[2] Theodoret says they do not baptize: λύτρωσιν γὰρ καλοῦσι τὴν τῶν ὅλων ἐπίγνωσιν. Hæret. Fab. Compend. lib. i. c. 10.

[3] De Baptismo, sec. 1.

[4] Thus St. Thomas Aquinas: "Tria baptismata fluminis flaminis et sanguinis." Summa, III. qu. lxvi. 11.

[5] The above principally, though not exclusively, keeps in view the spiritual grace of baptism in the case of infants. In reference to adults there is necessarily some difficulty and difference of opinion. Faith and repentance are the conditions of baptism—and, we may ask, would an impenitent adult be regenerated, thus being baptized without the requisite conditions. Was Simon Magus regenerated by baptism? The answer may be given, with certain qualifications, in the affirmative. He received the gift of the Holy Ghost, which remained like seed in a barren ground and could only be a cause of condemnation, until, by repentance, his heart was improved and thus the seed began to fructify. Hence St. Peter told Simon to repent if the thought of his heart might be forgiven him, but repentance would have been impossible if he had not had the gift or influence of the Holy Spirit. If an adult receiving baptism in impenitence be not in a certain sense regenerated, he would necessarily be excluded from salvation: he cannot be rebaptized, and it is only through Baptism that the gift of regeneration can ordinarily be conveyed. St. Cyril [Introductory Lect. sec. 2] says that Simon Magus was "baptized but not enlightened," was incapable of receiving enlightening and sanctifying grace, but this does not prove that he had not the gift in the sense before explained. And St. Augustine: "Through baptism the Church brought forth Simon Magus, . . . yet because love was wanting he was born in vain" [De Baptismo, lib. i. c. 10. See also In Evang. Joannis, tract. 6]. In the case of infants there can be no doubt that grace is always sacramentally given in baptizing; they cannot put any bar or hindrance to the infusion of grace, like an adult, by impenitence, nor was original sin ever regarded as per se excluding from the grace of regeneration. St. Augustine always either states or assumes, that all baptized children are regenerate [De Baptismo, lib. iv. c. 24, 25; De Prædestinatione Sanct. sec. 29], a truth probably first denied by Calvin. [See Institut. lib. iv. c. 15, sec. 10.]

[6] 2 Epist. sec. 8. In baptism we are sealed with the Holy Spirit, and an outward and inward mark is set on us as God's children which cannot afterwards be wholly effaced or lost—called in Greek σφραγίς, and in Latin "character." Thus St. Cyril of Jerusalem calls baptism σφραγὶς ἁγία ἀκατάλυτος, and St. Augustine, comparing it to the mark set on soldiers, says, "character est Regis mei."

[7] Lib. iii. c. 17.

[8] Lib. i. c. 39.

[9] Lib. i. c. 63.

[10] Sect. xi.

it is predicted,[1] that after the dispersion of His people, God "will have mercy upon them, and save them by faith and water." In the Shepherd of Hermas we read: "Now before a man receives the Name of the Son of God he is appointed unto death, but when he receives that seal he is free from death and appointed unto life. For that seal is water, into which men descend under the bond of death, but come up destined unto life."[2] St. Justin thus describes baptism: "Then we bring them (to be baptized) where there is water, and after the same manner of regeneration as we also were regenerated ourselves they are regenerated; . . . and that we may obtain remission of sins we have formerly committed, in the water, there is called over him that chooses the new birth and repents of his sins the Name of God the Father and Lord of all things. . . . Now this washing is called illumination, because they who learn the meaning of these things are enlightened in their mind. And in the Name of Jesus Christ, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and in the Name of the Holy Ghost, does he who is enlightened receive his washing."[3] "Wherefore," says Theophilus,[4] "God blessed those things which were born of water, that it might be a proof or evidence (δεῖγμα) that men were about to receive repentance and remission of sins through water and the laver of regeneration." In the words of St. Clement of Alexandria,[5] "being baptized we are enlightened, being enlightened we are adopted, being adopted we are perfected, being perfected we are made immortal." St. Irenæus says[6] that Christ giving His disciples the power of regeneration to God, said to them, "Go into all nations, baptizing them in the Name," &c. And again, "Christ came to save all men, all who through Him are born again to God."[7] "Our bodies through the laver, and our souls through the Spirit, have received that union (with God) which is unto incorruption."[8] "Happy," says Tertullian, "is the sacrament of our water, whereby, being cleansed from the sins of our former blindness, we are made free unto eternal life. . . . We, poor fishes, following our Ἰχθύς, Jesus Christ, are born in water, nor are we safe except by abiding in water."[9] [ΙΧΘΥΣ.]

Sin after Baptism. A few words must be added on an important doctrine connected with our subject—sin after baptism. Amongst the articles of faith is a belief in "one baptism for the remission of sins," i.e. a plenary remission of all sins, original or actual, previously committed. The baptized are placed in a new position: washed from sin, and regenerated by the Holy Ghost, they have higher privileges and responsibilities. Hence sin after baptism must differ essentially from the sin of the unbaptized or unregenerate, or have its own peculiar guilt and aggravation. Not that any past baptismal sin is to be considered as being of itself unpardonable (as certain heresies in the early Church believed), since baptism gives us an assurance of forgiveness by admitting us into the Church, wherein we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous, and also sacramental means of cleansing from sin. It will, however, be found that from the earliest period the essential difference of sin before and after baptism was fully recognised by a penitential discipline for the punishment of those who had sinned grievously after baptism, or lapsed in time of persecution. In the Shepherd of Hermas, a work of high authority in the primitive Church, and probably written by St. Paul's companion,[10] we read of a time of penance being allowed to grievous sinners.[11] The heresy of Montanism [A.D. 150] into which Tertullian fell, which excluded gross sins, as apostacy, adultery, and murder from forgiveness, Gieseler says was "a mere exaggeration of Catholic teaching."[12] The Montanist heresy was afterwards revived by Novatian [A.D. 250]. At first, says the same writer, his followers "declared themselves only against the readmission of the lapsi, but afterwards they fully returned to the old African notion that all who had defiled themselves by gross sins after baptism should be for ever excluded from the Church, as the Church itself would be tainted if they were received again."[13] In the Council of Nice, and the local or provincial Synods of Ancyra and Neocæsarea, received by the Council of Chalcedon into the code of the Universal Church, various classes of penitents are recognised. [Bingham, bk. xviii. c. 1, 11; Marshall's Penitential Discipline (Anglo-C. Lib.); St. Pacian's Epistles and Exhortations to Penance.]

BASILIDIANS. A sect of Gnostics, followers of Basilides, a disciple of Menander, and a native of Alexandria, who died about A.D. 130. A peculiarity of this sect, beyond the usual tenets of the early Gnostics, was a belief that the body of Christ being a mere phantom, yet a living and actual body was crucified, namely, the body of Simon of Cyrene. Thus the crucified person being a mere man, was not an object of worship or faith, and might be renounced without any renunciation of the true Saviour. The transmigration of souls was also one of their doctrines [METEMPSYCHOSIS], and they denied the resurrection of the body. [GNOSTICS: and the Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.

BASLE CONFESSION. [CALVINISTIC CONFESSIONS.]

BEATIFICATION, the act by which the Pope declares on behalf of a person whose life was [1] Levi, sec. 16. This work was probably written at the close of the first century [Gallandii Prœmial. Dissert.].

[2] Lib. iii. c. 9. sec. 16.
[3] Apol. i. sec. 61.
[4] Ad Autol. lib. ii. c. 16.
[5] Paedag. lib. i. c. 6.
[6] Advers. Hæres. lib. iii. c. 17.
[7] Ibid. lib. iii. c. 22.
[8] Ibid.
[9] De Baptismo, sec. 1.

[10] The writer of the life of Hermas in Smith's Biographical Dictionary thus concludes: "Considering, moreover, that the work [The Shepherd] already enjoyed considerable reputation in the time of Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria, we must suppose that it was either written in the time of the Apostles, or soon after, and that its author was either the person mentioned by St. Paul [Rom. xvi. 14] or one who assumed the name of that person for the purpose of acquiring a greater influence upon the minds of his readers."
[11] Lib. iii. simil. vi.
[12] Ecclesiast. Hist. vol. i. p. 148 (Davidson's trans.).
[13] Ibid. p. 284. See also Burton's Eccles. Hist. lect. xix. Montanism [1845].

holy and accompanied by miracles, that he thinks that his soul enjoys eternal bliss, and, in consequence, permits religious honour to be paid by the faithful to him.

Beatification differs from canonization, because the Pope does not pronounce judicially in determining the state of the blessed, but only permits to a religious order or community the privilege of a particular cultus, which is to be free from the charge of superstition, as possessing the seal of papal authority. In canonization the Pope speaks judicially, and determines "ex cathedra" the condition of the new saint.

The ceremony of Beatification was introduced when it was thought proper to allow an order or community to render special honour to the person proposed to be canonized, but without a full knowledge of the truth of the facts, and in consideration of the length of the proceedings attendant on canonization. It differs from canonization, not so much in the manner of proceeding, as in being a provisional permission to a religious order, a diocese or particular church, to have an office of a saint, whereas in canonization all churches are empowered to observe his feast. Beatification is the preliminary of canonization, and permits the name of "Blessed" to be given to the new saint; sometimes a particular office was permitted, but it was to be recited in secret without hindrance to the appointed service of the day. A papal indulgence is required for the exhibition of any portrait or relics; and a decree of Pope Alexander VII. in 1659 positively forbade giving to the beatified the honour rendered to those "legitimately" pronounced to be saints. In 1625, Urban VIII. prohibited painting the head of those who had died in the odour of sanctity with the aureole or disk of light, or exhibiting their portraits on altars, in chapels or churches; the publication of their lives and virtues, or miracles, without the approbation of the diocesan, acting with the advice of devout and learned assessors; or hanging lamps, images, or offerings about their tombs [André, Cours du Droit Canonique]. The Congregation of Rites, established in 1587 by Pope Sixtus V., reports previously to the accord of the title of Venerable to a saint by the Pope. The first solemn beatification was that of St. Francis de Sales by Alexander VIII. on January 8, 1662.

[Giusto Fontanini, Archbishop of Ancyra, Codex Constitutionum quas summi pontifices ediderunt in solemni Canonizatione, A.D. 993 ad 1729 (Romæ, 1729). Collectio Bullarum et Constitutionum quas summi pontifices ediderunt, etc. (Romæ, 1752). Emmanuel Azevedo, Opera P. Benedicti XIV., vols. i. to v. (Romæ, 1749). Castellino, de Inquisitione miraculorum, etc. André, Cours du Droit Canonique, 1844. Rocca, de Canonizatione Sanctorum. Fleury, Hist. Ecclesiastique, liv. xcv. 10, 37. Beyerlinck, Theatrum, tom. ii. p. 68, iv. 125. Pascal, de la Liturgie, 227. Boissonnet, des Ceremonies, etc. 404. Wilkins' Concilia, iii. 636. Cærem. Episc. e. i. s. vi. Ducange, Glossarium, ii. 107. Maillane, Dict. du Droit Canonique. Collier, Eccl. Hist. iii. 437.]

BEATIFIC VISION. The distinctive characteristic of the highest and final state of blessedness is thus named by theologians on the ground of certain statements made in the Holy Scriptures. It is a blessedness to attain to a knowledge of God by the contemplation of His attributes, the education of our faith, the widening and deepening of our love, the perfecting of sacramental union with Him, and the realization of His Sacramental Presence. But beyond all this there is a yet higher blessedness which is reserved for future life, when they who enter into the joy of their Lord will "see Him as He is" and "see His Face," as do the holy angels: which direct and unhindered vision of God is called the Beatific Vision.

That this great privilege cannot be obtained until after death was declared by God Himself to Moses, whose request "shew me Thy glory," was answered by "I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the Name of the Lord before thee, and will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will shew mercy on whom I will shew mercy. And He said, Thou canst not see My Face, for there shall no man see Me and live, . . . but My Face shall not be seen" [Exod. xxxiii. 19-23]. St. John also declares, "No man hath seen God at any time" [John i. 18]; and St. Paul that, "No man hath seen or can see" Him until in His appointed times He shall reveal Himself [1 Tim. vi. 16]. The vision of God therefore which was vouchsafed to the prophets [Isa. vi. 1, Ezek. viii. 4], to St. Paul [2 Cor. xii. 2], and to St. John [Rev. i. 13], was that of the Second Person of the Trinity revealing Himself before and after His Incarnation in the form of His glorified Manhood, "the King in His beauty" [Isai. xxxiii. 17, THEOPHANY.]

That, on the other hand, it will be attained after this life, is as distinctly declared by St. Paul when he writes, "For now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part, but then shall I know even as I am known" [1 Cor. xiii. 12]. St. John also writes, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is" [1 John iii. 2]. Perhaps, also our Lord Himself leaves us to infer the same truth when He tells us of His little ones that "in heaven their angels do always behold the face of My Father which is in heaven" [Matt. xviii. 10]. Nor can we fail to see the association between His words, "If any man serve Me, let him follow Me, and where I am there shall My servant be" [John xiii. 26], with those of the great Revelation of the future, "His servants shall serve Him, and they shall see His face; and His name shall be in their foreheads" [Rev. xxii. 3, 4].

It has been held by many theologians, that the Beatific Vision has not yet been vouchsafed to any, but is reserved until after the Judgment Day. When this opinion was maintained on behalf of the Greek Church at the Council of Florence [A.D. 1439], it was condemned by the Western Bishops; and it was again indirectly sured at the Council of Trent (when it had become common among Lutherans and Calvinists), by the decree respecting the Invocation of the Saints who are already enjoying eternal happiness in heaven, and reigning together with Christ [Sess. xxv.]. Yet it may well be doubted whether the highest degree of the "mansions" in the Father's house which are now the abode of the saints is not lower than that reserved for them after the Judgment and the Resurrection of the body. The saints are with Christ in His kingdom; but "when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God" [1 Cor. xv. 24], it is reasonable to believe that their condition will be still more exalted, and that then, and then only, will the full glory of the Beatific Vision be opened out before their eyes. [Resurrection.]

BEELZEBUB. [Baal. Satan.]

BELGIC CONFESSION. [Calvinistic Confessions.]

BEMA. The "Sanctuary," or altar space, of an Eastern Church. [Neale's Introd. Hist. of Eastern Church, p. 178.]

BENEDICITE. The hymn "Benedicite omnia opera" is of Jewish origin, and seems to have been originally formed by an expansion of the 148th Psalm. It is not known to exist in Hebrew, but was incorporated with the Greek translation of the book of Daniel (among other similar additions) in the LXX. Whatever its real origin, it has been adopted by the Christian Church as a hymn for Divine Service from primitive times. St. Chrysostom speaks of it as "that admirable and marvellous song, which from that day to this hath been sung everywhere throughout the world, and shall yet be sung in future generations." It is also mentioned in similar terms by Rufinus; and as early as the time of St. Athanasius it occupied the same position, as one of the Psalms at Lauds, that it does in the Salisbury Use. In the old Gallican ritual it was sung between the lections, a precedent for its present use as a Canticle in the Morning Office of the Church of England. [Mabillon, de Liturg. Gallic. ii. 108.]

BENEDICTION. The act of benediction consists in the use of words and actions by which persons or things are set apart from merely secular uses, and it is generally done to the intent that they may become means of good to the faithful. We are told that "without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better" [Heb. vii. 7], and accordingly we find God spoken of as blessing created beings [Gen. i. 28], the seventh day [ii. 3], a field [xxvii. 27], bread and water [Exod. xxiii. 25]. Melchizedek blessed Abraham [Gen. xiv. 19], the patriarchs blessed their children [xxvii. 23, &c.], and Moses and Aaron blessed the people [Lev. ix. 23], Samuel blessed a sacrifice [1 Sam. ix. 13], and ministers of Christ bless the Eucharistic chalice [1 Cor. x. 16]. There is a different sense in which "blessing" is spoken of in Holy Scripture, where man is said to "bless" God, i.e. to praise and thank Him, but we are only now concerned with the sense of the term usually conveyed by the technical term "Benediction." The Old Testament is full of such passages as those just quoted, in which either God Himself, or man as His representative, is spoken of as the agent in blessing. The primary notion of the Hebrew word, בָּרַךְ, lies in breaking down, hence bending the knees, kneeling, the less to receive blessing from the greater, and this includes the notion of the human agent kneeling to receive from God the blessing to be given. The Greek term εὐλογεῖν, like the Latin benedicere, relates altogether to the agent. This is the word used in the Septuagint and New Testament, both of God and of His servants, and it has come down to us as an ecclesiastical term through the ancient Liturgies and the writings of the Fathers. It is quite evident from Holy Scripture that words of blessing, whether spoken by God or spoken in His Name and by His authority, were words of power and efficacy to obtain the good invoked. Even Balak was constrained to confess to Balaam, "I wot that he whom thou blessest is blessed" [Num. xxii. 6], while the faithful always regarded the blessing of God and of His representatives as did Jacob, when he said "I will not let thee go except thou bless me" [Gen. xxxii. 26]. When Christ lived as Man upon earth, His formal blessing multiplied the loaves and fishes, and made bread and wine to become His body and blood. And, in accordance with His words, "As the Father sent Me, even so send I you" [John xx. 21], endued with power from on high [Luke xxiv. 49], we find St. Paul saying, "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ?" [1 Cor. x. 16]; and again, "When thou shalt bless with the Spirit, how shall he that is unlearned say the Amen at thy Eucharist?" [1 Cor. xiv. 16, see original]. It is indeed a Sacramental benediction, or "Eucharistization," that is here referred to, but we may infer by analogy that power to confer other benedictions was also given to the Church by our Lord. St. Paul appears to be referring to the common custom of blessing food at meals where he says (combating Gnostic and Judaizing superstitions), "Every creature of God is good, . . . for it is sanctified by the Word of God and prayer" [1 Tim. iv. 5], and the same may be referred to in the Jewish proverb quoted by our Lord, "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs"[1] [Matt. vii. 6]. The blessing of places and things so often referred to in the Old Testament involved the principle expressly sanctioned by our Lord in His cleansing of the Temple, and by St. Paul in his reproofs of such as profaned holy places. And it has ever been practised in the Christian Church from the earliest times. There are very ancient forms of benediction of various things, and also notices of the custom in the writings of the early Fathers.

[1] So strong was the feeling on this point in the Middle Ages, that many held it to be an act of impiety to give a dog food that had been blessed while the meal was going on. But as the effect of the benediction was considered to have ceased when the meal was ended, any remnants might be given to beasts without impropriety.

It was, in fact, like other ritual and ceremonial usages, instituted by God in the first instance as good for man, and was accordingly retained by the Church as a quasi-sacramental link of connection between the Creator and His creatures. The term "sacramentals," which has in recent times been applied to the five "commonly called Sacraments," distinguished from Baptism and the Holy Eucharist, was used by the schoolmen to designate benedictions or consecrations such as those now under consideration.

There is scarcely any "creature of God" that has not been the subject of solemn benediction. Persons have generally received benediction on assuming particular offices, and on particular occasions, as in the sacraments and sacramental ordinances, in the consecration of kings, abbots, &c., in the benediction of travellers on going and returning, and the like. Altars, churches, churchyards, vestments and vessels, bells, candles at Candlemas, ashes on Ash-Wednesday, palms on Palm-Sunday, the first-fruits of corn and wine at the harvest and vintage, and of the sea at the fishing-season, may be mentioned among many other things which received special benedictions to fit them for sacred uses. The benediction of food at a meal invites special attention, as being still a matter of daily observance among ourselves. It was practised by the Jews, and thus came into use among the first Christians. The Jewish form given in the Talmud is as follows: "Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, the King of the world, who hast produced this food (or this drink, as the case may be) from the earth or the vine." There are references to it in the New Testament [see above], and in the Apostolic Constitutions [vii. 49] is a beautiful form of "Grace before meat."[1] The forms which have been most used in the Western Church are "Benedic Domine nos et hæc tua dona quæ de tua largitate sumus sumpturi, per Christum Dominum nostrum. Amen."[2] And the shorter form, "Benedictus benedicat" before the meal, and "Benedicto benedicatur" after it.[3] A person in holy orders is the proper minister of this as of other benedictions, if present, otherwise the master of the house, or person presiding at the meal.

The use of holy water, or water of aspersion [Num. xix.; Exod. xxx. 18-20], dates from the earliest days of the Jewish Church, and Baronius [Anno 57, c. viii.] is probably right in assuming that, like many other Jewish ceremonies, it was adopted into the Christian ritual, for it is referred to by early Christian writers, and there is a form for blessing it in the Apostolic Constitutions [viii. 29]. It has been customary to bless it for various special uses, as well as for the general purpose of remaining in the benatura, or holy water-stoup, at the entrance of the Church. In mediæval times the font was not blessed at each separate service, but only on Easter Eve and Whitsun Eve, the ordinary times for baptism. A special office was used for this, and the water remained in the font to be used again and again.

Martene has printed a great number of benedictional offices of all kinds. The essential form is the use of certain appropriate words, which may be accompanied by suitable gestures. Such are imposition of hands, as in the patriarchal blessings, and as when Christ blessed little children, and signing with the cross, in token that through the cross of Christ all blessings flow from God to man. Holy water and chrism, which had themselves been previously blessed, were also used in the more solemn benedictions, as in that of bells, which in these and other respects so resembled the office of baptism that it unfortunately acquired the name of the sacrament, a name frequently applied to it by Roman Catholic ritualists and theological writers. So we now hear people speak of the "christening" of a ship, meaning the somewhat profane ceremony of naming it, which is a corruption of the old benedictio navis. The blessing of military ensigns is fortunately still a religious function. "House-warmings" are traditional observances connected with the benedictio domus. Buildings other than churches have been solemnly blessed by modern bishops, as have also church bells. Archbishops Laud and Sancroft used to consecrate altars and the instrumenta of public worship, and other bishops have done the same from time to time. In the Hierurgia Anglicana is a form for such consecrations, of the date 1703. The tradition of consecrating churches and churchyards has always been kept up by English bishops.

A priest is competent to perform any benediction, although it is more proper that a bishop should officiate if convenient. The less solemn benedictions, such as the benedictio mensæ, may be given by lay persons, but such benedictions are to be regarded rather as prayers for a blessing than the act of blessing itself. A woman cannot give solemn benediction under any circumstances. Abbesses claimed this power in the time of Charlemagne, but it was treated as an abuse. The same custom arose and was repressed in the Greek Church. Private benedictions, such as those of children by parents or aged persons, of relations and friends by dying persons, &c., are acts of Christian charity which have always been sanctioned by the Church. The rite of "benediction with the blessed sacrament" now so common in the Roman Church is one of very recent introduction, and consists in holding over the people the monstrance containing the sacred host.

Although sacerdotal benediction has much analogy with the sacraments and sacramental ordinances, it is to be distinguished from them in respect of the special graces which they convey, of their necessity to salvation, and of their being administered to mankind alone. It is analogous to the sacraments in having "an outward visible sign of an inward spiritual grace." The sign may [1] See Conybeare and Howson on 1 Tim. iv. 5.

[2] Gelasian Sacramentary.

[3] There is an ancient form of grace after dinner at Clifford's Inn, which is not said, but acted. Four loaves, closely adhering together, and said to be emblematical of the Four Gospels, are held up by the occupant of the chair, who raises them three times in allusion to the Blessed Trinity, and then hands them to the butler vary, as we have seen, and its effect is to set apart persons, places, or things for particular purposes. All things are, moreover, in virtue of benediction, especially fitted for their proper uses, "sanctified by the word of God and prayer" [1 Tim. iv. 5]. In the Holy Eucharist, however, we have a consecration quite distinct from any mere blessing of food, and in Ordination or Confirmation one quite different from any mere blessing of persons. The sacrament of baptism is also quite distinct from the benediction of the water, which is by no means essential or always practised. The sacraments are either necessary to salvation or to the perpetuation and well-being of the Church, whereas benedictions are only accessory. Nor is the recipient of benediction necessarily a person, but it may be a place or a thing.

The right appreciation of the Christian practice of various benedictions is happily reviving among both clergy and people, and the bishop or priest who desires to exercise this function need not be at a loss for proper formulæ while the ancient offices are readily accessible in many printed books. Yet an Anglican Benedictional is one of our desiderata. [Pontificale and Rituale Romanum; Martene, de Ant. Rit. Eccles. lib. ii., and de Ant. Mon. Rit.; Beyerlinck, Magn. Theatr. Vitæ Humanæ, s. v. Benedictio; Rock's Church of our Fathers, and Hierurgia; Blunt's Sacraments and Sacramental Ordinances; The Priest's Prayer-Book.]

BENEFICE. The perpetual right to receive the fruits of ecclesiastical goods by virtue of the spiritual office of an ecclesiastical person, constituted by the authority of the Church. It requires to be erected by episcopal authority; to be founded for purely spiritual purposes; to be conferred by an ecclesiastical person, and bestowed on a clerk in orders; it must be perpetual, and be given to another person than him who confers it. According as benefices are tenable by regulars or seculars, they receive their definition. The former contain Doubles, the claustral offices of the conventual prior, chamberlain, almoner, hospitaller, sacristan and cellarer; and Simples, such as non-conventual priories, and the places of monk or canon regular; according as they are tenable by men or women, they are designated further as masculine and feminine. Again some are curata, with cure of souls, or non-curata, sinecures without any such charge. Curata are either—[1] those improperly, and in a large sense only, so termed, which have external cure, viz. in matters of visitation, correction, excommunication, and [2] those strictly and properly having cure of souls, with the exercise of the power of the keys and the ministration of sacraments, such as all parish priests enjoy. All benefices are regarded as secular except of regular foundation or having a prescription of forty years. Secular benefices are either simple or double. [1.] Doubles are dignities, personages (personalia or personatus), and offices which have either cure of souls annexed, or some special jurisdiction, eminence in choir and chapter and processions, precedence, or administration of Church goods attached to them, viz. the Papacy, cardinalate, episcopate, capitular headships, the archpresbyterate, archidiaconate, and penitentiaryships, the præcentorship, &c. Benefices with cure of souls are also included. [2.] Simples, which have neither administration nor special eminence, but are instituted solely for celebrating Divine worship, as canonries and prebends in cathedral churches, chaplaincies, and the like. Those again are mere Simplicia, where only saying of prayers is concerned, and Servitorian, where celebration of Holy Communion or singing in choir are required.

Benefices are still further regarded as [1.] elective, which are conferred by competent electors, and confirmed by authority; as in elections of canons by a dean and chapter. [2.] Presentative, either ecclesiastical, when the presenter has founded a church or benefice out of church revenues, or is an ecclesiastic holding the power of presentation by virtue of his place, or secular, when made by a layman, its founder or patron; but in this case canonical institution by ecclesiastical authority must supervene the exercise of patronage. [3.] By postulation, when otherwise ineligible persons are directly chosen by two-thirds of a chapter; confirmation, however, is indispensable. [4.] Freely collative, when the ordinary himself collates or presents. [5.] Of canonical exchange. [6.] Given by resignation in favour of the presentee; collation following. A regular benefice is said to be held in title when occupied by a regular, and in commendam when tenable by a secular, who has a dispensation. Compatible benefices are pluralities canonically tenable.

Manual or temporal benefices are revocable at pleasure, as though in the hand of the presenter, and titular benefices are perpetual. The other kinds are perpetual vicarages, prebends, commendams, where a person named receives charge of a church; pensions, an income derived from the benefice of another; and præstimonia, a pension granted to canons or other clerks out of the church revenues. Consistorial benefices are those granted by provision of the Papal Consistory. Benefices are voidable through any crime by which forfeiture is entailed; by exchange, by resignation, by acceptance of another benefice not tenable together with it. For the reception of a benefice the priesthood is indispensable, and by the statute law of England, benefice now seems to designate only a benefice with cure of souls, as distinct from cathedral preferment. [Ferraris; Beyerlinck, i. 950; André].

BENEFIT OF CLERGY. A mediæval custom, by which accused persons who proved themselves to be "clerks" by reading Latin, could claim to be tried by the court of the Bishop instead of by the court of the King. It was a privilege originally belonging only to those who were actually in holy orders, but it was gradually extended to persons in the minor orders, and to every one who could read a verse of the Latin Bible. The privilege was thus grossly abused, and became a great impediment to justice, as well as a great scandal and burden to the Church. It was restricted by Reformation Statutes of 1531, 1536, and 1541, and the actual clergy were thenceforward subject to secular tribunals. But the Benefit of Clergy was retained in a modified form for the benefit of the laity, and was only abolished in 1827, by Stat. 7 & 8 Geo. IV., cap. 28. [Gibson's Codex, xlix. 5; Blackstone's Comm. iv. 28; Blunt's History of the Reformation, 1514-1549, p. 406.]

BETHPHANY. A primitive name for the festival best known in the West as the Epiphany. Durandus says—"In codicibus antiquis hæc dies Epiphaniorum pluraliter intitulatur, et ideo tripliciter et nominatur, scilicet Epiphania, Theophania, et Bethphania." The latter name of the festival seems to have been little used; but it is, of course, significant of our Lord's Manifestation by His first miracle in the house at Cana of Galilee. [EPIPHANY].

BIBLE. [τὰ βιβλία, scil. θεῖα]. This name for the Holy Scriptures can be traced back as far as the time of St. Chrysostom [Hom. ix. in Ep. ad Coloss.], and was commonly used by the Greeks of the fourth century, as that of Bibliotheca Divina or Sacra was by St. Jerome [Ep. vi. ad Flor.] and the Latins. The Greek name passed through the Latin into the English language, and has been used in its present form for about six hundred years. [TESTAMENT. SCRIPTURE. CANON.]

BIDDING OF PRAYERS, corrupted into BIDDING PRAYER. The old English word "bidding" had two senses—[1] that of mandatum, and [2] that of oratio [Prompt. parvul. s. v.]. The old word "bedes" also bore the sense of things counted, and of prayers. The old expression "bidding of bedes" thus carries the sense of [1] directing prayers to be made, [2] of praying prayers, and [3] of counting the beads of the rosary; the first being the most ancient, and the last the most modern. It is in the ancient sense that the modern term "Bidding Prayer" is to be understood.

This "bidding" or monition to prayer is a very ancient custom, being enjoined in the early Liturgies under the name of Προσφωνήσεις or "Alloeutiones," when the deacon said, "Let us pray," "Let us pray earnestly," "Let us pray on yet further and further," "Let us pray with intense zeal." Our forms of Bidding Prayer also originated in the "ECTENE" of the Eastern Church. In the Church of England a form is still enjoined in the 55th canon, which substantially agrees with that used in mediæval times. It is used before sermons which are not preceded by Divine service, as University sermons, and also before the morning sermon in Cathedral churches.[1]

BIGAMY. In modern language this term means the marriage of a second wife while the first is still living; but in early Church writers it is used (with Digamy) for the marriage of a second wife after the death of the first. The canons of several Councils [Agde, A.D. 506; Carthage, A.D. 398] make second marriages, when contracted after baptism, an impediment to holy orders; the rule being founded on the words of St. Paul in Tit. i. 6. Some local synods extended this rule even to persons who had contracted second marriages before they became Christians [Valence, A.D. 374]; and this is the practice supported by St. Ambrose in his 82nd epistle. On the other hand, there were those who interpreted St. Paul's words of bigamy, or polygamy, in the modern sense, as did St. Chrysostom and Theodoret in their homilies on the passage; and in Spain, at least, the bishops freely ordained men who had been twice married. [Innocent. Ep. xxii. c. 1]. Theodoret also [Ep. 110, ad Domum] gives several examples of such ordinations of digamists by the Bishop of Antioch; and it is evident that the rules of different dioceses varied greatly on this subject before the introduction of clerical celibacy. [CELIBACY.]

BISHOP. A name derived from the Greek ἐπίσκοπος, an overseer,[2] appropriated in the early ages, and according to modern usage, to the highest order of the Christian ministry. Bishop or overseer, it is manifest, does not necessarily or exclusively denote the episcopal office as distinguished from that of presbyters or deacons: presbyters have also the oversight of the people committed to their charge, and deacons also a kind of overseership. Hence the word ἐπίσκοπος is not limited in the New Testament to the highest order of the ministry, but also denotes the presbyterate or priesthood, which, taking the word literally, may be called an episcopate.[3] This might naturally be expected from the inherent vagueness of the term, and would also be likely to occur at an early period, before it was necessary or possible to designate by a peculiar word or term each of the three orders. Thus "presbyter" means an elder, a term often of respect as well as of office, and the Apostle St. John calls himself a presbyter or elder, without derogating from his Apostolic office, or giving any occasion for mistaking his meaning. But this almost unavoidable vagueness of language has led, in modern times, to the most unwarrantable and even absurd conclusions. We read in Scripture of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and as it is unquestionable that bishop and presbyter are often at least used interchangeably for the same office, it is inferred that there only existed in the Apostolic age bishops or presbyters (different names for the same office) and deacons. Hence it would follow that episcopacy is not of Apostolic or Divine institution, but a form of government subsequently introduced by the Church, and it would rest on ecclesiastical as distinguished from Apostolic or Divine

[1] Coxe on Forms of Bidding Prayer, with Introduction and Notes. 1840.

[2] This word is derived from the LXX. and means generally a superintendent whether civil or religious. Thus in Num. iv. 16, Eleazar is called ἐπίσκοπος τοῦ ἱερέως. In Isaiah [lx. 17], in reference to Christianity we read δώσω τοὺς ἐπίσκοπους ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ. The same word is also used of a superintendent in civil matters [Neh. xi. 9, 14, 22].

[3] To shew how little reliance can be placed upon a mere word as denoting an office, we may remark that the Apostles call themselves presbyters [1 Pet. v. 1; 2 John i.] and deacons [Eph. iii. 7; 2 Cor. iii. 16].

sanction. In proof of these assertions and inferences, it is asserted that the Epistles of the New Testament afford no evidence or even probability that there was an episcopacy in the churches which the Apostles planted. Thus in St. Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians no reference is made to their bishop, though it might reasonably have been expected, as their Church was in an unsettled state, and very corrupt as regards doctrine and morals [1 Cor. i. 11-13, iii. 3, 4, v. 1, 11, xv. 12; 2 Cor. ii. 17, xii. 20, 21]. In the Epistle to the Philippians the salutation of the Apostle is addressed to the bishops, i.e. to the presbyters, and deacons. When the Apostle summons together the presbyters of the Church at Ephesus, he also calls them bishops [Acts xx. 17, 28]. But this vague or undeterminate use of the word only shews that ἐπίσκοπος was not at first appropriated to the highest order, but was often, or rather ordinarily, used of presbyters; a fact which has no bearing on the real point in dispute, i.e. whether the episcopal office existed from the beginning in the Church. We have ample evidence that the Apostles themselves were the first bishops of the churches they planted; nor, as will be afterwards shewn, could any other arrangement have been reasonably expected. On referring to the Epistles we cannot mistake the exercise of an episcopal jurisdiction. Thus St. Paul, as we have seen, gives a solemn charge to the presbyters of the Church of Ephesus, and surely it is not of importance whether he call them presbyters or bishops. Throughout his Epistles, not only pastoral instruction is given to the churches, but he admonishes them with supreme authority, censuring errors in faith and practice, as one set over them in the Lord. The Apostles did not immediately after our Lord's ascension ordain bishops, having been themselves appointed the supreme governors of the Church. And even where many converts were made and churches founded, the ordination of presbyters and deacons, aided by their own superintendence, was ordinarily sufficient. The Apostles themselves, some have suggested, did not at first know that their own order was to be perpetuated by an episcopacy in the Church, a truth perhaps only revealed to them when the time of their departure drew near, which has been assigned as a reason for its late appointment. However this may be, there is another reason why the ordination of bishops could not have been expected at the beginning of the Apostolic ministry: they are the successors of the Apostles, and, as the word implies, could not be expected to be governors of the Church at the same time with them.

When the time of their death approached the Apostles appointed successors in the episcopal office. Thus we read that St. Paul ordained Timothy bishop of Ephesus, and Titus of Crete. He gives them in his Epistles directions for the ordination of priests and deacons, and for the due performance of their episcopal office, bidding them charge presbyters with authority, and to "lay hands suddenly on no man" [1 Tim. i. 3, iii. 1-13, v. 22; 2 Tim. ii. 14; Tit. i. 5-10]. During the lifetime of the Apostles, St. Ignatius was made bishop of Antioch and St. Polycarp of Smyrna,[1] and in the Apostolical Constitutions we read of many others whom the Apostles appointed bishops of churches.[2]

Thus bishops succeeded the Apostles in the government of the Church, and as being their successors are possessed of the same power of jurisdiction, which is indispensable to their office, and for giving mission to inferior ministers [JURISDICTION]. St. Irenæus speaks of "bishops to whom the Apostles delivered the churches;"[3] and St. Cyprian, "that the Lord chose Apostles, that is bishops;"[4] and again, "for this, very especially, we do and ought to labour that we strive to hold fast as much as we can the unity appointed by the Lord, and delivered through the Apostles to us their successors;"[5] and St. Jerome, "with us bishops occupy the place of Apostles,"[6] and "bishops are successors of the Apostles."[7]

The episcopal order being, thus, of Divine institution, and unchangeable, the Fathers unanimously teach that it is essential to the constitution of the Christian Church. St. Ignatius says, "My soul be for theirs who obey bishop, presbyters, deacons; . . . without these there is no Church"[8] (οὐκ ἐκκλησία καλέιται). "The mark of the body of Christ," says St. Irenæus, "is according to the succession of bishops to whom the Apostles delivered the Church which is in every place;"[9] and St. Cyprian tells us that "the Church is in the bishop and the bishop is in the Church, and that he who is not with the bishop is not in the Church."[10] Hence St. Augustine and St. Optatus appeal to the succession of bishops in the Roman Church as proving that the Donatists were separated from the communion of the Catholic Church (præcisos a vite). The Donatists were asked to shew the succession of their bishops from the apostolic age, and by their inability to meet the challenge, were, we may say, self-condemned,—manifestly proved to be in a state of schism.[11]

It was disputed in the primitive Church (the controversy being revived at the Reformation and continued to the present day) whether the episcopal order be distinct from that of the presbyterate, a bishop being primus inter pares, the first among presbyters, only officially their superior,

[1] Martyrium, sec. 11. The meaning of ἐπίσκοπος cannot here be misunderstood, as St. Ignatius speaks of the three orders of bishop, presbyter, and deacon. St. Polycarp was ordained bishop of Smyrna [Tertullian, De Præscrip. sec. 31, says by St. John], as we are told in the Encyclical Epistle on his martyrdom.

[2] Lib. vii. c. 46.

[3] Adv. Hæres. lib. v. c. 20.

[4] Epist. 65, ad Rogatianum.

[5] Ibid. Epist. 45, ad Cornelium.

[6] Ad Marcellam, Epist. 54.

[7] Ibid. Epist. 46, ad Evangelum.

[8] Ad Polycarp, sec. 6; ad Trall. sec. 3.

[9] Γνῶσις ἀληθὴς, ἡ τῶν Ἀποστόλων διδαχῇ, καὶ τὸ ἀρχαῖον τῆς Ἐκκλησίας σύστημα κατὰ πάντος τοῦ κόσμου: et character corporis Christi secundum successiones Episcoporum quibus illi (scil. Apostoli) eam quæ in unoquoque loco est Ecclesiam tradiderunt. Adv. Hæres. lib. iv. c. 8.

[10] Ad Pupianum, Epist. 66, sec. 8.

[11] St. Optatus, de Schismate, lib. ii. c. 3; St. August. Psalmus contra partem Donati, tom. ix.

though of the same order; or, on the other hand, whether episcopacy, essentially distinct from the priesthood, be really a different and higher order. Now that the latter theory is undoubtedly true has been already partly proved, and the mere fact that ordination is the exclusive prerogative of the bishop, and cannot under any circumstances be delegated to a presbyter, is alone sufficient to prove the fact. Let us even suppose that a presbyter has an equal right with the bishop to baptize, celebrate the Holy Eucharist, and to give the seal of the Holy Spirit in confirmation,[1] the fact remains that the power and right of ordination exclusively belong to the bishop; hence an apostolical or episcopal succession only has been everywhere preserved in the Church.

The heretic Aërius [A.D. 376] first denied that the bishop was of a superior order to the presbyter, asserting that they are of the same order, honour, and dignity. He thus argues: "The bishop lays on hands, so does the presbyter, the bishop baptizes and celebrates the Divine offices (οἰκονομίαν τῆς λατρείας ποιεῖ), so likewise the presbyter; the bishop sits on a throne, so also a presbyter." He alleges also, in support of his theory, that St. Paul uses the words presbyter and bishop interchangeably, and hence infers that they are of one and the same order. His erroneous opinion as regards orders, and on other important points, was condemned as being contrary to the usage and universal tradition of the Church.[2]

Modern writers, in maintaining the parity of the two orders, principally rely upon the authority or sanction of St. Jerome. He says "that the presbyter is the same as the bishop, and that churches were originally governed by the united counsel of presbyters; but on disputes arising, as at Corinth [1 Cor. i. 12], it was decreed throughout the world that one chosen from the presbyters (of each church) should be placed over others with superior authority, that thus the cause of schism might be removed." And again: "That presbyters should acknowledge themselves subject to him (the bishop), placed over them by the usage of the Church (ex ecclesiæ consuetudine), and that bishops should know that it is more by custom (consuetudine) than by the Lord's actual appointment (dispositionis Dominicæ veritate) that they are superior (majores) to presbyters, and that they ought to rule the Church in common with them."[3] Another passage has been quoted from St. Jerome to prove that the priests of Alexandria at first ordained their own bishop, just as soldiers might appoint a commander, or deacons choose from among themselves an archdeacon.[4] St. Jerome only says that the priests of Alexandria nominated or elected their bishop without stating whether subsequent ordination was required. Various attempts have been made to explain away principles so laid down, but not very successfully. His statements, which seem explicit and unmistakeable, are opposed to Catholic tradition and the unanimous teaching of other Fathers. The theory that episcopacy was suggested as the general rule of the Church by the schisms of the Corinthian Church is not mentioned by any other writer, and is also very improbable, since, were such the case, we might have expected that Corinth would have been the first episcopal see, which assuredly it was not. It may be true that the priests of Alexandria elected their bishop, but St. Jerome's illustrations, especially that of the deacons and archdeacon, lead to the supposition that he believed, that, beyond nomination, nothing further was required.[5]

But leaving this Father's peculiar and unsatisfactory theories, let us next inquire into the mode of election, and the ordination of bishops in the primitive Church. Though the episcopal order be only one and the same, whether its jurisdiction be over a large city or a country village (ejusdem meriti et ejusdem est sacerdotii), yet undoubtedly in early times, in a certain sense, there were degrees as regards dignity and pre-eminence in the episcopate. The episcopal order may be arranged

[1] St. Jerome [Epist. 46, ad Evangelum,] and St. Chrysostom [Homil. xi. in 1 Timoth.] say that "a priest can do all that a bishop does," with the exception of ordination; and a modern learned writer maintains that a priest, from the inherent rights of his order, can baptize, celebrate the Holy Eucharist, and give the seal of the Holy Spirit in confirmation [Palmer's Treatise on the Church, vol. ii. p. 282]. A few words must here be added on this alleged right of a priest to administer confirmation. In the Western Church confirmation was always, in ancient and modern times, administered by the bishop, nor is there, probably, one instance on record of its delegation to a priest. In the Eastern Church, though now usually, as in early ages, priests confirm after baptism, yet it is only with chrism which has been consecrated by the bishop, and is thus really, and is so regarded as, confirmation by the bishop. Mouravieff, late procurator of the holy governing Synod of Russia, thus speaks of the Eastern usage: "Again let us admire the wisdom of the orthodox Church in allowing, as she does, to every priest when he has baptized an infant, to communicate to that infant at the same time the gifts of the Holy Ghost by anointing it with holy chrism. And as this chrism is always consecrated by a bishop, the result is, that the rule of the Church by which only a supreme pastor must confirm receives its full effect, the priest being here only the intermediary of the bishop" [Dr. Neale's Voices of the Church, p. 56, 1859].

[2] St. Epiphan., Advers. Hæreses, lib. iii. [Hæres. lv. sive lxxv.]; St. August., de Hæresibus, liii.

[3] Comment. in Epist. ad Titum, c. 1, v. 5.

[4] Nam et Alexandriæ a Marco Evangelista usque ad Heraclam et Dionysium Episcopos, Presbyteri semper unum ex se electum, in excelsiori gradu collocatum, Episcopum nominabant: quomodo si exercitus imperatorem faciat; aut Diaconi eligant de se, quem industrium noverint et archidiaconum vocent. [Ad Evangelum, epist. 146, sec. 1.]

[5] Morinus mentions three opinions or theories on the episcopal order—[1] that of Aërius, that a bishop and a presbyter are of one and the same order, universally condemned as heterodox; [2] that bishops are superior to presbyters by ecclesiastical usage or appointment only, which was the opinion of St. Jerome and of many subsequent writers, who allege his authority, and mainly repeat his arguments, and also of many of the schoolmen; [3] that bishops by Divine institution are superior to and of a higher order than presbyters. This latter theory Morinus shews is both accordant with Scripture and with the unanimous teaching of the early Church. He also suggests the probable reasons why St. Jerome proposed a new theory, and points out his rhetorical and exaggerated language in its defence. [De Sacris Ordinationibus, exercitat. iii. c. 3, 1695.]

into four classes—[1] Patriarchs, that is the Bishops of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Constantinople, or New Rome, who had ultimate jurisdiction within their several patriarchates, and even over bishops, not authorizing them to interfere with ordinary episcopal authority and rights, but only in cases of gross misgovernment, or of alleged or suspected heresy; [2] metropolitans or the bishop of the chief or mother Church of the province; [3] archbishops, or the first or presiding bishop of national churches; [4] ordinary bishops. It has been said that patriarchs under certain circumstances interfered with episcopal rights, which was true also of metropolitans and archbishops; but it must be further added, that in the early Church every bishop considered it a bounden duty to interfere when the purity of the faith was endangered. Then the catholic Church became as it were his diocese: heresy was not a mere local evil, but corrupted the body of Christ, which was one, the members united and sympathizing together. Thus, in the Apostle's words, if one member suffered, the other members suffered with it, or if one member were honoured, all the members rejoiced with it."

When a see was vacant, the bishop was chosen according to common usage by the clergy and people of the diocese. St. Cyprian mentions the suffrages of the people (populi suffragium), and the consent of fellow bishops (co-episcoporum) or the bishops of the province.[1] Referring to the Apostolical Constitutions,[2] we also find that the bishop was to be chosen by all the people (ὑπὸ πάντος τὸν λάου ἐκλελεγμένον): "And when he is designated and approved, let the people, assembling with the presbytery and bishops who are present on the Lord's day, give their consent, and let the chief of the bishops (πρόκριτος τῶν λοιπῶν) ask the presbyters and people whether they desire him for their ruler." The question was put three times, with inquiries into the good life and conversation of the bishop elect, then a sign of assent from all[3] is demanded, and the ordination follows. Further proof of the right of the clergy and people of a diocese to elect their bishop is unnecessary, as the fact is generally admitted. Suicer[4] has shewn by ample quotations that the same usage prevailed during twelve hundred years. The bishop was usually chosen from the clergy of his church, as implied by the suffrages of the clergy and people, which intimate a previous knowledge of his life and character, and ordinarily without such knowledge would have been a mere form; exceptions, however, to this rule were frequently made.[5] The consent of neighbouring bishops was also required on his nomination or election; he was ordinarily consecrated by three bishops.[6] In the Apostolical Canons we read, "by two or three bishops," and in the fourth canon of the Council of Nice, "that a bishop should be appointed by all the bishops of the province (ἐν τῇ ἐπαρχία), or at least that three should meet together in one place, those who are absent giving their suffrages and their assent in writing, and that then the ordination should be performed." It is added "that the confirming of what is done in each province belongs to the metropolitan." In the first Council of Arles [A.D. 314], seven bishops are required to assist at the ordination of a bishop, or at least three.[7] The hands of the ordaining bishop and of his assistants were laid upon the head of the bishop elect, and the book of the Gospels opened was placed upon his head and neck.[8] The essential Matter of ordination is the imposition of the bishop's hands, and the Form prayer, whether expressed indicatively or imperatively.[9] Some writers have considered as a part of the Matter, such usages as putting the opened book of the Gospels on the head and neck, the unction, or giving him the book closed with injunction to preach the Gospel, or the pastoral staff and ring;[10]

[1] Quando ipsa (plebs) maxime habeat potestatem vel eligendi dignos sacerdotes vel indignos recusandi, . . . ordinationes sacerdotales non nisi sub populi assistentis conscientia fieri oportere, ut plebe præsente vel detegantur malorum crimina vel bonorum merita prædicentur ut sit ordinatio justa et legitima quæ omnium suffragio et judicio fuerit examinata, . . . ad ordinationes rite celebrandas, ad eam plebem cui propositus ordinatur, episcopi ejusdam provinciæ proximi quique conveniant et episcopus delegatur plebe præsente quæ singulorum vitam plenissime novit [Epist. 67, ad Stephanum].

[2] Lib. viii. c. 4.

[3] Probably by raising their hands. Cotelerius, in his note on this passage, refers to the Epistle of Synesius: σύνθημα τῆς χειροτονίας.

[4] Thesaurus Eccl. sub voc. ἐπίσκοπος, et vid. Dronven, De re Sacramentaria, lib. viii. sec. 11.

[5] Bingham, Orig. lib. ii. A bishop was also required before ordination to pass through and discharge the offices of reader, deacon, and priest, ordination per saltum being forbidden by the Council of Sardica [A.D. 347], though exceptions were frequently made in cases of merit or especial fitness for the office.

[6] Apostol. Constitut. lib. iii. c. 20.

[7] Canon xx.

[8] The deacons holding the Holy Gospels opened upon the head of him who is to be ordained [Apost. Constitut. lib. vii. c. 4], or two bishops, according to the fourth Council of Carthage [A.D. 398], c. 2.

[9] In the Western Church we have the imperative form which was not in use in the early ages of the Church, "accipe Spiritum Sanctum," whilst in the Eastern Church the form is indicative, as, "Do Thou, O Lord, confirm him by the grace of Thy Holy Spirit," but though verbally differing, the form in these two Churches is essentially the same. The Church, in the latter case, with assured faith, prays in the name of our Lord [John xiv. 13, 14] for that Gift which He imparted to the Apostles [John xx. 21-23], and promised implicitly at least to their successors.

[10] In the Western Church, according to the Roman Pontifical, the consecrator places the book of the Gospels opened, with the aid of assistant bishops, upon the head and neck of the bishop-elect; then follows imposition of the bishop's hands, (the consecrator and his assistants) with the words, "Receive the Holy Ghost:" the head and both hands of the bishop being anointed, and the pastoral staff and ring given to him. The consecrator, with the assistance of the other bishops, then takes the book of the Gospels from the head and shoulders of the bishop, and gives it closed into his hand, and says, "Take the Gospel, go preach to the people," &c. The bishop consecrated then receives the kiss of peace, a mitre is placed on his head, and a ring on his hand. In the Eastern Church, the bishop-elect, after making a profession of his faith, is led to the altar, and kneels before the consecrator and his assistants; the book of the Gospels opened is laid on his head and neck, and held there by two bishops; he is thrice signed with the cross on the but, as learned theologians of the Church of Rome have proved, none of them are to be considered as essential to valid ordination.[1]

It has been a subject of dispute whether consecration by one bishop is invalid: though uncanonical, it cannot be regarded as being null and void, and as such to be repeated. The well-known case of Evagrius proves this; though consecrated by one bishop only, Paulinus, the validity of his ordination was admitted both in the East and West. More than one ordaining bishop is required, and the sanction of neighbouring bishops, that proof may be afforded of unity and brotherhood with the bishop ordained; they virtually attest by their presence and consent to his consecration, his orthodoxy, and fitness for the office. It is also evident that by three consecrating bishops rather than one, the fullest assurance is given of the transmission of orders from an Apostolic origin.

In the Apostolical Constitutions, fifty is mentioned as the age for a bishop's ordination; in some churches thirty years, as being the age when our Lord began His ministry. But age was not deemed essential; exceptions were frequently made in cases of especial fitness; thus St. Athanasius is said to have been consecrated at the age of twenty-five.

BLASPHEMY. The general sense of βλασφημία, as evil speaking against any person, has been somewhat restricted in the ecclesiastical use of the word; and blasphemy must be understood to mean, primarily, words wilfully thought, spoken or written, to the dishonour of God. Several classes of such blasphemy may be pointed out, and though the subject is repulsive to a reverent mind, it cannot be passed over in a work like the present.

[1.] Blasphemy, then, may be by direct reviling of God. Illustrations of such a fearful crime are found in the words of Job's wife, "Curse God, and die" [Job ii. 9]; in those of whom St. James says, "Do not they blaspheme that worthy Name by the which ye are called?" [James ii. 7]; and in St. John's prophetic revelation of the wickedness which will accompany the last judgment, when some will blaspheme God and His Name in impenitent rage [Rev. xvi. 9, 11, 21].

[2.] It may also consist in wilfully and knowingly attributing to God qualities which He is incapable of possessing, such as injustice or mortality.

[3.] And, conversely, in wilfully and knowingly denying His proper attributes, such as justice, or love.

[4.] It may also consist in reviling or denying God's work, especially His spiritual work. Of this kind is "the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost" [Matt. xii. 31, 32]. To this sin belongs a guilt beyond that belonging to any other, our Lord declaring that it shall not be forgiven, "neither in this world, neither in the world to come." The particular instance of it which drew out this fearful revelation from Him was that of the Pharisees attributing His miracles to the power of Satan instead of the power of God. But even when visible miracles are not wrought, it is possible to make so near an approach to the same kind of blasphemy, that there may be great fear it is identical with it. Thus the Holy Ghost regenerates the soul in baptism, and confers the gifts of the ministry in ordination, and for any one to deny wilfully and knowingly that he or other baptized persons have been regenerated, or that the gift of the Holy Ghost has been bestowed on him or others by ordination, is certain in some degree to commit this sin. It is so in a still higher degree when the work of the Holy Ghost is repudiated by act as well as by word, as by the iteration of baptism or of ordination. Wilful despair of salvation has also been considered by the best theologians as a sin of the same character, since there are no limits to the power, mercy, and love of God, except those set by the sinner himself.

[5.] Blasphemy against God may be also comprehended in evil speaking against His creatures, as against human beings, the holy angels, and even the fallen angels. This is illustrated by a passage in St. Jude, "Likewise these filthy dreamers speak evil of dignities [δόξας δὲ βλασφημοῦσιν]. But Michael, the archangel, when contending with the Devil . . . durst not bring against him a railing accusation" [οὐκ ἐτόλμησε κρίσιν ἐπενεγκεῖν βλασφημίας]. The force of head for the benediction of the Holy Trinity, then follows imposition of the bishop's hands, and a prayer for the gift of the Holy Spirit.

[1] Thus Drouven: "In eo namque ritu materia episcopatus posita est quem solum præscribit Scripturæ et traditionis auctoritas: atqui solum manuum impositio in episcopi ordinatione Scripturæ et traditionis auctoritate præscribitur. Non aliter a Græcis et Latinis olim episcoporum consecratio quam χειροτονία sive manuum impositio vocabatur: in hoc ergo ritu totam ordinationis materiam contineri, communis doctrina erat." [De re Sacramentaria, lib. viii. c. 8.]

[2] Morinus also shews that the usages in the text are not essential. Let us take them in order—[1] putting the Gospel on the head and neck. The Fathers, he says, never speak of this usage as essential to episcopal ordination, but only of putting on hands [cum causam et rationem episcopatus alligant]. Again, he shews that this usage was not from the beginning in use in all churches, as in Alexandria, France, Spain, Italy, but was only gradually introduced. He thinks, therefore, that it is not probable that it is essential to valid ordination [admodum probabile mihi est ad ordinationis episcopalis substantiam non pertinere]. But Drouven uses more explicit and decisive language, clearly shewing that the usage is not essential. "The Apostles," as he says, "ordained bishops before the Gospels were written, and, afterwards, many ages elapsed before we hear of this usage; it is not even mentioned by Isidore of Spain [died A.D. 636], though he has carefully investigated and minutely describes the usages or ceremonies of episcopal ordination" [De re Sacramentaria, lib. viii. c. 8]. The unction of the bishop-elect, the same writer shews, is not mentioned in the Greek Euchology, and was never in use in the Eastern Church, and thus, as her rite of ordination is universally considered as valid by the Western Church, unction cannot be deemed essential even by Roman theologians. The custom of giving the Gospel into the hand of the bishop, and the pastoral staff and ring, also cannot be deemed indispensable to valid ordination, as being unknown for six or seven centuries, and also for another reason,—before they are given the person consecrated, hitherto called "elect," is termed bishop: he is thus considered duly ordained, previously to his receiving what we may call the insignia of his office.

which passage is, that if an archangel dared not to speak evil of the devil, how dare a man do so against angelic dignities, and thus blaspheme the majesty of God whose creatures and servants they are. Thus execrations, imprecations, and all kinds of "profane swearing" have the nature of blasphemy.

The law of England is very strict in defining this sin as a public crime; the Statute 9 & 10 Gulielm. III. c. 32, "an Act for the more effectual suppressing of Blasphemy and Profaneness," enacting penalties upon any who in "writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking" shall deny one of the Persons in the Holy Trinity to be God, shall maintain there are more gods than One, deny the truth of the Christian religion, or the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures. [Stephens' Ecc. Statutes, i. 667.]

BLOOD. [I.] Its sacred character. From the beginning to the end of the Holy Scriptures there are indications that a sacred character belongs to blood, whether the blood of animals or of mankind. God speaks to Cain of Abel's blood crying to Him from the ground, and of the earth having opened to receive it [Gen. iv. 10, 11; cf. Heb. xii. 24]. In giving a law to mankind after the Deluge, there is a commandment against using the blood of animals for food, and one respecting murder and suicide, in which the blood of the person killed is that which God declares Himself to require at the hands of the slayer [Gen. ix. 4-6]. In the law given to the Jews, the law given to mankind at large was re-enacted, "Whatsoever soul it be that eateth any manner of blood, even that soul shall be cut off from his people" [Lev. vii. 26, 27]. "No soul of you shall eat blood; . . . he shall even pour out the blood thereof, and cover it with dust" [Lev. xvii. 12, 13]. "Only be sure that thou eat not the blood: . . . thou shalt not eat it, thou shalt pour it upon the earth like water" [Deut. xii. 23, 24]. In much later times the force of this precept was still recognised as binding, and its transgression a sin [1 Sam. xiv. 32, 33] against which God declares His anger [Ezek. xxxiii. 25]. And even in the Christian Church, although the sacrifices of animals were discontinued, the precept respecting blood as an article of food was re-enacted, and made binding on Gentile Christians as well as on those who were of Jewish birth [Acts xv. 20, 29, xxi. 25]. That the precept was observed after all the earlier associations between Judaism and Christianity had passed away, is also shewn by the words of Tertullian, who refutes the charge made against the Christians of having human blood at their feasts, by declaring that they abstain even from the blood of animals, and hold unlawful the eating of "sausages made with blood." [Tertul. Apologet. ix.]

[II.] Association of it with life. This sacred character of blood appears to arise from an essential physiological relation between it and life and the soul. Thus in the Noachian precept respecting murder, the Divine expression is "Your blood of your lives," and respecting the flesh of animals, "the life thereof, which is the blood thereof" [Gen. ix. 4, 5]. Ages after, words of a similar import were emphatically spoken by God to the Jews, "For the life of the flesh is in the blood." "It is the life of all flesh; the blood of it is for the life thereof; . . . for the life of all flesh is the blood thereof" [Lev. xxii. 11, 14]. "The blood is the life, and thou mayest not eat the life with the flesh" [Deut. xii. 23]. To which direct declarations of Divine Omniscience may be added the usus loquendi of Holy Scripture in respect to death, which is continually associated with the shedding of blood, and the pouring out of blood, as if the typical expression for the loss of life was the loss of blood: and also with the "pouring out of the soul," the "offering of the soul," and other similar expressions (especially in the LXX.), as if there was an identity between the soul and the blood, which is the life. This is the more striking, as there is never any such association between blood and spirit.

Although, therefore, it is not possible to assign a local habitat to animal life, we may reasonably suppose that as it is generally associated with the whole body of the living person, so it is particularly associated with the blood. Perhaps we may venture to adopt the expression that, as the body is the shrine of life, so the blood is its vehicle.

[III.] The use of blood in sacrifice. This subject is treated of under the article ATONEMENT. It need only be repeated here that the Divine Word is very distinct on this point, "For the life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar, to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul" [Lev. xvii. 11].

[IV.] The Blood of our Lord. But beyond such considerations as belong to blood in its relation to the life of animals and the salvation of man, it must also be remembered that it is especially associated with the redeeming and sanctifying work of our Lord.

a] For, in the first place, the shedding of the blood of Christ is the typical act which marks the offering up of His life as a propitiatory and redeeming sacrifice: "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood" [Rom. iii. 25]; "Having made peace by the blood of His cross, by Him to reconcile all things to Himself" [Col. i. 20]; "In whom we have redemption through His blood" [Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14]; "The Church of God, which He hath purchased with His own blood" [Acts xx. 28]. Nor is this view of the propitiatory effect of Christ's blood shedding restricted to the act; for that effect is clearly represented as continuous: "By His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us" [Heb. ix. 12]; and there He is seen as one "clothed with a vesture dipped in blood" [Rev. xix. 13], and is continually praised in the memorial hymn of His passion: "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood" [Rev. v. 9].

b] In the second place, the blood of Christ is Scripturally represented as having a present relation, as a cleansing power, to the spiritual nature of mankind: "How much more shall the blood of Christ . . . purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God" [Heb. ix. 14]; "Elect, according to the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" [1 Pet. i. 2]; "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin" [1 John i. 7], even that blood, which, like His holy Body is transfigured by its union with Divine Personality, so that the robes of the saints may be washed therein, and "made white" by its all cleansing power [Rev. vii. 14].

c] And thirdly, the same blood of our Lord is set forth as having a present relation of life-giving power to the spiritual nature of mankind in all those passages which refer to His body and blood as the means of sacramental life: "This is My Blood," said our Lord, as well as "This is My Body" [Matt. xxvi. 28, &c.]. "The cup of blessing which we bless," said St. Paul, "is it not the communion of the Blood of Christ" [1 Cor. x. 16]. And our Lord, again, in His clear prophetic words, "Whoso eateth My Flesh, and drinketh My Blood, hath eternal life: . . . for My Flesh is meat indeed, and My Blood is drink indeed" [John vi. 54, 55].

BODY, MYSTICAL. The union between Christ and Christians is of so real a nature, that the Church is called by St. Paul the Body of Christ—"for His Body's sake, which is the Church" [Col. i. 24]; "The Church, which is His Body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all" [Eph. i. 23]; "For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the Body of Christ" [Eph. iv. 12]; "Now ye are the Body of Christ, and members in particular" [1 Cor. xii. 27]; "For we are members of His Body, of His Flesh, and of His bones" [Eph. v. 30]. The truth of the Apostle's words, "This is a great mystery," is so self-evident, that it is customary in speaking of the Church as Christ's Body to call it His "Mystical Body," as being a state of union and co-existence between Christ and Christians, which is to be believed rather than explained. Nevertheless, the truth revealed in Holy Scripture and involved in this expression is that the spiritual life of Christians is the life of Christ. He is sacramentally communicated to and united with them, so that the Church is "the fulness," i.e. the complement "of Him that filleth all in all" [Chrysos. in Eph. i. 24]. Hence the Church is not only a congeries of material bodies and immaterial souls, it is also such a congeries united into one mystical Body by the extension to and penetration of all by the living and life-giving Christ.

BODY, NATURAL. The theological aspect of the human body, in its relation to sin and holiness, will be found in another article [Asceticism]. It is only necessary here to consider the theological aspect of its original and of its existing material condition.

[I.] Its Creation. The only knowledge which we possess respecting the creation of the human body is that which is derived from Holy Scripture. Scientific induction can carry the inquiry into its origin only as far as one or more protoplasts, and beyond that point we are dependent on revelation, the testimony of which is substantially contained in Gen. i. 26, 27; ii. 7, 21-23; v. 1, 2. These several passages tell us that God created man "in the image of God;" that He "formed man of the dust of the ground," causing him to become a living soul by breathing into his nostrils the breath of life; that He created human nature in two sexes; and that the first woman was formed from the substance of the first man.

From this account it is evident that the human body was not created out of nothing, but from a pre-existing substance. This is also re-stated in the subsequent words of God, "till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" [Gen. iii. 19]. Some further evidence to the same purport is also found in the book of Job, "Remember, I beseech Thee, that Thou hast made me as the clay; and wilt Thou bring me into dust again?" [Job x. 9]; and also by the reference of the prophet Jeremiah and St. Paul to the potter's work with clay when speaking of the creation of man by God [Jer. xviii. 6; Rom. ix. 20, 21]. We must not, however, look on such a mode of creation from any anthropomorphic point of view. The continuous processes of natural action are ever transforming inorganic substances into plants; but our Lord's will was enough instantaneously to transform the inorganic substance of water into the organic substance of wine. The first is an illustration of the intermediate process by which comminuted mineral matter is always being changed into bone, muscle, blood, &c.; the second, of that Divine force by which intermediate processes are overleaped and superseded, and the simplest forms of matter changed into the most complex. In the creation of the human body, then, we are not to imagine the Creator as one standing before a mass of clay and moulding it into a man; but with the eye of faith to regard Him as acting by His will upon the inert matter, so that it became at once an organized being, instead of by a long course of intermediate processes, and by assimilation.

It is to be observed, as regards the creation of the first woman, that it was of a more intermediate character than that of the first man. The substance of the woman's body was taken from the substance of the man's; and whereas life was conveyed to the body of man by a direct communication of it from God, it appears (from the absence of anything to that effect in the narrative) not to have been so conveyed to the body of woman, but by a derivation of it from the life given to man. Thus "the woman" seems to have been "of the man" [1 Cor. xi. 12] as entirely as the child is "of" its parents: the material substance and the life of the one organized living being coming from the material substance and life of another, instead of coming from the primal matter of the earth and the original Fountain of life.

[II.] The Fall influenced the body of man as well as his soul. It was originally created with a capacity for immortality, which capacity was to become a possession and reality by its participation of some food spoken of as the "tree of life," and of which traditions survived even outside of Revelation, in the "ambrosia" and "nectar" of the Grecian mythology. It appears as if even the capacity for immortality was destroyed by the Fall; but whether this were so or not, it is certain that the means of immortality ceased to be within its reach, for man was no longer permitted to put forth his hand and take of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever [Gen. iii. 22], but was driven out from its neighbourhood, and prevented from returning thither by supernatural hindrances [Gen. iii. 24].

There was probably a loss of corporeal beauty and vigour consequent upon the Fall. "Thou shalt die" was a sentence that extended itself over the whole course of each man's life,—"dying, thou shalt die." For death is the climax of a more or less prolonged disorganization of the body, and disease is death in its more or less interrupted or unimpeded stages of disorganization: "As soon as we were born we began to draw to our end" [Wisd. v. 13]. Nor does it seem probable that so momentous a change in the final capacity of the body should be unaccompanied by any proximate change in beauty and vigour, even leaving out of the account that loss of the Image of God which may have involved the loss of a bodily perfection that was not again to be found until God Himself became Incarnate.

A degeneration of the natural body seems therefore to have been one inevitable result of the Fall of man, but no data exist by means of which we can form any estimate as to the extent to which such a degeneration took place. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the work of the Incarnation (which extends to the body so far, at least, as to give it capacities for holy living and for future resurrection) may have elevated our corporeal nature above the condition into which it was thus brought by the Fall, and in some measure have repaired the ensuing degeneration. But disease and death still maintain their hold over it, and perfection will be re-attained, not in the natural body which retains the capacity for dying, but in the SPIRITUAL BODY, to which the capacity for immortality will be restored.

BODY, SPIRITUAL. In 1 Cor. xv. 44, St. Paul writes respecting the external and organic part of our nature, that in death "it is sown a natural body," but that in the resurrection, "it is raised a spiritual body:" and he emphasizes his words by adding, "There is a natural body" [σῶμα ψυχικὸν] "and there is a spiritual body" [σῶμα πνευματικόν]. The language of the chapter in which these words occur is very precise and the argument close and exact, and there is no room for imagining either that the expression "spiritual body" is rhetorical, or that it contains any real contradiction of terms. Taking it in its literal sense the emphatic declaration of the Apostle is an assertion that our nature will, in the resurrection, have something corresponding to its present external and organic body, but of a much more attenuated and spiritual substance. Angelic beings appear to have bodies of such a nature [ANGELS]: and the Body of our Lord appears to have undergone a change in its Resurrection which made it the archetype of risen human bodies. [RESURRECTION.]

It is evident that the organic nature of the human body is in a large degree adapted for a state of existence which there is every reason to think will not form part of future resurrection life. The functions connected with food, and with the reproduction of the species, are commonly, and with good reason, supposed to belong to this life only: and it is a reasonable corollary that the organic systems framed for the operation of those functions will either [1] form no part of the nature which does not any longer require them, or [2] be in an undeveloped condition analogous to that of rudimentary limbs in the lower animals. On the other hand, the functions connected with thought and expression of thought may be expected to be highly developed in a life, the intellectual sphere and capacities of which will be so much more expanded than those of the present life. And thus, without venturing further into speculation, it may not unreasonably be conjectured that the "spiritual body" will be a reproduction of such portions of our bodily nature as are associated with the operations of mind, as distinguished from those which are associated with the operations of matter. But the complete definition and distinction of these several portions is beyond the power of physiological science.

BREVIARY. The late English form of the Latin name given in continental countries to the book containing the daily services of the Church. The ancient Latin equivalent in the Church of England was PORTIFORIUM, which was translated by Portuis or Portess. The word Breviarium is of considerable antiquity, for it was in common use in the time of Micrologus, whose commentary on Divine Service was written about A.D. 1180. It is supposed to have been formed from Breve Orarium, and it may have been introduced when St. Benedict condensed and shortened the daily offices for his rule, that is, in the sixth century [Grancolas, p. 5, ed. 1734]. The Breviary is a collection of the Psalms, Lessons, Prayers and Hymns which form "the Hours," that is the daily offices of Divine Service as distinct from the Liturgy. There is a much greater variety of Breviaries than of Missals in the Western Church, but they are reducible to four principal classes, viz., the Roman, the Gallican, the Mozarabic, and the Anglican. There was formerly also a great variety of Monastic Breviaries, derived from that constructed for his order by St. Benedict. For detailed accounts of the various Breviaries the reader is referred to the volume on LITURGIES, which forms part of this series. The fullest and most satisfactory historical work on the Breviary is the Commentarius Historicus in Romanum Breviarium of Grancolas, printed in French in the year 1728, and in this Latin translation (probably by the original author) in A.D. 1734.

BRIEF. An official document issued by the Pope; and generally with reference to matters of temporary importance, rather than, as Bulls, for those of a permanent character. Briefs begin with the name of the Pope by whom they are issued, e.g., "Pius Papa IX.," are signed by the Cardinal Secretary of State, and are dated from the Nativity. They are written in modern characters, on fine parchment; and are sealed with the Pope's signet-ring called the "Seal of the Fisherman," from its design, which is that of St. Peter drawing his net to land. [BULL. CHIROGRAPH.]

BRIEF, ROYAL. [ALMS.]

BUDDHISM. A system partly religious and philosophical, but mainly social and philanthropical, which emerged from the bosom of Indian Brahmanism, according to Chinese authorities, about B.C. 1000, according to Indian about B.C. 600.

[I.] Antecedents. In the fifteenth or sixteenth century B.C., the Brahmans, a branch of the white Aryans, migrated from the north-west into Hindustan, where they found a more numerous race of coloured and more barbarous aborigines. Amongst the immigrants the sacerdotal families, and the royal or noble class, were already distinct from the people at large; and the fixed position of inferiority in which the aborigines stood to the immigrants as a whole extended gradually in its measure to the inferior class of the latter. The result was the most rigid system of caste which the world has ever known: the priests and nobles forming a coalition to oppress the two inferior castes, with an inhumanity unparalleled in history. Intermarriage was forbidden, and the perpetuity of the caste distinctions carefully inculcated.

Parallel with the social inferiority of the two lower castes grew up a religious one. The polytheistic nature-worship of the Brahmans, in their original seats, gradually gave way, among the more educated classes, to an exceedingly vivid notion of one Infinite and Eternal Spirit, in comparison with whose perfections the individual life of man seemed mean and miserable. To be rid of personality, the form and condition of earthly existence, was thus the supreme object of desire. From the lower people, however, to whom life was (not merely theoretically) a scene of misery, this doctrine of a Supreme Spirit, in whom the individual might look to lose himself and find rest, was carefully concealed: they still believed in the gods and demons, and in an endless series of states of existence through which the soul was continually migrating.

[II.] Buddha's reform mainly consisted 1, in a slight modification of the doctrine of absorption; 2, in the extension to all the people of that which had hitherto been the monopoly of the instructed; and 3, in a philanthropical revolution founded upon the principle of the equality of all men.

a] His life falls into four periods. Born of a royal family in the east of Hindustan, he lived for the first twenty-nine years in the luxury and magnificence of his father's court. At the end of that time he "awakened" (Buddha = "the awakened") to the transitoriness and unreality of earthly existence, and went forth as a beggar to study in the schools of the Brahman priests. Dissatisfied with their doctrines, he withdrew into the forests for seven years to meditate, at the end of which he began a life of preaching, mortification, and philanthropy, which continued for forty-eight years, until his death in B.C. 543.

b] The doctrine of Buddha is a development of the following four principles:—1, Every kind of existence is transitory and painful; 2, all existence is the result of passion in some previous form of existence; therefore 3, the extinction of passion is the one means to escape from existence and from the misery which is inseparable from it; hence 4, all obstacles to this extinction of existence must be eliminated.

By existence is meant that separation from the general Being of the world which is involved in individual life and in the opposition of the subject which thinks, and the object which is thought about; by extinction of existence is meant, not so much annihilation, as the becoming one with Nature, in which that form of consciousness which separates subject and object is done away. This extinction Buddha called "the blowing out of the lamp" (Nirvâna), which does not necessarily imply the annihilation of consciousness altogether, but only of a finite form of consciousness, which may be as the light of a lamp to the light of day. Of God he does not seem to have spoken, nor to have identified Nirvâna with the Brahmanic absorption into the Divine essence. Of the gods of the people he says that they are, like men, subject to the law of Metempsychosis, or transmigration through an endless series of states of existence, and are therefore unworthy to be worshipped, because they are unable to deliver. Hence it would be incorrect to call Buddha either a theist or an atheist: he simply describes a state of absolute repose as an escape from the popular Metempsychosis, which is susceptible either of a theistic or an atheistic interpretation, but which he did not himself refer in any way to the idea of God.

This Nirvâna may be attained by all. "As there is no difference between the body of a prince and that of a beggar, so there is none between their spirits. Every man alike is capable of coming to a knowledge of the truth, and to work out his own emancipation, if he but will to do so."

The means to this are the extinction of passion, the surrender of the dearest wishes, of property, of the barest necessities, even of life itself, for the sake of others.

All hindrances to this end, which each would try to remove from his own way, he must try to remove from the path of others. Of these the principal are the laws, rites, and institutions of Brahmanism. Secondly, no Buddhist may do harm to another, by which his attainment of perfection may be hindered. Kindness, compassion, gentleness, pity, love, toleration are to be shewn by Buddhists, not only to each other but to all. Thirdly, the planting of trees, digging of wells, the building of public places of shelter and rest, and the general amelioration of the life of the people, complete the simple code of ethics.

c] His institutions. The practice of philanthropy, however, will not by itself lead to Nirvâna: whilst the higher asceticism is unattainable by the majority of men. This led Buddha to divide his community into two orders, the laity, who practised the former, and who, although not escaping the fate of Metempsychosis, might hope to attain some higher state of existence, in which the practice of asceticism would be more possible; and the clergy, who applied themselves wholly to working out their own emancipation, supported by alms and the contributions of the laity. The clerical order was open to all, even to women who were strong enough to practise the necessary mortifications; and from it any might recede who felt themselves too weak. The principal duties of the clergy were public preaching, open confession before the community, and the cenobitic life. In the course of time an ascending scale of degrees in perfection gave rise to an elaborate hierarchy culminating (in Thibet) in a kind of pope, the Grand Lama.

[III.] The spread of Buddhism was remarkably rapid. The nucleus of the community, which was destined to supplant the Brahmanic system of caste, was composed of persons from the lowest of the people, "the weary and heavy laden;" this was soon joined by some of the priests, glad to be relieved from the painful study of the Vedas, and by several members of the noble and royal caste, who seized the opportunity of relieving themselves from the oppressive tutelage of the priests. The new doctrine seems to have spread first—a] In the north-west of Hindustan, where Brahmanism had never taken deep root. Crossing the border, it found favour with the descendants of Alexander and the Greek populations; through them it passed on to Alexandria, where it exercised an important influence upon the growth of Neo-Platonic philosophy. It left its mark, too, on Manichæism and some of the Gnostic schools.

b] In Hindustan generally about the third century B.C. This is known from the stone-inscriptions of King Piyadasi, which are found in the east, north and middle of the country, and which contain the chief rules of Buddhist morals. It began to decline about the seventh century A.D., and was soon driven, with fire and sword, out of the country in the eighth. A remnant, however, is still found in the south-west.

c] In Ceylon it took root very early; and the Cingalese sacred books are some of the most reliable authorities for the early history of the movement.

d] In Inner Asia, China and Thibet, Buddhism spread in the second century B.C., where it attained its most perfect hierarchical development in the eighth and ninth A.D.

From China it penetrated to Japan, from Ceylon (probably) into Burmah and Siam, Java and the Indian Archipelago, though at what date is uncertain. At present it forms the almost exclusive religion of between one-fifth and one-fourth of the whole human race.

[IV.] Collateral Effects. 1. As a kind of reformation, it reacted upon the old Brahmanic religion, which soon purified itself of human sacrifice and the more barbarous parts of its ceremonial; many obscenities of custom disappeared; and the old Polytheism partly gave way before a modification of the doctrine of the One Infinite Being. The festival of Juggernaut, during which all distinction of caste ceases, and Buddhist symbols are used, marks the necessity which the Brahmans were under of retaining some relics of Buddhism, as they were of classing Buddha himself among the Avatars of their god Vishnu. 2. Buddhism may be said to be the parent of Indian architecture, which, though based at first on Greek models, soon assumed a character of its own, as is seen in the enormous temples, especially the celebrated one on the west coast of India. Reverence for their founder, too, developed an historical sense and accuracy, which, e.g., in the Cingalese historians, compares very favourably with that of the Brahmans. 3. The effect of the new religion upon the Mongols was that of turning into mild and peaceable people one of the most bloodthirsty races of Asia.

[V.] Deterioration. The utter absence of any other object of worship, and the reverence for his work of emancipation, soon led to the worship of Buddha himself, and to the obscuration of his name by an overgrowth of miracles and legends. The same causes led to the veneration of his relics; and the erection of reliquary towers is supposed by some to have given the first idea of church towers to Christian art.

[VI.] Points of contact with Christianity. The absence of any theological element in Buddhism distinguishes it toto cælo from Christianity. But there are many external points of similarity which a well-prepared missionary might turn to account. Like Christianity, Buddhism stood in opposition to a law and ceremonial which had become a hard taskmaster; like Christianity, too, it afforded a relief to the "weary and heavy laden," by calling away the mind to the spiritual world, and, on the other hand, by the doctrine of the brotherhood of all classes and nations of men. The philanthropy of the one is very like that of the other; and the moral ideal, gentleness, meekness, long-suffering, compassion, love, is common to both. A Roman Catholic missionary would also find analogies in the monastic orders, the celibacy and tonsure of the clergy, the use of rosaries, the veneration of relics, &c. It might also be possible for one well-versed in the Pauline method of evangelization [Acts xvii. 23] so to interpret both the doctrine of Nirvâna and the cultus of Buddha as to be able to build them up gradually into the Christian faith. [Consult Weber's Indische Studien, Skizzen und Seifen; Max Müller's Chips, &c., i. 9 and 10; St. Hilaire, Le Bouddha.]

BULL. The highest kind of official and authoritative document which is issued by the Pope. The name is derived from the "Bulla," or leaden seal with which the document is authenticated. This is struck from a double die, which is kept in great secrecy at the Camellaria, and is attached to the document by a cord of hemp (or of silk in more important cases) in the manner in which seals were always attached in mediæval times. Bulls are engrossed on strong rough parchment, and always begin with the formula "[Pius IX.] Episcopus, Servus Servorum Dei, ad futuram," or "ad perpetuam rei memoriam." They are signed by the functionaries of the Papal Chancery, and are dated from the Incarnation. [CHIROGRAPH. BRIEF.]

BURIAL OF THE DEAD. In all nations, and from the earliest times, the burial of the dead has been attended with importance. On political as well as theological grounds this has been necessary. The interment of the body in the ground is the most ancient and most general, but not the universal practice. The cave of Machpelah is the first instance named of a special place for burial [Gen. xxiii. 4-9]. As this cave was purchased by Abraham for himself and his descendants, so it became a special direction with the dying patriarchs that they should be buried there. The solemn funeral of Jacob [Gen. l.] was conducted after the Egyptian manner. The body of Joseph also was embalmed and put in a coffin. The spicery and balm and myrrh carried by the Ishmaelites into Egypt was used for these embalmings. The place of burial was held sacred, and the graves of illustrious men or of dear friends were selected by the living as the scene of their own burial [1 Kings xiii. 31]. The passages in the Old Testament which have been thought to shew that the Jews occasionally burned dead bodies appear to refer only to the burning of spices on the bodies [1 Sam. xxxi. 12; 2 Chron. xvi. 14, xxi. 19; Jer. xxxiv. 5]. Nor has the rite of burning the dead ever been practised among Christians. The attempted revival of the practice in France, towards the end of the last century, met with little favour. The care bestowed by the ancient Jews on funereal rites shews the belief in a future resurrection, and in the immortality of the soul. It was a pious work to bury the dead, even of the enemy [Tob. i. 17; 2 Kings ix. 34; Ezek. xxxix. 14, 15]. And an unseemly burial was regarded as a great disgrace [Jer. viii. 2; xxii. 19; Eccles. vi. 3; 2 Macc. v. 10]. Frequent reference occurs in Holy Scripture to the burial customs of the heathen around [Deut. xiv. 1; Ps. cvi. 28; Lev. xix. 27, 28; Jer. xvi. 6-8]. Hired women to mourn seem always to have attended Jewish funerals [Jer. ix. 17, 18; Amos v. 16]. In the time of our Saviour we find the use of spices continued [Matt. xxvi. 12; John xix. 40]; and from the instances of the widow's son at Nain, Lazarus, and our Lord Himself, we may gather that coffins were not used. The care and attention bestowed upon the dead by the early Christians did not escape the notice of their heathen persecutors. They attempted to aggravate the last hours of the martyrs by threatening them with dishonourable burial. In many cases this was intended to prevent the honour paid to their memory and the meetings around their tombs. But Diocletian and Maximian tolerated the burial of martyrs.[1] From the earliest times burial near martyrs was accounted honourable, and Christians had their cemeteries separate from the Gentiles.[2] Some heretics, when in power, refused burial to the Catholics.

At first the dead were buried anywhere. The Christians conformed to the Pagan laws regarding extramural interments.[3] Monuments were erected by the highway. Baronius names forty-three burial-places in the suburbs of Rome,[4] and gives a description of one discovered in his time [c. A.D. 1578]. In the fourth century, laws and rulers being alike Christian, martyria were erected over these burial-places. In general the extension of the boundaries of a city would by degrees include those κοιμητήρια which had been at first outside. Gradually interments were allowed inside a church. The first Council of Braga [A.D. 563], allows men to be buried in churchyards; the first concession was to kings and emperors, who might be buried in the porch; and laymen were expressly forbidden to be buried in church at the Council of Tribur [A.D. 811]. This was permitted at the Council of Mentz [A.D. 813].[5] The earliest mention of consecration of cemeteries is by Gregory of Tours [A.D. c. 570]. As soon as persecutions ceased the Christians used hymns and psalmody at their funerals, and from Chrysostom we learn some that were so used.[6] They were chosen to express joy and thanksgiving; not sorrow, as of men without hope. Burials were always by day; but lighted torches were used. Some funeral orations over eminent persons are still extant. Flowers also were strewn over the grave. Martyrs were buried in ecclesiastical vestments. There has never been any alteration in the custom of placing the body on its back, and with the feet to the east. We find very early evidence of a set body of men who made the proper conduct of funerals their special care [see also Acts v. 6, viii. 2]. The κοπιάται, laborantes, fossarii, were orders who undertook the whole care of funerals, and, from the poor, required no payment. They worked for their living. Fees for burials were regarded at first as a kind of simony, but the custom of accepting them is of ancient date. Pope Gregory attempted to suppress the custom.[7] An epitaph given by Baronius [A.D. 618] has the amount paid for the sepulchre named: "solidos vi. depositus." In the ninth century, some claimed

[1] Bar. 302, xxx.

[2] Cypr. Ep. 67: quoted Bar. iii. 258, 4. Cyprian accuses Martialis of having buried his sons among the Gentiles:—Quibus plane significatur, Christianos a Gentilibus sepulchra discreta habere solitos, nefasque fuisse se illis post obitum commiscere a quibus viventes abhorruissent.

[3] Laws of the Twelve Tables, Cic. de Legg. ii. 58; quoted by Bingham.

[4] Bar. 226, ix.

[5] Nullus mortuus infra ecclesiam sepeliatur, nisi episcopi, aut abbates, aut digni presbyteri, aut fideles laici.

[6] Ps. xvi. xxiii. lix. Chrys. Hom. 4.

[7] Noveris nos illicitam antiquam consuetudinem a nostra ecclesia omnino vetuisse, nec cuiquam assensum præbere ut loca humandi corporis pretio adipisci. Greg. 7, ep. 4.

hereditary rights of interment in France, after the example of the Patriarchs. The Council of Meaux [A.D. 845] forbade it. Leo III. was the first to sanction it [c. A.D. 1230]. Some of our reformers wished to abolish the custom as a corruption.

The solemn rites at burials have often been wholly suspended at times of great epidemics. And not only so, but the bodies themselves have been interred immediately in any convenient place. It was so at Rome, A.D. 746. It was so in England, in the seventeenth century.[1] Burial with solemnity was refused to catechumens dying in voluntary neglect of Holy Baptism; to suicides, "biathanati;" to the excommunicated; and to those executed for their crimes, who were regarded as contributing to their own deaths. A similar discipline in the Church of England forbids the rites of Christian burial to be used over "any that die unbaptized, or excommunicate, or have laid violent hands upon themselves."

Burial Offices have always partaken of a two-fold character; first, a solemn committal of the body into the keeping of God; and, secondly, prayer and praise, in which the deceased is recognised as still a member of Christ's Church. With the first have been associated many minor customs, such as the use of incense, flowers, and holy water, the true object of which is that of symbolizing the quasi-consecration of the dead bodies of Christians as sacred to God. With the second, all that array of psalm, hymn, and anthem, by which are expressed not only the sadness of the mourner, but the faith both of the living and the departed that the grave and gate of death lead to the peace of Paradise and the glory of a joyful resurrection. Hence Christian burials have the nature of thanksgivings not less than that of sorrow; and the highest act of thanksgiving, the offering of the Holy Eucharist, is frequently used as part of the Office (if, indeed, the Burial Office is not essentially part of an Eucharistic one) in token of the relations which still exist between the departed and the living, the departed and Christ. Such offices were anciently used on other days as well as on the day of burial, the "month's-mind" and the "year's-mind" representing memorial services which were known even to the primitive Church. "Lay this body anywhere," said Monica to her son St. Augustine, "let not the care for that any way disquiet you; this only I request, that, wherever you are, you will remember me at the altar of the Lord" [Aug. Conf. ix. 11].

One of the superstitions of the Puritans was that of omitting all religious services at the burial of the dead, and some Protestant sects still lay their dead silently in unconsecrated ground. "They would have no minister to bury their dead, but the corpse to be brought to the grave, and there put in by the clerk, or some other honest neighbour, and so back again without any more ado" [Cosin's Works, v. 168]. Such a superstitious disuse of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving, is well combated by Hooker, with whose words [Ecc. Polit. V. 75, iv.] this article may conclude: "But whatsoever the Jew's custom was before the days of our Saviour Christ, hath it once at any time been heard of, that either Church or Christian man of sound belief did ever judge this a thing unmeet, indecent, unfit for Christianity, till these miserable days, wherein, under the colour of removing superstitious abuses, the most effectual means both to testify and to strengthen true religion are plucked at, and in some places pulled up by the very roots? Take away this, which was ordained to shew at burials the peculiar hope of the Church of God concerning the dead, and in the manner of those dumb funerals, what one thing is there whereby the world may perceive we are Christian men?" [PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD. Greswell on the Burial Office, 2 vols, 1836. Blunt's Annotated Book of Common Prayer.]

[1] At Eyam, in Derbyshire, where the plague was very severe, are still to be seen graves in the middle of a field far distant from the church. In the register of Peterborough parish church we find interments in very unusual places, as "the fenwash," "the wood grounds," "the pest-house," a "close," an "orchard," and sometimes in "their yard." This was in 1666. The letter "P" is often placed against plague burials in the registers.

C

CABBALA. The Cabbala, or mystical theosophy of Judaism, means "that which has been received," the term being derived from "cabal," to receive. It is the correlative of "masora," tradition, from "masar," to deliver. The Masora was freely delivered by the Rabbi to his pupils; the Cabbala was a "disciplina arcani," and the utmost reserve was to be observed in communicating a knowledge of it. It was received therefore by a few only who were termed Mekubbalim. This reserve may account for the otherwise strange fact that the existence of the Cabbala was generally unknown to the learned till the Middle Ages. Yet the Tr. Chagiga of the Talmud repeatedly notices some such system of apocryptic mysticism. A book "Jetsira" is mentioned in either Talmud; and a commentary on the existing work has come down to us from the tenth century. The Jetsira therefore, and in substance the Zohar, are probably intended where the Mishna lays it down that the history of Genesis may not be explained to two persons at once; the "Chariot," i.e. the throne of Ezekiel's vision, not even to one, unless he be a man of approved wisdom, to whom a summary of the chapters may be imparted [Chagiga, § 1]. Allusion is here made to the two most ancient Cabbalistic works, Genesis, or the history of the physical creation, and the "Chariot," or metaphysics and mystical theology. The first is the book known as the Jetsira, the compilation of which is ascribed to Rabbi Akiba, [A.D. 120], and the second is the Book Zohar, of which Rabbi Simon ben Jochai, of the same period, is the reputed author; Zohar meaning "brightness" [Dan. xii. 3]. Of Akiba it is said [Chagiga, § 2] that of four doctors who entered Paradise, i.e. gained an intimate knowledge of the Cabbala, one died for his temerity, a second lost his reason, a third "committed ravages in the plantations," i.e. became a rationalist; while Akiba alone entered in peace and came forth in safety.

It is said that Rabbi Hanina wrought miracles by means of the Book Jetsira, some form of which therefore existed in the reign of Trajan, when that Rabbi lived. More ancient Cabbalistic works were known to the compilers of the Talmud which have not come down to us, and which were written in the time of Herod the Great. The Jetsira also mentions more ancient Cabbalistic authorities. Like the Mishna it is divided into six sections.

Doubts have been raised with respect to the antiquity of the Zohar, the sequel of Jetsira, and the principal work of Cabbalistic authority. It comprises the greater Zohar, which, as a mystical commentary on the book Genesis, has but little in reference to the text; and the lesser Zohar, formed of the Sifra de Zeniutha, or Book of Mysteries; the Idra Rabba, or Great Assembly, in which Simon ben Jochai indoctrinates his ten disciples; and the Idra Sota, or Lesser Assembly, where the surviving seven are gathered around the deathbed of their instructor. There are also fifteen minor fragments, completing the number eighteen. The Zohar has been ascribed to Moses of Leon, a Spanish Jew of the thirteenth century. Variety of style however, and the disjointed character of its contents, shew that it has been the growth of ages. The language generally indicates the vernacular dialect of Palestine of the two first centuries, with more or less of Syriac colouring in particular portions. It is not written in the Arabized dialect of rabbinical literature, neither is it tinged with the Aristotelian philosophy of Islam. Altogether, internal evidence leads to the conclusion that it was compiled in the Tanaite period; probably, as already said, by Simon ben Jochai, A.D. 125, who embodied ancient Cabbala, which by subsequent interpolation have reached nearly two thousand pages octavo. Both the Jetsira and Zohar are alluded to by Maimonides [Moreh Nev., pr.].

The Cabbala was of foreign growth. The Babylonian exile determined the intellectual as well as the religious bearings of the Jewish people. Seed was then cast upon the waters that may yet bear its crop in emancipation from spiritual bondage. Hillel's mode of dealing with precepts that had been rendered impossible by lapse of time and change of circumstances is capable of indefinite extension. [See HILLEL.] The Cabbala, as will be shown, supplied elements to Gnosticism in the second century; and it is only fair to suppose that the unsettled condition of Judaism at that period caused many Jews to join the Gnostic party, who afterwards became Christians. The theosophy of the Cabbala, as a corrective of Talmudism, served in the middle of the last century to bridge over the abyss that separates Judaism from Christianity; and some thousands of Jews passed over it as Zoharites to adopt the faith of Christ. The Cabbala contains many points of Trinitarian analogy, strange to the general spirit of Judaism, that may facilitate a yet more extensive transfer of allegiance at some future date, that shall truly be as "life from the dead" [Rom. xi. 15].

The origin of the Cabbala has been satisfactorily traced back by Franck [La Cabbale, 353-390] to Babylon. It is therefore antecedent to Talmudism, with which however it has flowed on in parallel course; many of the most eminent doctors of the Talmud having been adepts at the same time in Cabbalistic lore. But there are points of antagonism between the religious constitutions of the former and the theosophy of the latter system. The anthropomorphism of the Old Testament often becomes downright irreverence in the Talmud. The Cabbala attempts a corrective of such views. As Pythagoras, deriving his principles from Babylon [Beausobre, H. Manich. i. 31; Franck, La Cabbale, p. 356], guarded against material notions of the Divine Substance by veiling it under arithmetical abstractions; so the Cabbalistic theology is based on a numerical system that can have nothing anthropomorphic about it. The units up to ten, and the twenty-two letters, each of which in Hebrew is a numerical symbol, form the thirty-two "marvellous tracts of wisdom" on which the Cabbala is built. This number of twenty-two may be observed to be composed of the mystical elements, $3 + 7 + 12$; i.e. the triad + (the triad + tetrad) + (the triad × tetrad). On the sum of thirty-two the Infinite "hath founded His Name," and by its virtue man has power to control and arrest the course of nature. The ten Sephiroth are as the fingers; five correlatives of five, and bound together by the mean of unity. Thus the properties of numbers, always curious, have a Divine relation in this system; words also whose letters sum equal products are mutual equivalents. Metatron, another name for the personified Wisdom of the Deity, and so called as being in closest union with the Supreme Throne [μετὰ θρόνον, Franck, 60], is identified [Sanh. 38 b.] with the Divine Name Shadai; the letters of either word summing by Gematria (geometrice) 314, which also numbers Ruach K., the Holy Spirit.

The words of the Law veil the inner meaning. The mystical doctrine is the living body, of which the text is the outer garment. The letter ℵ occurring six times in the first and in the last verse of the Old Testament, shews that the world's duration will be six thousand years. The first word, B'reshith, sums 913, and the same number is found in "B'thorah yatsar," "by the Law He formed;" therefore the Law existed before all, and by it all things were created. The letters in the two first words of Genesis, B'reshith bara, sum 1116, therefore, since the same product is found in "B'rosh hashanah nibrâ" = "in the beginning of the year was created," the creation of the world dates from the autumnal equinox. A more remarkable exegesis of Gematria is the identification of "Shiloh" with the Messiah, since "Jabô Shiloh" [Gen. xlix. 10] and "Messiah" alike sum 358. The Absolute, Ein Soph, is numerically identical with, Aûr, light, both summing 207.

Again the letters had a mystical relation by the permutation termed Ath-Bash [את-בש], whereby the first and last letters of the alphabet are interchanged, the second and penultimate, the third and ante-penultimate, and so forth by regular progression till the middle terms are reached. The system is termed "Temura" or Permutation, and was doubtless invented as the means of carrying on secret correspondence in times of difficulty. The Targum makes use of it as an hermeneutical mean. Thus the name Sheshach [Jer. xxv. and li. 46] is rendered Babel, the second letter of the alphabet, Beth, replacing the penultimate Shin, and the two middle letters being interchanged according to rule. "The heart of them that rise up against me" [Leb Kami, Jer. li. 1] is resolved into "Chasdim," the Chaldæans, the exiled prophet not caring to speak out plainly. It is remarkable that Jerome received this latter interpretation from his rabbinical instructor [Comm. in Jer.], and Rashi knew no other meaning for the words.

It may be noted here that the Temura was adopted by the Gnostic Marcus, who identified the various portions of the human body in Aletheia with the elements of the alphabet. The head is α and ω, the neck β and ψ, &c. [Iren. i. 134, Ed. Cambr.]. Many such points of analogy between the Cabbala and Gnosticism may be seen in the Cod. Nazar. [Ed. Norberg.] By another Temura the alphabet is divided into two halves, the first being commutable with the twelfth letter, the second with the thirteenth, and so on. Thus Tabeel [Isa. vii. 6] is identified with Ramlâ, king of Israel. "Notarikon" was another Cabbalistic device, whereby a mystical meaning was obtained from the initial letters of words, as by a notary's abbreviations. So a metempsychosis of souls being a tenet of the Cabbala, since Adam is formed of the initials of Adam, David, Messiah, therefore the soul of Adam was transfused into David, and was destined to be the soul of the Messiah. The first word of Genesis denotes the entire material universe, as giving the initials of "He created the Firmament, the Earth, the Heaven, the Sea, the Abyss." Christians have copied this industrious trifling, and have found in the same word the initials of "Ben, Ruach, Ab, Sheloshah yechidah thamah," "Son, Spirit, Father; the three a perfect unity." Let it be observed, however, that the same mystical expansion is noted in the Idra Sota [c. 8], where "Binah," or understanding, the second of the Sephiroth, is identified by its component letters with "i," the masculine termination, "ah," feminine termination, and "Ben," i.e. "father, mother, and son." The spirit is always a feminine noun in Aramaic dialects. Hence it is the "prima fœmina" of Gnosticism. [See Note i. 223, Irenæus, Cambr. ed.] The initials of the words [Deut. xxx. 12] "who shall go up for us to heaven," give the Cabbalistic response, "Milah," circumcision. The word Maccabee seems to be doubly Cabbalistic. It is formed by "Notarikon" from the initials of "Mi Camoka Belohim Jehovah," "Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods?" By "Gematria" also it supplies a dynastic appellative for the Senate [2 Macc. i. 10, iv. 44, xi. 27] or Elders [1 Macc. i. 26, xii. 6, v. 16, xiv. 9], the Sanhedrim or governing body after the Captivity, which was a revival of the Seventy Elders [Num. xi. 25; compare 2 Chron. xix. 8-11], with the addition of a "Prince" President and "Father of the House of Judicature," or V. President; the representatives of Moses and Aaron [Talm. Sotah, 24, a]. The numerical value of the letters מכבי exactly sums this constituent body of seventy-two members. [SANHEDRIM.]

These matters, however, only touch the surface of the Cabbala. The Septuagint translators occasionally betray a knowledge of the Cabbala. Thus they evade the declaration of the Hebrew text that the elders saw the Supreme Being [Exod. xxiv. 9. 10], by saying they saw the place [τόπον, Makôm] of His appearance. The "train" of His robe [Isa. vi. 1] is rendered "His glory." If Moses spoke with the Eternal "face to face," the LXX. adds that it was ἐν εἴδει [Numb. xii. 8]. The Lord of Hosts, as having too close a resemblance to the Ἄρης of Greek mythology, becomes the Lord God of spiritual powers, δυνάμεων. The most remarkable Messianic prophecy in the Book of Psalms is made square with Cabbalistic principle, where the generation of the Word is described as antecedent to that of the heavenly bodies, ἐκ γαστρὸς πρὸ ἑωσφόρου ἐγέννησα σέ [Psa. ex. 3]. In speaking of the creation of man it is not said, according to the Hebrew original [Gen. i. 27], "male and female created he them," but αὐτον, "him;" in accordance with the "arrhenothele" character of the ideal man of the Cabbala. So the Talmud, "when the Almighty created the first Adam, he made him androgynous." The formation of the world is not spoken of as an act of "creation," but as a manifestation to the senses, κατάδειξις, the Cabbala being essentially pantheistic and teaching the Spinozist doctrine that unity is the universe, and the universe unity, "Eins ist alles; und Alles ist eins." Matter is no second principle.

Again, where the Hebrew text [Deut. xxxii. 8] says that Jehovah "set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel," the LXX. has "of the angels of God," and the variation is explained by the Cabbala, which makes seventy to be the number of the nations on earth, each stock having its tutelary angel, while the Lord Himself is the guardian of Israel, as the Son of Sirach says [Ecclus. xvii. 17]. This book throughout is largely indebted to the Cabbala, and more particularly in its personification of the Divine Wisdom as the first evolved of the Sephiroth, the Philonic Logos [xxiv. 3], personally present as Jehovah of old in the "cloudy pillar" [ib. 4]; the intermediate Will between the Supreme Being and the world of matter; the Supreme Being having evolved the Word, and the Word the visible creation. If inferences thus supplied may be followed, the starting-point of the Cabbala would seem to be somewhere antecedent to the LXX. translation, and to the time of the Son of Sirach. It had taken hold of the Jewish mind before the birth of our Lord. The Targum of Onkelos, in its avoidance of anthropomorphic statement, by substituting the Word for the impersonation of Jehovah; in its mysticism; and in its application of the Temura as a mean of exegesis, indicates Cabbalistic principle [Franck, 67]. The Jewish exorcists [Acts xix. 14], sons of Sceva, an high priest, practised in all probability the occult arts of the Cabbala.

Philo exhibits full traces of Cabbalistic principle [Franck, Cabb. iii. 3]. The Gnosticism of the two first centuries is only a theosophical development of it in the systems of Simon Magus [Hippol. Philosophum, vi. 18], Menander, Cerinthus, in answer to whom St. John wrote his Gospel [Hieron. in Joh.], Carpocrates, the Ophites [Hippol. Phil. v. 6, 7], and the Marcosians, the two latter being most evident plagiarisms from the Cabbala [Iren., lib. i.]. There are such strong points of resemblance between the Avesta and the Jewish Cabbala, as to confirm the opinion that the latter had its rise in Babylon during the Captivity; Zoroaster having been engaged in remodelling the Persian religion at Babylon during the last ten or twenty years of the exile [D'A. Duperron, Vie de Zoroastre, ii. 67]. And as the Zend resembles in its structure the Sanscrit, so the Zoroastrian notions themselves may be the reproductions of thought that grew up in the Punjab, or were imported thither from central Asia in the earliest days. [Z. Av., Spiegel; D'Anquetil Duperron; Kleuken; Westergaard, Copenhagen.]

The Zoroastrian system supposed a first principle of "eternal duration" [Zeruane Akerene] or "boundless space" to have existed in neutral solitude, and to have contained within itself the germ of antagonizing principles, light and darkness. Ormuzd and Ahriman, light and shade, good and evil, were first evolved. Ormuzd, seated on a throne of primal light, and, as some sects said, in human form,[1] put forth the creative Word, Honover, whereby the worlds were made, and which was to the emanative source as soul is to body [Zend Av. ii. 138, 415, Duperron]. This Word is the mediator between the Absolute and created substance, emanating from the Eternal, containing within itself the source and type of all perfections, with power to reproduce them in other beings. It is spirit and it is body—spirit as being the very soul of Ormuzd, and body as manifesting to the senses the law and substance of the universe. Compare now the first creative impulse of the Cabbalistic theory. Here the first inscrutable Principle is the Ancient of Ancients, Mystery of Mysteries, the Indefinite, the Bythus of the Gnostic system, that can only be expressed by the interrogative "Mî," who? First, when the creative act was determined, Adam Cadmon came forth, the ideal form of man, created after the Divine image, the very substance of the ten attributes, or Sephiroth, from which the universe was evolved. As in the Persian system, he is all glorious with light; his robe is of dazzling whiteness; the pure rays for ever streaming from his head give light to 400,000 worlds, which he called into existence from his throne or "chariot"

[1] Hyde, de Vet. Rel. Pers. p. 293.

(Mereaba = δίφρος). Every day 13,000 new worlds spring into existence as emanations from his intelligence. That the idea of Infinity connecting him with the Ein Soph may be represented in the Creator of the material world, he is termed the Tall of Aspect, in length equal to 3,700,000 worlds. Thus the Cabbala, in its desire to correct the anthropomorphism of Jewish thought, has only created a more gigantic form of it. As in the Persian system Ormuzd shared in every Divine attribute, and was the source of the material world, so in the Cabbala Adam Cadmon embodied in himself all the Divine Sephiroth, numerations or attributes of the Supreme, and was the eternal source without which the worlds could never have been created. The Cabbala even says that many worlds had preceded our own, but as being antecedent to the A. Cadmon they could not subsist, and came to nothing. They were as the sparks that the smith strikes out from the hot iron—procosmic worlds, that could have no lasting subsistence, because the Ancient of Aneients had not yet clad Himself in form. The Master Workman was not yet at the anvil. This Adam Cadmon is the human impersonation of Aletheia in the Marcosian system of Gnostieism [Iren. ed. Cambr. i. 134]; also the Adamas of the Barbelonite [ib. 224], and of the Ophite [Hippol. Philos. v. 6-8, x. 9]. The creed both of the Cabbala and of its original is equally pantheistie. The Word is, in fact, the universe.

The eosmogony of the Cabbala is briefly as follows:—The ten first numerals symbolize the ideal universe, and the wisdom of which it is the reflex image. "The Sephiroth are ten only," the Cabbala says with marked preeision, "and not nine; ten, and not eleven." The absolute is Zero, from whenee unity is evolved as the ereative spirit; the binary number is summed by unity, and the idea of all things to be hereafter brought into being. Three is water, four, fire; and the remaining six symbolize form, as the six faces of the cube—east, west, north, and south, zenith and nadir. All, however, is in the abstract as yet, representing ereation "in posse." The ten first numerals thus express the form and substance of things, flowing forth perpetually from the throne of the Most High, and giving eoncrete expression to the ideal forms of Divine wisdom. But the efflux becomes despiritualized and gross in proportion to its distanee from the first prineiple, till in matter it is as the sunken dregs of emanative substanee. The results of creation are varied infinitely, as the words that express them are capable of infinite variation. The letters of the alphabet symbolize creation "in esse." The Absolute having willed, the aet of ereation became defined in ten attributes, or Sephiroth, numerations, affeeting each other mutually, as rays of light, streaming through variously eoloured erystal, interpenetrate each other, or as numerals may be made to enter into indefinite combinations. Collectively they represent the ideal form of the Deity, the Adam Cadmon as revealed to Ezekiel and Daniel in their prophetic visions. Hence the various elements of the Sephiroth are also compared with the parts of the human body, and were turned, as it was thought, to praetieal aecount in eharming away local diseases and morbid affections. It may be added that whereas the notion of a Trinity in unity perpetually recurs in the Zohar, so here the human brain, consisting of two lobes with cerebellum, represents the Deity.

These Sephiroth, each of whieh is identified with one of the ten Scripture names of the Deity, are arranged in the following order:—

1
3 . 2
5 . 4
6
8 . 7
9
10

They are the "decem nomina mystica" to which Jerome refers [Ep. cxxxvi. ad Marcell., and Qu. Hebr. in Gen.]

1. Named the Crown, the equivalent of Ehieh, [I AM]; also Arieh Appayim, μακροπρόσωπος, Infinity personified: from whence the rest are evolved, viz.—2. Wisdom, Jah; and 3. Understanding, Jehovah. These three form the first Cabbalistic triad; and represented the seat of intelligence, the head in the human anatomy. Also, viewing man as a triple eompound of spirit, soul, and vital power, it is as the spirit of man. The next triad is formed by 4. Merey, El, and its antithesis, 5. Justice, Elohim, bound together in 6. Moral Beauty, Shaddai. This triad is as the upper body, and expresses the soul eonseious of right and wrong. The lower or physieal triad is, 7. Eternity, Jehovah Sabaôth, 8. Majesty, Elohê Sabaôth, and 9. Basement, El Chaî, eo-ordinate with the lower man. The 10th. Sovereignty, Adonai, collects all the above in one, and expresses the ideal realization of the works of ereation, as the "fire infolding itself" [Ezek. i. 4]; it represents also the vital energy of the soul of man.

These ten Sephiroth form the emanative world [Olam Atsiluth]; but still two other worlds are interposed between the Absolute and the material creation; the world of ereation [B'riâh] i.e. of spiritual essence, called also the Throne, "out of the midst of the fire" [Ezek. ibid.] the Divine principle of whieh is named Sandalphon, συνάδελφος, the mundane soul or demiurge of other systems; the third world of natural powers and forces is under the superintendence of Metatron, and corresponds with the four living creatures of Ezekiel's vision. Either world is built up on the mystical decad, and through both of them the primal light shines with a broken beam in consequence of increased remoteness. The fourth, or material world, is represented by the wheels of Ezekiel's vision. It is the husk or shell of the world of spirits, the fuel of Divine light; for the Creator and His ereation are eompared to a burning lamp divisible into three distinct parts; the fuel or wiek, the eone of darker light formed by imperfect eombustion, and the tapering flame of white light of more ethereal character; yet all these are combined in one. Like the preceding, it is the aggregate result of the ten Sephiroth, but the Divine light has almost become darkness; "it smoulders as a coal in which there is no longer fire." As in the Platonic theory, every thing that should ever exist stood eternally present in the Divine Intelligence in archetypal form; and the completely Gnostic notion is added that the lower world is made in likeness of the heavenly. All that exists in the upper world is reflected here below; yet ideal form and mundane substance are one. As counterparts of things Divine, the mundane Sephiric elements are—1. Tohu, without form; 2. Bohu, void; 3. Darkness; and 4-10 the seven portals of the senses—eyes, ears, nostrils and mouth; the angel of death, Sammael, being the presiding genius. Hence it is seen that the Cabbala neither teaches, with ancient philosophy, that the world was formed of pre-existent matter, nor with the Mosaic account, that it was created out of nothing. "Ex nihilo nihil" was essentially the creed of the Cabbalist; so Basilides declared that the non-existent world was created by the non-Existent [Hippolyt. Phil. x. 14]; for the Absolute and Infinite, abstracted and apart from every attribute, is to human intelligence as "nil." It was a Gnostic notion also that the Deity was non-existent, μήδε ὅλως ὄντα τι. [Iren. i. 108, Camb.] The zero from whence the Sephiroth are evolved is the Deity. The universe is the efflux of the Deity, as effect is the outward manifestation of cause. It is the mantle in which He clothes Himself; the visible glory wherein He is revealed, the Sephiroth being interposed between the Mystery of Mysteries and the visible creation. But subject, mean, and object are substantially one. The Supreme and His creation are at once number, numerant, and numbered [Jetsira, i.]; as Aristotle said, ταυτὸ νοῦς καὶ νοητόν [Met. xii. 7], and the Neo-Platonics and Plotinus, οὐκ ἔξω τοῦ νοῦ τὰ νοητά. Spinoza reproduced the Cabbalistic theory when he styled the Deity the "immanent Cause of the universe, indwelling, and one with the extended substance." [Waehter, Spinos. in Jud.] Before the evolution of the Sephiroth, "Ein Soph" was simply "Ein," negation; or, "Mi," who? Hegel has adopted the notion, "Dieses reine Seyn ist nun die reine Abstraction, damit das Absolut-Negativ, welches, gleichfalls unmittelbar genommen, das Niehts ist." [Encycl. d. Sc. Phil., sec. 86, 87.] The interrogative "Mi?" by the act of creation, became Elohim, as it is written, "Who hath created these things" [Isa. xl. 26], the Hebrew equivalents for the italicized words giving the letters of Elohim. The Deity, therefore, is the negation of all that man can deem intelligible; and out of this relatively negative substance the world was evolved, the theory of the Zohar being pure Pantheism. Consistently with this it denies that evolved substance can ever be annihilated. The breath we exhale still exists; man's words, and his very voice continue their resonance. Death is only a return to the Divine principle from whence the soul is an efflux. It is "God's kiss," as it is beautifully said, whereby union is restored between the Supreme and His children.

There are many points of analogy in the psychology of the Cabbala and of the Persian system, as shewn in the ancient traditions of Persia [D'Anquetil Duperron, Acad. d. Inscr. xxxvii. 646-8.] According to the Cabbala, man belonging to the higher world of intelligence, and at the same time to the lower world of sense, is a type of the universe, and was named Microcosmus. For as the universe is one with the Deity, being an outward expression of the Divine substance, so body and soul form the individual Microcosm. Man made in the image of God, is in this respect the reflex image of the Adam Cadmon. The Divine similitude consists in the triple nature of his spiritual being; composed of the intellectual or dextral soul (Neshama); the soul morally sensible (Ruach); and the soul of vital energy or sinistral principle (Nephesh), that never can inherit Paradise. They emanate from the triad of central Sephiroth 1, 6, and 10, of which they are the terrestrial co-ordinates. In these Sephiroth every human soul has had its pre-existence; and in conjugate relation male and female, which relation is severed for awhile on birth, but restored by marriage. Similarly Philo speaks of the prototypal man as formed κατ' εἰκόνα, ἰδέα τις, οὔτε ἄῤῥην οὔτε θῆλυ [π. τ. κοσμοπ.] a notion, however, that he may have derived from Plato's androgyne [Sympos.]. The idea that is so often represented in funereal sculpture was an essential part of Cabbalistic psychology, and the individuality of each man, called by more modern Cabbalists, Echidah, in bodily form, eternally pre-existent, was supposed to be united with the first fœtal germ of humanity, and to impress upon it its definite form and character; which union was severed again under the hand of death. [Zoh. iii. 107.] The Brahminical notion of the penal character of life on earth was not unknown to the compiler of the Zohar, and the souls of men on being sent to animate human beings remonstrate with the Source of all, and represent the condition of misery to which they are about to be consigned apart from heaven. The idea is reproduced from the Zend Avesta, where the Ferouer, or ideal types of all intelligent beings, raise the same complaint, and are assured that it is their mission to destroy the seed of Ahriman, and inherit an eternity of joy. These Ferouer represent not only individuals but nations, like the tutelary angels of the Cabbala. The metensomatosis of souls, Gilgula [Zohar, pt. ii. fol. 99], was a part of the Cabbalistic creed, and marks another point of contact with Gnosticism; the same way of accounting for the apparent anomalies of Divine government having been adopted by Simon Magus [Iren. Cambr. Ed. i. p. 192]; Carpocrates, [ib. 207, note 4], and the Ophites, [240]. Empedocles, Pythagoras, and Plato obtained the notion apparently from the same Eastern source. Pindar also says that the soul can only be admitted to the isles of the blessed after three several states of probation have been passed [Ol. ii. 123]. And the idea was not altogether rejected by the philosophical spirit in primitive times [Hieronym. ad Demetr.; Origen, π. ἀρχῶν, c. 7, adv. Celsum, iii.; Huet, Origeniana. Metempsychosis. Original Sin]. According to the Cabbala, when each soul has had its allotted trial, the restoration of all things will take place, and discord will be harmonized in the unity of the Divine Substance. The purification of every soul will in due time be accomplished; even Sammael, the Satan of Scripture, will regain his first estate. He "will lose," as it is stated, the first syllable of his name "Samma," venom, and the second syllable common to all angelic names alone will remain. The notion is Babylonian. Sammael is the counterpart of Ahriman, the Prince of Darkness. At the consummation of all things, Ahriman will accept the Avesta, and establish its authority among the lost. On the one side Ormuzd and the seven primary spirits, and on the other Ahriman, with a like number of his emissaries, will do sacrifice to the Absolute Zeruane Akerene [Zend Av. iii. 415]. Man, before the Fall, had a body composed "e principi limo," not of the vile earth of which we are formed. So the Gnostic Justin said that the angels of Elohim collected virgin earth for man's formation [Hippol. Philos. v. 26; Iren. i. 235, ed. Cantab.]. Adam, according to the Zohar, was liable to none of our wants, and moved by none of our desires, and he was endued with a super-angelic wisdom as with a robe of light, which he lost on the Fall, and he was then clothed with the skin of brute, that is, he was invested with our present body of sense. Cabbalists of later days have held that the souls of all mankind were bound up in the soul of Adam, and that our first parent's sin was the sin of the whole race. The first man's disobedience brought death into the world, affecting the whole of nature as well as the race of man. The freedom of will in fallen man is asserted; the pre-existence of souls and a foreknowledge of their destiny not involving the slightest tinge of predestination. The ethnology of the Cabbala is in substance that of the Avesta. In this latter system the earth is divided into seven districts, bounded by the waters poured forth from the beginning in seven rivers. The natives differ from each other generically, and in various degrees exhibit the deformities that illustrate the chronicles of the Middle Ages. In the Cabbala we trace the same theory; only these districts instead of being collateral are concentric, and are contained one within the other as the coats of a bulb. It expressly denies the unity of the race of man; for how should Adam have transferred himself to every region of the earth, so as to people it with human beings? [See Reuchlin, Knorr Cabbala Denudata, Wachter Spinosismus in Judenthum, Amst. 1699; Basnage, H. d. Juifs, vol. iii.; Brücker, H. Cr. Ph. ii.; Tennemann, H. Ph.; Kleuker, Emanationslehre, Riga, 1786; Tholuck, de Ortu Cabbalæ, 1837; Franck, La Kabbale, is of all the best; Freystadt, Ph. Cabb., and papers in Fürst's Orient. vi. x. and xii.; Herzog, Real Encyclop. art. Kabbala.]

CALENDAR. [1.] A table of the order of days in the year. [2.] A catalogue of saints affixed to the days on which they are commemorated. The earliest of these ecclesiastical calendars can be traced back to almost primitive times, one of A.D. 336 being printed in Bouchier's Commentary on the Paschal Cycle, and another of the Church of Carthage, A.D. 483, in the Analecta of Mabillon. They are plainly derived from the Diptychs [q. v.], on which the names of the martyrs were recorded: and subsequent additions, such as the columns of Golden Numbers and Sunday Letters, have been made for the convenience of calculating ecclesiastical seasons. The Calendar of the English Church can be traced back to the eighth century, the time of the Venerable Bede [Martene, Vet. Script. vi. 635]. After receiving many additions (chiefly before the twelfth century), it was more or less tampered with by incompetent authorities between A.D. 1536 and A.D. 1561. At the last date it was brought into the condition in which it still exists, except that St. Alban, St. Enurchus, and the Venerable Bede were added to it in 1661. Blunt's Annot. Book of Common Prayer [pp. 36, 61] gives a full comparison of the old and modern English, the Roman, and the Eastern Calendars.

CALL. [Vocation.]

CALVINISM. A system so called from Calvin,[1] the Genevan Reformer [1509-1564], who revived, with modifications, the doctrine on Predestination which originated with St. Augustine in the fifth century, and was afterwards, though never authoritatively sanctioned in the Western Church,[2]

[1] The best modern account of the Reformer is given in Dyer's Life [ed. 1850]. The author avoids the indiscriminate adulation and mere hero-worship of biographers of the Genevan school, and also the unfairness and virulence of Roman Catholic writers.

[2] Shortly after the death of St. Augustine, St. Prosper and St. Hilary, the patrons of his novel theory on Predestination, appealed to Pope Celestine [A.D. 431], complaining that there were priests at Marseilles who publicly taught erroneous doctrines, which the bishops of Gaul had been remiss in visiting with due censure. The Pope, on being thus appealed to, merely confirmed the ecclesiastical decrees of his predecessors, and of the councils which had been held against the Pelagian heresy, but refused to pronounce an opinion on other abstruse questions (obviously referring to Predestination) which had arisen during the controversy. He says, "Profundiores vero difficilioresque partes incurrentium quæstionum, quas latius pertractarunt qui hæreticis resisterunt, sicut non audemus contemnere, ita non necesse habemus astruere" [Epistola ad Galliarum Episcopos, c. xiii.]. The novelty of St. Augustine's theory was proved from his unsuccessful attempts to reply to the objection "that it was contrary to the teaching of the Fathers and the belief of the Church." See his treatises De Prædestinat. Sanctorum and De Dono Perseverantiæ [Opera, tom. x. Migné]; also the letters of St. Prosper and St. Hilary to St. Augustine on the same subject [Epistol. inter Augustinias, ccxxv. ccxxvi.], and St. Prosper's Responsiones ad capitula calumniantium Gallorum [St. August. tom. x. Appendix]. St. Augustine virtually acknowledges that his theory was not of primitive origin, or the received and catholic teaching of the Church. Thus he admits that before the Pelagian controversy he had taught another and totally opposed doctrine, but that afterwards, by his researches, he had discovered in Scripture the true meaning of election, "Nondum diligentius quæsiveram, held to some extent at least, and especially by the Schoolmen, (as St. Thomas Aquinas, for instance), in the Middle Ages.

The teaching of Calvin on Predestination may be summed up in what are called the FIVE POINTS, a name given to the peculiarities of his system. These are:—Election (and non-election or reprobation); redemption; the bondage of the will; grace; final perseverance. His teaching on these subjects will appear from a statement of his theory on Predestination. He maintained that God not only foresaw, but from eternity decreed the fall of Adam and the total corruption of his posterity by sin;[1] all from birth inherit his fallen nature with its hereditary bond of sin and guilt, and are in a state of utter alienation from God; freewill to Godward is totally lost; man in his natural state can do nothing but sin, and that continually.[2] God is pleased, for wise reasons inscrutable to ourselves and independent of the foreseen merits of the objects of His mercy, to elect some from the fallen race to salvation.[3] They are made willing by His grace, which is irresistible or necessarily effectual, to obey the Gospel call, are regenerated by His Spirit, and live in holiness and obedience to His will, and cannot finally fall from a state of grace. The rest of mankind God predestines to eternal destruction, not on account of foreseen sin, though it may aggravate their doom, but in fulfilment of His sovereign purpose or decree.[4] He leaves them in their fallen state without effectual grace, deprived of which they must necessarily perish, as examples of His hatred against sin and for the manifestation of His glory.[5] nec adhuc invenerам qualis sit electio gratiæ de qua dicit Apostolus, Rom. xi. 5" [De Prædestinatione Sanctorum, c. iii. sec. 7]. "St. Augustine's theory respecting original sin and grace never became the doctrine of the Church" [Mochler on Symbolism, vol. ii. p. 64, Robertson's transl.]. Dr. Dollinger also speaks of St. Augustine's views "on the necessity of sinning and the irresistible operations of Divine grace as not in perfect conformity with the tradition of the Church" [Eccles. History, vol. ii. p. 44, Cox's transl.].

[1] Nec absurdum videri debet quod dico: "Deum non modo primi hominis casum et in eo posterorum ruinam prævidisse, sed arbitrio quoque suo dispensasse" [Inst. lib. ii. c. 1, sec. 9].

[2] Thus he says of infants, "Imo tota eorum natura quoddam est peccati semen, . . . hæc perversitas nunquam in nobis cessat sed novos assidue fructus parit" [Inst. lib. ii. c. 1, sec. 8].

[3] A statement of Calvin's teaching on election and reprobation is given in Instit. lib. ii. c. 3, secs. 10, 11, lib. iii. c. 21. Comment. in Rom. c. ix. 11-23.

[4] "Si non possumus rationem assignare cur suos misericordia dignetur, nisi quoniam ita illi placet; neque etiam in aliis reprobandis aliud habebimus nisi ejus voluntatem" [Inst. lib. iii. c. 22, sec. 11]. "Quos ergo Deus præterit, reprobat, neque alia de causa, nisi quod ab hæreditate quam filiis suis prædestinat, illos vult excludere" [Ibid. lib. iii. c. 23, sec. 1]. Calvin admits, in a certain sense, that the eternal condemnation of the reprobate may be assigned to sin; but he truly adds, in accordance with his system, that their continuance in sin was really to be attributed to God's decree, by which effectual grace was withheld from them, which could only bring them to repentance and salvation. [See Inst. lib. iii. c. 24, sec. 14.]

[5] He thus speaks of the reprobate:—"Quos ergo in vitæ contumeliam et mortis exitium creavit ut iræ suæ organa forent et severitatis exempla; eos ut in finem suum perveniant, nunc audiendi verbi sui facultate

Calvin's theory thus asserts that man in his unregenerate state is deprived of free will, and that God's grace bestowed upon the elect is irresistible, necessarily securing their salvation. His theory required him to add that Christ died for the elect only, since it was at least prima facie improbable that if God from eternity predestined the elect only to salvation, Christ should have shed His blood for all men. He admits, indeed, that in a certain sense Christ may be said to have died for all men,[6] but the saving benefits of His death he supposed by God's decree were limited to the elect only.

Such is the theory of Calvin—a revival, as before remarked, with certain modifications, of the Predestination theories of St. Augustine, whose works the Reformer frequently cites, and to whose authority he mainly appeals. In order to understand the Calvinistic theory, and to ascertain whether or in what degree it has primitive or patristic sanction, we must investigate this previous teaching of St. Augustine.

He undoubtedly taught the doctrines of election and reprobation revived by Calvin, though there was an important difference in their system. But St. Augustine did not teach that God had predestined or decreed the fall of Adam, and the consequent corruption and ruin of his posterity by sin, and thus he escapes the charge of making God the author of sin. The foundation of his system, like that of Calvin, rests on a theory of original sin—that all mankind became, on account of Adam's transgression, a mass of sin and perdition (massa perditionis), or, as he says, a condemned batch (conspersio damnata), and thus that all free will to good was extinct or annihilated.[7] To this "fallen mass," the posterity of Adam, the guilt and penalty of his transgression was conveyed by generation, and inseparably and inherently belonged; and from this hereditary bond of guilt and condemnation none could be delivered but by the grace of Christ,[8] which privat, nunc ejus prædicatione magis excæcat et obstupefacit. . . . Ecce vocem ad eos dirigit sed ut magis obsurdescant: lucem accendit sed ut reddantur cæciores; doctrinam profert sed qua magis obstupescant; remedium adhibet sed ne sanentur. . . . Neque hoc quoque controverti potest, quos Deus illuminatos non vult, illis doctrinam suam ænigmatibus involutam tradere, ne quid inde proficiant, nisi ut in majorem hebetudinem tradantur" [Inst. lib. iii. c. 24, secs. 12, 13].

[6] Thus, in his Commentary on 1 Tim. ii. 6:—"Pro omnibus inquam orare Spiritus præcepit, quia unus noster Mediator omnes ad se admittat sicut morte sua omnes reconciliavit Patri." Elsewhere he allows the opinion of the Schoolmen that Christ died sufficiently for all men, but effectually for the elect only, though he denies that it is sanctioned or confirmed by the passage quoted in proof [1 John ii. 2]—"Sufficienter pro toto mundo passum esse Christum sed pro electis tantum efficaciter. Vulgo hæc solutio in scholis obtinuit. Ergo quamquam verum esse illud dictum fateor: nego tamen præsenti loco quadrare."

[7] See an account of St. Augustine's teaching on original sin by Wiggers: Historical Presentation of Augustinism and Pelagianism, p. 88, transl. by Emerson [1840].

[8] Quotquot enim ex hac stirpe gratia Dei liberantur, a damnatione utique liberantur qua jam tenentur obstricti; istos a reatu hereditario et proprio, illius Agni sanguis absolvit" [De Prædestinatione Sanctorum, secs. 10, 11]. St. Augustine, as Wiggers shews, denied the universality grace was given by the new birth in holy Baptism—all the baptized being by the sacrament regenerated—placed in a state of grace and salvation.

He further taught that God from eternity predestined a certain number from man's fallen race to salvation—a number not to be increased or lessened[1]—not from a foresight of faith and obedience, but merely according to His own good pleasure and sovereign will,[2] and that He predestined the rest of mankind to destruction as belonging to the fallen race of Adam (euntibus omnibus ex uno in condemnationem), and if of adult age, in punishment also for their own sins.[3] God, as was said, according to his theory, gave to all the baptized (i.e. to the elect and non-elect) the gifts of regeneration, and some of the non-elect at least lived for a time in holiness and obedience to His will. But there was another gift which St. Augustine believed was absolutely necessary for salvation which was denied to the non-elect—the gift of perseverance (donum perseverantiæ). Deprived of this they would inevitably fall from baptismal grace, and perish in sin.[4] Thus no one, according to this theory, and as St. Augustine also expressly taught, could assuredly know whether he belonged to the number of the predestinate. He might really for a time live in holiness and obedience to God's will, and afterwards finally fall from grace—not being by God's decree predestined to salvation, and being thus deprived of the gift of perseverance. Calvin differed from St. Augustine on this point. He thought that the elect, from the testimony of God's Spirit, and the fruits of His work, a life of holy obedience, might be assured of their salvation[5]—that is, that they might have a modified but not an absolute assurance, since he admitted that the signs of grace were often deceptive; and he draws a characteristic picture of the horrors which beset the man who doubts of his election.[6]

Thus, the especial difference between Augustinism and Calvinism was, that according to the former system, God was not in any degree chargeable with the sin of Adam and of his posterity. The other important difference related to the grace of Holy Baptism, St. Augustine believing in the real bestowal of sacramental grace, or that all the baptized in and through baptism were regenerated. Calvin did not believe that grace in any real sense was bestowed on the non-elect. If given at all, it is represented as the shadow, rather than the substance of a Divine gift;[7] or a deceptive, or illusive grace intended to render them inexcusable. Effectual grace leading to salvation (he really recognised no other) was given only to the elect: hence he limits the grace of regeneration or adoption to the elect amongst the baptized.[8]

When Calvin proposed his theory of election, he fully acknowledged its fearful and terrible nature,[9] that God should have predestined the fall of Adam and its awful consequence of eternal death to the greater part of his posterity, who by God's decree were predestined to eternal perdition. This doctrine is not only a very fearful one, but it is opposed to some portions of Holy Scripture, as, e.g., God's willing the salvation of all men (πάντας θέλει σωθῆναι) [1 Tim. ii. 4], and to the doctrine of universal redemption, or what might fairly, or would usually at least, be inferred from this doctrine; and also to the fact that this condemnation of the wicked is never assigned to a Divine decree, but to their wilful refusal of the offers of grace and salvation (as in Acts xiii. 46). [Election.] Whatever may be said of the doctrine of election, or God's choosing a portion of man's lost race to salvation, the decree of reprobation must certainly seem of redemption: "God sent His Son into the world not to redeem the whole sinful race of man, but only the elect. By this Mediator God shewed that those whom He redeems by His blood He makes from being evil to be eternally good" [De Correp. et Grat. sec. 11]. The following passage is peculiarly clear, and is taken from the first book On Adulterous Marriages [c. 15], a work written about the year A.D. 419, and not directed against the Pelagians: "Every one that has been redeemed by the blood of Christ is a man, though not every one that is a man has been redeemed by the blood of Christ." Hence the words in John x. 26, "Ye believe not, because ye are not of My sheep," according to Hom. xlviii. on John's Gospel, mean as much as this, "Ye believe not because ye are not bought for eternal life by My blood." "No one perishes of those for whom Christ died" [Epist. 169, c. 1]. Nay, according to his theory Augustine would have no mediator between God and the human race, but only a mediator between God and the elect: "Christ redeemed the sinners who were to be justified" (justificandos peccatores) [De Trinitate, lib. iv. c. 13: Wiggers, pp. 254, 255].

[1] "Hæc de his loquor qui prædestinati sunt in regnum Dei, quorum ita certus est numerus, ut nec addatur illis quisquam, nec minuatur ex eis" [De Correptione et Gratia, c. 13].

[2] "Cur autem istum potius quam illum liberet—inscrutabilia sunt judicia ejus et investigabiles viæ ejus" [Rom. xi. 35]. [De Prædestinatione Sanct. c. 8. See also de Civitate, lib. xiv. c. 26.]

[3] De Correp. et Grat. c. xiii. et Tract. xlviii. in Joannis Evangel.: "non estis ex ovibus meis" [c. x. 26]. "Quomodo ergo istis dixit non estis est ovibus meis—quia videbat eos ad sempiternum interitum prædestinatos, non ad vitam æternam sui sanguinis pretio comparatos. 'Pater meus quod dedit mihi majus est omnibus' [ver. 29]. Quid potest lupus, quid potest fur et latro? Non perdunt nisi ad interitum prædestinatos."

[4] Mirandum est quidem, multumque mirandum quod filiis suis quibusdam quos Deus regeneravit in Christo, quibus fidem spem, dilectionem dedit non dat perseverantiam? [De Cor. et Grat. c. viii. sec. 18]. "Ex duobus autem piis, cur huic donetur perseverantia usque ad finem, et huic non donetur inscrutabiliora sunt judicia Dei" [De Dono Perseverantiæ, c. ix.].

[5] In his Antidote to the Council of Trent, see Tracts, vol. iii. pp. 135, 136 [Calvin. Soc. transl.].

[6] Inst. lib. iii. c. 24, sec. 4.

[7] Dominus ut magis convictos et inexcusabiles reddat insinuat in eorum (reproborum) mentes quatenus sine adoptionis spiritu gustari potest ejus bonitas. . . . Reprobi nunquam sensum gratiæ nisi confusum percipiunt, ut umbram potius apprehendunt quam solidum corpus . . . nec vero nego quin hucusque eorum mentes irradiet Deus, ut ejus gratiam agnoscant; sed sensum illorum a peculiari testimento quod reddit suis electis ita distinguit ut ad solidum effectum et fruitionem non perveniunt. [Inst. lib. iii. c. 2, sec. 11.]

[8] Multi signum recipiunt qui tamen gratiæ non fiunt participes; quia signum omnibus est commune, hoc est bonis indifferenter et malis; Spiritus autem non nisi electis confertur, atque signum ut diximus sine Spiritu est inefficax. [Com. in Ephes. v. 26.]

[9] Horribile decretum fateor [Inst. lib. iii. c. 23, sec. 7].

to an unbiassed mind contrary to the meaning of many portions of Scripture, compelling us to understand them in a forced and unnatural sense; and it is also inconsistent with the character of our heavenly Father there revealed.

This was clearly perceived when the Predestinarian theory was first introduced; the objections against St. Augustine's theory were chiefly based on its contrariety to the doctrine of universal redemption, and of God's "willing" the salvation of all men. After Calvin's revival of the Augustinian theory, similar objections were soon proposed, and some of his followers attempted so to preach election, as to deny the corresponding doctrine of non-election or reprobation. This attempt was most strenuously opposed by the Reformer. "Many," he says, "so preach election as to deny that any is reprobated, but very ignorantly and childishly (nimis inscite et pueriliter), since election itself would not stand unless opposed to reprobation."[1]

The attempt to separate these dogmas, so emphatically condemned by Calvin, has also been made in modern times, and may be said to characterize the form of Calvinism known as semi-Calvinism. Now that the doctrine of Calvinistic election may in a certain sense be held, without admitting a corresponding decree of reprobation, is unquestionable. A theory has been proposed, which is termed (from a well-known divine of the seventeenth century, with whom it originated) Baxterianism, which may be thus stated. Some persons, Baxter supposed in accordance with Calvin's theory, were elected by a Divine decree, without foresight of their character, to salvation; but upon all others to whom the Gospel was preached, "common grace" (that is as distinguished from effectual or saving grace, given to the elect only), was bestowed, which they might so far improve as at last to attain salvation. Thus, in their case, salvation was conditional, depending on their faithful use of grace. But the objections against this theory are manifest: that if men can be saved by their own free will with the assistance of God's ordinary grace, there would have been no need whatever of a decree of election for the salvation of any one; neither is it probable that God in the case of some persons would make the service of their own free will indispensable to salvation, and yet in the case of others supersede its need altogether by a decree of election.[2] Besides which is the fatal objection to this theory—the decree of Calvinistic election, is solely founded on the alleged fact, that man is by nature in a state of total corruption, destitute of free will, and thus cannot be saved, except by God's irresistible or necessarily effectual grace. Hence the Baxterian theory is impossible, and would manifestly be subversive of the Calvinistic system. It cannot, indeed, be held by any one who admits the first principles, the very foundation of Calvin's theory

[1] Inst. lib. iii. c. 23, sec. 1.

[2] Thus Calvin argues: "Fortuito alios adipisci, vel sua industria acquirere quod sola electio paucis confert, plus quam insulse dicetur." [Ibid.]

—his doctrine of original sin and the total corruption of human nature.

This theory is probably little known and has few supporters at the present day. Moderate or semi-Calvinists now as much as possible avoid the subject of reprobation altogether, or speak of it as preterition, i.e. being passed by or not elected to salvation, but as this means that the non-elect are left in their fallen state, in which, destitute of God's effectual grace, they must necessarily perish, the doctrine remains in the same state as before, with merely the change or softening of an obnoxious word: election and non-election are connected as before, and are equally inseparable. Hence the objections against the latter doctrine, which some Calvinists openly admit to be unscriptural;[3] while others, by keeping the doctrine as much as possible out of sight,[4] virtually shew that election itself, according to the Calvinistic theory, is untenable, or cannot consistently or scripturally be maintained.

An account may now be given of the history and progress of Calvinism. During the Reformer's life, his opinions were widely diffused throughout Europe. Some of the English Reformers,[5] and Somerset the Protector, during the reign of Edward VI., corresponded with him.[6]

[3] See Art. on Reprobation in Dr. Henderson's edition of Buck's Theological Dictionary [1833]. The writer says the word "reprobation" has been applied "to that decree or resolve which God is supposed to have taken from all eternity to punish sinners who shall die in impenitence, in which sense it is opposed to election. But the word is never used in this sense in Scripture, nor does the Scripture teach any such doctrine as that of a reprobatory decree, how clearly soever it refers us to this doctrine of election."

[4] Thus Scott in his reply to Bishop Tomline's Refutation—"But we find nowhere in Scripture so particular an account given concerning the non-elect (as concerning the elect). God would do them no wrong, but would not exert omnipotent power in new creating them to holiness, but determined to have them to walk in their own ways. It was a negative decree, a determination not effectually to interfere" [vol. ii. p. 159]. There is unquestionably, so far as we can perceive, no difference between Calvin's positive and Scott's negative decree. The doctrine of reprobation, as held by the two writers, is really though not verbally identical.

[5] The reader must not suppose from what is stated that the Reformers—those to whom this name is especially given in our Church (as Cranmer and Ridley)—adopted Calvin's views on Predestination, or that such views are reconcilable with the formularies of the English Church. The reformers mentioned held undoubtedly a view of Predestination, but, as will be shewn, it was not the Calvinistic tenet. It would be easy to prove from their writings, and the explicit teaching of the Prayer-Book which they compiled, that they held the doctrine of baptismal regeneration—that all infants by baptism are engrafted into the Church and made God's children by adoption and grace. Now this doctrine was not only expressly rejected by Calvin, but is necessarily inconsistent with his system, since he believed that to the elect only amongst the baptized was given the grace of regeneration or adoption. We cannot doubt, therefore, that Cranmer, Ridley, and probably others amongst the reformers, held the Augustinian view of predestination, which is fully reconcilable with the doctrine of baptismal grace.

[6] See Letters of Calvin translated by Bonnet [1857]. The following are quoted from the second volume:—To Protector Somerset [1548], to Lady Anne Seymour [1549], to Somerset [1550], to Edward VI. [1551], to Somerset [1551], two letters to Cranmer [1552], to Edward VI. and Cranmer [1553].

At the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, the returned exiles, most of whom had embraced his opinions, were promoted to bishoprics and other ecclesiastical dignities, and Calvinistic teaching generally prevailed. A contemporary writer states that Calvin's Institutes were generally in the hands of the clergy, and might be considered their text-book of theology.[1] Towards the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign a reaction against Calvinistic doctrine took place, and sounder teaching on predestination and grace prevailed.[2] The Calvinistic system was chiefly disseminated in Scotland by Knox [A.D. 1559-1571], the friend of Calvin; and it soon became, as it is still, the established faith. "Calvinism," says a recent writer, "still more inimical to Rome than were the doctrines of Luther, had from Geneva, its centre and stronghold, spread itself in all directions in Western Europe. In the neighbouring provinces of Germany it had in a great degree supplanted Lutheranism, and it had even penetrated into Hungary and Poland; it was predominant in Scotland, and had leavened the doctrines of the English Church. In France it had divided the population into two hostile camps."[3]

But this rapid progress of Calvinism, as the same writer observes, was only temporary. After the Council of Trent and the moral reformation which ensued, the Church of Rome recovered a large portion of her lost ground. It would be absurd, e.g., to speak of France in modern times, as divided into "two hostile camps," Catholic and Calvinistic. The Calvinistic party have long ago dwindled into a feeble and totally insignificant minority. Nor would the remarks of this writer respecting Austria in any degree hold good at the present day. On account of the prevalence of Lutheran and Calvinistic opinion, he says, "not one thirtieth of the population remained faithful to the Roman Church:" as regards the present population of Austria the Roman Catholics exceed in number Protestants of all denominations nearly in the proportion of ten and one.[4]

We have stated that predestinarian teaching originated with St. Augustine. For some unknown reason the controversy thence arising excited little attention in the East. The new theory had been indeed virtually, though not controversially, and in all its bearings, condemned by the teaching of the Greek Fathers, obviously irreconcilable with it.[5] In the seventeenth century the doctrine of the Eastern Church was fully and authoritatively declared; and the peculiar system of Calvin was expressly condemned as opposed to her belief from the earliest period. The following is a brief statement of the circumstances which led to this public confession. Cyrillus Lucaris, a native of Crete, having in his travels through Europe embraced Calvinistic opinions, whilst outwardly professing the orthodox creed of the Greek Church, was chosen the patriarch of Alexandria, and afterwards of Constantinople. He then published a confession of faith, or one was published under his name, in which Calvinistic opinions were distinctly avowed; and the teaching of the Eastern Church on other points was represented as being in accordance with the Lutheran standard. On this confession becoming known, two synods were held at Constantinople in which Cyril was anathematized, and it is even said that he denied upon oath that he was the writer of the heretodox creed. His opinions were more fully examined in the Council of Jerusalem, held a few years afterwards [A.D. 1672], in which he is accused of the grossest dissimulation and wickedness. He had publicly taught, it is said, the orthodox views of the Greek Church whilst patriarch of Alexandria and Constantinople (which the Council clearly shews by extracts from his sermons), and then in a secret and insidious manner published a confession of faith, in which doctrines wholly contrary were maintained. His confession is, as the Council states, signed by none but himself, and could have no claim to authenticity, not having been transcribed into the public records of the Church, which ought to have been the case with his own confession of faith as patriarch. If published synodically, the signatures of the bishops and others present who sanctioned it would have been affixed. Any discussion respecting Cyril's life, history, or his cruel end (he was strangled on an accusation of treason) does not come within our consideration. His spurious confession was most emphatically repudiated by the Council, which set forth in opposition the teaching of the Eastern Church on the controversy. The Council indignantly denies that light and darkness, or Christ and Belial, have any more concord than the "heresiarch Calvin" and the Eastern Church. They condemn the Calvinistic system as calumniating God, who is the Father of all, as opposed to the teaching of Scripture, that man has free will, and is to receive the reward of his actions; as making God the author of sin; and as being partial in His dealings, preferring one to another, though He tells us that He "wills all men to be saved." It is added that free will is the most assured dogma of the Catholic Church, and the opinion of Calvin is condemned, that man is saved by faith alone without works.[6]

[1] Atque is liber [Institutio Christianæ Religionis] in tanto apud nostros hodie in Anglia novi Evangelii satrapas pretio est, ut vix quemquam ecclesiasticæ functioni proficiant, qui non hunc librum habeat et studiose evolvat. Copi [scil. Harpsfield], Dialogi, p. 824. Antwerp, 1566.

[2] Heylin's Quinquarticular History, part iii. c. 21, 22.

[3] Dyer's History of Europe, vol. ii. p. 392 [1861].

[4] In 1851 there were in round numbers in the Austrian empire twenty-five and a half millions of Roman Catholics, and of Greeks in union with Rome three and a half millions; the Protestants of all denominations being rather more than three millions [Chambers' Encyclopædia, i. 569].

[5] Cassian of Marseilles [A.D. 360-435], who introduced the Monastic system into the West, may be considered as embodying the theology of the Eastern Church in its bearing on Augustinian Predestination, being a disciple of St. Chrysostom, by whom he was ordained deacon. He shews, though uncontroversially, the reality of man's free will, the resistibility of Divine grace (though his views on the necessity of preventing grace are sometimes erroneous), and the universality of God's love to His creatures—in other words, indirectly refutes the newly devised dogmas of St. Augustine. [See Ad Collatorem, c. xiii. 11-18, Opera, 1722.]

[6] See Decreta iii. x. xiii. xiv. [Kimmel, Libri Symbolici Orientalis Ecclesiæ, Jenæ, 1843].

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent may next be referred to [A.D. 1545-1563] in their bearing on this subject. The doctrine of Predestination was not formally considered by the Council, though Calvinistic opinions on the subject, as in the canons on justification, are condemned. The only direct reference to Predestination is contained in one of these canons: "That no one so long as he is in this mortal life ought so far to presume, as regards the secret mystery of Divine Predestination, as to determine for certain that he is in the number of the predestinate, as if it were true that he who is justified either cannot sin any more, or if he do sin, that he ought to promise himself an assured repentance; for, except by special revelation, it cannot be known whom God hath chosen unto Himself."[1] This is merely a repetition of the statement of St. Augustine; it undoubtedly implies that the predestinate cannot perish, but states nothing respecting the cause of Predestination, the real point of dispute. There were two parties at the Council of Trent, the Dominicans, who held the doctrine of St. Thomas, or Augustinian predestination; and others, as the Jesuits, an order recently formed by St. Ignatius Loyola [A.D. 1534], who believed that Divine grace was resistible, and that the cause of election was man's foreseen obedience and perseverance. Luther and Melanchthon at first held the doctrine of Predestination according to the rigorous theory of Calvin, but Melanchthon's views were soon modified,[2] and the doctrine of Predestination and grace, as finally developed, or held by the Lutheran body, was not deemed erroneous by the Council of Trent. Heylin says: "The Fathers there assembled found nothing in the Augsburg Confession, and other symbols of faith, worthy of blame."[3] The canons on justification, and the anathemas, were solely directed against the reformed or Calvinistic teaching.

At the close of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century, the controversy on Arminianism began, of which an account has been already given [ARMINIANISM]. The Arminians were condemned by the Council of Dort, which faithfully represents Calvin's teaching. Archbishop Whitgift attempted, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth and of her successor, to impose nine Articles on the Church of England as an authoritative exposition of the Seventeen, called "Lambeth Articles," from the name of the archiepiscopal palace, but the attempt was frustrated.[4]

We have alluded to the different opinions on Predestination held by the Fathers of the Council of Trent, which by the Council were left unsettled. A controversy was soon raised on the subject by Baius or Bajus, a professor of Louvain, who may be considered the precursor of Jansenius. Eighteen propositions taken from his lectures and writings were condemned by the Sorbonne [A.D. 1560]; afterwards Pius V. issued a bull [A.D. 1567] censuring seventy-six dogmas of Baius, which the writer was compelled to retract. His opinions afterwards were mainly adopted by the Jansenists. The controversy with the latter originated in a work written by Cornelius Jansenius, Bishop of Ypres, in the Netherlands, and published after his death, in 1640, under the title of Augustinus. In this work he proposes to state the doctrines of St. Augustine on the depravity of man, and the nature and influence of Divine grace; the doctrines which, according to Jansenius, St. Augustine delivered and taught in the name of the Church. The work soon after its publication was condemned by Pope Urban VIII. [A.D. 1642]; and afterwards by a bull of Innocent X. [A.D. 1653.] Five propositions were extracted from Jansenius' work, which were condemned in these words. The first proposition was: "That there are some commands of God which righteous and good men are absolutely unable to obey, though disposed to do it, and that God does not give them so much grace that they are able to observe them;" the bull says of this, "We declare it to be rash, impious, blasphemous, worthy of anathema and heretical, and as such we condemn it." The second proposition was that "no man in this corrupt state of nature can resist Divine grace operating upon the soul." The third proposition, that "in order to a man's being praise or blameworthy before God, he need not be exempt from necessity, but only from coercion." Of these two propositions, the bull says, "We declare them heretical, and as such condemn them." Of the fourth proposition: "that the semi-Pelagians erred greatly by supposing that the human will has the power both of admitting and of rejecting the operation of internal preventing grace;" the bull declares that "it is false and heretical, and as such we condemn it." The fifth proposition: "That whoever affirms that Jesus Christ made expiation by His sufferings and death for the sins of all mankind is a semi-Pelagian," is thus censured: "We declare it impious, blasphemous, contumacious and derogating from Divine love, and heretical, and as such we condemn it." [JANSENISTS.]

The several propositions condemned embody the main details of the Predestinarian theory, which is thus implicitly condemned by the papal bull, since it would be impossible to assent to the condemnation of the "five propositions," and still

[1] Sessio, vi. c. xiii.; see also c. xiii. on the "gift of perseverance." "Let no one herein (the Council says) promise himself anything as certain with an absolute certainty, though all to place and repose a most firm hope in God's help. For God, unless men be themselves wanting to His grace, as He has begun the good work so will He perfect it, working (in them) to will and to accomplish. Nevertheless, let those who think themselves to stand, take heed lest they fall," &c. [Waterworth's transl.]

[2] Comp. the original edition of Loci Theologici [A.D. 1521] with subsequent recensions of the same work. First, Melanchthon says, "Si ad prædestinationem referas humanam voluntatem, nec in externis, nec in internis operibus ulla est libertas, sed eveniunt omnia juxta destinationem divinam." Afterwards this opinion was considerably modified in editions published during the lifetime of the author, and in his last recension was certainly rejected. See Augusti's reprint of the first edition of Loci Theologici [Leipsic, 1821], in which the alterations made in subsequent editions are given in an appendix.

[3] Quinquarticular History, c. 4.

[4] Ibid. part iii. c. 21.

to hold in their entirety either the Augustinian or the Calvinistic system.

Speaking generally of Calvinism, in modern times, it must be said to have usually developed into Arianism, Socinianism, or kindred heresies, as we may see from the present state of Geneva, its birthplace ;[1] also from the prevalence of Socinianism in the old Puritan Churches established in the seventeenth century in America. In the disputes on Lady Hewley's charity, which occurred a few years ago, it was shewn that Presbyterian ministers in England had generally perverted the orthodox doctrines on the Holy Trinity, and taught Arianism or Socinianism. Calvinism at the present day is probably in its purest doctrinal state (that is, in nearest accordance with the teaching of its author) in the Presbyterian Establishment and the Free Church (so called) of Scotland. Their symbol of faith is still the Assembly's Catechism, which is essentially the same as that of the Synod of Dort, and represents the genuine teaching of Calvin.[2]

CALVINISTIC CONFESSIONS. The earliest of these documents was the Confession of Basle, or the Helvetic Confession. It was first composed A.D. 1530, and re-constructed A.D. 1536, and A.D. 1566. With the latter, Bullinger's name is epecially associated. The Tetrapolitan Confession was so named as being subscribed by the four cities of Strasburg, Constance, Menningen, and Lindau, in 1531; and was probably composed by Bucer. The Gallican Confession was composed by Beza, and was presented to Charles IX. as that of the French Protestants, A.D. 1561. The Belgic Confession originated in the same year was approved by a Protestant Synod in 1579, and finally confirmed by the Synod of Dort, in 1619. The Scottish Confession was composed by the usurping "Assembly of Divines" at Westminster in 1647, and established in Scotland in 1690 by Act of Parliament. [Calvinism. Niemeyer's Collect. Confess.]

CANDLEMAS. An ancient name for the feast of the Purification, February 2. It perpetuates the memory of a very ancient custom, that of walking in procession, carrying tapers and singing hymns. This was probably the first festival set apart in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, as it is referred to by St. Cyril of Alexandria, and is provided for by Collect, Epistle and Gospel in the Comes of St. Jerome, and the Sacramentary of St. Gregory. In the Eastern Church it is called the Hypapante of our Lord Jesus Christ, the meeting of our Lord with Simeon and Anna in the Temple being the event kept in view. It is placed at forty days' distance from Christmas, that being the interval ordained by the Jewish law between the birth of the child and the purification of the mother. The ceremony from which the popular name of the day was derived is spoken of in the Homilies of Alcuin [A.D. 790], and of St. Bernard [A.D. 1153], but is probably much more ancient than either.

CANON. A Greek term, κανὼν, for any rule or law passed by a conciliar assembly, for the regulation of doctrine or discipline in the Church Catholic, or in a particular branch of it. The word is used in a cognate sense several times in the New Testament, and the Apostolic epistle in Acts xv. 23-29 is practically a Canon. It is used in the decree of the Council of Nicæa [16, 17, 19], and the historian Socrates [A.D. 439] distinctly speaks of it as a term commonly received in its present meaning, when he writes, "Then the bishops assembled in synod, having drawn up in writing some documents which are commonly called Canons, returned to their respective sees" [Socrat. Hist. i. 13]. The Canons passed at the General Councils form a body of law for the whole Church. Those of some other Councils and Synods are almost as generally received; but the Canons passed by Provincial Synods are only binding on the particular province represented. [Convocation. Council. Synod.]

CANON. [Liturgy.]

CANON LAW. [Law.]

CANON OF SCRIPTURE. The Hebrew word קנה, the Greek κανών, the Latin canna, are of the same stock, and signify a measuring reed; and hence, as used by Aristotle, a testing rule in Ethics. Among the Alexandrine grammarians, collections of the old Greek authors were called κανόνες, as being models of excellence, classics. Thus the word was ready for the use to which it has been from a very early date applied by the Church, viz., to denote the rule of faith and practice; and the Divine code of faith and practice is what is meant by the "Canon of Scripture."[3]

The Canon of the Old Testament, which was the only sacred collection of books in the hands of the first Christians, had been closed long before the birth of Christ, and as such was received from the Jewish by the Christian Church. On the testimony of the Jews, therefore, the Canon of the Old Testament rests.

Among the Jews, both of Palestine and of Egypt, there were to be found other writings which claimed to be the composition of the earlier Prophets. Such were the books of Wisdom (ascribed to Solomon) and of Baruch [cf. Jer.

[1] "Calvin died in 1564. The discipline of his Church can scarcely be said to have survived him. In the seventeenth century, Geneva was distinguished only by its open profession of infidelity, till at length the Trinity, the Atonement and the Incarnation of the Son of God were prohibited by authority as subjects of public instruction." [Barter's Tracts, p. 252, 1851.]

[2] There is probably a little difference on "Supralapsarianism," i.e., whether God decreed the fall of Adam. Calvin, we have seen, asserted this dogma: it is only said in the Assembly's Catechism, c. vi., the sin of our first parents "God was pleased according to His wise and holy counsel to permit, having purposed to order it to His own glory."

[3] In St. Irenæus we find the expressions, "fundamentum et columna fidei nostræ" [Hær. iii. 1]; "regula veritatis" [iii. 11; iv. 35]. In Clement of Alexandria, εὐαγγελικῷ κανόνι [Strom. iii. ed. Sylb. p. 453]. In Eusebius, κατὰ τὸν ἐκκλησιαστικὸν κανόνα [H. E. vi. 25]. The Council of Laodicea (held between A.D. 343 and 381) decreed in its celebrated canon:—Ὅτι οὐ δεῖ ἰδιωτικοὺς ψαλμοὺς λέγεσθαι ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ οὐδὲ ἀκανόνιστα βιβλία, ἀλλὰ μόνα τὰ κανονικὰ τῆς καινῆς καὶ παλαιᾶς διαθήκης [Can. 59, ap. Mansi, t. ii. p. 574].

Canon of Scripture

xxxvi.]; such pieces also as the story of Susannah [LXX. Dan. xiii.], the Epistle of Jeremiah [LXX. Baruch vi.], &c. To these latter writings the Jews of Palestine ascribed no value,—not even to those among them which were originally written in Hebrew (or Chaldee), such as Ecclesiasticus, Tobit, Judith, 1 Maccabees, but which have come to us only through a Greek translation, probably from the Jews of Egypt.[1] Although prized more highly by the Alexandrine Jews, there is no proof that they received these—the so-called Apocryphal books—into the Canon. Philo Judæus, who must have been well acquainted with them, never quotes them, although his references to the Canonical Books of the Old Testament are numerous [see infra].

The first Christians were acquainted with the Old Testament only (or for the most part) through the LXX. version, which, on the faith of the narrative as to its miraculous origin, was commonly held to be inspired.[2] It was soon perceived that the Word of God had been mingled with human additions in the collection which the so-called "Septuagint" version represented as the authentic composition of the writers of the Old Testament;[3] and accordingly, from a very early period, efforts were made to ascertain with accuracy what were those "oracles of God" of which the Jews alone were the Divinely-appointed guardians and witnesses [Rom. iii. 2]. One of the first attempts to settle this matter seems to have been caused by a question proposed by a certain Onesimus to his brother Melito, Bishop of Sardis [A.D. 170]. The reply of Melito, who had travelled to Palestine in order to obtain information, is preserved by Eusebius [H. E. iv. 26]; and the result of his investigations proves that the Jewish Church received as Canonical Scripture those Books only which the Anglican Church [Art. vi.] regards as the components of the Old Testament. The Jewish Canon is, in like manner, given us by Origen.[4]

The early notices of the Old Testament Canon are necessarily vague. Isaiah [xxxiv. 16] speaks of "the Book of the Lord;" Zechariah [vii. 12] refers to the Law and "the former prophets" as co-ordinate authorities; Daniel [ix. 2] appeals to "the books," and among them to "Jeremiah the Prophet," in a manner which seems to mark the prophetic writings as already collected into a volume. Popular belief—and there is every reason to accept it as accurate—has assigned to Ezra and the "Great Synagogue," the office of making this collection, as part of their divinely appointed task of organizing the Jewish Church.[5]

We read in 2 Macc. ii. 13, how Nehemiah "founding a library (βιβλιοθήκην, i.e. a collection of books) gathered together the acts of the Kings, and the Prophets, and of David." The writer had just stated that Jeremiah had preserved the Law; and here the remainder of the Canonical Books of the Old Testament are said to have been selected by Nehemiah from the different Jewish writings.[6] Passing from the Old Testament itself to the scanty remains of Hebrew literature, the most ancient reference to the Old Testament collection of writings, as a whole, is to be found in the prologue to the book of Ecclesiasticus [circ. 130 B.C.], which makes mention of the division of the different Books into the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms [see article on the OLD TESTAMENT]. The works of Philo Judæus [A.D. 41] and of Josephus also afford important testimony. Philo's references to the Books of Moses are numerous; and, in addition to the Pentateuch, he expressly quotes Joshua, Samuel ("the Kings"), Job, the Psalms, Proverbs, Ezra, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosea, Zechariah.[7] But the famous passage in the treatise of Josephus against Apion [i. 6-8] supplies the earliest direct evidence as to the entire Hebrew Canon. Having elsewhere quoted and applied almost every Book of the Old Testament, Josephus here counts up twenty-two Books in all, according to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet. He specifies the five Books of Moses; thirteen of the "Prophets after Moses"—the prophetic history, as his view respecting the Book of Esther led him to suppose, continuing to Artaxerxes (? Longimanus)—[i.e. 1. Joshua; 2. Judges and Ruth; 3. 2 Books of Samuel; 4. 2 Books of Kings; 5. 2 Books of Chronicles; 6. Ezra and Nehemiah; 7. Esther; 8. Isaiah; 9. Jeremiah and Lamentations; 10. Ezekiel; 11. Daniel; 12. the twelve minor Prophets;[8] 13. Job]; and four "which contain hymns and directions for life" [i.e. Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon],—in all thirty-nine Books. The unvarying consent of the Jewish Church down to the present day upholds this conclusion.

[1] See Prol. to Ecclus. Also St. Jerome, Præff. in Tob.; et ad l. Judith; Prolog. Galat.

[2] According to the statement of Aristeas, repeated by Josephus [Ant. xii. 2], and much exaggerated by later writers [e.g., Philo Judæus, De Vita Mosis], this translation was made in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt, at the instance of Demetrius Phalereus, by seventy-two learned Jews who were invited for the purpose from Palestine. Each, it was said, separately received the Books of Moses to render into Greek; and each of the seventy-two translators produced a version in all respects identical with each of the other versions [see H. Hody, De Bibl. Text Originalibus]. To this, translations of the other Books were from time to time added.

[3] See e.g., the epistle addressed to Origen by Julius Africanus [A.D. 220], ap. Routh, Rel. Sacr. vol. ii. p. 226.

[4] Comm. in Ps. i. This catalogue of the books of the Old Testament is repeated by Eusebius, H. E. vi. 25.

[5] See Hävernick, Einleitung, i. 1, 39.

[6] The Canon of the Samaritans contains only the five Books of Moses.

[7] See a paper by Professor Lightfoot in The Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology, March 1856, p. 119; Lee On Inspiration, app. F. p. 480. Philo [De Vit. Contempl.] refers also to the Old Testament as a whole, where he too seems to mention the threefold division of its Books—νόμους, καὶ λόγια θεσπισθέντα διὰ προφητῶν, καὶ ὕμνους—to which, however, he adds, καὶ τὰ ἄλλα οἷς ἐπιστήμη καὶ εὐσέβεια συναύξονται.

[8] According to the threefold division into "the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms" [OLD TESTAMENT], "the Prophets" were divided into (1) the former (ראשונים). viz., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings; and (2) the later (אחרונים), or those properly styled Prophets. The Books of this second division were again divided into "the great" (גדולים), viz., Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel; and "the less" (קטנים), viz., the twelve minor Prophets—see De Wette, Einleit. s. 10.

For the determination of the Canon of the New Testament, appeal may be made with confidence to the result expressed in the definition of St. Athanasius, as given in his famous "Festal" or "Paschal" epistle. He there enumerates the Canonical writings [κανονιζόμενα], viz. the four Gospels, the Acts, fourteen Pauline,[1] and seven Catholic Epistles, together with the Apocalypse. This was the decision of an age which was necessarily an age of criticism. It was the great object of the attack upon Christianity under Diocletian [A.D. 303] to effect the complete destruction of the writings which contained the doctrines of the Christian religion. "Give up your sacred Books or die" was the alternative proposed by the persecutor; and severe ecclesiastical censures were subsequently directed against those who had delivered up—the so-called Traditores—the Books of Scripture to the heathen. It became, consequently, an anxious question—"What are our sacred Books?" Thus the determination of the canon of Scripture was a matter of great practical moment; and Eusebius has carefully collected the doubts and the proofs which formed the materials of the discussion. According to the distinction which resulted from this inquiry, the Books of the New Testament were divided into ὁμολογούμενα ("universally acknowledged") and ἀντιλεγόμενα ("spoken against")—the latter class comprising five of the shorter Epistles, viz. 2 and 3 St. John, 2 St. Peter, St. James, St. Jude, the Apocalypse, and the Epistle to the Hebrews.[2] The Church of Rome, as in the Old Testament so in the New, distinguishes between the Books which it styles "proto-canonici," and "deutero-canonici." The Anglican Church, in the case of the Old Testament, receives as authoritative and Canonical only the former class, regarding the "deutero-canonici" as apocryphal. In the case of the New Testament, the Anglican Church declares [Art. vi.]: "All the Books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive, and account them Canonical." The Books styled "deutero-canonici" by the Church of Rome, are, as above, Hebrews, St. James, 2 and 3 St. John, 2 St. Peter, St. Jude, the Apocalypse; and also, to quote Perrone,[3] "[1] Posteriores versiculi cap. xvi. S. Marci, nempe a ver. 9 ad finem; [2] historia sudoris Christi sanguinei quæ legitur ap. S. Lucam, cap. xxii. 43, 44; [3] historia mulieris adulteræ, Joan. viii. 2-12." This distinction of the Books of the New Testament into "libri proto-canonici" and "deutero-canonici," Tholuck accepts on the part of the Lutherans—see his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews [Einleitung, chap. vi.].[4]

The earliest extant catalogue of the Books of the New Testament is preserved in a composition by an anonymous writer, apparently translated from Greek, and yet of Roman origin. This composition, which is mutilated at the beginning and at the end, was first published by Muratori in 1740, from a MS. preserved in the Ambrosian Library at Milan. Bunsen conjectures, with much probability, that Hegesippus [circ. A.D. 170] was the author. [See Analecta Ante-Nicæna, i. 126.] The "Fragment" opens with the statement that St. Luke's is the third, and St. John's the fourth Gospel—the lost beginning doubtless mentioning those of St. Matthew and St. Mark. Of the rest of the New Testament, the Epistle to the Hebrews, 2 St. Peter, and St. James alone are wanting: whether the lost conclusion mentioned these Epistles it is impossible to affirm. It is usually held that, even before any catalogue of the Canonical Books of the New Testament was put forth by the Church, a list was announced by the heretic Marcion of Pontus [circ. A.D. 140] which consisted of a Gospel—τὸ Εὐαγγέλιον, (which, however, was but a mutilated recension of St. Luke), and ten Epistles of St. Paul—ὁ Ἀπόστολος; for Marcion rejected the three pastoral Epistles, and, as his system required, the Epistle to the Hebrews. Tischendorf pronounces the opinion that Marcion occupies "an important place in the history of the New Testament Canon" to be erroneous. [See his tract Wann wurden unsere Evangelien verfasst? s. 25.]

Equivalent to a catalogue of the Books of Scripture is an ancient translation. Such a translation we have in the Peshito, i.e. the simple or faithful version, as the Syriac is called. This, if not the oldest, is one of the oldest versions of both the Old and the New Testament. So early as A.D. 170 ὁ Σύρος is cited by Melito [Mill, Proleg. sec. 1239]; and this same version is read at the present day by the various Nestorian sects. The Peshito omits the Apocalypse, and four of the Catholic epistles, viz. 2 St. Peter, 2 and 3 St. John, and St. Jude.[5]

Of no less weight is the concurrent testimony of three writers, St. Irenæus, St. Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian, who lived in different countries at the close of the second century, and who quote as Scripture the following Books—the four Gospels, the Acts, thirteen Epistles of St. Paul, 1 St. Peter, 1 St. John, and the Apocalypse. Here it is to be further noted—[1] that of St. Paul's fourteen epistles, St. Irenæus and Clement do not quote that to Philemon, although they were, doubtless, acquainted with it; [2] that it is the Epistle to the Hebrews which

[1] Thus ascribing the Epistle to the Hebrews to St. Paul.

[2] These latter Books, Eusebius distinctly states, were publicly read in most of the churches [ἐν πλείσταις ἐκκλησίαις] like the rest of the New Testament; and he observes that the Apocalypse, if thought fit, [εἴγε φανείη] may be classed among the Books "universally acknowledged" [Hist. Eccl. iii. 25]. He would also ascribe the Epistle to the Hebrews to St. Paul [see H. E. iii. 3; vi. 20], although he notices the doubts of some. Eusebius mentions another class of writings, which he styles νόθα, e.g. the "Acts of Paul," the "Revelation of Peter;" but he does not adhere consistently to the terms of this classification. On this confusion, see Hug, Einleitung, i. s. 80.

[3] Prælect. Theol. t. ii. pars 2, p. 12.

[4] The Greek Church adopts the Canon of St. Athanasius, thus agreeing with the Anglican Church throughout—see "The Larger Catechism of the Russian Church," translated by R. W. Blackmore, B.A.

[5] The "Philoxenian" Syriac contains all the New Testament except the Apocalypse. It takes its name from Xenaias or Philoxenus, Monophysite Bishop of Hierapolis, A.D. 488.

Tertullian excludes from the fourteen Pauline,[1] ascribing it to Barnabas [De Pudic. c. 20]; [3] that St. Irenæus [Adv. Hær. i. 16; iii. 16] quotes 2 St. John, 7, 8, 11; and that Clement also refers to it [Strom. ii. ed. Sylb. p. 389]—both 2 and 3 St. John being included in the "Fragment" of Muratori, and being mentioned by Origen and Dionysius Alex. [ap. Euseb. vi. 25; vii. 25]; [4] that Clement [Strom. iii. p. 431; Pædag. iii. 239] and Tertullian [De Habitu fœm. c. 3] quote the Epistle of St. Jude,—Origen also writing: "Petrus etiam duabus epistolarum suarum personat tubis, Jacobus quoque, et Judas" [Hom. vii. in Jos. ii.]; and, again, Ἰούδας ἔγραψεν ἐπιστολὴν. . . . πεπληρωμένην τῶν τῆς οὐρανίου χάριτος ἐρωμένων λόγων [in Matt. iii. cf. De Princip. iii. 2]; [5] that the Epistle of St. James is quoted argumentatively by St. Clement of Rome [1 ad Cor. c. 10]; by St. Irenæus, [Adv. Hær. iv. 16]; by Origen, [In Joann. t. xix. 4]; [6] the early evidence for the authenticity of St. Jude's epistle has been given above; and in it St. Jude himself [17, 18] supplies evidence for 2 St. Peter, whose words he thus quotes: "But, beloved, remember ye the words which were spoken before of the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; how that they told you there should be mockers," &c., where 2 St. Peter iii. 3 is manifestly referred to: indeed the general resemblance of the two epistles is unquestionable. Origen (see [4]) quotes 2 St. Peter by name: "Et iterum Petrus dicet, consortes inquit, facti estis Divinæ naturæ" [2 Pet. i. 4]; Hom. iv. in Levit. Opp. t. ii. p. 200; so also in his Comm. in Joann. Opp. t. iv. p. 135. In the Apology addressed [circ. A.D. 170] to the Emperor Marcus Antoninus by Melito of Sardis, published in Syriac by Dr. Cureton, 2 St. Peter iii. 10-12 is referred to. [7] One of the many references to the Apocalypse by St. Irenæus is noteworthy:—He records that some of his contemporaries, who had themselves seen John, "the Lord's disciple," were wont to state with reference to a disputed reading [viz. the "number of the beast," chap. xiii.] that the number 666 was the true reading, adding that they were supported by trustworthy and ancient copies.[2] The doubts as to the Canonical authority of the Apocalypse, which Eusebius has mentioned, are to be traced to the controversial zeal of Dionysius of Alexandria, who imagined that he could refute the Millennarianism of Nepos of Arsinoe by denying that the Apostle John was the author,—his arguments being founded solely on internal evidence [CRITICISM]. A similar motive, as we learn from a work on heresy by Philastrius, Bishop of Brescia, led in the West to the doubts as to the Epistle to the Hebrews [Hær. 89]. By questioning the Pauline authorship, it was supposed that the Novatianists (as also the Montanists) would be more easily silenced when deprived of the support of Heb. vi. 4, 5, claimed by them, for their tenet that sin committed after baptism could not be forgiven.[3] [See the article on the Canon in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible; and Tischendorf's Tract on the date of the composition of the Gospels, entitled Wann wurden unsere Evangelien verfasst? Leipsic, 1865, translated also by the Tract Society.]

CANONS, AMMONIAN OR EUSEBIAN. In the third century Ammonius of Alexandria proposed to construct a scheme which should exhibit at a glance the corresponding passages of the Gospels. Taking St. Matthew's Gospel as his standard, he arranged in parallel columns the sections which corresponded with the other three. The so-called Ammonian Sections, 1165 in number (viz. 355 for St. Matthew, 236 for St. Mark, 342 for St. Luke, 232 for St. John), are generally supposed to have been devised by Ammonius for the carrying out his system of Gospel-harmony. This opinion is questioned by Bishop Lloyd [Nov. Test. Oxon. 1827, Mon. p. vii.]. With the same object Eusebius devised his Ten Canons, among which the Ammonian Sections are divided, and which he describes in his epistle ad Carpianum. The first Canon sets forth seventy-one places in which all the four Evangelists have a narrative, discourse, or saying in common. The second, third, and fourth Canons exhibit the places common to the Gospels taken three by three. The fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth Canons, the places common to the Gospels taken two by two. The tenth, the places peculiar to each Evangelist. Beneath each Ammonian Section, written in the margin of the MS., is set down in coloured ink the number of the Eusebian Canon to which it refers. On searching for that Ammonian Section in its table or Canon, the parallel place or places in the other Gospels will be found: e.g., at St. John xv. 20, we find, $\frac{\overline{\text{ΡΛΘ}}}{\Gamma}$; where ΡΛΘ (139) is the Ammonian Section of St. John, and Γ (3) the number of the Eusebian Canon. Referring to the third Eusebian table, we read MT. ⸗ Λ. $\overline{\nu\eta}$ 1Ω. ρλθ—i.e. the first clause of St. John xv. 20, has as its parallels the 90th (⸗) section of St. Matthew [x. 24], and the 58th ($\overline{\nu\eta}$) of St. Luke [vi. 40]. [See A Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, by F. H. Scrivener, M.A., p. 53.]

CANONS, APOSTOLICAL. These most ancient canons of the Church were evidently compiled from various sources. Councils were held in the early ages, of which no acts have come down to us. The Paschal controversy, Judaizing tendencies, heretical baptism, lapse, and other questions, gave frequent scope for synodal action. Tertullian says that in Greece the Churches often assembled to take joint action in matters of grave import [de Jejun. 13]. The same was the custom

[1] That the Pauline authorship was maintained in the Eastern Churches, to which the Epistle to the Hebrews was addressed, is proved by the decree of the Synod of Antioch [A.D. 264], where Heb. xi. 26 is, with 1 and 2 Cor., ascribed to St. Paul.

[2] πᾶσι τοῖς σπουδαίοις καὶ ἀρχαίοις ἀντιγράφοις. Adv. Hær. v. 30.

[3] Tertullian writes (he held Barnabas to be the author): "Monens itaque discipulos omissis omnibus initiis, ad perfectionem magis tendere, nec rursus fundamenta pœnitentiæ jacere ab operibus mortuorum: impossibile est enim, inquit, eos qui semel illuminati sunt," &c. [De Pudicitia, c. 20.]

in Cappadocia, as we learn from Firmilian's letter to Cyprian [Ep. lxxv. Ed. Ox. p. 219]; and in Africa [Cyp. ad Fort. Ep. lvi. p. 116]. The more important canons thus framed were collected together at an early date, and the third century had scarcely opened before canons termed "apostolical" were in existence. Scaliger, Hammond, Gunning, and Bishop Pearson [V. Ign. i. 4] refer the Ap. Canons to this period, and B. Beveridge [Jud. Can. Apost. Coteler. i. and Can. Prim. Eccl. Vindic.] has conclusively proved the correctness of this view. This collection was known by various names, as the "Apostolical and Ecclesiastical Canons," "Ancient Canons," "Apostolical Doctrines and Traditions." They first obtained their name, perhaps, not as claiming to have been drawn up by the Apostles, but as declaring the discipline of the Apostolical Church confronted with heresy, as compiled by Apostolical men, the incumbents of Apostolical sees, and as announcing the synodal decisions of the Church built upon the Apostolic faith. Two collections of Apostolical Canons appear to have existed, both connected with the name of Clement of Rome. A shorter body of fifty canons was translated by Dionysius Exiguus, for Stephen, Bishop of Salona, at the close of the fifth century, and placed by him at the head of a codex containing the canons of the two first general Councils, the Chalcedonian, Ancyran, Sardican, Afriean Canons, and several others; shewing that these canons were of received authority, though Dionysius himself threw doubts upon their genuineness. A second collection was made half a century later by Johannes Scholasticus, before his advancement to the Patriarchate of Constantinople [A.D. 565]. It was enlarged by thirty-five additional canons, compiled from local and provincial Councils, and from the Apostolical Constitutions, to which work it has ever since been annexed as an appendix. Johannes Scholasticus declared that these eighty-five canons were found in earlier Greek collections. The Greek copy of which Dionysius made use was of a different family from the copy of Johannes Scholasticus. MSS. depart from the original text by slow degrees; and material variations in the context as well as number of these canons as they first stand forth in antiquity, shew that they are the product of very primitive times.

These canons bear the stamp of primitive antiquity, and they contain nothing that is inconsistent with Church usages of the second century. They were at length superseded by the canons of General Councils, and fell into desuetude. The few expressions that these canons contain, referring their origin to the Apostles, may have been easily interpolated. The concluding paragraph [Can. lxxxv.] which sets forth the canonical books of Scripture, is probably of the fourth century, and ascribes the entire work to the Apostles. The entire number of eighty-five canons has always been received as authoritative by the Eastern Church since their reception by the Trullan Council, A.D. 792. The Church of Rome treats all as apocryphal, even the first fifty canons [Cabassutius, Not. Conc. iv.]; but they mostly bear marks of primitive date, as Drey has shown [Drey, Neue Untersuch]. Dionysius himself eliminated the Apostolical Canons from a subsequent collection made after Pope Hormisdas had declared them to be apocryphal, "quos non admisit universitas, ego quoque in hoc opere prætermisi" [Bickell, Gesch. d. Kirchenrechts, 75]. Yet they still retained some authority in the Western Church, and Humbert, legate of Leo IX., declared, A.D. 1054, that the Apostolical Canons "numerantur inter apocrypha, exceptis capitulis quinquaginta." Gratian, moreover, gave them a place in the decretals, which obtained for them by degrees the force of law.

The existence of some such code may be traced in the writings of early Fathers. Tertullian says, "We are forbidden to consort with heretics," and he probably had in his mind C. Ap. xlv. and lxv., which in effect do forbid it. He speaks of synodal action in the Churches of Greece [de Jejun. 13], and Canon xxxvii. enjoins every Church to hold semestral councils. Firmilian [Ep. ad Cypr. A.D. 233] declares that these meetings were a matter of necessity [sec. iii.], clearly implying some authoritative decree that bound the Church in the way of duty. The only ante-Nicene decree on the subject is Ca. Ap. xxxvii. A letter, published first by Maffei, A.D. 1738, in a Latin translation, and to be found in Routh's Rel. Sacr. [iii. 381], contains a complaint of Hesychius and other Egyptian bishops, addressed to Meletius, A.D. 304, with respect to his ordination of priests in a foreign diocese; it was a practice "aliena a more divino et regula ecclesiastica," and Meletius, as they said, was well aware that it was a "law of their fathers and forefathers that no bishop should ordain in other dioceses." The only extant law to which reference could be made is the thirty-sixth Apostolical Canon. Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, in his epistle to Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, complains of the breach of ancient Church canon law, when Arius and Achillas, deprived of communion by himself [Theod. H. E. i. 4], were admitted to communion by other bishops. As there is no other primitive canon in existence bearing upon this subject we cannot doubt but that he had in his mind Can. Ap. xii. xiii. xvi. xxxii. The Council of Nice, without introducing much new matter, gave full synodal authority to such of these ancient canons as it adopted. [Beveridge, C. Prim. E. Jud. i. 4]; compare Can. Nic. i. = A. xxi.-xxiii.; N. ii. = A. lxxx.; N. iii. = A. xviii.; N. iv. = A. i. xxxiv.; N. v. = A. xxxii. xxxvii.; N. viii. = A. xvii. xxxv. lxii.; N. xvi. = A. xv.; N. xvii. = A. xliv.; N. xix. = A. xlvi. xlvii. Such terms as the "ecclesiastical canon," Can. Nic. ii.; the "canon," v. xv.; the "dogmata of the Catholic and Apostolical Church" viii., referring to similar canons in the Apostolical collection, must be held to be a virtual citation of them.

Still more satisfactory evidence of the high authority of these Canons is supplied by the Council of Antioch [A.D. 341]. There is a close parallel between the canons of this Council and certain of the Apostolical Canons. Drey indeed pronounces for the higher antiquity of the former [N. Untersuch., 406]; Bickell adopts the same view [Gesch. d. K. Rechts, p. 79]. Beveridge says, with equal decision, "At vero Antiochenos ex Apostolicis non e contra traductos esse probe constat;" and the contemporary evidence that he adduces is very convincing. Hefele says that the Council of Antioch may have copied from the Apostolical Canons, and that the point cannot be considered to have been settled by Drey. [Doch ist die Möglichkeit nicht ausgeschlossen, dass umgekehrt das Antiochenische Concil aus unseren canonen geschöpft hätte, und wir müssen darum diesen Punckt als noch nicht erledigt betrachten. Concilien Gesch. i. 772]. Throughout Hefele agrees with Beveridge, and considers that Synods of the fourth and fifth centuries that appealed to older Apostolical Canons had this collection in view. [Ibid.] The canons of the Council of Antioch, i.-xxv., form a close parallel with the Ap. C. vii.-xvi. xxviii.-xl.; only, as being of later date, they are expressed with less simplicity, and they make clear expressions that spoke doubtfully in the older collection. The substitution of "Metropolitan," Can. Ant. ix., for "Chief Bishop," Can. Ap. xxxiv., is a very significant proof of the priority of the latter in point of time. When this Council cites the "Ancient Canon," C. ix., and then sets down the exact words of Ap. C. xxxiv., it not only identifies this latter with the "Ancient Canon," but explains it by the synonymous term in the Nicene code. When George of Cappadocia, with the help of the secular power, usurped the see of Alexandria [A.D. 356], he thereby violated Can. Ap. xxix. xxx., and set at nought the "ecclesiastical decrees" [Athanas.]. Eusebius, Bishop of Cæsarea, by refusing translation to the more important see of Antioch, acted in accordance with the Can. Ap. xiv., which prohibits translation, and was complimented by the Emperor Constantine for his obedience to the "Apostolic and Ecclesiastical canon." Basil [ad Amphil. Can. iii.] says, that simple deposition, without excommunication, is sufficient punishment for certain clerical offences; "for it is the old rule," i.e. as laid down in Can. Ap. xxv. Again, he says [ib. Can. xii.], the "Canon" disqualifies for the ministry those who have been twice married, his precedent being Can. Ap. xvii. When Athanasius was driven from his see [A.D. 341], the Emperor placed in it Gregory, who, without having discharged any kind of ministerial office, was raised at once to the episcopate, and consecrated at Antioch to the see of Alexandria. It was an infraction of the two Ap. Can. xxxv., lxxx., and the proceeding was at once denounced by Julius, Bishop of Rome, as "uncanonical." A provincial council held at Constantinople [A.D. 394], in the matter of the disputed see of Bostra, declared that a bishop could only be deposed by his co-provincials, or by a synodical decree, "as the Apostolical canons have decided," i.e. Can. Ap. lxxiv. At about the same time a council held at Carthage under Aurelius, declared that the "ancient form" should be maintained, and that three bishops should be required for episcopal consecration [Can. Ap. i.].

The Emperor Theodosius the Younger, in a law passed against the Nestorians [A.D. 435], speaks with severity of Irenæus, who, having been twice married, had been raised to the episcopate, "the Apostolical Canon" [xvii.] notwithstanding. The Council of Ephesus referred to these canons [cf. Can. Eph. viii. with C. Ap. xxxiv. xxxv.] The Council of Chalcedon also in framing Can. xxii. had in view C. Ap. xl.

These Canons refer to the ordination of bishops, priests and deacons; clerical obedience; freedom from secular cares; simony, usury, nepotism; fasts and festivals; a married clergy is recognised, and bishops are allowed to devise their property by will for the sake of wife and family; a second marriage is a disqualification for holy orders; a bishop may not be translated, a priest may not seek any other preferment, nor court the patronage of the great; a bishop may only be deposed after three citations; the Sacraments shall be rightly administered and duly honoured, neither may any offering be made on the altar but that of the Holy Eucharist, and corn and grapes in their season. The primitive form of baptism with triple immersion is given, which may not be repeated, and heretical baptism is pronounced invalid. The schisms and heresies of primitive times are indicated in various canons, as also the custom from whence these canons took their rise, viz., the celebration of half-yearly synods, after Easter and in October. Excommunication may only be reversed by the bishop who inflicted it; the clergy may not encroach upon the cure of others, nor read unauthorized writings in their public ministration. A list of the Canonical Scriptures is appended, which adds three books of Maccabees to the Old Testament, and Ecclesiasticus is recommended for catechetical use. The Book of Revelation is omitted in the New Testament canon, which otherwise contains all our present books, with the addition of two Epistles of Clement and the eight books of Apostolical Constitutions. The words δι' ἐμοῦ Κλήμεντος are a probable interpolation, and the same may be said of ἡμῶν in καὶ αἱ Πράξεις ἡμῶν τῶν Ἀποστόλων. The Constitutions, however, must be read with reserve, διὰ τὰ ἐν αὐταῖς μυστικά. This last canon is the latest in the collection, and may be referred to the middle of the fifth century, when the last thirty-five canons were probably added. The whole number was then added to the Apostolical Constitutions, from whence also much of their subject-matter was derived. In this position they were found by Joh. Scholasticus a century later. Most of the Greek copies contain an injunction to the bishops to observe them, which concludes with a prayer, as found in Cotelerius [Patr. Ap.]. The Emperor Justinian mentions these canons as a code of laws "delivered by the Apostles to the Church, and always maintained and expounded by holy men." [Nov. vi. Beveridge, Jud. de C. Ap. Coteler, Patr. Ap. i.; Canones Prim. Eccl. Vindicata. Drey, N. Untersuch. Hefele, vol. i. Ap- pendix Cabassutius, Not. Concil. iv. Pearson, Vindic. Ignat. iv. Fr. Ballerini in Leonis Op. ed. Quesnel, and Migné Patrolog.]

CANONIZATION is the judgment pronounced by the Church on the state of a faithful person dying in the odour of sanctity, who in his lifetime had displayed striking proofs of virtue by miracles or other means. When a Christian died an altar was erected over his grave, at which the Eucharist was offered, and this was the earliest form of canonization; but bishops were very strict in requiring proofs of the truth of a martyrdom. According to St. Augustine [Collat. Brevic. iii. 11], the acts were sent to the metropolitan or primate, who, with the advice of the suffragans of his province, decided on their authenticity, which was indispensable when heresy also claimed its heroes [Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 14, viii. 10]; St. Jerome [Com. in Ps. cxv.] alludes to the necessity of exactness in such investigations.

The word itself is derived from the custom of inserting the names of saints in the canon of the mass, before martyrologies were composed. In the Greek Church the names of bishops who had governed their dioceses well, and others of the faithful, were inscribed in the holy diptychs, and recited after the Irene [Dionys. de Eccles. Hier. ix. 24], and Bona [Rer. Liturg. l. ii. c. xii. n. 1], calls this a kind of beatification. No cultus is allowed by the Roman Church to be offered to saints without the permission of the Pope, after a ceremonial beatification or canonization. The rules for this were prescribed by John XV., and Pope Celestine III. required the most searching inquiry to be made into the virtues and miracles of saints; whilst Gregory IX. declared in his bull "Cùm dicat" that virtues without miracles, or miracles without virtues, were insufficient to constitute grounds for canonization. Urban VIII. prohibited any cultus of saints previous to beatification. Bellarmine states that St. Swibert, Bishop of Verden by Leo III. [see, however, Acta Sanctorum, March 1, i. 81], and St. Hugh, Bishop of Grenoble [d. 1132], by Innocent II. [Fontanini's Codex, p. 11], were the first persons canonized according to the mode and ceremonial now observed. The earliest direct application to a Pope for the canonization of a saint was made to Clement VIII. in the case of Raymond de Pennafort, who died in 1275.

It appears from notices in the history of St. Martin of Tours [De Vita Martini, Sulpitius Severus, num. xi.], and the works of Optatus of Milevi [de Schism. Donat. lib. i. c. 19], that honours were sometimes paid by individuals or towns to one not an accredited saint or martyr; just as in the fourteenth century the term was "non vindicatus," unrecognised. The cultus of confessors being a more recent designation than that of martyrs, and a condition more difficult of a proof beyond contest, and therefore more liable to illusion, was still more strictly guarded. The Council of Cologne, cited by Ivo of Chartres, forbade any public mark of veneration to new saints made by the popular voice until they had received the sanction of the diocesan; and the decision of the Church was supported by the emperors, as in the Capitulars of Charlemagne, A.D. 801. Festivals in honour of the saints were ordained by the bishops, relics were consigned to the veneration of the faithful, translation of their bodies was made or sanctioned, and at length the right, or rather sanction, of canonization for general observance after the diocesan had initiated the matter, was claimed by the Pope. The precise date cannot be ascertained previous to the tenth century; but in the Council of Lateran, A.D. 993, John XV. inserted amongst the saints' names that of Udalric, Bishop of Augsburg, at the entreaty of Luitolph, one of his successors. Yet even after that date a long list of saints remains, of men universally honoured, although their names were consecrated only by individual prelates, with permission of the metropolitan and within the limits of a single diocese. Alexander III., about the year 1170, is believed to have first formally claimed the reservation of the rite to the Roman See, and Pope Innocent III. confirmed this in a bull dated April 3, 1200, although it was not acknowledged until a much later date. The last canonization made without any intervention of the Pope was that of St. Gualtier of Pontoise by the Archbishop of Rouen, A.D. 1153. In early times canonization in a Council was required, as for Udalric, who died A.D. 973, by John XV.; as by the French bishops of the province at the Council of Vienne, A.D. 993, when they invited the canonization of St. Stephen of Die by the hands of Gregory IX.; in that of Lateran [Fontanini's Codex, p. 1], of St. Gerard of Toul, who died A.D. 994, by Leo IX. in the Council of Rome [Ibid. p. 5]; and of St. Sturmius, Abbot of Fulda, who died A.D. 779, by Pope Innocent II. in the second Council of Lateran [Ibid. p. 13]. A general consistory of all bishops present at Rome is now convened, but the Pope alone pronounces canonization. The honours of canonized saints are seven; their names are inserted in the Calendar, and recited in litanies; invocations are addressed to them; churches and altars are dedicated under their title; their festival, i.e. the anniversary of their death, is observed; their pictures are decorated with a nimbus—the Italian aureole; and their relics are exposed for veneration and carried in procession.

When any person is proposed for canonization by a sovereign, a country, or an order, [1] the Pope entrusts the preliminary examination to a certain number of bishops, who make a report of the popular devotion towards the reputed saint, and of his life and miracles. This process, if favourable, is transmitted to a committee of cardinals and auditors of the Rota, and if they are agreed, an orator gives a biographical sketch, and recommends canonization. The Pope then prescribes prayer and fasting and alms-deeds, and convenes the consistory; [2] the episcopal order record their votes; [3] a procession of the Pope and clergy is followed by [4] an entreaty for canonization; [5] the litany is said, the Pope kneeling; [6] the second entreaty follows, the Pope being seated on his throne; [7] the Pope and bishops, unmitred, address themselves to private prayer; [8] the last entreaty is made, the Pope declares the new saint; [9] the cardinal deacon recites the name in the Confiteor; [10] the Pope gives the benediction, and [11] celebrates mass. At the offertory [12] two large candles, two loaves, two small barrels of wine, three basket cages containing a pair of turtle doves, doves, and singing birds, are offered. [13] The Pope pronounces a plenary absolution; and [14] a solemn procession with banners and chanting is made to a church prepared in honour of the new saint, where thanksgiving is made. The wax tapers, presented by two persons especially interested in the canonization, represent the light of the virtuous actions of the saint, and are placed in a candlestick; the bread, which is in one loaf gilt and in the other silvered, both ensigned with the papal arms, and carried by the gentlemen of a cardinal priest, represents that the saint's food was the imitation of his Master; the barrels of wine, gilt and silvered, carried by gentlemen of a cardinal deacon, typify sanctifying grace; the doves in their gilded cage represent sweetness; the turtles are the symbol of fidelity, and the other birds of heavenly contemplation. Gregory XVI. added the ceremonial of benediction from the balcony of the Vatican; the use of carpets with armorial bearings and standards date from the canonization of St. Stanislaus, Bishop of Cracow, by Innocent IV., A.D. 1253. The Register of Archbishop Morton at Lambeth contains a most diffuse account of the order of canonization observed at the close of the fifteenth century. A large traverse, or enclosed platform of wood (parcus), was erected, with seats for cardinals and bishops, and a wooden altar, at which the Pope celebrated; every bay of the church was to blaze with tapers, at least eighty of four pounds in weight having to be used. Cardinal commissaries made the offerings: one presented two loaves, one covered with cloth of gold, the other with cloth of silver; a second brought four barrels of wine, full, and covered with cloth of gold; the third offered four tapers of ten pounds in weight; and the chief of the applicants for the canonization brought a painted canister or cage containing white doves, one of which was to be loosed. Seven tapers were to burn on the altar, two on the credence, and seven were carried in procession. Finally, the Pope received a cup with one hundred ducats.

Latimer called canonization "a judging of men before the Lord's judgment," and Sir Thomas More draws a nice distinction [Dial. Works, p. 190]. "Those that be not canonized ye may for the more part both pray for them and pray to them, as ye may pray for and to them that be alive. But one that is canonized ye may pray to him to pray for you, but ye may not pray for him. Of the canonized ye may reckon you sure." Crakanthorpe has ably argued on the subject of invocation of saints, which naturally flows from formal canonization [Cap. l. li. lii. Def. Eccles. Anglic.].

[Giusto Fontanini, Archbishop of Ancyra, Codex Constitutionum quas summi pontifices ediderunt in solemni Canonizatione, A.D. 993 ad 1729 (Romæ, 1729). Collectio Bullarum et Constitutionum quas summi pontifices ediderunt, etc. (Romæ, 1752). Emmanuel Azevedo, Opera P. Benedicti XIV., vols. i. to v. (Romæ, 1749). Castellino, de Inquisitione miraculorum, etc. André, Cours du Droit Canonique, 1844. Rocca, de Canonizatione Sanctorum. Fleury, Hist. Ecclesiastique, liv. 59. xcv. 37. Beyerlinck, Theatrum, tom. ii. p. 68, iv. 125. Pascal, de la Liturgie, 227. Boissonnet, des Ceremonies, etc. 404. Wilkins' Concilia, iii. 636. Cœrem. Episc. c. i. s. vi. Ducange, Glossarium, ii. 107. Maillane, Dict. du Droit Canonique.]

CANTICLE. A prose hymn taken from Holy Scripture chanted in Divine Service. In the Anglican rite the Canticles are sung after the first and second Lessons at Morning and Evening Prayer; and their leading ritual principle is that of associating the praise of the personal Word of God with the reading of the written Word of God.

CAPHARNAITISM. A term used to express the gross and material notion which was originally entertained by the people of Capernaum of our Lord's declaration respecting Sacramental feeding on His Body and Sacramental drinking of His Blood [John vi. 52, 59].

CAPITULARS. Codified forms of the French Civil Law. Those of Charlemagne and St. Louis are best known; and all that are extant are printed in the collection of Baluze. The term was applied in a limited sense to books of Diocesan Canons. [Law, Civil and Canon.]

CAPITULUM. The "little chapter," one or more verses of Holy Scripture said after the Psalms and before the Hymn in the several Hours of the Breviary.

CAPUT JEJUNII. An ancient name for the first day of Lent.

CARDINAL. A title of honour in the time of St. Gregory given to all the clergy of the city of Rome. In later times the title went with the rectorship of the churches of Rome, and these are still associated with it. The canonical number is now seventy, comprising six bishops, fifty priests, and fourteen deacons. They form the council of the Pope, and act as his vicars at the altar and elsewhere.

CASUISTRY. The science of duty. The name is rudely formed from casus, as used in the expression Casus Conscientiæ, through "Casuist," the person who studies and decides on such cases. Every one who acts "conscientiously" must be in some degree a casuist on his own account: and the degree in which he will be so will depend partly on the circumstances of his life, partly on the keenness or dulness of his conscience, and partly on his intellectual capacity to decide as to his duty in particular instances. The laws of reason, the laws of society, the laws of the Church, and the principles (in the absence of direct laws) of the Gospel, are the chief authorities external to the intuition of conscience, by which the course of duty must be settled in such cases. For although in a simple life the duties of life are simple, and the intuitions of conscience need little help, yet in a complex life, such as that which falls to the lot of men whose occupations are many and varied, duty becomes much less self-evident, and is to be ascertained in many cases only by a careful detailed balancing of right and wrong. "Every one hath not digested, when it is a sin to take something for money lent, or when not; when it is a fault to discover another's faults, or when not; when the affections of the soul in desiring or procuring increase of means, or honour, be a sin of covetousness or ambition, and when not; when the appetites of the body in eating, drinking, sleeping, and the pleasure that comes with sleep, be sins of gluttony, drunkenness, sloth, lust, and when not, and so in many circumstances of actions" [Herbert's Works, i. 128]. The science of duty, therefore, or "Casuistry," is the application of general laws respecting duty to particular cases. It is a science in which every well-trained Christian must necessarily have more or less practical, though it may be informal, knowledge; and of which much formal knowledge is required by those whose province it is to guard and guide the moral life of others.

Casuistry has been very much neglected by English theologians, especially in modern times. This is probably to be attributed to the disuse of confession since the Great Rebellion, which has given rise to habits of self-reliance that have led English people (for good or evil) to determine the right and wrong of their particular duties without much reasoning upon them, and without much reference to any guidance beyond the intuitions of conscience. Among the works of old English Divines, "cases of conscience" are, however, very common; and there are abundant indications that those which got into print were a very small proportion of those in which the laity sought and obtained the advice of their clergy. Great discredit has, in fact, been brought upon Casuistry by the over-minuteness with which it is pursued in the works of the Jesuits; and it cannot be denied that this over-minuteness has sometimes perverted Casuistry into an immoral tampering with the principles of right and wrong. [Jesuits.] But the old saying applies in this case as in many others, the abuse of a thing does not prove that it is evil: and as Casuistry in some vague form is practised by every conscientious person, so formal Casuistry is more or less a necessity among every community of moral beings who are living in the midst of complex, social, and business relations.

CATECHUMEN. The technical name in early ages for all who were being prepared to receive holy baptism. It is directly from the Greek word, κατηχούμενος, the participle of κατηχέω, "to sound a thing in one's ears, impress it upon one by word of mouth," and hence, in the passive, to be informed of a thing, to be instructed in the elements of religion.

In the Apostolic age, baptism was administered whenever desired. But in process of time, as the Church increased, a long course of moral training and dogmatic instruction was enjoined upon those who were preparing to receive the initiatory sacrament. To instruct these, catechists were appointed by the bishops, and special places set apart for their teaching. The candidates were admitted to be catechumens by a solemn form, with prayer, and the sign of the cross and the imposition of hands.

Catechumens were divided into three classes. The first, called Audientes, or hearers, were admitted simply to hear instruction in the Church; the second, or Genuflectentes, were allowed to join in some of the prayers; and the third, or Competentes, being fully prepared for baptism, only waited for its administration, which was generally confined to the Vigils of Easter and Pentecost, and, in the East, the Feast of the Epiphany.

The time of preparation for catechumens varied in different churches. The Apostolical Constitutions [viii. 32] prescribe three years, but provide for a shortening of the time, if needful, as regard must be had not to "the space of time, but to the fitness and manners of men." The Council of Illiberis [circ. A.D. 305-320] appoints two years as the season of instruction. If, however, there was any danger of death, baptism was at once administered.

It was a great principle with the early Church to conceal the higher doctrines or mysteries of the faith from all but the faithful, i.e. the baptized. This system was what is called the Disciplina Arcani, and was most strictly practised. The object was not only to stir up in the minds of the catechumens a great desire to share in the full teaching and privileges of the faithful, but also to avoid exposing the sacred rites and doctrines of the Church to the contempt of the heathen.

Hence catechumens were only taught what was necessary to fit them for baptism. St. Cyril expressly says that if the catechumen inquire of the preacher's meaning, the catechist is not to inform him, "for he is without" [Præf. ad Catech. Illum. p. 13]. And at the end of this preface is subjoined the note: "These catechetical discourses may be read by those that are to be baptized, or the faithful already baptized. But to catechumens, or such as are no Christians, thou mayest not impart them; for if thou dost, expect to give an account to God."[1]

In accordance with this system of discipline, the office for Holy Communion was divided into two main parts. The earlier part was called the "missa catechumenorum;" and at the close of the Gospel proclamation was made by the deacons, ὅσοι κατηχούμενοι προέλθετε[2] (those that are catechumens depart). Then came the "missa fidelium," to which the baptized alone were admitted. This division was maintained until the fifth century, when it gradually ceased in Christian countries, as being no longer necessary.

It does not appear that catechumens had often special duties in connection with the Church services. But Socrates [v. 22] mentions that, in the Church of Alexandria, they were permitted to be readers and singers.

[1] To this custom also refers the frequent expression of St. Chrysostom, ἴσασιν οἱ μεμνημένοι.

[2] See Canon xix. of the Council of Laodicea.

Two of the canons of the Council of Nicæa have reference to catechumens. The second censures transgression of the rule of the Church, "in that men who had just come over to the faith from a Gentile life, and had been but for a little time catechumens, have been at once brought to the spiritual laver, and immediately after their baptism promoted to the episcopate or presbyterate." "It seems good that no such thing take place in future; for the catechumen needs time and a longer probation after baptism. For the Apostolic Scripture plainly says—'Not a neophyte, lest being puffed up he fall into condemnation and the snare of the devil.'" The fourteenth says: "Concerning the lapsed catechumens, it seems good to the great and holy synod that for three years they be hearers only, and afterwards pray with the catechumens."

The Sarum Manual contained an "Ordo ad faciendum Catechumenum;" but this was for use prior to infant as well as to adult baptism. The ceremony took place at the door of the church, and various rites were performed; e.g. salt placed in the mouth, exorcism, signing with the cross, &c., the Lord's Prayer, Hail Mary and Creed concluding the service. The child's right hand was then taken by the priest, who introduced him into the church as a complete catechumen. Then followed the "ritus baptizandi." It is easy to see the derivation of this from the more ancient practice. [Cave's Primitive Christianity, part. i. c. 8 and 9; Annotated Book of Common Prayer.]

CATHARI. This name was given to, or assumed by, several early sects of heretics, who claimed to be "Puritans" in comparison with the Church. But it is generally used with reference to the followers of Novatus of Carthage, who seceded from the Church about A.D. 251. Epiphanius says that these refused to communicate with the lapsed, and denied the possibility of pardon for sin committed after baptism. St. Augustine also, in the 38th chapter of his book on Heresies, speaks of them as "the Cathari, who proudly and hatefully so designated themselves, as if on account of their purity: they do not admit of second marriages, and refuse repentance, following one Novatus, a heretic, from whom also they are called Novatians." In mediæval times the sects of the ALBIGENSES and VAUDOIS were called Cathari, and the name has been reproduced in England under the form "Puritans."

CATHOLIC. The original and proper meaning of this word is universal, or scattered throughout the world (καθ' ὅλης τῆς γῆς). On this account certain of the epistles are called Catholic, or "general," as our version has it, because they are not addressed to any particular church or person. As applied to the Church, its original purpose was to distinguish the Christian Church, as designed to be co-extensive with humanity, from the Jewish, which was confined for the most part to the descendants of Jacob. But it was also used to distinguish those Christians who maintained what had been universally taught from the beginning from those who added to or detracted from the faith. [Ignat., Ep. ad Smyrn.; Pacian., Ep. i. ad Sempronian.; Euseb. iv. 15.] We thus obtain the phrase Catholic doctrine, by which is meant the doctrine of the Church as unanimously taught in all parts, as distinguished from additions or corruptions of a practical and personal origin. The test of Catholic doctrine, the maintenance of which distinguishes the Catholic Church in any place from heretical or schismatical communions, has been described as that which has been taught always, everywhere, and by all—the quod semper, quod ubique, et quod ab omnibus of Vincentius Lirinensis. Of this the main foundations are the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, of which the former, with slight variations, has come down to us from the most ancient times as a confession of faith, and the latter was finally proclaimed, nearly in its present state, at the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. This creed was at the time said to be conclusive on all points relating to the Persons of the Holy Trinity, and all additions were forbidden. The words "from the Son," however, in the third part, have been subsequently introduced in the West; and although the explanation of them has been admitted to be orthodox, their presence in the creed has caused the schism now existing between the Catholic Churches of the East and West. Roman theologians maintain that the Catholic Church is confined to the communion and obedience of the Pope: but this is denied by a large portion of the Christian world. This controversy turns entirely upon the question of the necessity of obedience to the Papal Supremacy being, or not, a part of Catholic doctrine, which is denied by the whole of the Eastern Church, by all churches in communion with the Church of England, and of course by all other classes of Christians. This, however, being in its substance a point of discipline only, though exalted into a doctrine by Romanists, is not considered to destroy the Catholicity of the Roman Church, or to make it wrong to communicate with her. Hence she is included, with all other churches, not heretical, in the term "Catholic Church" in the creeds, and in the same term in the "Prayer for all conditions of men" in the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England. But it is a wrong to other churches and to the truth to speak of her, as is popularly the case, as "the Catholic Church" and of her clergy alone as "Catholic priests."

CELIBACY OF THE CLERGY. It is certain that marriage was allowed during the Apostolic age. Some of the Apostles, as St. Peter, were married [Matt. viii. 14]; we read in the Acts of the Apostles, of Philip the deacon's seven daughters [xxi. 8, 9], and that Aquila preached the Gospel, accompanied with his wife Priscilla [xviii. 2]. St. Paul recognises the existence of a married clergy, by giving directions to Timothy and Titus respecting their wives and the duties of married life[1] [1 Tim. iii. 1-13; Titus i. 6]. Accordingly it is not actually asserted by its advocates that the celibacy of the clergy is of divine institution, nor with the evidence of Scripture only before us would such an assertion be possible; but merely that it belongs to ecclesiastical usage or discipline, which may vary at different periods as the circumstances of the Church may require. Bellarmine[2] and others, however, have made assertions which, if true, would virtually render celibacy of Divine institution, or at least as having Divine sanction. They say that a person married was bound after ordination, by Apostolic tradition, to live separate from his wife: this Bellarmine asserts is implied by the word ἐγκρατῆ, which St. Paul, in his Epistle to Titus [i. 8], uses of a bishop, and which is rendered in the English version "temperate."[3] But there is no reason to think that this word is mistranslated in our version; nor if rendered, which is admissible, "continent," would it necessarily, or even probably, imply the necessity of celibacy.[4] We have the clearest, most unexceptionable proof that during the first three centuries this supposed Apostolic tradition was wholly unknown —proof not only of a married clergy in the Church, but of their living together in the relation of marriage. Thus, St. Polycarp speaks of Valens, a presbyter, and his wife. Eusebius relates that the judge entreated Phileas, Bishop of Themis, and others married in the Thebaid, to have compassion on their wives and children, by renouncing the faith, and thus saving themselves from suffering and martyrdom. The case of Novatus, which St. Cyprian mentions, is too clear to leave any doubt of the truth of our statement, for he struck his wife during her pregnancy, causing miscarriage. St. Gregory of Nazianzus was born during his father's episcopate, and other instances of a married clergy are given by Bingham.[5]

It may thus be asserted generally that during the first three centuries the marriage of the clergy was permitted; that is, the clergy who were married before ordination were not, on being admitted to the order of deacon,[6] priest, or bishop, required to live separate from their wives; but there is no instance, in the primitive Church, of the marriage of a priest or bishop. The first change, so far as we know, which was made in the usage of the Church was at the Council of Elliberis in Spain [A.D. 305], continence being enjoined, after their ordination, on bishops, priests, and deacons[7]—a canon, as we shall presently see, set aside by the Council of Nice. In one of the canons of the Council of Neocæsarea [A.D. 314], we read: "If a presbyter marry, let him be removed from his order" [canon 1]; and in one of the canons of Ancyra [A.D. 315], "that if any when made deacons said it was needful for them to marry [see 1 Cor. vii. 8], and should afterwards marry, they may continue in the ministry because this was permitted by the bishop. But should any at ordination be silent respecting this, thus undertaking to 'abide so,' i.e., in continence, and afterwards marry, let him be removed from the ministry," literally, "cease from the diaconate."

After this followed the canons of the Council of Nice. A new law, as Socrates the ecclesiastical historian relates, was then proposed (νόμον νεαρὸν εἰς τὴν Ἐκκλησίαν εἰσφέρειν) to compel the three orders of the ministry to live separate from their wives. This was opposed by Paphnutius, a bishop of one of the cities of Upper Thebes, an unmarried man of unblemished chastity and a confessor: he strongly recommended that the old tradition should be kept up (κατὰ τὴν Ἐκκλησίας ἀρχαῖαν παράδοσιν), i.e. that none should be allowed to marry after ordination, but that those previously married should not be required to separate from their wives. This alleged usage or tradition of the Church is confirmed by the Apostolical Canon [c. xxvi.], that of those admitted to the clerical order unmarried, none but "readers or singers" should be allowed to marry: whilst by another canon the matrimonial union of the clergy with their wives is fully sanctioned: "If any bishop, presbyter, or deacon put away his wife under pretence of religion, let him be excommunicated, or if he persist, deposed" [c. v.]. And by the Council of Gangra in Paphlagonia [about A.D. 340], "If any man make a distinction (διακρίνοιτο παρά) between a married presbyter and another, so as not to partake of his oblation, let him be anathema."

Thus it is proved that the marriage of the clergy was allowed in the primitive Church, though with certain restrictions: marriage must precede ordination: bigamy, or being twice married after baptism, also incapacitated from holy orders.[8] Again, it cannot be doubted, from the testimony of Socrates, the historian, that many of [1] St. John, also, in the Apocalypse, according to the best MSS., speaks of the wife of the angel, or bishop, of Thyatira, whom he calls by the opprobrious name of Jezebel [ii. 20]. "Thou sufferest thy wife Jezebel," &c. Τὴν γυναῖκα σοῦ is admitted into the text by Lachmann and Tischendorf.

[2] De Clericis, lib. i. c. 19. Bellarmine represents St. Jerome (Comment., in loc.) as sanctioning his interpretation of ἐγκρατῆ, but the statement is untrue. St. Jerome, in explaining the verse, does not refer to this word. He strongly indeed, though on other grounds, recommends clerical continence.

[3] The meaning of the word is thus explained by St. Chrysostom—"'temperate:' he speaks not here of one who fasts, but of one who commands his passions, his tongue, his hands, his eyes; for this is 'temperance,' to be drawn aside by no passion." Comment. on Titus, i. 8 (Oxf. transl.).

[4] Suicer gives instances from the Fathers of the use of the word in reference to those living in marriage. Thesaur. Eccles., in loc.

[5] Antiquities, book iv. ch. v. sec. 5.

[6] One of the Councils, we shall find, allows, under certain conditions, marriage after deacon's orders.

[7] Placuit in totum prohibere episcopis presbyteris et diaconis, vel omnibus clericis positis in ministerio, abstinere se a conjugibus suis et non generare filios; quicumque vero fecerit ab honore clericatus exterminetur, c. xxxiii.

[8] Apostolical Canons, c. xvii.; Epiphan. adv. Hæres. contr. Cathar. 39 al. 59; St. Ambrose, De Officiis, lib. i. c. l. sec. 247; St. Augustine, De Bono Conjugali, c. xviii.

Celibacy

the married clergy lived in continence: no positive law existed, but it was done voluntarily and by mutual consent. Thus he says:[1] "I knew a custom when living in Thessaly; if a cleric in that country after taking orders should cohabit with his wife whom he had legally married before ordination, he would be degraded (ἀποκήρυκτος): all clergymen with wives, in the East, abstaining from each other's society, and also bishops, if they please—not doing this of necessity as by any law (οὐ μὴ ἀνάγκῃ νόμου τοῦτο ποιοῦντων), for many of them (bishops) in the time of their episcopate have had children by their lawful wives." This passage will enable us to explain statements which have been quoted from writers of the Eastern and Western Churches, who appear to represent clerical continence as being positively obligatory by the ordinary law of the Church; it would appear, from the account of Socrates, that in the East it was the ordinary custom, but, as the same writer states, it was not universal, nor was it enjoined by any ecclesiastical law. St. Epiphanius asserts[2] that, "unless any married man promises to abstain from the society of his wife, he cannot be admitted to the order of subdeacon, deacon, priest, or bishop," adding, that this is especially the case "where there are strict ecclesiastical canons." He admits that some of the clergy had children, but this he says was not according to the canon (οὐ παρὰ τὸν κανόνα) but through negligence, or in parishes where a sufficient number of clergy could not be had. The testimony of St. Ambrose[3] is the same, though he does not refer to any canon enjoining continence, but merely speaks of it as a well-known usage of the Church (cognoscitis). He admits, as St. Epiphanius, that the clergy in "remote places" (plerisque abditioribus locis) had children, and says that they defended themselves by "ancient usage."

It may be concluded from the passages quoted, and from previous statements, that clerical continence was now (in the fourth century) becoming the usage of the Church, though not binding on the clergy hitherto by positive law. This is unquestionable. St. Epiphanius cannot mean by "ecclesiastical canons" what the word would ordinarily signify; for if no such law existed in the Church, he can only refer to custom or usage, and probably such is his meaning. Continence, he says, is required, especially where there are strict ecclesiastical canons or law (μάλιστα ὅπου ἀκριβεῖς κανόνες οἱ ἐκκλησιαστικοί).

The next stage is the decretal of Pope Siricius [A.D. 385], who first imposed celibacy on the Western Church by a positive law. It had before been a custom which had more or less prevailed, but it was now for the first time made obligatory upon the three orders of the ministry.[4] But even after the decretal of Pope Siricius, we find by one of the Councils of the Western Church [Concilium Toletanum, ii., A.D. 531], that if a candidate for orders professed his inability to observe continence, he was to be admitted to the diaconate, but not to the higher orders; and, afterwards, the following canon occurs in the first Council of Tours [i. Concil. Turonicum, A.D. 460]: "The clerk who is allowed to marry, (clericus cui nubendi datur licentia) must not marry a widow, or in such a case must take the lowest rank among the clergy" (ultimum officio clericali teneat locum). The decretal of Siricius could not have been generally known in the Western Church or received as of binding authority. Bishop Forbes, in his Exposition of the Articles [Art. xxxii.], has given an account of the corrupt state of the Church throughout the Middle Ages; of the canons of Councils, &c. passed for the repression of clerical incontinence or concubinage, and of its increasing prevalence in the Western Church till the period of the Reformation. In the eleventh century Pope Gregory VII., called Hildebrand, reimposed the law of Pope Siricius on clerical continence. Documents from contemporary history are quoted by Giesseler,[5] shewing that the law was either evaded or openly resisted, and so far from being effective only increased the existing moral corruption. There can be no doubt that the profligate lives of the clergy, as Protestant and Roman writers equally admit, was one chief cause which led to the Reformation of the sixteenth century.

Some account must be added of the practice of the Eastern Church. The Council of Nice, as we have seen, had not required the clergy to separate from their wives. The next and most important canons on the subject will be found in the Quinisext Council, or Council in Trullo [A.D. 692], which has since regulated the custom in the Eastern Church. Fleury thus sums up its canons: "The clerks in holy orders are not allowed to marry after their ordination; the bishops are to live in a state of perfect continence whether they have been married or not; the priests, deacons, and sub-deacons who are married may cohabit with wives as usual, except at such times as they approach the holy mysteries."[6] Yet in Russia the practice has long been to require marriage as a sine quâ non for a benefice, though celibacy is equally necessary for the Episcopate.

The English Church at the Reformation threw off the enforced yoke of celibacy, which, as experience had proved, was the prolific source of innumerable evils and scandals. Permission to marry was given to the clergy in the first year of Edward VI. Nothing is known of the debates on the subject, as Burnet[7] says that the Registers of [1] Book v. c. xxii.

[2] Advers. Hæres. contr. Catharos.
[3] De officiis Minist. c. 1.
[4] Fleury, Ecclesiast. History, bk. xviii. c. 35.
[5] Eccles. Hist. vol. iii. p. 10, &c. (Clark's transl.)
[6] Fleury, Eccles. Hist. book xviii. c. 35.
[7] Burnet gives the opinion of Dr. Redmayne, who being sick did not attend Convocation—his opinion was brought under his hand—"'That though the Scripture exhorted priests to live chaste and out of the cares of the world; yet the laws forbidding them marriage were only the canons and constitutions of the Church, not founded on the Word of God; and, therefore, he thought that a man once married might be a priest; and he did not find that the priests in the Church of England had made any vow against marriage; and therefore he thought that the king and the higher powers of the Church might take Convocation during this reign were destroyed in the fire of London. An Act of Parliament was afterwards passed allowing the marriage of the clergy [A.D. 1548-9]. The preamble sets forth: "That it was better for priests and other ministers of the Church to live chaste and without marriage, whereby they might better attend to the ministry of the Gospel, and be less distracted with secular cares, so that it is much to be wished that they would of themselves abstain."[1]

CENOBITES: κοινοβιακόι, ὅσοις εἰς πλῆθος ἡ ἄσκησίς ἐστιν, "those who practise Asceticism collectively." [Justinian, Novell. v.]

The first notice we have of Cenobitic Asceticism is that of the early Buddhist communities, [Weber, Indische Skizzen, p. 52], where it seems to have arisen from the combination of active philanthropy with intense contemplation.

In the Christian Church the origin of the Cenobitic rule is identified with the name of Pachomius at the beginning of the fourth century. A native of the Upper Thebaid, he had served in early life as a conscript in the army of Maximin, and it is not unlikely that he may have gained the idea of disciplined co-operation from his experience as a soldier. On his conversion to Christianity he practised the solitary life for a time under the guidance of Palemon, in a small hut on the banks of the Nile. Palemon soon returned into solitude; but Pachomius found a new companion in his elder brother. After the death of the latter, disciples came in crowds to perfect themselves under the eye of Pachomius. He soon found himself superintendent of one hundred monks, and both enlarged his habitation and built six others in the neighbourhood, giving to all the same rules, and reserving to himself the right of inspection. A similar establishment was set up by one of his sisters on the other side of the river for women. At the end of his life [A.D. 348] the new order numbered seven thousand persons, in communities spread abroad over a large tract of the East.

The hard regimen prescribed by St. Antony, which was just half the amount of bread per diem prescribed by Howard (twenty-four ounces), as the minimum diet for prisons where no nourishing liquor was taken, was relaxed by Pachomius, who allowed occasional meals of vegetables, cheese and fish. For the details of his rule, see his Præcepta, judicia, et monita, translated by St. Jerome, and Codex Regularum, Paris, 1663, 4to.

The Cenobitic life was regarded as a concession to the weakness of humanity, and as standing midway between the monastic state and the married. Οὐ μὴν, says Theophylact, ἐπ' ἴσης καρποφοροῦσι πάντες οἱ δεξάμενοι τὸν λόγον, ἀλλ' ὁ μὲν, ἑκατόν τυχὸν, ὁ ἀκτημοσύνην τελείαν (absolute poverty) καὶ ἄκραν ἄσκησιν· ὁ δὲ ἑξήκοντα ὁ κοινοβιακὸς τυχὸν μοναχὸς καὶ ἔτι πρακτικός. Ὁ δε τριάκοντα, ὁ γάμον σεμνὸν ἑλόμενος, καὶ τὰς ἀρετὰς ὡς ἐγχωρῇ σπουδαίως μετερχόμενος. [Comment. in Matth. xiii.]

Some of the practical advantages which arose from its adoption were the following. [a] The living in common supplied to the individual some degree of that support in "religion," which the ordinary man gets in society at large. [b] It necessitated the adoption of a moderate rule of life, which should suit a great number of differently constituted persons, and the character of which would be determined rather by natural circumstances than by individual caprice. "Non oportet," says St. Basil, "quemquam vel sui ipsius dominum esse." [Ep. xxii. Opp. Ed. Bened. iii. 99.] [c] It gave opportunity for active philanthropy, for agriculture, for manufacture, for art, or for study. In this way its influence was most valuable in the West, the climate of which demanded a more generous diet, while it rendered living in the open air impracticable. [d] The substitution of the Cenobitic for the solitary life thus marks the extension of Monasticism to the educated and wealthy classes, from the active and open air to the sedentary and indoor life. Hence the typical monastery of the West is the Benedictine, the precursor of the modern academical college. [e] It was the Cenobitic form of Asceticism which rendered possible such institutions as the monastic colonies—Fulda, Eichstadt, St. Gall, Fritzlar—among the wandering tribes beyond the frontier of the Empire, and the pacification of the latter through the introduction of manufactures and agriculture. [f] Lastly, it was as communities that the Ascetics acquired land; and, by themselves becoming feudal lords, were enabled to compete on equal terms with the fierce Teutonic chivalry, and to befriend the poor. These developments involved a certain amount of evil and corruption, for which see Monasticism.

Much of the Asceticism of the last three hundred years—e.g. the Societies of St. Vincent de Paul, St. François de Sales, the Port-Royal—has been, on one side, of this utilitarian type. An exception may perhaps be found in the "pia collegia," which sprung up in Germany for purely religious exercises, under the influence of Labadie, during the misery of the Thirty Years' War. [Schmid. Die Geschichte des Pietismus.]

For an account of the Moravian community at Hermhut, see Southey's Life of Wesley, i. c. 5. [Asceticism.]

CEREMONY. Although the derivation of this word is utterly unknown, its primary meaning is clearly that of a corporeal act giving expression to a spiritual act. So in prayer, for example, the spiritual act is compounded of emotion, thought, and language, and expression is given to these by the ceremony of kneeling, which is a bodily act. In some cases such ceremonies are not essential, as kneeling is not essenaway the clog of perpetual continence from the priests, and grant that such as would not or could not contain might marry once, and not be put from their holy ministration.' It was opposed by many in both Houses, but carried at last by the major vote. All this I gather from what is printed concerning it." [History of Reformation, vol. ii. p. 88, ed. 1715.] Burnet adds, "his opinion went a great way with Convocation," and that "he was a man of great learning and probity, and of so much greater weight because he did not in all points agree with the Reformers."

[1] Burnet, vol. ii. p. 84; Collier, Eccles. History, vol. ii. p. 262.

tial for prayer; but in other cases the spiritual act cannot be accomplished without the accompaniment of the bodily act. Such cases are the administration of sacraments, the ceremony of pouring water on the person being essential to the validity of baptism, and the ceremony of consecration being essential to the validity of the Holy Eucharist.

The word "ceremony" has also been applied in a wider sense, so as to signify OFFICES, i.e. devotional formularies, such as confirmation, the churching of women, extreme unction, &c. In this case the term seems to belong to the performance of the office, as distinguished from the words and rules appointed for its performance, which are more properly called the RITE. But there has been so much confusion in the use of the term in this latter sense, that the true understanding of the word "ceremony" in any case can never be determined without reference to the context with which it is joined. In the title of the Prayer Book, the phrase "other rites and ceremonies of the Church" is evidently used of such offices as those referred to; while in the introductory note "Of Ceremonies" it is used in both senses.

CERINTHIANS, so called from Cerinthus, a heretic of Asia Minor, who lived at the close of the first century, and was contemporary with the Apostle St. John.[1] His system may be described as a combination of Judaism and Gnosticism. He taught, according to St. Epiphanius,[2] that circumcision and the Jewish ceremonial law were still binding on Christians, and St. Irenæus[3] describes him as one of the earliest teachers of Gnosticism, holding their peculiar opinions that the world was not created by the Supreme God, but by a subordinate angel, the DEMIURGE, by whom the law was given. Unlike the Docetæ, he maintained that Jesus was a mere man, the son of Joseph and Mary, that the Divine WORD descended on Him at His baptism, and that after His apprehension by the Jews, the Logos departed from Him, the Man Jesus alone being crucified. He is said also to have held gross and sensual views on the Millennium.[4] The sect seems to have been of short continuance, and was soon merged in other Gnostic sects of the second century. [Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

CHERUBIC HYMN. [TERSANCTUS.]

CHARACTER. A theological term signifying a spiritual and ineffaceable mark made on the soul by God's co-operation with the outward sacramental work in baptism, confirmation, and holy orders. That such a character is impressed in these three cases was constantly maintained by mediæval theologians; and the theory was definitely fixed as a part of Roman theology by the Council of Trent [sess. vii. can. ix.]: "If any one shall affirm that in these sacraments, that is to say, in baptism, confirmation, and order, there is not impressed a character, or certain spiritual and indelible signs upon the soul, on account of which these sacraments cannot be repeated, Let him be anathema."

The language of Scripture gives great countenance to this idea of character, the "seal" of the Spirit [2 Cor. i. 22; Eph. i. 13, iv. 30] appearing to refer to a mark impressed upon the spiritual part of our being rather than to the mark of the cross or any such external sign. And whatever differences of opinion have arisen on this subject among theologians they are scarcely more than verbal, since all are agreed that in baptism, confirmation, and holy order God gives grace for Christian life, Christian stability, and for the supernatural work of the ministry. That in the bestowal of this grace a permanent character is impressed on the soul may very well be believed; and no sound theologian believes that it is possible to iterate the grace, even if the forms are iterated.

CHILIASM. [MILLENNIUM.]

CHIROGRAPH. The least authoritative of the three kinds of official documents issued by the Pope. It has more of a personal than an official character, though still answering to those documents which, in England, are issued under the sign manual. [BRIEF. BULL.]

CHOREPISCOPI. Rural, or country bishops [χώρα], as distinguished from those of cities. Although assistants, and subordinate to the bishops of the cities, or sees, the chorepiscopi must not be confused with SUFFRAGAN BISHOPS [q. v.]. There has been much difference of opinion as to whether they were really in episcopal orders or not; but St. Athanasius speaks of them in such terms as seem to put this beyond doubt. [Athanas., Apolog. ii.]. All bishops who by any accident were without sees appear to have been employed as chorepiscopi, including those who came over to the Church from schism, as the Novatians and the Meletians [Concil. Nic. can. viii., Ibid. Epist. Synodic]. The most probable opinion is, therefore, that the chorepiscopi were a kind of missionary bishops sent among the "pagans," or country people, who remained heathen long after the cities had become Christian. The power of the chorepiscopi varied in different churches, but there was an universal understanding that they had no jurisdiction independent of the bishop of the diocese.

CHRISM. A compound of oil and balsam consecrated by a bishop, and used for anointing with the sign of the cross at confirmation. Its composition has varied at different periods, and in the Eastern Church as many as forty ingredients are used; but its characteristic quality is that of a perfumed ointment, as distinguished from the blessed oil which is used for most other unctions. In Roman theology chrism is often held to be an essential part of confirmation, and it is certainly mentioned as early as the time of Tertullian [De Resurrect. viii.]; but this opinion is not consistent with the undoubted fact that

[1] Eusebius relates the well-known anecdote of St. John meeting Cerinthus in a bath, and instantly leaving it, saying, "Let us flee lest the bath should fall while Cerinthus, that enemy of the truth, is within." [Eccles. History, bk. iii. c. 38.]

[2] Advers. Hæres., 8 vol 28.

[3] Ibid., lib. i. c. 26.

[4] Eusebius, Eccles. Hist., bk. iii. c. 28, bk. vii. c. 25.

imposition of hands is the essential part of the rite. From the use of chrism in confirmation the word passed into a name for the rite itself. [Anointing. Confirmation.]

CHRIST [מָשִׁיחַ Messiah, The Anointed One]. This is the distinctive title, in Greek, of our Blessed Redeemer. Our Lord was known in prophecy by this title, and was chiefly looked for under it at the time of His appearance, as indicated by such questions as, "Is not this the Christ?" The earliest passages of Holy Scripture in which He is so alluded to, are 1 Sam. ii. 35, or (more directly) Ps. ii. 2. The title seems to have been especially applied to Him as uniting in His own Person all those offices among men which were anciently conferred by the ceremony of anointing. These were the offices of Prophet, Priest, and King; to which Elisha, Aaron, David, and others are particularly mentioned as having been severally appointed by this rite. The idea conveyed by its use, on these and on other occasions, is that of consecration; and, in conjunction therewith, the conferring, if need be, of suitable gifts. In this respect it bears a marked resemblance to the ceremony of laying on of hands, more frequently used in the Church, as that by which the ordinary ministerial gifts of the Holy Ghost are conferred. The use of chrism, or of oil, in some parts of the Church, as a sign of these gifts, confirms the general unity of idea expressed by these two ceremonies.

The anointing under the Old Testament was performed with material ointment, compounded of the sweetest and richest spices of the East, as symbolical of the various and costly gifts of the Holy Ghost. But besides the outward sanction thus given to the office conferred by it, it was attended, more or less immediately, with spiritual gifts themselves; as instanced in Saul, "to whom God gave another heart," and "he prophesied," and who was blamed for his cowardice in the Song of David "as though he had not been anointed with oil;" David himself, who very shortly manifested his power in his conflict with Goliath; and Elisha, whose miracles at once attested the grace he had received. The anointing whereby Jesus of Nazareth was in like manner endowed for His high offices was in one respect equally outward, having been conferred directly from Heaven by a visible manifestation of the Presence of the Holy Ghost [John i. 32]: and of its effects St. John Baptist said that "God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto Him."

This appellation accordingly represents to us at once the prophetic, sacerdotal and royal character of our Lord, His consecration to these offices by the Father, and His endowment with the necessary gifts for their perfect discharge. It conveys the idea of authority and power, coupled with that of delegation and subordination. Being an outward mark, it establishes a claim to our submission, and so exalts the religion of Jesus Christ from the character of a mere following or philosophical sect to that of an obedience to the authority and supreme will of God. Derived from the two ideas of consecration and endowment involved in this anointing, are the warnings of Holy Scripture on the one hand against insubmission and opposition, as in Psa. cv. 15, "Touch not mine Anointed," and in 2 Sam. i. 14, "How wast thou not afraid to put forth thine hand against the Lord's anointed;" and on the other the encouragement given to accept the offices of the anointed person and profit by them; as in Isa. lxi. 1, "The Lord hath anointed me . . . to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." In these ways the title of "The Christ" becomes essentially characteristic of our Lord's offices and position in the world, and most fit to be added to the Name of Jesus, whereby He is designated as the Saviour of sinners. And lastly, this title of The Anointed calls special attention to our Lord in His all-important character as the ordained fountain of all sacramental grace of every kind and order in the Church which is His Body Mystical. For it signifies that He has Himself received the greatest of all sacraments, bestowed on Him with an outward and visible sign on the occasion of His Baptism, and thus constituting Him the mediatorial vehicle of all grace, and the sacramental bond of union between every man and his God. It is agreeably to this title of our Lord that anointing was used in the Christian Church in and from very ancient times in the ministration of Confirmation (though not essential to it), as also in the consecration of kings, in the extreme unction of the dying, and in other ceremonies bearing on our union with "The Christ." [Anointing.]

CHRISTIANS. A name first given to the disciples of Christ at Antioch [Acts xi. 26]. It seems most probable, from the peculiar form of the word, having a Greek root and a Latin termination, that it was a designation of Pagan origin: and, that being generally called by it, Christian authors subsequently applied the title to themselves. Thus as "Christianos ad leones" became the cry of the heathen in times of persecution, so "Christianus sum" was equally the mode of confession adopted by several among the martyrs. The frequent repetition of this answer by Lucian is mentioned by Chrysostom [Hom. xlvi.]; and it is spoken of by Tertullian as if one often on their lips [Tertul. Apolog. ii.]. This Pagan derivation seems, however, to be disclaimed by Tertullian, who writes, "But 'Christian,' so far as the meaning of the word is concerned, is derived from 'anointing.' Yea, and even when you wrongly pronounce it 'Chrestian' (for you do not even know correctly the name you hate) it comes from 'sweetness' and benignity.'" [Χρηστός. Suetonius writes our Lord's name as "Chrestus" [Claud. 25], and His followers were often called "Chrestianos." Among the unbelieving Jews, the disciples were more usually spoken of as Nazarenes, Galilæans, &c., the title of Christ, or Messiah, being held in reverence by them, but not the person of Jesus. Among themselves, they were spoken of rather as "the disciples," "the believers," "the saints," "they that call on the Lord Jesus Christ," "the Church," "the Brethren," and the like.

CHRISTMAS. The Church Catholic, though it has always celebrated our Lord's Nativity as a principal festival, has not been uniform in its observance. Clement of Alexandria styles the attempt to define the precise day of its occurrence as idle [περιεργότερον], and says that while some kept it on May 20th [Strom. i. 408], others anticipated that day by a whole month. The Armenians made a triple observance of the Annunciation, the Nativity, and the Baptism of our Lord (Epiphany) on January 5th [Coteler. Const. Ap. v. 13]. By far the larger section of the Eastern Church kept the Feast of the Nativity, concurrently with the Feast of the Epiphany, on January 6th; intending thereby to signify the twofold birth of Christ, as Man, and as Head of the Body the Church, by baptism in the river Jordan; it being a tradition that our Lord received the baptism of John upon that day. The Church of Constantinople altered its practice at the close of the fourth century, as we learn from a remarkable Homily of Chrysostom, presently to be noticed, and which indicates the true "rationale" for celebrating the Nativity on December 25th. The Churches of the South, and those of Palestine, following Roman counsel, made a similar alteration a little later, i.e. just prior to the Ephesine Council [Act. Conc. Eph. iii. 31; and Coteler. loc cit.], which is a satisfactory confirmation of the view put forth by Chrysostom. The final separation, therefore, of the two feasts of Christmas and Epiphany may be dated from the first quarter of the fifth century. The Armenian Church alone continued to celebrate the Nativity and Epiphany together on January 6th. [Leo Allat. de Dom. et Hebd. Gr. c. 32.] The Apostolical Constitutions, though a work of Eastern origin, in a passage quoted also by Anastasius, say, "Let the Festival of the Nativity be observed by you on the 25th day of the ninth month" [v. 13] (reckoned from the vernal equinox), and "let all servants rest from work on that day" [viii. 33]; the Feast of the Epiphany in both places being separately mentioned. The churches of the Latin communion had always followed this rule, celebrating the Nativity on viii. Cal. Januar. or December 25th [Aug. Trin. iv. 5]; and the Epiphany on the 6th of January. This agrees best with the time of Herod's death, which was shortly before Easter [Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 18], and after a lunar eclipse indicating A.U.C. 750 [Gieseler, K. Gesch. i. 20].

The institution of this festival is lost in antiquity. Chrysostom says that it had been observed from of old [ἄνωθεν], according to Western practice, from Thrace to the Straits of Gibraltar. He calls it the most venerable, and the mother of all the rest. It was a day of solemn religious observance, plentiful traces of which exist in the homilies of antiquity; the celebration of the Eucharist invariably forming a part of it. "Approaching with faith," says Chysostom, "we behold Him as in the cattle crib; for the Holy Table is as the manger, where reposes the Body of the Lord; not bound in swaddling clothes, but arrayed with the Holy Spirit. The initiated will understand." The Saviour in His whole work of mercy, in His birth and death, is set vividly before the eye of faith in holy mystery; "Who by the operation of the Holy Ghost was made very Man of the substance of the Virgin Mary His Mother." It was in the strictest sense of the word a holy day, on which under the Christian Emperors, the theatre and circus were closed [Cod. Theodos. xv.; Tit. v. l. 5, de Spectaculis]. The Homily of Gregory Nazianzen claiming for the day a sacred and reverential observance is as applicable now as when it was first delivered [Or. 38 in Theoph.; Bingham, Ant. xx. iv. sec. 5]. The rioting of the Saturnalia, immediately preceding the winter solstice, darkened the closing year of heathenism, and Hospinian [De Festis, p. 111] imagines that it was with a view of putting down these excesses that the Feasts of the Nativity and of the Epiphany were fixed by the Church at this period of the year. But the true reason is assigned by Chrysostom in his Homily on the Nativity; a day, as he states in the heading, "that was formerly uncertain, but has been made known of late years by some coming from the West." He clearly indicates as the belief of the Western Church, that the angelic message was conveyed to Zacharias, the father of the Baptist, in the Holy of Holies on the Great Day of the Atonement, Εἰς τὰ ἅγια τῶν ἁγίων ἔνδον ὄντα τὸν Ζαχαρίαν ὁ ἄγγελος ἐνηγγελίσατο. [Chrysostom, Hom. lxxii. ed. Savil. tom. v. p. 515, l. 28.] And there is no improbability in the supposition. For although the law of Moses declared that the high priest alone should enter into the Holy of Holies, with the censer and the Blood of the Atonement, yet Maimonides, deeply versed in Jewish antiquities, and having access to the best sources of information, states that if the High Priest were disabled by sickness or disqualified by any temporary uncleanness, 'another priest in his lieu' [Yoma. i. a] might officiate. [Maim. on Mishna. Yoma.; Jost, Jud. i. 162.] Josephus gives a contemporary instance in point; Joseph, a kinsman of Matthias, the high priest, having officiated as his deputy on the Day of Atonement in the reign of Herod the Great [Jos. Ant. xvii. 6, sec. 4]. To the same purport is the story related in the Jer. Talm. of a mother who saw two of her sons high priests on the same day; one having contracted legal defilement. [Lightf. ix. 35.] The very fact of this heavenly message having been made to Zacharias, rather than to any other son of Israel, must be held to be a conclusive proof of his sanctity. And if, as was the case, he was of priestly race, and exercising the ordinary duties of his office at the period of the great day, nothing can be more likely than that he would be selected by the high priest to act as his deputy, in case of his own disqualification or inability. The ceremonial purification required for the ordinary functions of the priesthood would make it absolutely necessary, in case of sudden emergency, to look to the ordinary course of the Temple for a "locum tenens." Possibly this provision of later Judaism may account for the ἀρχιερεῖς mentioned in the New Testament. If now the birth of the Baptist were foretold by the angel on the 10th of Tisri, September 23rd, which was the Day of Atonement, nine months and a day would carry us on to June 24th, the feast of the nativity of John the Baptist. The nativity of the Baptist preceded that of our Lord by six months; the Annunciation to the Blessed Virgin, March 25th, having taken place "in the sixth month" from the angelic message to Zacharias; nine months from which day indicates December 25th, for the Nativity of our Lord.

The birth of our Lord having taken place by night [Luke ii. 8], the festival has obtained the name of Weihnacht in Germany. In the mediæval services, for the same reason, there was a mass for the vigil, and "galli cantu" as well as for the day of the Nativity. There were also two celebrations, the present Collect, Epistle, and Gospel having been appointed for the second or principal communion. The three festivals that stand in close communion with the Nativity are very appropriately that of the protomartyr St. Stephen; of the disciple whom Jesus loved, and who was to the Blessed Virgin as a son; and of the Innocents, slaughtered at Bethlehem, the "eoætanei" of our Lord. [Epiphany. Bernard, Hom. de iv. Cont. solenn. i. 787. Bened. Bingham, Ant. xx. iv. sec. 1. Guerieke, Lehr. B. d. Chr. Archäol. Freeman and Procter, on Liturgy. Blunt, Annot. Book of Com. Prayer. K. Lex. Weihnacht.]

CHRISTOLOGY, that which we are taught of Christ in His Person and office, refers to the Messianic hopes of the Jew, and the distorted notions of heresy, as well as to Christian verities. Even Mahomet had his Christology when he declared in the Koran that Jesus was conceived of the Holy Ghost [Sur. iii. 52; Harvey on the Creeds, 278]. The Jewish Christology had its patriarchal, its legal, and its prophetic phases. It can scarcely be doubted that the angelic revelation of the Person and office of the Messiah, both God and Man, that Milton has imagined [P. L. xi. xii.], was actually made in some form to Adam, and that these traditions of Paradise never wholly died out in the chosen seed. That faith of Abraham which "was counted to him for righteousness" was faith in the Christ of the future; he saw His day, and was glad. And wherever in patriarchal times God is said to have spoken with His servants, the primitive Church has always connected the revelation with the ministry of the Logos [Bull, Def. F. N. I. i. Theophany. Logos]. The Jewish Church also before the day of Christ identified the operation of the Deity with that of the Word, "Mimra da J." It is scarcely a sufficient explanation to say that the Targumists would thereby soften down the anthropomorphic utterances of the sacred text, for whether the Eternal Father or His Word spake unto the Fathers, the anthropomorphism remains unaltered. God is Spirit, and His Word is Spirit, but the mediatorial notion was essential to the Jewish Christology, and theologically connected also with the Word. The Targumist may have been as little cognizant of the truth to which he gave expression as Caiaphas was, when he became an unconscious exponent of the deep purposes of God in Christ. The final cause of the sacrifices and ordinances of the Law was the atonement made by Christ. The rationale of those ordinances was laid deep in the sin of our first parents, and in whatever degree the hope of Christ was revealed to them at the Fall, in the same degree the hidden meaning of the sacrificial ordinances was made known to them. The acceptance of Abel's sacrifice, and the rejection of Cain's, turned upon the veneration shewn in the one case, and the sullen contempt in the other for the revealed symbol of Christ's death. Christ was shadowed forth in the patriarchal sacrifices. The Egyptian bondage crushed for a time all better hope, and the people in part lost sight of their Messianic traditions, yet not the chief men of the tribes; and when Moses rose up as a deliverer, he came with the authority of I AM, the God of their fathers, and with a living faith in the ancestral traditions that he had received. Hugh Miller, in the spirit of Milton, supposes the work of creation to pass in review before Moses in a vision; but the sacred record may have been compiled by Moses from the traditions of his race. He was not much further removed from the creation of man than a Jew of the present day is from the Babylonian captivity. And if the traditions of creation reached down to him, so also those of the Fall, and of the promised remedy; and the typical shadows of the law were projected by the light of a traditional faith. These were harmonized, and received consistency in the Sinaitic revelation; all things having been ordained by Moses according to the pattern shewn to him upon the Mount; but the dim outline of their substance was already known to him by faith. As time wore on, the Messianic hope, though never entirely lost, became more vague, the successive schools of the prophets alone preserving anything of its true character. Under the controlling guidance of the Holy Spirit, prophecy from time to time revived the traditions that had existed from the beginning; and the spirit of the prophets being subject to the prophets, their burthen contained much of which they had a human knowledge, as well as much that was communicated by direct inspiration from above. In the same way the Apostles, possessing a human knowledge of the historical facts of the Gospel, and of the discourses of our Lord, before and after His decease, were guided into all deeper truth by the Holy Spirit. Thus the Christology of the Old Dispensation was always one and the same in substance. As primeval tradition became more faint, increased light was given to the chosen agents of revelation, though their utterances were as dark parables to the multitude. The Sun of Righteousness at length arose, and the doctrine of the Person and office of Christ received its ultimate adjustment in the system of Christian faith.

The Apostles and Evangelists give the first principles of the Christology of the new dispensation, rudimentally as yet, but wholly intelligible, when they relate the miraculous circumstances of the Nativity of Christ; the teaching of Christ, as when He declared, before Abraham was, "I AM;" and various evangelical utterances, as when the disciple who lay in the Lord's bosom declared of that Lord, that in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. A full faith in this Christology and in the eternal Godhead of Christ was confessed by St. Peter as the solid Rock of Faith on which the Church of every after age should be built up. The doctrinal principles thus committed to the Church have been fully sufficient, with the overruling action of the Holy Spirit, to lead it into all truth with respect to the Person and Office of Christ. Thus when the Ebionite lowered the Godhead of Christ to a mere divine afflatus, such as had inspired any prophet of old, the Church at once cast forth from her bosom the Jewish disparagement of the Divine Incarnation. When the real humanity of Christ was denied by the pagan Docetæ, and a phantom existence was attributed to Him, as some mere pagan Theophany, the Church declared that Christ was very Man as well as very God; for that "the Word was made Flesh." In the same way, it was no new doctrine, but that which had been received from the beginning, when the declaration of a Trinity in Unity became a necessary sequel to that of the Godhead of Christ. The Son was co-eternal with the Father, wholly One with Him, and the Spirit of Father and Son descended on the Church at Pentecost. Faith in the Holy Trinity is inseparable from a true Christology, and was embodied in the creed before the Gospels were written. Thus, from the first commencement of the Christian Church, the doctrine of Christ has still been one and the same, but human error has made it necessary at times that greater stress should be laid on some particular phase of it. The Eastern Church, from force of circumstances, has been the principal exponent of a true faith with respect to the Person of Christ, while the Western Church has spoken out more especially upon the doctrine of His grace. Irenæus, a member of the Eastern Church, but Bishop of Lyons in the West, combines the characteristics of both churches. [L. Duncker, d. H. Irenäus, Christol.] In the East the Arian controversy was not unproductive of good; for it gave occasion for the Church to declare her faith in fullest detail. The true Godhead and Manhood of Christ having been established, the mode of union of the two natures in one Person was next misstated by heresy. At one while the Godhead and the Manhood were held to have been fused together; as gold alloyed with silver produces electrum, so a "tertium quid" is the result of the interfusion of the two natures, and the Christ of the Apollinarian was neither God nor Man, introducing thereby a fourth Person into the Holy Trinity. [Athanas. de Incarn.] Others, to avoid this confusion of substance, fell into the opposite error of dividing the Person of Christ, and affirmed that the Godhead was only united with the Manhood of Christ at the Nativity; so that the Human Nature existed apart from the Divine from the Annunciation, giving to Christ a twofold personal subsistence. [NESTORIANISM.] With most of these heretics also it was a favourite notion that the Divine Nature in Christ occupied the place of a human soul, in which respect therefore His human Nature was defective; as also that the Manhood, representing a transcendental humanity, the cross was no longer a symbol of ordinary mortal suffering. After a protracted struggle with every possible form of misconception, the faith handed down from the Apostles was at length universally recognised, and Christ was confessed to be God and Man, without confusion of substance or division of Person. It was the only possible condition under which He could be the universal Redeemer; wholly one with the redeemed, yet wholly one with God, giving hope to Man that hereafter he shall be made wholly one with God in Him.

The Western Church, on the other hand, sets forth Christ in His office as the Atonement for sin; the restorer of Man to the original dignity of his nature, lost in Adam. The sinfulness of man, original and actual, that could only be expiated by such an atonement; the thorough depravation of his nature, that needed to be so restored; the antithesis of death merged in the glories of life eternal, were so many watchwords of the Western Church as it went on its way warring and travailing in the cause of truth. They are subjects with which Catholic teaching had been consistent from the beginning, but there was no occasion for their expression as ordinary tests of faith until Pelagius by his heresy called forth the need. [PELAGIANISM.] To Augustine more especially we owe the symmetrical adjustment of the doctrine of grace and of human sinfulness, that continued to be the standard of orthodox teaching in the churches of the West, until the schoolmen involved theology and philosophy alike in mist. Hence sin and its remedy, the degree of human depravation, and the sacramental union of man with Christ, were topics that divided the Western Churches at the Reformation. The consideration of these at some future period in a calmer spirit will be a principle of consolidation; when the Christology of one branch of the Church Catholic will be once more the faith of all. [Hengstenberg, Christol.; Dorner, Lehre v. d. Person Chr.; Duncker, Christol. d. H. Irenäus].

CHRISTOPHORI. A term anciently applied to Christians, having reference to the spiritual indwelling of Christ in the hearts of His people, and the constant presence of His grace with them. It is found in an epistle of Phileas,

Bishop of Thmuis, to his flock, where he speaks of the martyrs as Χριστόφοροι μάρτυρες, the "Christ-bearing" martyrs. [Euseb. Ecc. Hist. viii. 10.] A similar term is mentioned as having been used by St. Ignatius, who called himself Theophorus, as bearing about with him his God. [Theophoroi.]

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES, for reference in the study of theology and ecclesiastical history.

	B.C.
Birth of our Lord	4
Herod the Great died	2
	A.D.
Tax under Quirinius	8
Augustus died	14
Pontius Pilate, Procurator of Judæa	26
Crucifixion of our Lord	30
Diaconate instituted	32
Martyrdom of St. Stephen	33
Pontius Pilate banished to Vienne	36
Judæa annexed to Syria	36
Conversion of St. Paul	36
Tiberius succeeded by Caligula	37
St. Paul in Arabia	37
Herod Agrippa, King	37
Herod Antipas banished	37
Return to Damascus	38
Conversion of Cornelius	38
St. Paul in Syria and Cilicia	39, 40
Caligula succeeded by Claudius	41
Judæa and Samaria given to Herod Agrippa I.	41
Gospel of St. Matthew	42
Invasion of Britain by Aulus Plautius	43
Paul and Barnabas at Antioch	43
Name of Christian first known	44
Famine in Judæa	44
James, brother of John, martyred	44
Herod Agrippa I. dies	44
Cuspius Fadus, Procurator of Judæa	44
Cumanus, Procurator	49
Council of Jerusalem	50
Caractacus captured by the Romans	50
Claudius expels the Jews from Rome	52
St. Paul winters at Corinth	52
First Epistle to Thessalonians written	52
Second Epistle to Thessalonians written	53
Felix, Procurator of Judæa	53
Claudius succeeded by Nero	54
Nero gives Galilee and Peræa to Agrippa	54
St. Paul at Ephesus. In these years visits Crete, and leaves there Titus	55, 56
1 and 2 Corinthians and Galatians written	57
Epistle to Romans written	58
St. Paul at Cæsarea	59
Felix replaced by Festus	60
St. Paul arrives at Rome	61
Philemon, Colossians, Ephesians, Philippians written there	62
Gospel according to St. Luke written	62
Pallas put to death	62
St. Paul in Macedonia and Asia Minor	63
——— writes Epistle to Hebrews	63
Burning of Rome	64
St. Paul possibly in Spain or in the West	64-66
St. Peter visits Rome, and goes from thence into Egypt	66
Jewish war begins	66
Linus, Bishop of Rome	66
St. Mark wrote his Gospel	66
1 Peter and Epistle of St. James written	66
1 Timothy written from Macedonia	67
Epistle to Titus written from Ephesus	67
James, Bishop of Jerusalem, martyred	67
Epistle of Jude written	67
St. Paul imprisoned at Rome	68
2 Timothy written	68
2 Peter written	68
St. Paul and St. Peter martyred	68
Nero died; succeeded by Galba, Otho, Vitellius	68
Linus martyred; succeeded by Anencletus	68
Vespasian made Emperor	69
Jerusalem taken	70
Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch	70
St. John writes Gospel and Epistles	90
Anencletus succeeded by Clement	93
St. John at Patmos. Revelation	94
Clement succeeded by Euarestus	100
St. John died	100
Pliny's letter to Trajan	104
Ignatius martyred	107
Euarestus succeeded by Alexander	109
Trajan's letter to Pliny	111
Alexander succeeded by Xystus	116
Aquila's Greek Version	119
Hadrian at Jerusalem	119
Apolog. of Quadratus and Aristides	122
Xystus succeeded by Telesphorus	129
Jerusalem rebuilt as Ælia	136
Telesphorus succeeded by Hyginus	138
Marcion at Rome	142
Hyginus suc. by Pius	142
Justin Martyr, 1st Apology	148
Pius suc. by Anicetus	156
Polycarp at Rome	158
——— martyred; Justin martyred	167
Anicetus suc. by Soter	168
Soter suc. by Eleutherus	173
Pothinus, Bishop of Lyons, martyred	177
Irenæus adv. Hær.	180
Theodotion's Greek Version	184

Chronological Tables

	A.D.
Eleutherus suc. by Victor	189
Praxeas	195
Tertullian (Jud. 7) mentions British churches	198
Paschal controversy	198
Victor suc. by Zephyrinus	201
Symmachus, Greek Ver.	202
Perpetua, Felicitas, Afr. M.	202
Caledonian war, Fingal	208
Emperor Severus died at York	211
Conc. Carthag. under Agrippinus	215
Zephyrinus succeeded by Callistus	218
The Mishna completed	219
Callistus suc. by Urbanus	222
Urbanus suc. by Pontianus	230
Conc. of Iconium under Firmilian	231
Origen's Hexapla begun	235
Pontianus suc. by Anteros	238
Anteros suc. by Fabian	238
Beryllus, heretic	239
Conc. Carthag., Privatus condemned	240
Manes born	240
Noetus, her.	240
Goths first invade the Roman Provinces	250
Anthony institutes Monasticism	251
Fabian suc. by Cornelius after vacancy of a year	251
Novatian condemned	251
Coruelius suc. by Lucius	252
Irruption of Goths	252
Lucius suc. by Stephen	253
Controversy between Cyprian and Stephen, de rebapt. hær.	254
Council of Carthage	256
Persecution (lapse)	257
Stephen suc. by Xystus	257
Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, writes agst. Sabellius	258
Xystus mart., and Cyprian mart.	258
Sabellius	258
Dionysius, Bishop of Rome (after vacancy)	259
Goths become formidable by sea	260
Conc. of Antioch against Paul of Samosata	265
Conc. of Antioch, Paul deposed	269
Dionysius suc. by Felix	269
Dacia resigned to Goths.	270
Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, descendant of Macedonian Kings	272
Felix suc. by Eutychianus	274
Manes died	277
Eutychianus suc. by Caius	283
Dionysius, Bishop of Paris, mart.	286
Caius s. by Marcellinus	296
Britain recovered by Constantius	296
Neo-Platonists	303
Marcellinus died (vacancy)	304
Council of Cirta and Eliberis (Elvira)	305
Constantius d. at York	306
Marcellus, Bishop of Rome	308
Marcellus succeeded by Eusebius	310
Eusebius succeeded by Melchiades	310
Lucian M. at Antioch	311
Rise of Donatism	312
Constantine's vision of the Cross	312
Defeat of Maxentius and Maximian	313
Christianity established	313
Pachomius establishes Cœnobia in Egypt	313
Melchiades succeeded by Silvester	314
Council of Arles, at which Bishops of York, London and Lincoln were present	314
Final division of Eastern and Western Empire	314
Donatist Schism	315
Battle of Hadrianople—Constantine sole master	323
Adoption of Labarum	324
Siege of Byzantium	324
Council of Nice. First Œcumenical, June 19th	325
Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria	326
Council of Cæsarea, Eusebian	334
Dedication of Constantinople	334
Church of Abyssinia founded by Frumentius	334
Council of Tyre, Euse.	335
Silvester suc. by Marcus	336
Athanasius at Tyre	335
Marcus suc. by Julius	336
Arius died	336
Athanasius banished	336
Constantine baptized	337
Athanasius restored	338
Constantine died	340
Eusebius Pamph. died	340
Jerusalem Talmud completed	340
Athanasius at Rome	340
Council of Rome, Athanasian	341
Council of Antioch, Dedication, Eusebian	341
Revolt of Circumcelliones	345
Council of Sardica, Eusebian	347
Athanasius restored	348
Julius suc. by Liberius	352
Augustine b., and on the same day Pelagius	352
Council of Arles, Eusebian	353
Council of Milan	355
Liberius, Bishop of Rome banished	355
Athanasius banished	355
Homœan Creed of Sirmium signed by Hosius	356
Athanasius seeks an asylum among the monks of the Thebaid	356
Semi-Arian Creed signed by Liberius (recalled)	357
Council of Antioch, Homœan Creed	358
Council of Ancyra, Semi-Arian	358
Council of Seleucia, Semi-Arian Creed	359
Council of Ariminum, Homœan Creed (British Bishops present)	359
Council of Constantinople, Homœan Creed	360
Basil establishes Monasticism in Pontus	360
Council of Antioch, Anomœan Creed	361
Council of Alexandria	362
Athanasius returns to Alexandria; again expelled	362
——— returns upon death of Julian	363
Council of Lampsacus, Semi-Arian	365
Liberius suc. by Felix II.	366
Council of Tyana	367

Chronological Tables

	A.D.
Felix II. suc. by Damasus	367
Council of Laodicæa	370
Martin establishes Monasticism in Gaul	370
Athanasius died	373
Council of Constantinople. Second Œcumenical, July 15th	381
Damasus suc. by Siricius	384
Jerome at Bethlehem	384
First Decretal of Siricius	385
Conversion of Augustine	386
Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech.	387
Gregory Nazianzen died	387
Ambrose inflicts penance on Theodosius, emperor	390
Augustin, B. of Hippo	395
Council of Carthage	397
Siricius suc. by Anastasius	398
Ambrose died	398
Council of Carthage	399
Council of Carthage	400
Council of Toledo	400
Ruffinus condemned	400
Goths, Vandals, and Burgundians embrace Christianity as Arians	400
Council of Carthage	401
Council of Chalcedon	401
Anastasius suc. by Innocentius	402
Council of Milevi	403
Council of Carthage	403
Picts and Scots combine against the Romans in North Britain	403
Council of Antioch	404
Chrysostom driven from Constantinople	404
Council of Turin	404
Council of Carthage	404
Chrysostom died	407
Council of Carthage	407
Vandals overrun Gaul	408
Rome besieged by Alaric	409
Attalus emperor, Rome sacked	409
Conference with Donatists at Carthage	411
Council of Cirtha	412
Pelagian heresy	412
Council of Braccara	412
Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria	412
Council of Diospolis	415
Innocent succeeded by Zosimus	417
Zosimus suc. by Boniface	418
Pharamond first Merovingian King of France	420
Germanus of Auxerre and Lupus sent by Gallican Church into Britain to check Pelagian heresy	429
Boniface succeeded by Cœlestine	430
Augustine's works:—
De Peccatorum mer. et rem. and De Sp. et Litera	412
De Natura et Gratia	415
De Trinitate completed, and De Gestis Pelagii	417
Ep. ad Sixtum	418
De Nuptiis et Concupiscentia	419
De Civitate Dei, completed	426
De Gratia et Lib. Arbitrio	426
De Correptione et Gratia	427
De Prædest. Sanctorum et de dono Perseverantiæ	428
Augustine died	430
Council of Ephesus. Third Œcum. June 22nd	431
Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, died	431
Patricius converts the Irish	432
Celestinus succeeded by Sixtus III.	432
Vincent of Lerins	433
Prosper Aq. Mercator	433
Nestorius died	435
Council of Antioch against Theodore of Mopsuestia	436
Carthage taken by Vandals	439
Sixtus III. succeeded by Leo	439
Armenia divided between the Romans and Persians	440
Council of Arausio I.	441
Council of Vasa	442
Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, died	444
Vortigern invites over Saxons under Hengist against Picts and Scots	446
Britons colonize west of Gaul, thence called Brittany	446
Eutychian heresy	446
Council of Constantinople	446
Sueves masters of Gallicia, the Goths of the rest of Spain	447
False Council of Ephesus	449
Council of Constantinople	451
Gaul ravaged by the Huns	451
Council of Chalcedon. Fourth Œcumenical	451
Meeting between Leo I. and Attila	452
Council of Angers in Gaul	453
Prosper died	453
Rome pillaged by Genseric	455
Council of Arles	455
Persecution	455
Simeon Stylites	455
Leo suc. by Hilarius	461
Council of Arles	462
Hilarius suc. by Simplicius	467
Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne, institutes Litanical Rogations	476
Simplicius succeeded by Felix III.	483
Vigilius Tapsensis	484
Peter Fullo, Bishop of Antioch, died	488
Felix III. succeeded by Gelasius	492
Gelasius s. by Anastasius II.	496
Anastasius II. s. by Symmachus	498
Conversion of Clovis	498
Babylonian Talmud completed	498
Fulgentius, B. of Ruspæ	506
Clovis died	511
Symmachus suc. by Hormisdas	514
Abyssinian conquests	522
Hormisdas succeeded by Johannes	523
Johannes suc. by Felix IV.	527
Angles settle in east part of Britain	527
Code of Justinian	528
Benedictine order founded	529
Jutes settle in the Isle of Wight	530
Felix IV. suc. by Boniface	530
Boniface s. by Johannes II.	531
Christian era instituted by Dionysius Exiguus	532
Institutes of Justinian	533
Abyssinians received into Roman alliance	533
Johannes II. s. by Agapetus	535
Africa reconquered by Belisarius	535
Sacred vessels (taken from Rome to Carthage by Genseric) sent back to Jerusalem	535
Agapetus succeeded by Silverius	536
Silverius succeeded by Vigilius	540
Benedict and Totila, kings of Goths	543
Council of Constantinople. Fifth Œcumenical	553
Commencement of Schism between the East and West	554
Vigilius suc. by Pelagius	555
Pelagius suc. by Johannes III.	559
King Clothaire died	561
Justinian died	565
British Saints Gildas, Bridget, Columba	566
Johannes III. s. by Benedictus	573
Gregory of Tours	573
Germanus, Bishop of Paris, died	575
Benedict succeeded by Pelagius II.	577
Uffa, first king of East Angles, died	577
Ercenwyn, first king of Essex, died	587
Visigoths of Spain converted	589
Council of Toledo III. Nicene Creed made part of service with "Filioque"	589
Pelagius succeeded by Gregory I.	590
Heptarchy	590
Mission of Augustine to Saxons in Britain	596
Ordo Romanus reformed, canon of mass	599
Gregorian chants introduced into England by Augustine	599
Lombards converted	599
Columban founds the monastery of Luxeuil	600
British churches raised on ruins of heathen temples	601
Mellitus first Bishop of London	601
Gregory I. s. by Sabinianus	604
Sabinianus s. by Boniface III.	606
Boniface III. s. by Boniface IV. (The Papal succession here discontinued.)	607
Augustine, Archb. of Canterbury died, s. by Laurence	607
Jerusalem taken by the Persians, and the Holy Sepulchre burnt	614
Ethelbert, king of Kent d.	616
Chosroes conquers Egypt	616
Laurence, Archbb. of Canterbury, s. by Mellitus	619
Hegira of Mahomet	622
Mellitus s. by Justus	624
Conversion of Edwin, king of Northumberland	627
Mahomet dies	631
Mahomet s. by Abubeki and Omar	631
Monothelite heresy	633
Justus s. by Honorius	634
Damascus taken by the Moslems	635
Jerusalem taken by Omar	636
Isidore of Seville d.	636
Malmesbury Monastery founded	638
St. Aidan founded See of Lindisfarne (since of Durham)	638
Moslem rule spreads from Egypt to Euphrates, and over whole of Persia	639
Alexandria taken by Moslems, and Library used as bath fuel	640
Melchite Patriarch in Egypt	641
Moors, by junction of Saracens and Berbers of Tripoli	641
Oswald, K. of Northumberland, killed	642
Caliph Omar assassinated, succeeded by Othman	644
North Africa overrun by Moslems	646
Persian Empire extingd. by death of Yezdegird after a dynasty of 425 years. Magian fire worship abolished; Parsees retire to India	651
Honorius s. by Deusdedit a W. Saxon	653
Oswy K. of Mid Angles baptized	655
Oswy obtains accession of Mercia	655
E. Saxon conquered by Oswy, of which London is capital	655
Chad, Bp. of Northumberland	655
Caliph Othman assassinat.	655
Ali has Persia, Arabia, and the east; Moavia (Ommiad) has Syria, Egypt and west; the Persian dynasty descended from Ali	660
Moavia sole Calif from Mediterranean shores to India	662
Moors invade Sicily	662
Conference at Streneshal, i.e., "Beacon Point" (Whitby Abbey) on Paschal question	664
Diocese of Winchester formed by King Oswy from Wessex	664
Council of Merida (Canons Resident.)	666
Deusdedit d. 665; s. by Theodore	668
Wilfrid consecrated Archbishop of York	670
Queen Etheldred founded Ely monastery	672
Council of Hertford	673
Glass first introduced in church windows by Bened. Biscop at Wearmouth in Durham	674
Ven. Bede b. at Jarrow, Durham	674
Queen Etheldred d.	679
Council of Constantinople. Sixth Œcumenical	680
Council of Hatfield	680
Wilfred (deposed) founds Selsey Abbey	680
St. Cuthbert, Bp. of Lindisfarne, d.	687

Chronological Tables

A.D.

Theodore s. by Britwald or Berthold, first native primate . . . 692
Council in Trullo (Quinisext) . . . 692
Council of Toledo XVII. and last . . . 694
Church in Spain raises persecution of Jews, and gives no other historical sign of life for 150 years . . 694
Council of Beconeeld (cf. A.D. 798) . . . 694
Council of Berkhamsted 697
Sale of St. John's Church at Damascus refused to Caliph Walid. He builds a Mosque on ruins 705
Wilfrid d. 709
Moors pass from Africa into Spain . . 712
Roderic, King of Goths defeated. Gothic kingdom had lasted 300 years . . . 713
Moors established at Cordova and Toledo . 713
Andalusia named from "Vandal" . . 713
Moors seize Gothic territory north of Pyrenees 719
King Ina refounds Glastonbury Abbey . . 722
Ina founds English College at Rome. Maintains it by "Rome scot," the origin of Peter's Pence . . 727
Berthold or Britwald s. by Tatwin . . 731
Bede's Hist. closes . 731
Abderrahman killed by Charles Martel at Poictiers . . . 732
Bede's letter to Egbert 734
Bede d. 735
Tatwin s. by Nothelm . 735
York made Archbishopric 735
Charles Martel d. . . 741
Northelm s. by Cuthbert 741
Conc. of twelve bishops at Cloveshoe (Cliffe at Hoo), Kent . . 747
Abdallah (Abassid) Caliph 749
Jewish Sect of Karaites 750
King Pepin crowned . 751
Pepin founder of Carlovingian dynasty . . 752
Ommiad dynasty expires, but Abderrahman holds Spain . . . 753
Counc. Constant. against Images . . . 754
Pepin takes 22 cities from Astolf, King of Lombardy, and gives them to the Pope, now a temporal prince . . 755
C. Almansor persecutes Church in Palestine . 756
Cuthbert s. by Bregwin 759
Bregwin s. by Jaenbert 762
Council of Calcuith (Chalk Hythe, Sax. Cealchith, modern, Chelsea) . 767
False decretals presented to Pope by Ingelram, Bp. of Metz . . 785
Endowment by Constantine therein forged . 785
COUNCIL OF NICÆA. Seventh Œcumenical . 787
Adrian, to mortify Archb. of Canterbury sent Pallium to Bp. of Lichfield qua Archbishop . 787
Libri Carolini presented to Pope Adrian . . 790

A.D.

Jaenbert s. by Athelard 791
Alcuin's letter to Charlemagne against Iconolatry 792
Danes destroy Lindisfarne 793
Council of Frankfort against images . . 794
Council in Mercia . 795
Council of Beconeeld (cf. A.D. 694) . . . 798
Council of Finchal, Durham (Paschal qu.) . 798
Council of Cliffe at Hoo (Medway) . . . 800
Coronation of Charlemagne as Emperor . 800
Council at Aix-la-Chapelle 803
Alcuin d. 804
Athelard s. by Wulfred 804
Council of Aix-la-Chapelle 809
Nicene Creed with "Filioque" in Spanish and Gallican Liturgies; not in Ordo Romanus, but engraved on silver plates in Greek and Latin and suspended in St. Peter's Church, Rome . . . 809
Manichæans in Armenia 811
Council of Constantinople against images . . 815
Council of Calcuith . 816
Monastic reform in France 817
Sicily and Crete taken by the Moors . . 820
Council at Cliffe . . 822
Council at do. . . . 824
Wulfred s. by Thcogild . 829
Theogild s. by Ceolnoth 829
Heptarchy united under Egbert, first King of England 830
Paschasius Radbertus on Euch. 831
Viscount of Bigorre made king, to resist the Moors, origin of kingdom of Navarre . . 832
Caliph Almamoun, patron of learning, died 833
Moors ravage banks of Rhone . . . 842
Descent of Danes on French coast, Rouen and Nantes pillaged, and large sums extorted as ransom . . . 843
Saracens enter Italy as allies, and obtain much plunder from the monastery of Monte Cassino 844
Danes return upon Rouen, take Paris on Easterday, and retain a footing in France . - 845
Danes pillage Hamburg and Friesland, . . 845
Moors crossing from Africa plunder the outskirts of Rome . . . 847
Rome fortified, . . 848
Bourdeaux taken by Danes . . . 848
Moors persecute Church at Cordova . . 848
Gotheschalk on Predestination 848
Ethelwulf, second King of England . . 848
Alfred, son of Ethelwulf, King of Wessex, born 849
Danes repulsed on English coast . . . 850
Danes ascend the Seine and Loire . . . 853

A.D.

Church endowed by Ethelwulf with tenth part of lands . . . 854
Christianity introduced into Denmark . . 854
Ethelbald, third King of England . . . 855
Rabanus Maurus died . 856
Danes burn churches at Orleans and Paris . 856
Ratramnus on Holy Eucharist 859
Danes pass round Spain and ascend the Rhone 859
Ethelbert, fourth King of England . . . 860
Ethelbert, fifth King of England . . . 866
Danes ravage east coast of England, and take York 867
Gotheschalk died in prison 868
Ratramnus on Proc. of Holy Spirit . . 868
COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE. Eighth Œcumenical . . . 869
Danes under Ungar and Hubba plunder and burn the conventual churches at Lindisfarne, Tynemouth, Whitby, Croyland, Ely 870
St. Edmund M. . . 870
St. Neot died in Cornwall, 870
Hincmar of Rheims . 870
Ceolnoth succeeded by Æthelred . . . 871
Peter of Sicily, Hist. Manich. . . . 871
Russians receive the Gospel 872
Alfred the Great, sixth King of England, . 872
England overrun by the Danes, King Alfred in concealment . . 878
Danes overrun Netherlands 881
Danes defeated by Alfred, allowed to colonize coast south and west of Humber, on condition of receiving baptism . 884
King Alfred codifies the laws of Offa, Ina, and Ethelbert . . . 884
Italy ravaged by Moors 884
Danes winter at Amiens, and besiege Paris . 886
St. David 886
Oxford restored by Alfred 889
Photii Bibliotheca . 889
University of Paris . 889
Æthelred succeeded by Phlegmond . . 890
Edward the Elder, seventh King of England . 900
Hervé, Archb. Rheims, converts Danish settlers at Rouen, who may now be called Normans 910
Abbey of Clugni founded 910
Normandy and Brittany ceded to Rollo, baptized Robert . . 912
Phlegmond succeeded by Adhelm . . . 923
Adhelm succeeded by Wulfhelm . . . 925
Athelstan, eighth king of England . . . 925
Moors possess Alpine passes, and levy tax upon pilgrims, . . 936
Edmund, ninth king of England . . . 941

A.D.

Wulfhelm succeeded by Odo, son of a Pagan Dane . . . 942
Odo's Constitutions . 944
Thurketil refounds Croyland Abbey . . 945
Dunstan endows Glastonbury, and founds five other abbeys . . 948
Edred, tenth King of England 948
Seven new Sees created in England . . 948
Conversion of Bohemian Sclaves . . . 948
Dunstan holds the Sees of London and Worcester in plurality . . 948
Edwy, eleventh king of England . . . 955
Edgar, twelfth king of England . . . 959
Odo succeeded by Dunstan 960
Conversion of Poles . 965
Dunstan inflicts seven years' penance on King Edgar . . . 966
Dunstan, with Bishops Ethelwald and Oswald, a commission for reform of clergy . . 969
Cairo, "The Victorious," built by Moez . . 971
Edward II., thirteenth king of England . 975
Ethelred II., fourteenth king of England . 979
Bath Abbey founded by Elphege, Bishop of Winchester . . 980
Hugh Capet, founder of Capetian dynasty, consecrated at Rheims . 987
Dunstan succeeded by Ethelgar . . . 988
Ethelgar succeeded by Siric 989
Moors under Almansor oppress Spain for twelve years . . 993
Siric succeeded by Ælfric 996
Hungarians receive the Gospel . . . 1002
Ælfric succeeded by St. Elphege . . . 1006
Church reform . . 1006
Church of Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem destroyed: Jewish persecution in consequence . . 1009
Council of Enham forbids polygamy, sale of slaves to infidels, sorcery . . . 1009
Danes take Canterbury, and cruelly kill St. Elphege, Apr. 10 . 1011
Sweyn, king of Denmark, fifteenth king of England . . . 1013
Elphege succeeded by Leyfing . . . 1013
King Ethelred's restoration . . . 1015
Edward Ironsides, sixteenth king of England . . . 1016
Canute, seventeenth king of England . . 1017
Leyfing succeeded by Egelnoth . . . 1020
Manichæans burnt in Normandy . . 1022
Harold Harefoot, eighteenth king of England . . . 1036
Egelnoth succeeded by Eadsige, . . . 1037

	A.D.
Hardicanute, nineteenth king of England	1039
Edward the Confessor, twentieth king of England	1040
Council of Paris condemns Berengarius and J. Scotus Erigena	1050
Eadsige suc. by Robert	1050
Robert outlawed, succeeded by Stigand	1052
Normans invade Papal States, and take Leo IX. prisoner	1053
Mich. Cerular. Patr. of Constantinople, excommunicated July 16, Leo IX. having died April 19	1054
Duchy of Apulia and Calabria ceded to Normans in fee with Moorish part of Sicily. Origin of kingdom of Naples	1059
Pilgrimage of seven thousand Germans to Jerusalem,	1064
Westminster Abbey consecrated on Innocent's day	1065
Edward Confessor died January 4, naming William Duke of Normandy as his heir	1066
Harold, half brother of Edward, crowned	1066
William crowned after battle of Hastings by Aldred, Archbishop of York	1066
Stigand imprisoned as an intruder, succeeded by Lanfranc	1070

CHURCH. [Ἐκκλησία.] I. Etymology. A similarity of sound between the word "Church," as it appears in the Teutonic languages, and the word κυριακόν, which was occasionally used instead of ἐκκλησία [Conc. Ancyr. can. xiv. Laodic. xxviii.; Euseb. ix. 10[1]] by ecclesiastical writers, led to the opinion that the one word had been derived from the other [Walafrid Strabo, De rebus Eccl. vii.]. It has also been supposed to have been derived from κύριου οἶκος. But the first term is rare even in Greek writers, and there are strong arguments against the probability of its introduction into other languages [Smith's Dict. Bible, iii. App.]; while the second, though often found in the accusative case, τὸν οἶκον κυρίου, in the LXX., does not appear to have been transferred to Christian writers. In the most primitive known languages of Britain, the corresponding word is plainly allied with ἐκκλησία, the Welsh being Eglwys, the Cornish Eglos, and the Gaelic Eaglais. Of a similar derivation is the French Eglise. Although therefore the ecclesiastical words "bishop," "priest," "deacon," are undoubtedly from the Greek, it is not clear that "Church" is so derived. A more probable derivation is from the Anglo-Saxon "circ," a name applied to the stone circles used for Druidical temples, and exactly corresponding to the "kirk" of old English.

II. Usage of the word Church. The New Testament word for "Church" is uniformly ἐκκλησία, which is derived from ἐκκαλεῖν. The sense is that of a body formed into a separate assembly by being "called out" from the midst of a larger body; the analogous expression "the called" [κλητοὶ, Rom. i. 6; viii. 28] being familiar in St. Paul's epistles. This idea of Christians as persons "called" out of darkness and sin "unto God's kingdom and glory" [1 Thess. ii. 12], is so very frequently used by St. Paul that it was probably the sense in which ἐκκλησία was adopted and applied by the early Christians. It must not be forgotten, however, that the word is twice used by our Lord, once in the sense of a spiritual building [Matt. xvi. 18], and once in the sense of a religious community [Matt. xviii. 17]. These two instances, and a third in St. James [v. 14], are the only ones in which the word is used by any New Testament writer except St. Paul, St. Luke (his companion), and St. John. The idea of the ἐκκλησία as a building is not found anywhere else in the New Testament, except in our Lord's words before referred to, and (in a symbolical sense) in 1 Cor. xiv. 4, 12: though some writers, as e.g. Mede, consider it to be so used (in opposition to οἰκίας) in 1 Cor. xi. 22.

The primary idea of the Church is, therefore, in the New Testament, that of a separated community composed of Christ's followers, and as such dissociated from the rest of the world. In the Gospels it is usually spoken of by St. Matthew as "the Kingdom of Heaven," and as "the Kingdom of God" by all the Evangelists. It is observable however that in the latest Gospel, the designation "Kingdom of God" is only once used, and that St. John, the writer of that Gospel, uses the word "Church" freely in the Apocalypse.

In the fourth century the word had come to be generally used for the place of assembly for Divine Worship. Thus St. Augustine [A.D. 354-430] writes: "Sicut ecclesia dicitur locus quo ecclesia congregatur. . . . . Et hoc quotidianis loquendi usus obtinuit, ut 'in ecclesiam prodire,' aut 'ad ecclesiam confugere,' non dicatur nisi qui ad locum ipsum parietesque prodierit vel confugierit, quibus ecclesiæ congregatio continetur." [Quæst. in Levit. iii. 57.]

But even in Apostolic times a secondary sense of the word had sprung up, in which it was applied to particular bodies of Christians, as well as to the whole body in general. Thus the Churches of God [1 Thess. ii. 14], and the Churches of the Gentiles [Rom. xvi. 4], are spoken of by St. Paul.

In the same manner the Apostle particularizes national churches, as "the Church of God which is at Corinth," "the Church of the Thessalonians:" and at a later date, St. John addresses one of the seven epistles with a specially revealed superscription, "Unto the angel of the Ephesian Church" [τῆς Ἐφεσίνης ἐκκλησίας[2]]. From this usage of the word it is evident that it very soon acquired several meanings, even apart from its application to the place of assembly for Divine worship: and that local churches were recognised in Apostolic times, especially with reference to national and territorial divisions. Hence in the sub-Apostolic days it was customary to call each bishop and his flock a church; and in the age after that, when still further progress in organization had been made, such bishops and their flocks as were comprised within the bounds of a Roman province were collectively called so, each particular episcopate being then called a parish. The idea of "National Churches," such as the Church of France, the Church of Spain, the Church of England, the Church of Ireland, &c., is strictly in accordance with the primitive idea of the [1] This is in the decree of Maximin. In the previous chapter, however, he himself speaks of churches as οἴκους ἐκκλησιῶν [Euseb. ix. 9], and the word most generally used by him is "temples," but his terms for them vary much, as if none were yet quite settled.

[2] This reading is not, however, in all the MSS.

Church; while, on the other hand, nothing could be less so than to speak of the Church of Rome, or the Roman Church, as if it were a body extending into other countries than that to which the name "Rome" may be legitimately extended.

III. Nature of the Church. The primary idea of the Church as a community of persons "called out from" the whole body of mankind, leads on to the further notion of it as comprising the whole body of Christian people. But this comprehensive notion of the Church extends it to Christians of all times and of all places; and therefore, of necessity, to Christians of all preceding ages as well as to those of any specified moment. This comprehensive idea of the Church is consequently subdivided into those of the Invisible Church and the Visible Church.

1. The INVISIBLE CHURCH is the name given to that vast body of Christians who have at any time, or in any place, departed out of this life in the faith, and fear, and love of God to live in the world unseen. In the words of St. Augustine, "The Church is the people of God throughout all nations, all saints being joined and thereunto numbered who lived in this world even before His coming, so believing that He would come, even as we believe that He hath come." [Aug. de Catechiz. rud. iii.] This definition presupposes, of course, that Christians who have left this world in a state of unforgiven sin, are in some sense or other cast out of the Church; but the condition of the departed is so veiled in mystery that their exact relation to the Church of Christ between death and the final Judgment can by no means be defined. We can only carry our definition to the extent of saying that the Invisible Church is made up of the faithful who are dead as far as this life is concerned, but who are alive as to the life of the world to come.

2. The VISIBLE CHURCH is the whole body of Christians at any time living in this world: that is to say, the whole body of those who have been baptized, and have not been authoritatively separated from the Church by excommunication. How far wilful heresy, schism, or immoral wickedness can of itself effect a person's separation from the Church, is a question too difficult to be entered upon in this place. But as theologians contemplate only the holy dead when they speak of the Invisible Church, so they ordinarily speak of the Visible Church in a restricted sense which does not include heretical, schismatical, or iniquitous Christians; meaning by that term, the "One Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church" of the Nicene Creed. This is called "cœtus fidelium" by ancient writers, and the term is retained in the definition given by the Nineteenth Article of religion, which is, "The Visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men" [cœtus fidelium], "in the which the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly administered according to Christ's ordinance" [et sacramenta quoad ea quæ necessario exigantur, juxta Christi institutum recte administrantur].[1] Of such a cœtus fidelium the principal notes or marks by which it is to be distinguished are Unity, Holiness, Catholicity, and Apostolicity. But these distinctive characteristics, and also the spiritual phase of the Church as the Body of Christ, are treated of in separate articles. [BODY, MYSTICAL. AUTHORITY OF CHURCH. DISCIPLINE, ECCLESIASTICAL. DIOCESE. NOTES OF THE CHURCH. COMMUNION OF SAINTS, &c.]

CIRCUMCELLIONS. Certain fanatical Donatists of the fourth century who formed themselves into armed bands, and roamed through the country on the pretence of redressing injuries. The name was revived in Germany in the thirteenth century by some fanatics who professed to have armed in support of the excommunicated Emperor Frederic. [See Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

CIRCUMCISION. The Octave of Christmas was called the Festival of the Circumcision as early as the sixth century, and for the obvious reason that the eighth day after the Nativity was the day on which our Lord was circumcised. The coincidence of this day with the Kalends of January, on which the riotous and immoral festival of the Saturnalia was kept by the Romans, always prevented it from being a prominent Christian festival in the early centuries; and there were places and periods in which the heathen Saturnalia so invaded the Christian festival that the observance of the latter was altogether forbidden. In modern times it has been confused in a similar manner with the observance of New Year's Day.

CIRCUMINCESSION, called in Greek περιχώρησις, is the name given to the indwelling in each other of the Three Divine Persons. This mutual indwelling is not only expressly stated in Scripture [John xiv. 9-11; xvii. 11, 21, 22, 23, and often implied, as in John i. 1; Col. ii. 9, πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα], but necessarily follows from the Catholic doctrine of the Holy Trinity: for the Divine Nature being entire in each Person, though the Persons are distinct from each other, there must be that mutual indwelling which this word implies. St. Athanasius often alludes to the coinherence of the Three Persons,[2] which implies their equal and self-same Godhead, as manifestly inconsistent with Arianism. Not that we are to suppose that the teaching of the Church is either identical with, or even implicitly sanctions, the heresy of Sabellius, who maintained that the distinction between the Persons of the Godhead was only nominal, or, in other words, that there was only one Divine Person, bearing the name of the Father, the Son, or the Holy Ghost. On the contrary, as Bishop Bull shews, the doctrine of

[1] The definition of the Church usually adopted by Roman theologians is that of Bellarmine, which is thus given in Liebermann's Institutiones Theologicæ, i. 257: "Ecclesia est cœtus hominum unius et ejusdem fidei Christianæ professione, et eorundem Sacramentorum communione conjunctus, sub regimine legitimorum pastorum ac præcipue Romani Pontificis." As to the last words see SUPREMACY, PAPAL: the preceding part of the definition is entirely consistent with that of the English Church as given above.

[2] Oratio tertia cont. Arianos, tom. ii. (Migne), 1857.

Clergy

the coinherence of the Divine Persons has no affinity with, and may be considered the safeguard against, the Sabellian heresy. He says: "In the Trinity the circumincession is most proper and perfect, forasmuch as the Persons mutually contain Each Other, and all the Three have an immeasurable whereabouts (immensum ubi, as the Schoolmen express it), so that wheresoever one Person is, there the other two exist; in other words, They are all everywhere. . . . In the next place, I would remind the reader that this doctrine of the circumincession of the Persons in the Trinity is so far from introducing Sabellianism, that it is of great use, as Petavius has also observed, for (establishing) the diversity of the Persons, and for confuting that heresy. For, in order to that mutual existence (in each other) which is discerned in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, it is absolutely necessary that there should be some distinction between those who are thus joined together—that is, that those that exist mutually in each other, should be different in reality, and not in mode of conception only: for that which is simply one, is not said to exist in itself, or to interpenetrate itself. . . . Lastly, this is especially to be considered—that this circumincession of the Divine Persons is indeed a very great mystery, which we ought rather religiously to adore than curiously to pry into. No similitude can be devised which shall be in every respect apt to illustrate it; no language avails worthily to set it forth, seeing that it is an union which far transcends all other unions."[1] [Petavius, de Trinitate, lib. iv. c. 16.]

CIVIL LAW. [Law, Ecclesiastical.]

CLERGY. The word clergy is derived from κλῆρος, a lot, and is thus explained by St. Jerome [Ep. ad Nepot.], "Propterea vocantur clerici, vel quia de sorte sunt Domini, vel quia ipse Dominus sors, id est, pars, clericorum est." Others have supposed that the custom of choosing persons by lot to discharge sacred offices is connected with the term which is used [Acts i. 26] in reference to the election of St. Matthias to the Apostolate by casting lots; ἔδωκαν κλήρους αὐτῶν, καὶ ἔπεσεν ὁ κλῆρος ἐπὶ Ματθίαν. The clergy were also called canonici, from κανών, the catalogue of each church, οἱ ἐν τῷ κανόνι, ἱερατικοὶ, or τάξις ἱερατικὴ, and ταξις τοῦ βήματος, or the order of the sanctuary, a term used chiefly by Gregory Nazianzen. In the third century, the inferior orders were also called clerici, and the third Council of Carthage in its twenty-first Canon expressly grants the title to them.

That the clergy, using the name in its older sense for the three orders of bishops, priests, and deacons, formed from the first a distinct order cannot be doubted. It has never indeed been denied that in the third century there was a distinction between clergy and laity, clearly marked, and firmly established, though it is asserted that it was then new, and brought in by the increasing worldly ambition of the Church. In the first place, however, the tone of all the passages of Scripture in which the ministers of the Church are spoken of is one which conveys the idea, not of equality, but of godly authority. A passage in St. Peter's Epistles [1 Pet. v. 3], μηδ' ὡς κατακυριεύοντες τῶν κλήρων, has been cited to prove the equality of all Christians in the primitive Church, and the absence of any distinct order of ministers. In that passage the presbyters of the Church are bidden not to be lords over God's heritage or clergy, τῶν κλήρων. The word is there undoubtedly used for the whole body of Christian people, but the same word had been used before of the Jews, who in the same way are called God's inheritance or clergy [Deut. iv. 20 and ix. 29], and among whom, nevertheless, a distinct priesthood existed. The whole body of the Christian Church is in truth the κλῆρος or inheritance of God, when it is distinguished from unbelievers; but when we speak of the members of the Church in their mutual relations one to another, there is an especial κλῆρος, just as from the whole of God's inheritance of Israel the tribe of Levi was chosen to minister at the altar. With this view the testimony of the ancient Church, in every age, agrees. St. Ignatius declares: "He who does anything without bishop, and presbyter, and deacon, is not pure in conscience" [Ad Trall. c. 7], and in the same epistle χωρὶς τούτων (ἐπισκοποῦ, πρεσβυτέρων, καὶ διακόνων) Ἐκκλησία οὐ καλεῖται. St. Clement of Rome, the "fellow-labourer" of St. Paul, parallels the three orders of the Church to the Jewish high priests, priests, and Levites, and the Stromata of Clemens Alexandrinus contains these remarkable words, καὶ αἱ ἐνταῦθα κατὰ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν προκοπαὶ, ἐπισκόπων, πρεσβυτέρων, διακόνων, μιμήματα, οἶμαι, τῆς ἀγγελικῆς δόξης. The same Father records of St. John that when he returned from Patmos, and settled at Ephesus, he set apart for the clergy such persons as the Holy Spirit signified to him. The testimony of Tertullian with respect to the episcopal office, as it existed in his day, is "ordo episcoporum, ad originem recensus, in Joannem stabit auctorem."

Similar passages abound in the writings of the Fathers, but those here given sufficiently shew the opinion of the Church in the age immediately following that of the Apostles. The most ancient division of the clergy is into the three orders of bishops, priests, and deacons. In the lifetime of the Apostles, themselves forming the Episcopate of the Church, Theodoret says: "Formerly they called the same persons presbyters and bishops, while those who are now called bishops they named apostles. But shortly afterwards the name of apostles was appropriated to such as were apostles indeed, and then the name bishop was given to those who before were called apostles." The appointment of Timothy and Titus with authority over the presbyters of Ephesus and Crete is one of the first traces of the divinely-appointed provision made by the Apostles for the continuance of their own office; and by St. John, the last survivor of the twelve, the new organization was made complete. The bishops of the Church are then, in the fullest sense, διάδοχοι τῶν Αποστόλων, the successors of the Apostles. Other titles of honour given to them were ἄρχοντες ἐκκλησιῶν, governors of the Churches, προεστῶτες or presidents, summi sacerdotes, summi pontifices, papæ, vicars of Christ, and angels of the Churches [cf. St. Aug. Ep. 162, "Divina voce laudatur sub angeli nomine præpositus ecclesiæ]. The duties of a bishop included those of the presbyter, such as baptism, the celebration of the Holy Communion, and preaching, "the ministry of the Word and sacraments;" and also the consecration of churches, confirmation, the reconciliation of penitents, offices which only in case of absolute necessity were performed by presbyters. But the distinguishing office of the bishop was the power of ordination, which he alone possessed. The fourth Council of Carthage directs "Presbyter cum ordinatur, episcopo eum benedicente, et manum super caput ejus tenente, etiam omnes presbyteri, qui præsentes sunt, manus suas juxta manum episcopi super caput illius teneant;" that is, as in the Ordinal of the English Church, the presbyters were to place their hands upon the heads of the person to be ordained, but the bishop alone was to utter the words of consecration. St. Jerome, even when writing in favour of the privileges and status of presbyters, says [Ep. 85], "Quid enim facit, excepta ordinatione episcopus, quod presbyter non faciat." It was also the office of a bishop to grant letters of commendation to members of his flock when leaving home for other countries, to administer the revenues of the Church [Canon xxiv. of the Council of Antioch], and to superintend the conduct of the inferior clergy in his diocese. This power, however, was not arbitrary, for the Councils of Carthage allow an appeal to any presbyter or deacon from his own bishop to a synod, or to the neighbouring bishops.

[1] Defence of the Nicene Creed, bk. iv. c. iv. secs. 13, 14. Oxf. transl.

Clergy

The word presbyter, like the Latin senior, signifies an elder, but it is a title of station and rank rather than of age, as the Saxon word alderman, before it was supplanted by the Danish jarl or earl, denoted high dignity and power rather than seniority. Archbishop de Marca defines the office of presbyter: "Presbyterium est ordo qui manuum impositione confertesse ad conficienda et dispensanda sacramentæ." Presbyters might also preach and grant absolution in the absence of the bishop, or if authorized by him; they sat in the place of honour with the bishop, forming his council or senate. St. Cyprian says of his presbyters that he was accustomed to deliberate with them on the merits of all candidates for ordination, and on the subject of discipline and reconciliation of penitents.

The word deacon (διάκονος) is derived from διήκω, to go through or perform. Διάκονος is sometimes used in the New Testament for any servant of God, just as διακονεῖν is used for the performance of a service, διακονία for the service or ministry itself, whether performed by a deacon, or as in Acts i. 25, by an apostle, and in 2 Tim. iv. 5, by a bishop. Deacons appear first in the Church at Jerusalem, and were appointed in consequence of a complaint made by the Hellenic converts that their widows were neglected in the daily ministrations. Their duties are to assist the bishop and presbyters at the celebration of the Holy Communion, to baptize in the absence of a priest, to preach by authority from the bishop, to rebuke unseemly conduct in church, and particularly to minister to the wants of the sick and poor. The difference between the ordination of a deacon and a priest is set forth by the fourth Council of Carthage [c. 4]: "Diaconus cum ordinatur, solus episcopus, qui eum benedicit, manum super caput illius ponat; quia non ad sacerdotium, sed ad ministerium consecratur."

In the middle of the third century several new orders were introduced: [1] Sub-deacons, whose principal duty was to prepare the sacred vessels for the service of the altar; [2] Lectores, or readers, who read the Scriptures in the Church from the "tribunal ecclesiæ," or lectern; [3] Acolythes, who lighted the candles in the Church, provided wine for the Eucharist, and attended the bishop in his official duties; [4] Exorcists, whose office is explained by a canon of the fourth Council of Carthage: "Exorcista cum ordinatur, accipiat de manu episcopi libellum, in quo scripti sunt exorcismi, dicente sibi Episcopo, Accipe et commenda memoriæ, et habeto potestatem imponendi manus super energumenum, sive baptizatum sive catechumenum;" [5] Ostiarii or doorkeepers [πυλωροὶ], who had the charge of the doors of the church, and enforced the observance of the distinctions between the faithful and catechumens, or persons under discipline, at the time of service. Besides these five orders, there were also in the fourth century cantores, or psalmistæ, who sang in the church; copiatæ, or fossarii, whose office is described in a passage of St. Jerome: "The clerici, whose duty it was, wrap the corpse in linen, and according to custom prepare the tomb;" and the parabolani who, under the direction of the bishop, attended on the sick.

In the earliest times, the clergy were supported by the weekly oblations at the altar, and by monthly offerings made to the common treasury of each church. These revenues were divided monthly. St. Cyprian speaks of a divisio mensurna, exclusion from which seems to have been equivalent to the modern suspension from a benefice. It was impossible in the ages of persecution, and until the imperial decrees granted liberty in this respect, for the Church to hold with safety property in houses or lands. Such, therefore, if given to the Church, were sold, especially in the West, which continued the practice later than the East. A law of Constantine, embodied in the Code of Justinian, decreed that even any person might, when dying, bequeath "bonorum quod optaverit" to the most holy Catholic Church. In consequence of the great abuses which arose in after times, Valentinian decreed that no ecclesiastics should enter the houses of orphans or widows for the purpose of obtaining bequests from them. It was doubtless a law made in restraint of abuses, for St. Jerome says of it, "Nec de lege conqueror, sed doleo cur meruimus hanc legem." I do not complain of the law, but I grieve that we should have deserved it [Ep. 2 ad Nepotian]. Constantine also granted an annual payment to the clergy out of the revenues of the empire [Sozomen, lib. v. c. 5], but this, after being entirely withdrawn by Julian, was only restored in part by the succeeding Christian emperors. It was probably the germ of the payment of tithes, which was made before the end of the fourth century.

Many privileges were granted to the clergy by the Christian emperors. Justinian decreed that when the evidence of a bishop was required, "Judex mittat ad eos quosdam ex personis ministrantium sibi," so that the bishop might not be obliged to appear in court. A law of Theodosius the Great forbade the examination of a presbyter or ecclesiastic of higher rank by torture. Valentinian decreed that in matters of faith or ecclesiastical order the clergy should be judged by those of their own body [St. Ambrose, Ep. ad Valentin.] "Minora delicta" were also, according to De Marca, left to the cognizance of the bishop, when the clergy were guilty of them; "atrocia crimina" alone being in their case judged by a secular court. The clergy were also exempted from the payment of the "census capitum," or personal tribute, although in common with other subjects of the empire they paid, except in particular instances, the census agrorum for their own lands or those belonging to the Church.

The power of the clergy reached its highest point in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Many causes contributed to this, such as the superiority which learning, almost exclusively possessed by them, gave to them over the laity; and the fact that the spirit of religion, even when unable to repress immorality and crime, was yet powerful enough to invest the possessions of the Church with a peculiar sanctity, and therefore to make churches and religious houses safe refuges in which the oppressed and the weak might find protection.

The influence of the clergy, as distinguished from power, was perhaps never higher than at the close of the sixteenth century. Ranke says of this period [Hist. of the Popes, book vi. Intr.]: "There has been no period in which theologians were more influential than at the close of the sixteenth century. They sat in the councils of kings, and discussed political affairs from the pulpit in the presence of the whole people,—they directed schools, controlled the efforts of learning, and governed the whole range of literature." [Bishops. Benefice. Celibacy. Cure of Souls. Character. Discipline. Episcopacy. Orders. Priest. Apostolical Succession.]

CLINIC [κλινικός]. This designation was applied in very early times to any person who was baptized in private on account of sickness or approaching death. St. Cyprian says that he was at a loss to know how the name came to be used, but concludes that it was a term borrowed from Hippocrates, or from Soranus (a Roman physician of Trajan's time), and applied to persons so baptized as a kind of nickname. [Cyp. Ep. lxix. al. lxxxv. ad Magnum.]

There were many in the early Church who doubted the efficacy of clinical, or deathbed, baptism, because a person so baptized was only sprinkled and not dipped. St. Cyprian declares his opinion in the epistle just quoted, however, that it was effectual, though he will not control or question the contrary opinion of any brother bishop. [Baptism.] The twelfth canon of the Council of Neocæsarea [A.D. 314] sanctions clinical baptism in time of necessity; and the forty-seventh canon of that of Laodicæa [A.D. 314-372] implies the same permission by enjoining that clinics shall learn the Creed if they recover from their sickness. But the same canon of Neocæsarea also forbad the ordination of any person who had received clinical baptism, and this was the common rule of the early Church, as shewn in the objections offered to Novatian on this account.

Clinics were unfavourably looked upon as Christians, because they were often persons who had put off their baptism until the last, that they might live unrestricted lives, and yet hope for remission of their sins by that sacrament. Constantine is said to have been a clinic.

CŒNA DOMINI. The "last Supper" of our Blessed Lord, at which He celebrated the Passover, and instituted the Holy Eucharist. The fifth day in Holy Week, popularly known as Maundy Thursday, has been ritually known by the name of "Cœna Domini," or "Feria quinta in Cœnâ Domini," from very ancient times, St. Isidore [A.D. 570-636] referring to it in his treatise on Divine Service [de Offic. Eccl. i. 28], and the Council of Meaux [A.D. 845] ordering in its forty-sixth canon, "Nemo sacrum chrisma, nisi in quinta feria majoris septimanæ, id est, in Cœna quæ specialiter appellatur Dominica, conficere præsumat." [Lord's Supper. Maundy Thursday. Lavipedium.]

CŒNA DOMINI. On this day the Pope used for some centuries to fulminate a special excommunication against heretics, which was hence called the Bull "in Cœnâ Domini," the instrument beginning with those words. It is not known who began the formality of this annual excommunication, but Grancolas attributes it to Boniface VIII. or Clement V. about A.D. 1294-1315 [Comm. Hist. in Brev. Rom. ii. 60]; and the Bull, with variations and improvements, has been published by not a few Popes. The most noticeable editions are of Urban V., A.D. 1364, who does not excommunicate heretics, but opposers of the See; of Julius II., A.D. 1511, who excommunicates all heretics, particularly "Gazaros, Patarenos, Pauperes de Lugduno, Arnaldistas, Speronistas, Passagenos, Viclefitas seu Ussitas, Fratricellos de opinione nuncupatos;" of Paul III., A.D. 1536, who states the custom of the annual excommunication to be an ancient one; of Gregory XIII., A.D. 1582, who excommunicates "Hussitas, Uuichlephistas, Luteranos, Zuinlianos, Calvinistas, Ugonottos, Anabaptistas, Trinitarios, et a fide Christiana apostatas;" and lastly of Urban VIII., A.D. 1627, which is the present Bull, "Pastoralis Romani."[1] This excommunicates the heretics last named, all who aid and abet them, and all readers of their books, appellants to a general council, pirates and corsairs and wreckers plundering the goods of Christians, falsifiers of bulls and papal rescripts, those who tax the clergy without the Pope's license, secular judges who summon ecclesiastics to their courts contrary to the canon law, all hinderers of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, all usurpers of ecclesiastical jurisdiction or revenues, all who hinder the execution of apostolical mandates and rescripts. It is ordered that the Bull shall be published yearly, and that all confessors and curates shall have it for use and study.

The clauses which condemn those who protect heretics, and those who tax the clergy, bring most, if not all, of the Roman Catholic princes under the censures of the Church: the clauses condemning those who appeal to a general council implicates that large section of the Church which holds a general council to be superior to the Pope. In short, the Bull brings the Roman See into collision, theoretically, with the authorities of every state; and overthrows the legitimate power of sovereigns. Accordingly, the states of Europe, with few exceptions, have declared against it. France most strongly perhaps, for in 1580, on an attempt by some French prelates to procure the reception and publication of the Bull, the Parliament of Paris ordered those who had received and published it to be suspended, and their temporalities to be confiscated.

In 1773 Clement XIV. suspended the publication of the Bull. But "this Bull, although the formality of its publication is now omitted, is nevertheless implicitly in vigour in all its extension, and is likewise observed in all cases, where there is no impediment to the exertion of the Pope's authority. Therefore it must legally be looked upon as a public declaration to preserve his rights."[2]

CŒNOBITÆ. [Cenobites.]

COLLECT. A short prayer formed on definite principles of construction. The most probable interpretation of the name is that it indicates a prayer offered by the priest alone on behalf of the people; whose suffrages are thus collected into one voice, instead of being said alternately by priest and people as in Versicles and Litanies. [Microlog. iii.; Durand, iii. 13; Bona, Rer. Liturg. ii. 5; Mirror of our Lady, fol. lxxiii.] Collects are a form of prayer peculiar to the Western Church, but there are some points of likeness between them and the Exapostelaria of the Eastern liturgies [Freeman's Princ. Div. Serv. i. 142], the latter being originally a kind of precatory hymn invocating the grace of God, which is characteristic of the Collect. The only two prayers of the Church which are given in the New Testament have the form of Collects [Acts i. 24, iv. 24], and there is a vast number in the ancient Sacramentaries, of which some date back to Apostolic times. The characteristic features of the Collect form of prayer are: [1] an invocation; [2] a reason on which the petition is to be founded; [3] the Petition itself, centrally placed, and always in few words; [4] the benefit hoped for; [5] a memorial of Christ's mediation, or an ascription of praise, or both. [Blunt's Annotated Book of Common Prayer, p. 69. Bright's Ancient Collects.]

COLLYRIDIANS. A sect of heretics, consisting chiefly of women, which sprung up in the end of the fourth century. They seem to have revived some portions of heathen worship, profanely adapting them to the worship of the Blessed Virgin Mary as a goddess: and they also invented a pseudo-Christian female priesthood. Their distinctive name was derived from the collyria, or cakes, which they offered to the Blessed Virgin.

COMES. An ancient Lectionary, or book of Epistles and Gospels, which has gone by the name of St. Jerome at least since the time of Amalarius [A.D. 820] and Micrologus [c. A.D. 1080]. It has been doubted whether it really is the work of St. Jerome, but chiefly because the system of Epistles and Gospels differs from that of the Roman rite. Where it differs from the Roman rite it agrees, however, with the ancient Anglican rite, and as there is no historical association known between the two, it seems as if the system must be one of great antiquity. Mabillon found the Comes mentioned in the Charta Cornutiana, a deed so early as A.D. 471, belonging to a church in France; it is mentioned by Amalarius [iii. 40], and in Micrologus [xxv.] it is spoken of as "Liber Comitis sive Lectionarius, quem Sanctus Hieronymus compaginavit." It will be found under the name of St. Jerome in the Liturgicon Ecclesiæ Latinæ of Pamelius, and also in the eleventh volume of St. Jerome's works. The singular points of agreement between the Comes and the Anglican system are set out at length in Blunt's Annotated Book of Common Prayer, p. 71. [Zaccar. de Latin. libris liturg. disquis.]

COMMENDATIONS. [Prayers for the Dead.]

COMMENDATORY LETTERS. [Literæ Formatæ.]

COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM. This theological term expresses a result of the Hypostatic Union. The Divine and the Human Nature being perfectly united in the Person of our Lord Jesus Christ, the properties of the one nature are to be predicated of the other nature. Thus our Lord speaks of Himself as being in Heaven in His human nature, "the Son of Man which is in Heaven" [John iii. 13], although that nature had not yet ascended there, because it was one with His Divine nature, which could not but be in Heaven. Thus, also, His Divine nature communicated its omnipotence to His human nature, so that the latter participated in the working of miracles, which were the result of Divine power. Thus, again, St. Paul speaks of the Jews as crucifying "the Lord of glory"

[1] "Pastoralis Romani Pontificis vigilantia et sollicitudo," &c.

[2] Cardinal Erskine to Sir J. C. Hippisley, in Report of Comm. of House of Commons on the Laws regarding the regulation of Roman Catholic Subjects. 1816, p. 218.

[1 Cor. ii. 8], and bids the elders of Ephesus to "feed the Church of God, which He hath purchased with His own blood" [Acts xx. 28]. For the same reason, the Blessed Virgin is called the Mother of God, because she bore the Human Nature which is inseparably united with the Divine. [Theandric Operation. Theotokos.]

COMMUNION, HOLY. [Eucharist.]

COMMUNION OF SAINTS. The unity of the Invisible Church. [Church.] This concluding part of the ninth article of the Apostles' Creed does not appear in any form of it earlier than the fifth or sixth century. It is first met with in one of the creeds expounded by Eusebius Gallus, and is not found again until the seventh century, when it occurs in a Gallican sacramentary [Codex Bobiensis], printed in the Museum Italicum of Mabillon. [Heurtley, Harmonia Symb. p. 145.] Whether or not it belonged to more ancient forms, or whether it was inserted after the age of general councils (a very improbable supposition), cannot be determined. By many divines it has been taken as an explanation of the preceding words, "the Holy Catholic Church," but this view involves a tautology which is not at all consistent with the carefully castigated style of the creeds; and the better interpretation is that which makes it mean the mystical union between all holy members of Christ's mystical body, living and departed.

And although this article of the Creed is not found in the earliest forms of it, the doctrine of the article is plainly enough set forth in Holy Scripture, "If we walk in the light, as He is in the light," says St. John, "we have fellowship one with another" [1 John i. 7, κοινωνίαν μετ' ἀλλήλων]; and that this, moreover, is not what we understand by Christian intercourse, but mystical union, is clearly shewn by his preceding use of the word, "and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ" [1 John i. 3]. These words are expressive of the same truth that is set forth in our Lord's parable of the vine and its branches, with a further extension of it in the direction of the words contained in His prayer, "that they all may be one; as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in Us" [John xvii. 21].

But the oldest interpretations of this article which are extant, including that of the homily in which the ipsissima verba of it are first found, referred it chiefly to communion with the saints departed. The obvious reason is, that only those who are at rest in Jesus in the unseen world are entitled to the term "saints" in its full and unlimited sense, for they only are beyond the risk of falling from holiness. For this, also, there is the most literal Scripture warrant, for in the Epistle to the Hebrews the writer developes the whole idea of the communion of saints in language which cannot be mistaken: "Ye are come unto Mount Sion, and unto the City of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in Heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect [καὶ πνεύμασι δικαίων τετελειωμένων], and to Jesus the Mediator of the new Covenant" [Heb. xii. 22-24].

Some divines have considered that there is a direct reference to sacramental unity in the word "communion" as here used; and this opinion is well expressed in the old expository formularies of the Reformation period: "And forasmuch as the most blessed Sacrament of the Altar . . . increaseth and worketh in them that worthily receive it the communion and conjunction in body and soul of them to Christ and Christ to them, with a mutual conjunction also in love and charity of each good man in Christ to other, therefore the said Sacrament may worthily be called the Communion of Saints" [Erud. Christ. Man, A.D. 1543]. On this article of the Creed is also based the idea of a great treasure of grace, holiness, and love, which is a source of spiritual wealth and strength to each individual Christian as member of one vast body, as a living branch of the True Vine, and as partaker of the "fatness of the Olive," in which he remains engrafted. [Body, Mystical.]

COMPETENTES. The catechumens of the primitive Church whose preparation for baptism was completed. They were called also Electi; and, in the Eastern Church, βαπτιζόμενοι and φωτιζόμενοι. The designation of competentes was derived from the fact that their names were given to the bishop as petitioners for the sacrament of baptism; the "quid petis?" of the Latin office for baptism still representing the custom. St. Augustine also says of Curma, the smith of Hippo: "Easter was now approaching, and he gave his name among the other competents" [Aug. De Cura pro Mort. xii]. And in another treatise: "When we were petitioning for the sacrament of that fount, and for this reason were called Competentes" [Aug. de fid. et Oper. vi.]. The names of the candidates were registered in the "diptychs of the living," and were read out in the presence of the congregation.

COMPLINE. [Hours.]

CONCEPTUALISM. The theory that "universals" are conceptions, i.e. thoughts in the mind, as opposed to either of the conflicting views [a] that they were substances in the external world, and [b] that they were merely names.

I. The celebrated controversy about the nature of universals which perplexed the Middle Ages, divided University-towns into opposite camps, and in some instances led to sanguinary conflicts in the streets, may be traced back to a confusion of thought in the mind of Plato.

[a] Three main questions may be said to have been opened by the philosophical critics of the age of Pericles. [1.] What is the basis of the distinction between the passing impression of the moment and knowledge? [2] (a different form of the first) What is the basis of the distinction between what appears to be and what really is? and, [3] What ground is there for the distinction between what I like to do and what I ought to do? The comprehensive answer given to all these problems by the sceptical school was, The impressions of any individual man at any given moment are the only standard by which knowledge, reality, and right can be judged. In other words, there is no knowledge beyond the passing impression; no reality behind the appearance; no rule of conduct except the desire of the moment. This last principle led naturally to the further question, whence, then, are the laws, which so far from being identical with the momentary desires, constantly restrain and contravene them? The sceptical answer to this was consistent: They are restraints imposed upon the people, by agreement of, and in the interest of the rulers, i.e. with a view to secure the maximum of gratification of their own desires. The moral obligation ("I ought") to obey the laws, is thus supplanted by the purely physical obligation to do so ("I must"); as merely the expression of the collective selfishness of the rulers, the laws are entirely external to the individual citizen, who submits to them because, and just so long as, he cannot help doing so.

[b] It was against this last conclusion that the Socratic method was intended to be an antidote. It may be briefly described as an attempt to awaken in men the consciousness that the laws they had been accustomed to obey, as ordinances arbitrarily imposed from without, are merely the register of moral distinctions which they bear in their own breasts, that they rest upon an authority of which they themselves are the authors. This moral consciousness he "brings to the birth," by taking a number of cases, in which some term, such as "just," "beautiful," "good," &c. is applied by common consent (τὰ πολλὰ δίκαια), and by comparing them together, he tried to ascertain what characteristics are common to all the cases, and thus obtain a definite and distinct meaning (ὅρος) of the words "justice," &c. which had been before instinctively and vaguely applied. This "definition" supplies also the "reason why" (λόγος) the name "just" is applied in any given instance; and, lastly, forms a standard or type (εἶδος) to which to refer actions and our judgments of them. In this way Socrates restores, under a slightly altered form, the distinction which the sceptical school had obliterated. There is one general and permanent type of justice, beauty, &c. (τὸ δίκαιον, τὸ καλον, &c.) which we all recognise implicitly whenever we apply the name to given instances (τὰ πολλὰ δίκαια, καλά, &c.); and the distinction between the two depends on the difference between the vague application of a term in common speech, and a clear conception of its meaning, and the reason for applying it.

[c] The problem before Plato was slightly different: viz. how to give an account of the distinction between the passing sensation and knowledge; between the phenomenon and reality. As it appears in the Cratylus, p. 386, D, E, it may be expanded thus: I look at an object, say a chair, and I have a certain picture painted upon the retina of my eye, which I call a sensation. I turn my head, the picture of the chair vanishes, and another takes its place; my head returns to its original position, the sensation of the chair reappears. I leave the room, the sensation vanishes; I return, it reappears, and so on ad infinitum. The result of this process is that I experience a series of recurring sensations resembling one another.

But this series of recurring similar sensations or pictures is not, nor is the fact of their similarity or recurrence, what I mean when I speak of "this chair" as a real object in the world. What I mean is something which is one, definite, and permanent (οὐσίαν ἔχοντά τινα βέβαιον), which is there, when I do not see it as well as when I do, and whether I am conscious of it in any way or not. A contrast thus arises between the recurrent sensations of the chair, as manifold and transitory (τὰ πολλὰ αἰσθητὰ), and the chair itself which I speak and think of (τὸ νοητὸν), as one and permanent; the sensations as affections of me, and the chair itself as external to me in the world; and, again, the sensations as mine alone, (ἑλκόμενα ἄνω καὶ κάτω τῷ ἡμετέρῳ φαντάσματι), and the chair itself (καθ' αὑτὰ . ἥπερ πέφυκε) as a common object to all.

The difficulties arising out of this contrast, and of the distinction and correlation of its terms, were evaded by the sceptical school by the simple process of denying the latter term (the one permanent reality), as they had denied the latter term of the ethical contrast between the passing desires and the moral law. This view led to a corollary affirming the conventional character of language and general names [Cratyl. 383 A], which imply the existence of real outward things, analogous to the corollary affirming the conventional character of laws and institutions, which imply the reality of moral distinctions. In answer to this, Plato might have proceeded in the steps of Socrates, by an induction of general names, to shew that, upon this hypothesis, it is impossible to account for the existence of names in language. That, irrespectively of the correctness and incorrectness of their application, names are always the names, not of sensations but of things. And that naming implies that the thing so indicated is a permanent reality, external to consciousness, and a common object to all men, having a definite character (ὅρος), being the standard or type (εἶδος) by which our sensations are to be judged, and supplying therefore the reason (λόγος) why upon their recurrence we fix them in a name. The reality (τὸ ὄν) thus established, as the object, not of sensation, but of thought (νοητὸν), would have at once refuted the contemporary sceptic, have gone far to settle a question which has come down unsolved nearly to our own day, and have spared the world the fruitless controversy about the nature of "universals." The appeal to language, as a proof of the reality of an external world and of the possibility of knowledge, lay to Plato's hand, but he plays with it throughout the Cratylus, and finally rejects it.

The application of the Socratic method to the different spheres of ethics and the physical world thus leads to two different results. In the former it established the reality and permanence of one law or principle of justice, goodness, &c., τὸ δικαιον, τὸ καλὸν, &c., as implied in all applications of the name "just," &c.; whilst in the latter it would establish the reality and permanence of a single external object, as implied in the naming of each series of similar recurrent sensations: the reality, e.g., of each of the chairs in my room, of each of which I have a series of continually recurring sensations, similar to one another, but not necessarily similar to those of another series. In short, it would have proved the existence of a world of corpora individua, external to consciousness, each of which is at once real and an object of thought or idea. The perception of this difference between the results of the same method in different spheres of inquiry seems to have led Plato to seek a higher unity in the physical world, which should match the "one justice," &c., in the ethical. In other words, all the chairs in the world, each of which is one, permanent, real, &c., as contrasted with my recurring sensations of it, form together a series themselves. Is it not possible to find some single and permanent reality, which shall bear the same relation to the manifold chairs in the world, as each of the chairs bore to the manifold recurring sensations corresponding to it? This higher unity seemed to be presented by the artifice of classification, and the existence of class names [Phaedrus, 265 D], whereby all the chairs in the world are summed up under the one idea and name of chair, all the trees under the one idea of tree, &c., obtained by the comparison of different objects having a general resemblance, by neglecting the points in which they differ, and forming a mental type composed of the attributes in which they agree. The ideas so attained were the result of the same interrogation of ordinary language which Plato rejected in the Cratylus. But they served to stand in the same relation to the series of chairs, trees, &c., as each chair or tree, &c., stood in to the series of sensations corresponding to each. The general type of chair or tree, too, represented by the series seemed to be permanent, whilst the individuals themselves of the series came into being and afterwards ceased to be; to be an object common to all, while the particular chairs in my room and trees in my garden are only objects to me and a few persons besides. The natural inference then was, that the idea in this sense, possessing the other characteristics of the idea in the former sense, was also, like that, a reality in the world; that, as the individual chair is a reality external to consciousness, as contrasted with the manifold sensations of it, so the abstract generality "chair" was in a proportionately higher sense a reality external to consciousness, as contrasted with the manifold individual chairs which it represented.

Conceptualism

Again, it is to be observed that these ideas themselves, "chair," "tree," "table," &c., form a series, the differences between which also admit of being abstracted, leaving a residuum of attributes similar to one another, the complex of which forms an idea (e.g. "wooden substance"), standing to the series in the same relation as "chair," "tree," &c., stand to the individual chairs and trees, and as each of them stand to the recurring sensations of it. It is a higher unity, it is more an object to all—for those who have neither seen a chair nor a tree may have seen something made of wood, and may have the idea of "wooden substance" when they have not that of "tree" or "chair;"—it is more permanent. Therefore, as before, it is more real than the subordinate ideas, as they are than individuals, and as these are than the sensations. This process (συναγωγὴ, ὁδος ἄνω, σύνοψις, as it was called by Plato, ἐπαγωγὴ by Aristotle) may be continued through successive series of ideas, each at once more abstract and more real than the preceding, until a limit is reached in the idea of mere Being at once the most abstract, the absolutely real, and absolutely known.

This, so far as it is possible to gather it from scattered hints in the Platonic writings, seems to have been the process by which the celebrated Theory of Ideas was generated in Plato's mind, a process which it is necessary to trace to its original source, before being able to understand how the controversy about Universals, which vexed the world for more than a thousand years, could have arisen. The idea, according to Plato, is at once a name, an idea in the mind, and—which is with him the prominent aspect—a reality outside the mind, as much more real than the things we see and handle, as these are than the manifold similar sensations which we have of each. And the reality of the ideas increases as they become more abstract and general. Two consequences follow from this view: [1.] That, as compared with the intense reality of the highest ideas, and especially of the highest of all, which, as Plato says, "is more than reality," the reality of the things we see and handle is so meagre, as scarcely to be a reality at all. Thus the world of form and colour, in which we live, becomes to Plato a brilliant phantasmagoria, "midway between what is and what is not real;" and the doctrine of the dualism or irreconcilable opposition of the worlds of thought and reality on the one hand, and of sight and sense on the other, is a natural consequence. The farther we recede from the latter the nearer we get to the former. [Dualism.]

[2.] Conversely it follows from this view that the supreme idea being absolutely real, and at the same time absolutely abstract, and the successive stages of the subordinate ideas being more or less real in proportion to their abstractness and their proximity to the highest, the scale of being may be described as a gradual degeneration in reality from the highest idea, down through the lowest species, to the individual things amidst which we live. [Emanation.]

II. The introduction of this vast creation of the philosophical imagination (ἡ τῶν εἰδῶν εἰσαγωγὴ) between the mind and the problem of outward reality, as originally stated, has left its mark upon the logical writings of Aristotle, where the process of abstraction from the concrete up to "Pure Being" is represented by "induction," the descent from Pure Being to the concrete individual by

"syllogism." In his more thoughtful writings, the Metaphysics and the De Animâ, only isolated traces of the theory are to be found; and the concrete individual thing, of which we have a series of recurrent similar sensations, remains at once the only reality, and the true idea or object of knowledge. But the logical writings of Aristotle, which alone were known to the early middle ages, served to pass on the Platonic ideal theory, or some modification of it, to the scholastic metaphysicians, amongst whom the different aspects of the "idea" become the all-absorbing questions of the day.

[a] The word "universalia," as a translation of the Aristotelian τὰ καθ' ὅλου, was first used by Boethius (end of fifth century), and expressed the extension of the idea to all the particular things summed under it. And it was the following translation by Boethius of a passage in Porphyry's Introduction to the Aristotelian Categories which may be said to form the thesis of the subsequent controversy about universals: "Mox de generibus et specibus illud quidem, sive subsistant, sive in solis nudis intellectualibus posita sint, sive subsistentia corporalia sint an incorporalia, et utrum separata a sensilibus an in sensilibus posita et circa hæc consistentia, dicere recusabo. Altissimum enim negotium est hujusmodi et majoris egens inquisitionis."

The different interpretations here indicated existed within the Carlovingian schools of the ninth and tenth centuries, but without exciting general notice, and without the importance of their consequences being appreciated. The opinion of Boethius himself on the point is thus expressed: "Cogitantur verò universalia nihilque aliud species esse putanda est nisi cogitatio collecta ex individuorum dissimilium numero, substantiali similitudine; genus verò cogitatio collecta ex specierum similitudine" [Opp. p. 56]. This view of the nature of universals is strictly what was called in the eleventh and twelfth centuries "Conceptualism:" but before the controversy began to rage, the view of Boethius was regarded as indistinguishable from Nominalism. Thus Rabanus Maurus (ninth century) recognises only two alternatives in the passage in Porphyry, (tractando de rebus vel vocibus,) and by transcribing the anti-realistic opinion of Boethius as best expressing his own view, practically ignores any distinction between the view of universals as notions, and the view of them as words [see Cousin, Ouvrages inédits d'Abélard, 4to, Paris, 1836. Introduction, p. lxxvi.-ix.]. The conceptualist view is also expressed without any distinction of it from Nominalism in the anonymous glosses discovered by M. Cousin in the margin of the St. Germain MS. of Porphyry's Isagoge, &c., and belonging to the tenth century. "Genus est cogitatio collecta ex singularium similitudine specierum" [l. c. lxxxv.].

[b] The two diverging theories thus latent in traditional Peripateticism were developed into a temporary opposition, by the extreme expression given to Nominalism by Roscellin in the eleventh century. With him universals are flatus vocis, i.e. mere words: by which, however, a strong antithesis is intended, not to Conceptualism, but to Realism [Cousin. l. c. clxxx.]. The denial of any reality save that of the individual, and the thoroughgoing Tritheism to which it led in its application to Christian dogma, stimulated the realistic aspect of universals into a new life in the person of St. Anselm; whilst the condemnation of Roscellin at the Council of Soissons [A.D. 1092] contributed, along with St. Anselm's De fide Trinitatis and de Incarnatione Verbi, to throw the weight of Catholic authority into the scale of Realism. The doctrine was wrought into a scientific shape by William of Champeaux, and the genus or universal declared by him to be "rem eandem essentialiter totam simul" in all the individuals classed under it. Thus, e.g., "humanity" (the instance on which the battle was mainly fought) is a real thing, constituting the "essence" of every individual man, the same and entire in each. [Nominalism. Realism.]

It was as an intermediate view between these two extremes that the old Conceptualism of Boethius and Rabanus Maurus was formulated anew by Abélard [A.D. 1079-1142], the disciple first of Roscellin and afterwards of William. His objection to Realism is summed up in the following paradox: If humanity is the entire substance at once of Plato and Socrates, when Socrates is at Athens and Plato at Rome, the entire substance of both is in two places at once. On the other hand the universal is not a nonentity, but a mental or logical reality, indicated by a name. While excluding Realism, Abélard thus does not exclude Nominalism, but only the purely verbal and grammatical view of Nominalism, which appeared, perhaps, rather in the expression than in the thought of Roscellin. On the contrary he holds the fundamental tenet of Nominalism, that nothing is real but the individual, and in the individual nothing but what is individual. [For the passages of Abélard against Nominalism and Realism, see Cousin, l. c. clvii.-clxviii.] His Conceptualism, like all Conceptualism, is only "un nominalism qui s'ignore ou qui se cache." On the other hand, no rational Nominalist would deny that the generality of a name is representative of the generality of the idea which it expresses. The ultimate identity of the two views is confirmed by the history of the school of Locke and the Scottish school. Both Hobbes and Locke begin with Nominalism and rise to Conceptualism: while Condillac and De Tracy fall back again into Nominalism. So Reid rejects Realism and Nominalism, and adopts Conceptualism: his follower, Dugald Stewart, falls back into Nominalism.

The application of his theory to the doctrine of the Trinity landed Abélard in the same dilemma which Roscellin fell into. If there is no unity but that of the individual, there are either three gods or but one person: in the first case the Unity in Trinity, in the second, the Trinity in Unity, is a chimera. As Roscellin had chosen the former, so Abélard selected the latter alternative—a peculiar kind of Sabellianism.

"Absit," says St. Bernard, "ut huic acquiescamus dicenti hoc esse Filium ad Patrem, quod speciem ad genus, quod hominem ad animal, quod æreum sigillum ad æs, quod aliquam potentiam ad potentiam" [Opp. tom. xi. p. 647]. And again, "Sicut eadem oratio est propositio, assumptio et conclusio, ita eadem essentia Patris, et Filii, et Spiritûs Sancti" [St. Bernard, Opp. tom. i. p. 185, Ep. ad Guidonem de Castello]. This doctrine was condemned at a second Council at Soissons [A.D. 1121], and again twenty years later at Sens.

But the success of Abélard as a teacher and controversialist in Paris [A.D. 1108-40] had been prodigious; indeed it was mainly owing to the conflict of the doctrine of Conceptualism with its two rivals, that the multiplication of schools and the growth of an university at Paris is due [Cousin, l. c. ec.].

Among the followers of Abélard may be mentioned Peter Lombard, John of Salisbury, and Albertus Magnus; the last of whom, however, gave a death-blow to the controversy by shewing that universals are at once "ante res" in the Divine mind, "in rebus" as their common nature, and "post res," as abstractions from things, in the human intellect; and thus shewing Realism, Nominalism, and Conceptualism to be different aspects of the same truth.

The connection of Conceptualism with political history may be found in the efforts made by the English clergy to induce William the Conqueror to take up the Church's cause against it; in the presence of Louis VII. at the Council of Soissons; in the adherence to it of Arnold of Brescia, who was a pupil of Abélard; and more generally in the rise of a spirit of independence which accompanied the decline of Realism, and which gave occasion to the Councils of Constance and Basle, at which the great Nominalists, Pierre d'Ailly and Gerson, were present. More widely still its influence may be traced on the rise of Gallicanism and the Protestant Reformation.

Through Descartes [Principes, §§ 58-9] Conceptualism passes on into modern philosophy. [For an able defence of it, see Mansel's Prolegomena Logica, passim.]

CONCOMITANCE. A word used to express the doctrine, that when Christ's Body is present in the Holy Eucharist, there is also His Blood, and that when His Blood is present there is also His Body. The Godhead and Manhood of our Lord after His Resurrection and Ascension being inseparable, it will follow that when either His Body or His Blood are present, there is Christ Himself both God and Man.

The doctrine of concomitance has been supposed to be taught or implied in St. Paul's words:—"Whosoever shall eat this Bread, or drink this Cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the Body and Blood of the Lord" [1 Cor. x. 16], which seems to mean that Christ may be received unworthily under the species of Bread or Wine, and so to imply the validity of communion in one kind, which is founded on the belief of concomitance, and is its practical realization. Admitting, however, that the reading or (ἤ) in this passage is unquestionably genuine, and that we cannot with some commentators, render the word "and," as if of synonymous meaning—still it by no means follows that St. Paul intended to teach, or virtually recognised the doctrine of concomitance, as reasons may be given for his language totally unconnected with this doctrine.[1] It cannot be proved that communion in one kind which is founded on and implies concomitance was known to the writers of the New Testament or during the Apostolic age. The statements often quoted from the "Acts" of the Apostles meeting "to break bread," or "breaking bread from house to house," afford no proof whatever of communion under one kind. For the Apostles met together with the disciples to "break The Bread:" but in celebrating the Eucharist, bread and wine must have been consecrated together, as all theologians admit; and even had the Sacrament been given to the faithful under the form of bread only, still bread and wine are necessary for consecration, and must both be consumed by the priest who celebrates. So that if meeting to "break bread" were to be taken according to the mere letter, it would prove that bread only was used in celebration, or in other words, that the Apostles themselves did not validly celebrate or consecrate the Holy Eucharist. To "break bread" is a phrase commonly used by scriptural and ecclesiastical writers for celebrating the Eucharist, but it never for a moment implies the non-reception of the Sacramental Blood. We find the phrase, e.g., in the Apostolic Fathers, St. Ignatius sometimes speaking as if the faithful received under one kind only, though it is universally acknowledged that in the early ages the Sacrament was always publicly received under both kinds. Thus he says in his Epistle to the Ephesians, sec. 20, "breaking one bread which is the medicine of immortality;" also, to the Smyrnæans, sec. 7, that the Docetæ "abstain from the Eucharist and prayer (or Oblation), because they confess not that the Eucharist is the Flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ,"—making no allusion to the Cup or Sacramental Blood. In other epistles, St. Ignatius expressly mentions both, "I wish for God's Bread which is the Flesh of Jesus Christ, and the drink I long for is His Blood."[2] From these passages it is clear that

[1] Dr. Wordsworth says in reference to this passage, "A, and some few Cursives and Fathers have καὶ; but ἤ is doubtless the true reading; for it is necessary to receive both elements with devotion and reverence. Further, ἤ (or) has a peculiar significance here, because, as the context shews, St. Paul is censuring the Corinthians for two several sins, opposed respectively to the two elements of the Lord's Supper. The first sin is that of eating meats offered to idols, and of gluttony generally and particularly at the meals before the Communion [ver. 21], a sin specially opposed to communion in the Eucharistic Bread [see 1 Cor. x. 21]: the second sin, that of drinking the cup of Devils or false deities [1 Cor. x. 21], and of intemperance in the meals before the Communion [ver. 21], a sin specially opposed to participation in the Eucharistic Cup. He therefore says, "whosoever by eating idolatrous meats and gluttony eats this Bread unworthily, or by idolatrous drink and intemperance drinks this Cup unworthily, is guilty of the Body and Blood of the Lord." Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles.

[2] Ad Romanos, sec. 7. See also Ad Philadelph. sec. 4.

the phrase of "breaking bread" was not intended to imply communion in one kind, but was a well-known expression for receiving the Eucharist, as administered under both kinds.

After the Apostolic age, we find what may be called a recognition of the doctrine of concomitance: or rather we find instances in which the Eucharist was received under one species or element only. Thus we know from Tertullian[1] and St. Cyprian[2] that the faithful took the sacrament home in the form of bread only, and communicated themselves, an usage which prevailed after persecution had ceased. Thus St. Basil says,[3] "the monks in deserts where there is no priest, keep the sacrament at home, and communicate themselves; and also, that Christians generally follow the same usage in Alexandria and Egypt. St. Cyprian mentions the instance of a child receiving the sacrament under the species of wine, after partaking of meat offered to idols.[4] And Eusebius tells us of Serapion, a deacon, who, when dying, communicated under the species of bread only.[5] According, also, to the usage of the Eastern Church, a few drops of the sacramental Blood only are given to an infant after baptism.

Admitting, then, the doctrine of concomitance,[6] and that, in certain cases, it was recognised by the practice of the Early Church, yet such recognition was rare and exceptional, the ordinary law being that the faithful received the Eucharist under both kinds separately administered,[7] and this being the ordinary rule of the Church during 1200 years.[8] The present usage of the Church of Rome, to withhold the cup from the laity, being merely a matter of discipline, it is to be regretted that the general wish for its restoration, expressed before and since the Council of Trent, has not been complied with, as a step would thus have been taken towards the union of Christendom, which is not only in itself, as all must allow, desirable, but is in accordance with the command and dying prayer of our Lord.

CONCORDAT. I. A solemn act of composition, accommodation, agreement, and accord transacted between a Pope and a temporal sovereign. Such were those of Bologna [A.D. 1516]; between Leo X. and Francis I., abolishing the right of the election of bishops by cathedral chapters; of Paris [A.D. 1801]; between Pius VII. and Bonaparte; and [A.D. 1817] between the same pontiff and Louis XVIII. with regard to the reconstruction of dioceses. By these formal agreements between the See of Rome and any foreign government, the ecclesiastical discipline of the clergy, and the management of the Church and its benefices within the territory of the state are regulated; in order to define the rights of the Pope and the country, and adjust the line between the ecclesiastical and secular power. They embrace the immunities of the clergy from taxation and the jurisdiction of the temporal courts, the right of sanctuary and the papal claim to benefices, provisions, first-fruits, tenths, and revenues. In France, the state received [A.D. 1801] the right of nomination to vacant sees, the clergy were subjected to the civil power, all immunities were abolished, and the control or approbation of the secular authority was required in numerous cases. In Austria and Germany, as between Frederick III. and Nicolas V. [A.D. 1447] touching annates, and the Emperor and Gregory XIII. [A.D. 1576], similar arrangements have been made; Benedict XIV. [A.D. 1741] and Clement XIV. made a concordat with the king of Sardinia; another Pope with Charles, king of Naples; and [A.D. 1818] with another of its kings, concluded certain agreements tending to the repression of the ancient privileges of the national churches and limiting the episcopal jurisdiction. Since the commencement of the eighteenth century, governments have made themselves more independent, and compelled the See of Rome to adopt a conciliatory and more enlightened policy than prevailed in earlier times. [PRAGMATIC SANCTION.]

II. Inter Beneficiatos, a transaction whereby one of two presentees to a benefice cedes institution to the other, on condition of a fixed stipend out of the income.

CONDIGNITY. There is no peculiar force in "condignum," as compared with the simple form "dignum." The compound term is as the simple. Thus, in Rom. viii. ἄξια παθήματα is rendered in the Vulgate as "condignæ passiones;" and the [1] De Orat. sec. 14. Ad Uxorem, lib. ii. c. 5.

[2] De Lapsis.
[3] Epist. 93. Ad Cæsariam Patriciam.
[4] De Lapsis. [5] Eccl. Hist. lib. vi. c. 44.
[6] The present usage of the Eastern Church to give in a spoon the Eucharistic Bread and Wine sopped together is contrary to primitive custom, the elements being always given separately to signify the breaking or wounding of Christ's Body on the cross, and the effusion of His precious Blood. This is clear from the Clementine and other liturgies, and from the account of Eucharistic celebration given by Cyril of Jerusalem [Lect. xxiii. sec. 22], where the deacon follows the bishop or priest who celebrates, and who administers the Lord's Body, with the Sacramental Cup, of which each communicant partakes. Intinction, as the ordinary mode of public Communion, is as great an innovation upon primitive usages as communion in one kind. [INTINCTION.]
[7] The Eastern Church, whilst protesting against communion in one kind as the ordinary rule of the Church, recognises the truth of the doctrine of concomitance, as by infant communion in one kind, to which we have just referred, so also in the Mass of the Pre-sanctified (λειτουργία τῶν προηγιασμένων), when throughout Lent (except on Saturdays and Sundays, on which being considered festivals consecration is permitted), the priest receives the sacrament reserved from the previous consecration on Sunday, in the form of Bread only. Hence, the word pre-sanctified or consecrated. Leo Allat, de utriusque Ecclesiæ consensione, appendix [1655].
[8] Cardinal Bona says, "Certum quippe est omnes passim clericos et laicos, viros et mulieres sub utraque specie sacra Mysteria antiquitus sumpsisse, cum solemni eorum celebrationi aderant, et offerebant ac de oblatis participabant. Extra sacrificium vero, et extra Ecclesiam semper et ubique communio sub una specie in usu fuit. Primæ parti assertionis consentiunt omnes tam catholici quam sectarii, nec eam negare potest qui vel levissima rerum ecclesiasticarum notitia imbutus sit. Semper enim et ubique ab Ecclesiæ primordiis ad sæculum XII. sub specie panis et vini communicarunt fideles, cœpitque paulatim ejus sæculi initio usus Calicis obsolescere, plerisque episcopis eum populo interdicentibus ob periculum irreverentiæ, et effusionis, quod inevitabile erat aucta fidelium multitudine, in qua deesse non poterant minus cauti et attenti ac parum religiosi." Rerum Liturg. II. xviii. 1.

earlier and later classical[1] authors give to it no other meaning. As a term of scholastic theology, Meritum de condigno is the sequel of Meritum de congruo [which see]; but like this latter term, meritum de condigno has no place in the nomenclature of Latin theology before the time of Thomas Aquinas. According to the scholastic theory, meritum de congruo having worked its way to the gift of grace, vouchsafed not for its own merit but by God's free goodness, the recipient obtained justification by the infusion of grace, which is love; from which point he is able to perform works by aid of the Spirit that are pleasing and acceptable to God, and to obtain still increasing measures of grace by merit of condignity. The award of the antecedent merit of congruity is justification through the gift of grace; the issue of the consequent merit of condignity is life everlasting. Between the two, therefore, as the turning-point between night and day, lies justification. The Scotists taught that the sure promises of God, and not any merit of human work, lay at the foundation of all increase of grace "de condigno;" it was "ratione pacti," not "ratione operis." As in the parable of the talents, "to him that hath is given," and one grace is rewarded by another, and that by further increase, until the ten full talents are attained, and the faithful servant is made "ruler over ten cities" [Luke xix. 17]; so is it with the grace of condignity, "those that use the grace of God find it increasing in them,"[2] not for their own inherent merit, but because it is of the nature of every good gift of God to fructify as "the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself."

The untrue principle of meritum de congruo, as attributing too much to man's unaided will, is shewn under the article CONGRUITY; but as a symbol of doctrine, meritum de condigno differs from the teaching of our Church in sound rather than in substance. Its parallelism with a faulty term has brought discredit upon it, that is not altogether so well deserved. The Schoolmen, with the view of reducing the doctrines of grace to one harmonious system, have invented terms which are neither scriptural nor catholic, and this is one of them. But it expresses a scriptural idea; for there is no truth clearer on the page of Scripture than that faithful work is said to have its reward; on earth, in the approval of conscience, and hereafter in the glories of the eternal kingdom. Thus "things wrought" in a spirit of faith "bring a full reward" [2 John 8]. The persecuted for righteousness' sake shall have their reward hereafter before men and angels [Matt. vi. 6; 1 Cor. iii. 14]. Charity has its reward, even as the peacemakers shall be called both here and hereafter the children of God [Matt. v. 9, vi. 1, x. 42; Luke vi. 35]. The high privilege of serving God at the altar is no ordinary reward of the ministry [1 Cor. ix. 17]. Moreover, one state of reward leads on to another in the manifold operations of God's gifts of grace. St. John begins his Gospel with the declaration, that "of His fulness have we all received, and grace for grace;" the graces of the present are superadded to the graces of the past. Our Lord repeatedly declared that "to him that hath shall be given" [Matt. xiii. 12, xxv. 29; Luke xix. 26], and that there might be no doubt of the meaning of "habenti dabitur," St. Mark shews [Mark iv. 25] that it is by growth and development, even as the grain of corn unfolds its principle of growth, "first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." St. Paul speaks of the glory of the Lord as being communicable to man through the Spirit, and declares that "we are changed into the same image from glory to glory" [2 Cor. iii. 18]. And St. Peter [2 Pet. i. 5] gives the practical interpretation of such terms when he bids us give all diligence that we add to "faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge patience, and to patience temperance, and to temperance godliness, and to godliness brotherly-kindness, and to brotherly-kindness" the bond of every good grace, "charity."

And in heaven, we are assured, there are many mansions, where the reward will be enjoyed that for the present is the object of hope. There may be gradations, even "as one star differeth from another star in glory," but there can be no misgiving; a knowledge of the perfect equity of the adjudication will hold each blessed spirit in the bonds of harmony and love. "My reward is with Me" [Rev. xxii. 12] is the assurance of Him who is A and Ω; a reward for every faithful servant, whether prophet or saint, or those "that fear His name, both small and great" [Rev. xi. 18]. It is "the reward of the inheritance," [Rom. ii. 6, 7, 10], "the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give at that day to all who love His appearing" [2 Tim. iv. 8].

This steadily augmented condition of blessing, involving growth of grace here, and culminating in eternal glory hereafter, was expressed by the scholastic grace or "merit of condignity"; merit being used in the sense of "earning,"[3] as in the parable the one talent earned ten; rather than in the moral sense of "deserving." It is not for the worthiness of the recipient, but because there is mercy in God that giveth that His gifts thus fructify, and from first to last to God alone is the glory due, through the merits of the Redeemer. With later theologians, indeed, the word "merit" was made to involve the idea of "worth," and a very different application of the scholastic theory is then observable. Yet even so its original meaning could not be wholly forgotten, and more especially when every thought of human pride was humbled in the fear of death. "Even you yourselves," says Archbishop Laud,[4] "in the point of condignity of merit, though you

[1] A. Gellius, III. vii. 1. [2] Bishop Browne on Art. xiii.

[3] As the dialectics of the schools descended from the Greek philosophy of preceding ages, so many of its terms may be interpreted better through the Greek than through the Latin language; ἀξία, an equivalent price, seems to have suggested the term "meritum." Compare also the mercantile signification of "mereor" in Facciolati.

[4] Conference with Fisher the Jesuit, sect. 35, num. 1.

write it, and preach it boisterously to the people, yet you are content to die renouncing the condignity of all your own merits, and trust to Christ's."[1]

The position and bearing of works done after the grace of Christ, form the subject of the article on WORKS, where the authoritative statements of the Church of England are considered. To that article the reader is referred.

CONFESSION OF FAITH. A term originally used only for the Creeds, but extended in the sixteenth century to elaborate collections of "articles" containing long and minute expositions of the distinctive doctrine professed by the Lutherans, Presbyterians, and Calvinists. [AUGSBURG CONFESSION. CALVINISTIC CONFESSIONS.]

CONFESSION OF SINS. It is the natural instinct of penitence to make a confession of guilt, so that as soon as a person is convinced of sin, and is truly sorry for it as sin [CONTRITION], and not merely as to its consequences [ATTRITION], the acknowledgment of it follows as the next step on the path of an effective repentance. Such acknowledgment must, of course, be made to God, whether or not it is also made to any human person against whom the sin may have been committed; for repentance looks to pardon, and pardon is received from God.

The object of Confession being, however, not only the acknowledgment of sin, but submission to penitential discipline, and the reception of an authorized sentence of reconciliation [ABSOLUTION], it has been the habit of the Christian Church for penitents to make confession to God in the audience, and under the guidance, of the Christian ministry. This Christian custom may indeed be traced back to the earliest ages of mankind.

The pardon of sin was associated from the first with acts of sacrifice, and (except in the most primitive age of mankind) acts of sacrifice presuppose the intervention of a ministerial officer. A "sin-offering" was always, therefore, an act of confession, and if offered for a particular sin was a confession of that sin, whether or not it was accompanied by a verbal acknowledgment of it.

1. Jewish confession. But verbal acknowledgments of sin were the common practice, at least under the Mosaic dispensation. For, as Hooker shews [Eccl. Polit. VI. iv. 4], the Jews held that no repentance could be complete without confession, and three kinds were specified by their doctors. The first of these was the general confession made by each Jew for himself, and by the high priest on behalf of all, on the great day of Atonement. The second was that voluntary confession which was made "at all times and seasons, when men, bethinking themselves of their wicked conversation past, were resolved to change their course, the beginning of which alteration was still confession of sins." The third kind was the special confession of the particular sins for which God's pardon was to be sought. The words of the Law respecting this are—"When a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the Lord, and that person be guilty, then they shall confess their sin that they have done" [Numb. v. 6]. "And it shall be, when he shall be guilty in one of these things, that he shall confess that he hath sinned in that thing" [Lev. v. 5]. "For such kind of special sins they had also special sacrifices, wherein the manner was, that the offender should lay his hands on the sacrifice which he brought, and should there make confession to God, saying, 'Now, O Lord, that I have offended, committed sin, and done wickedly in Thy sight, this or this being my fault, behold I repent me, and am utterly ashamed of my doings; my purpose is never to return more to the same crime.'" And Hooker adds that no criminal was ever condemned to death, or severe punishment, but he was called upon to repent and confess his sins; as Joshua exhorted Achan; "My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto Him, and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me" [Josh. vii. 19]. The ministry of St. John the Baptist appears to have included a revival of this ancient habit of Jewish religion, for it is specially mentioned in connection with it that the people who came to him "were all baptized of him in the river of Jordan, confessing their sins" [Mark i. 5].

2. Our Lord's commission to the Apostles. When Christ solemnly transmitted to the Apostles His own mission, saying "As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you," He accompanied the act of Ordination with the words, "Whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosesoever sins ye retain they are retained" [John xx. 23]. Such words necessarily presuppose confession of sins to, or in the hearing of (which is the same thing) those who were to remit or retain them; for there could be no personal application of this power, unless with a personal knowledge that confession had been made; and the power of remitting or retaining sins shews that an act of judicial discrimination was to be made by the person so remitting or retaining. In accordance with this view of the commission, we find penitents coming to the Apostles in numbers for the purpose of confession; "Many that believed came, and confessed, and shewed their deeds" [Acts xix. 18], and St. Peter's conduct towards Simon Magus is a conspicuous instance of an Apostle "retaining" the sins of one not judged to be truly penitent for them [Acts viii. 18-24].

3. Confession in the Sub-Apostolic Church. The Ἐξομολόγησις, full confession, or open confession of sins of the early Church, was partly a public act [see Cyp. Ep. xvii. al. xi.], and is thus described by Hooker: "First, the offender's intimation of those crimes to some one presbyter,

[1] Even Bellarmine lays down for proof the proposition "Propter incertitudinem propriæ justitiæ, et periculum inanis gloriæ tutissimum est fiduciam totam in sola Dei misericordia et benignitate reponere" [De Justif. V. vii. prop. 3]. If only the Church of Rome had allowed as a matter of true principle that which is here conceded on the score of expediency!

Confession of Sins

for which imposition of penance was sought: secondly, the undertaking of penance imposed by the bishop; thirdly, after the same performed and ended, open confession to God in the hearing of the whole Church; whereupon ensued the prayers of the Church, then the bishop's imposition of hands; and so the party's reconciliation or restitution to his former right in the Holy Sacrament" [Eccl. Polit. VI. iv. 13]. It will be here observed that private confession "to some one presbyter" was the first step in this course of discipline, and probably this was the act of confession quâ confession, the subsequent public Ἐξομολόγησις being certainly looked upon as a part, and the crowning part of the penance. The private confession did not, however, entitle a penitent to absolution, and to obtain this he had to accept, (with a shrinking heart, doubtless, in the majority of cases,) the terrible ordeal of the Ἐξομολόγησις. Nor indeed, was it customary for absolution to be given to heinous sinners by any except the bishop himself [Cyp. Ep. xvii. al. xi.; Aug. Serm. ccli.]. This system of public confession was gradually discontinued soon after the cessation of persecution. When peace came to the Church the inconvenience of requiring every penitent to make his sins as public as if they were printed in a modern newspaper was found to be very great, and in fact a living scandal in the Church. "Whereupon," says Hooker, "forasmuch as public confessions became dangerous, and prejudicial to the safety of well-minded men, and in divers respects advantageous to the enemies of God's Church, it seemed first unto some, and afterwards generally requisite, that voluntary penitents should surcease from open confession" [Eccl. Polit. VI. iv. 3]. In A.D. 441, St. Leo absolutely forbad the practice [Ep. cxxxvi.] declaring that the sins which were made the subject of such publication were often not fit to be spoken of in so open a manner, and that the private confession was sufficient. Open penance was indeed retained in use for notorious sinners, and of course included some form of open confession; but it was no longer superadded to private confession as an essential part of penitential discipline.[1]

4. The Mediæval System of Confession. During the early centuries of Christianity the discipline of the Church was so strict that confession was compulsory on those whose sins had caused them to be put out of communion, if they wished to be restored. But there was no such compulsion upon others; nor is it even provable that it was used as a common practice by the "fideles," or communicants. It is true that, after the general discontinuance of public penance, the system of private confession, as a step to the private discipline and penance which still preceded absolution, became more definitely organized. But it was long before divines came to assert that confession was absolutely necessary for every one who would be in a state of grace. This principle, however, gained ground in the Church; and at length, in A.D. 1215, Pope Innocent III. promulgated the famous 21st Canon, "Omnis utriusque sexûs," of the fourth Council of Lateran, which enjoins all the faithful who have arrived at years of discretion to confess their sins once a year at least to their own parish priest. In after days local synods (e.g. Lambeth, A.D. 1378) reimposed this canon in a still stricter form, and enforced its observance under severe penalties: and for some time before the Reformation period it had been very generally taught that confession was part of a sacrament which is necessary to salvation.

5. The principles of the modern Church of England respecting Confession. Although the canons of the mediæval Church of England respecting confession were not actually repealed, their compulsory force may be said to have lapsed during the Reformation period; and (without any word indeed depreciating the value of confession) the Church of England habitually reverted to the earlier system of voluntary confession. The authoritative Anglican statements and injunctions respecting it will be found in the third of the Ten Articles of A.D. 1536; in The Institution of a Christian Man, and its revised form The Erudition for any Christian Man; in the "Exhortation to Communion," and the "Office for Visitation of the Sick," contained in the various editions of the Book of Common Prayer from A.D. 1549 to A.D. 1662, and in the 113th of the Canons of A.D. 1603.[2] From these documents it will be found that the ancient system of "auricular," or private, confession is still permitted, and in some cases encouraged; and that, beyond the disuse of any words which would imply its absolute necessity to salvation, there is nothing that breaks into the ancient traditions of the Church upon the subject. The opinions of all those divines who have best expressed the theology of the Church of England as distinguished from that of the Dissenters have also invariably run in the same direction from the time of Hooker to that of Keble.

6. The spiritual value of Confession. The primary theological aspect of confession is as a preparation of the soul necessary to the reception of God's pardon through the ministration of absolution. A full and true confession is the outward manifestation of contrition and repentance; and in the covenant of God's mercy and grace the person making it is entitled to the outward manifestation of God's forgiveness: "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" [1 John i. 9]. But there are also secondary aspects from which confession may be justly viewed as an important auxiliary to repentance and sanctification.

a] The large majority of persons have but a very imperfect knowledge, beyond the lines of those greater sins which society calls crimes, as to what is and what is not very sinful. The sensitiveness of the Christianized conscience is deadened by contact with an artificial state of social life and of business; and there are multitudes of cases occurring in the course of every active person's life in which, if they honestly acknowledge their true state of mind, they must fairly say, "I really do not know for certain whether such and such a course has been, or will be, right or wrong." Hence there is a need for the help of those who have made Christian morals their study with a view to the regulation of Christian life; who have studied the characteristics of sin in their broad lines, and in their more intricate complications, as physicians study the diseases to which human nature is subject.

[1] The ecclesiastical censures of our Episcopal Courts represent the ancient public discipline of the Church.

[2] See them all collected together in The Doctrine of the Church of England, pp. 132-135, ed. 1868.

b] It is by no means so easy as persons often suppose, for a sinner to know whether or not he is really penitent. An impulsive mind may be very likely to make mistakes on this point, and to put down as true penitence a temporary regret, a few tears, a momentary disgust with sin, which might indeed be capable of development into repentance, but which, left to itself, is "as a morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away" [Hos. vi. 4]. But if such first impressions of compunction are brought under the guidance of a wise priest, they may probably lead to that much deeper and more thorough sorrow which characterizes a real penitence, and is the sorrow not only of impulse, but "after a godly sort."

c] A person who has a hearty desire to forsake sin and to overcome temptation, may be in great ignorance as to the way and means of doing so. The highly educated mind, or the person trained in habits of thorough self-possession and self-government, may see much absurdity in such ignorance; but these are a mere fraction of the world at large, and the real fact is, that there is nothing in which the majority of persons so much need spiritual guidance as in respect to the actual way by which they may forsake sin, and the actual means by which they may get the better of their temptations.

d] There is, too, the familiar, but yet Divine saying to be remembered, that "the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?" [Jer. xvii. 9]. A strong conviction of this as regards their own hearts will often lead persons to desire the assistance of others in searching out their faults, and in bringing them before Him who has said, "I, the Lord, search the heart," and who sees with the Omniscient eye of judgment and condemnation sins which lie in hidden corners, where they are not visible to the eye of so partial a judge as every one is of his own self. [Contrition. Absolution. Discipline, Ecclesiastical. Marshall's Penitential Discipline; Oxford Trans. of Tertullian, note on Ἐξομολόγησις; Carter on Confession; Blunt's Sacraments and Sacramental Ordinances.]

CONFESSOR. One who confesses Christ faithfully before men under circumstances which seem likely to bring death upon him for the confession, but who escapes with life notwithstanding. The term itself seems to originate in our Lord's words, "Whosoever, therefore, shall confess Me before men, him will I confess also before My Father which is in heaven" [Matt. x. 32], and is used of our Lord Himself by St. Paul, when he writes, "Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed [μαρτυρήσαντος] a good confession" [1 Tim. vi. 13]. The original meaning of the word was probably an inclusive one. Tertullian speaks of confessors as "martyrs elect," and Cyprian wrote an epistle "to the martyrs and confessors of Jesus Christ." As early as the time of Eusebius, it was evidently restricted to those who endured trials and sufferings which were short of death. Asclepiades, he says, was distinguished among the Antiochean confessions [ἐν ταῖς ὁμολογίαις], and afterwards became Bishop of Antioch. How large a class of such confessors existed in the early Church is indicated by Theodoret's remark on the bishops who came to the Council of Nicæa: "Many bore about in the body the marks of the Lord Jesus. Paul, Bishop of Neocæsarea, had experienced the fury of Licinius, his hands powerless, the red-hot iron had destroyed the power of motion; others had their right eyes dug out; others were hamstrung at the knees, of whom was Paphnutius." Socrates and Rufinus mention others who had suffered in similar ways during the persecutions. In later days the term "confessor" was rather indiscriminately used; but in the Eastern Church it still retains its ancient meaning.

CONFIRMATION. A sacramental rite by which the spiritual life given in baptism is strengthened and perfected. The name by which this rite is commonly known throughout the Western Church appears to have come into use about the fourth century, when it is mentioned by St. Ambrose [de Myst. vii. 42]. In earlier times it was called "imposition of hands" [Aug. de Bapt. ii. 16], "chrism" [St. Leo, Serm. iv. de Nativit.], and the "seal" [Prudent. Psych. 360].

[I.] Confirmation in the New Testament. There is no verbal institution of this rite by our Lord; but the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Him immediately after His Baptism [Matt. iii. 16] was a typical act in which He was "anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power" [Acts iv. 27, x. 38, cf. John vi. 27], and which associates His Person with the subsequent administration of the rite; and the imposition of His hands on the children brought to Him [Matt. xix. 15] may be justly regarded as an exemplary, if not a mandatory act. But whether these are or are not to be regarded as constituting a precept for the Church to follow, it is evident that the Apostles used the rite with a promptness and straightforwardness which point to some Divine command as to what they were doing. Among their earliest acts we read of St. Peter and St. John going down to Samaria to lay their hands on those who had been baptized by the deacon Philip [Acts viii. 14-17]; and in the early ministry of St. Paul we see him laying his hands upon the Ephesian disciples of St. John the Baptist, as soon as they had been baptized with the baptism of Christ [Acts. xix. 6]. In both these cases the gift bestowed was accompanied with extraordinary spiritual powers, but the administration of it clearly had relation to the preceding baptism, and these powers were a special addition to the ordinary gift.

In the subsequent portions of the New Testament there are frequent references to the rite. Thus, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, it comes in immediately after baptism: "The doctrine of baptism and of the laying on of hands," as τῆς ἀρχῆς of Christian doctrine [Heb. vi. 2]. Elsewhere St. Paul writes to the Ephesians, that they had been "sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance" [Eph. i. 13-14], after they had believed in Christ; he exhorts them not to grieve the Holy Spirit by which they had been "sealed unto the day of redemption" [Eph. iv. 30]; and in similar terms writes to the Corinthians of confirmation [ὁ δὲ βεβαιῶν], and anointing in Christ, by God, who has sealed them [2 Cor. i. 21]; and the "foundation" and "seal" of 2 Tim. ii. 19 appear to be references to the same rite and its results. Of a similar character are St. John's references to an anointing which Christians had received [1 John ii. 20, 27], by which they had received spiritual illumination from Him of whom our Lord had said to the preceding generation, "He shall teach you all things" [John xiv. 26].

[II.] Confirmation in the Early Church. About a century or so after St. Paul had thus spoken of the "seal" after baptism, and St. John of the "unction" received by Christians, Tertullian [A.D. 150—220] wrote: "After this, having come out from the bath, we are anointed thoroughly with a blessed unction. . . . Next to this the hand is laid upon us, calling upon and inviting the Holy Spirit through the blessing" [Tertull. de Bapt. vii. viii.]. Shortly afterward, St. Cyprian writes: "Anointed also must he of necessity be who is baptized, that having received the chrism, that is, unction, he may be anointed of God, and have within him the grace of Christ" [Cyp. Ep. lxx. 3]. And speaking of the rite administered by St. Peter and St. John to the Samaritans, he identifies it with the rite of his own time, saying, "Which now also is done among us, those baptized in the Church being brought to the bishops of the Church; and by our prayer and laying on of hands, they receive the Holy Ghost, and are perfected with the seal of the Lord" [Cyp. Ep. lxxiii. 8]. St. Cyril of Jerusalem [A.D. 315-386] gives a still more full description of its administration: "After you had come up from the pool of the sacred streams, the unction was given, the emblem of that with which Christ was anointed. This holy ointment . . . is symbolically applied to thy forehead and thy other senses; and while thy body is anointed with visible ointment, thy soul is sanctified by the Holy and Life-giving Spirit. And ye were first anointed on your forehead, . . . then on your ears, . . . then on your nostrils, . . . then on your breast. When ye are counted worthy of this Holy Chrism, ye are called Christians, verifying also the name by your new birth" [Cyril, Catech. Lect. xix. xx. xxi.]. He also speaks of the imposition of hands: "In the days of Moses, the Spirit was given by the laying on of hands, and Peter also gives the Spirit by the laying on of hands. And on thee also, who art about to be baptized, shall His grace come" [Ibid. xvi. 26].

[III.] The Ceremony used. The earliest confirmation offices belong to an age not very far removed from the time of the Father last quoted, being found in the Sacramentaries of Gelasius [A.D. 472] and St. Gregory [A.D. 590]. One of the Anglican rite, used in the Church of York, belongs to a little later age, about A.D. 700. In these formularies there is a substantial agreement with that of our modern Prayer Book, though the latter is much curtailed, and the use of chrism was not provided for in the English formulary. It will be observed from the preceding quotations that in the early Church confirmation was administered directly after public baptism; and as public baptism was administered at distant intervals and in the presence of the bishop, it is probable that he was always in those days the minister of confirmation. It was also administered with chrism, with imposition of hands, and with prayer. The Western Church continued the ancient customs; but in the Eastern Church, the rite itself came to be administered by the baptizing priest, the bishop being associated with it only by means of the previous benediction of the chrism used, which was and is specially reserved for him. At a later period, probably not until mediæval times, the Western Church separated confirmation from baptism, so far as infants were concerned, not permitting it to be administered till the children had reached the age of seven years. The English Church has dropped the use of chrism, but has intensified the other portion of the rite, requiring the bishop to lay his hands on the head of each person confirmed, instead of spreading them out towards the whole number, as in the Roman practice. [Imposition of Hands.]

[IV.] The effect of Confirmation. Theologians usually lay down that confirmation gives 1, Grace, and 2, Character. Of the latter nothing more need be said than will be found in the article Character. As to the grace given, two things may be noticed. [a] The rite has a certain similarity to that of ordination; and as, in ordination, the Holy Spirit gives grace for the work of ministerial life in its several degrees, so in confirmation the same Holy Spirit gives grace for the ordinary Christian life. It is therefore an ordination to that Christian priesthood of which St. Peter speaks [1 Pet. ii. 9], a perfecting of the baptized Christian for his share in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, and for all other work which a layman can do in the Church of Christ. [b] Confirmation is an establishing and strengthening of the Christian in the grace of Holy Baptism; a re-settlement of him in the Body of Christ; the sending him forth armed to the warfare for which he was destined at the first; the enrolment of him as an adult servant of Christ, arrived at full competency for responsibility and full competency for grace.

CONGREGATION. The visible Church of Christ, "cœtus fidelium:" the three terms being used as synonymous in the Nineteenth Article of Religion. The word is used twenty-two times in the Services and Rubrics of the book of Common Prayer, and almost always in this sense; as in the case of "the congregation of Christ's flock" in the Baptismal Office, and "to minister . . . in the congregation," in the Ordination of Priests. It is also sometimes used in the modern popular sense of a particular assembly, but in such cases with a distinguishing qualification, as "this congregation here present," or "this present congregation of Christ here assembled." The Puritan notion that "congregation" does not involve the same meaning as "church" is shewn to be quite groundless by the Latin form of the word, "cœtus fidelium," which is a well-known term in the works of Latin theologians.

CONGREGATIONALISTS. A modern name assumed by the English Calvinistic sect formerly known as "Independents"; the name being founded on their leading principle of organization, that of autocephalous communities composed of single "congregations." [Dissenters. Dict. of Sects and Heresies.]

CONGRUITY. "Merit de congruo" is a scholastic rather than a theological term, and was used by the Schoolmen to denote the first movement of the human mind, whether heathen or in a state of spiritual lapse, in the direction of Divine grace. A mere intellectual faith, as it was supposed, led a man to serious thoughts of God and Christ, of time and eternity, of heaven and hell, and to perform such works of a low order of obedience as were not beyond his unaided natural power; human freewill and nothing better being his guide. It was the rude matter of faith, to which God by His grace shall afterwards give form. As in the natural world, it was argued, the "natural agent" supplies the matter on which the propagation of animal and vegetable life depends, to which the God of Nature gives form and plastic energy; so in the spiritual world, man supplies the first rude material of a low range of faith; but God gives to it by grace the form of justification, and of spiritual life and operative virtue. It was wholly congruous to His perfections to vouchsafe this grace. The first weak beginning, therefore, was called "meritum de congruo"—the word meritum meaning a workman's "earning" rather than "merit" in a moral point of view. [Condignity.]

This notion is, of course, diametrically opposed to the Christian doctrine of preventing grace. As Pelagianism in the commencement of the fifth century, so this scholastic doctrine in the thirteenth arose by force of reaction from Manichæan fatalism. The Schoolmen agree more nearly with writers, who first fused together the doctrine of the Church with the teaching of philosophy, such as Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen. When these fathers wrote, no question had arisen to perplex men's minds with respect to the antagonism of grace and freewill; and for that reason the writers of the four first centuries throw but little light upon it. The freedom of man's will was an intuitive fact; if discussed at all, it was propounded as a question for philosophic rather than theological speculation. Doubtless man's nature was considered in this, as in the subsequent period, to have gone "quam longissime" from original righteousness; yet it was not wholly depraved, some glimmering of Divine light remained, as instanced in the more virtuous heathen. Man's soul had still come forth from God; and as the "course of nature" meant not that nature can do anything "propriis viribus," but by the orderly operation of those laws which God from the first has bound upon it; so the soul of man, though fallen, was still in some degree responsive to good, and even in his state of lapse he was not without his weak virtues, the standing proof of a Divine origin.

Pelagianism easily rose from the exaggeration of such reasoning, when it became necessary to confront Manichæism, the heir and successor of Gnosticism in the heresiologia of antiquity; and a like cause gave rise to this scholastic notion of merit de congruo, directly opposed as it is to the teaching of Augustine, the champion of the Catholic faith in the Pelagian period. "Quid habes quod non accepisti" [1 Cor. iv. 7] is his constantly recurring question to the assertor of man's unaided sufficiency. And that is exactly the point at issue between this notion of the schools and the teaching of the Church Catholic. On the one side it has been declared from the beginning that Divine grace "leads" man to repentance, and that "faith is the gift of God," "it is not of ourselves" [Eph. ii. 8]; on the other, the sufficiency of man's free-will to earn the help of grace was taught. "Preventing grace" under this system is a nullity, for free-will anticipates grace. "No man can come unto Me," said our Lord, "except the Father draw him," and from the first faint wish for spiritual good to the bestowal of man's regeneration in baptism, and from thence till death, the whole work of Christian life is of God's grace.

The case of the unregenerate, when this notion was first floated, was different from anything that we can now witness in this country. The distance between the exalted graces of the Christian saint and the purblind wandering towards Christ's fold of the pagan, whether Teuton, Celt, or Goth, was so marked, that it may easily have been considered a difference of kind rather than of degree. So faint was the trace of good in the unconverted, that it scarce seemed to be even the twilight dawn of grace. So also in the case of those who lapsed from a state of grace, the heinousness of mortal sin after baptism was so great, and, in the opinion of many, it approximated so perceptibly to the sin against the Holy Ghost, which "never may be forgiven," that the condition of the returning penitent in his first steps was hardly to be preferred to heathenism; they were both without the operation of grace.

CONSANGUINITY. This is relationship by blood, as distinguished from relationship by marriage, which is called Affinity. Consanguinity, within certain degrees, has always been considered as an impediment to the marriage of the man and woman so related; and the union of such blood relations is incestuous. The law of the Church of England upon this subject will be found in the article on "Forbidden Degrees." It is enough here to say that it is founded on the Divine prohibitions contained in the book of Leviticus. [DEGREES, FORBIDDEN.]

CONSCIENCE. Volition is a single act, though it proceeds from a complex choice; of many thoughts or possible courses of action we choose one. The guide of that choice is either, as in the case of the undisciplined, a man's own pleasure; the φρόνημα σαρκὸς that offers itself so readily as his first allective guide; or, as in the case of every well-balanced mind, conscience. The moral guide of choice determines the will, and that guide is conscience. As science means knowledge, so conscience etymologically means self-knowledge.[1] In the moral being, conscience is the queen of every inward spring of action, will is her subject; and as all legislative function and delegated judicial authority emanates from the sovereign, so conscience is, objectively, the unwritten law of the heart, as founded on those eternal principles of right and equity and truth that are as rays from the throne of God; and, subjectively, it passes judgment upon the thoughts of the heart and the actions of the body. If conscience be obeyed, it approves, and then is pure; but if it be dishonoured and its voice disregarded, such disloyalty can only lay up materials for remorse.

This fundamental element of man's moral being is proof to him of his religious relation to his Maker; it declares the mysterious intercommunication that subsists between the Spirit of God and the spirit of man; and it indicates the natural revelation of God's will made to man through the reason. Conscience is the representative of this inner revelation, which, proceeding forth from the creative Spirit of God, infuses itself into the spirit of man, and as a plastic energy forms and moulds him, by conveying to him the cognizance of God's will and of man's duties in His sight. Thus conscience is our moral sense continually held in check by the Spirit of God; it is the very soul of our loyalty to Him; it is the "religio" of a true communion.

This authoritative principle of the mind and soul of man is referable only to the original gift of moral and spiritual life as the soul of man. "In the likeness of God made He him;" and as mental consciousness is our evidence of the existence of thoughts, desires, feelings, and other states of the mind, so conscience is a standing testimony of the Divine genesis of the soul, as a direct afflatus from God. We may trace its truthful voice even among the heathen; though so little has been known of its power and functions by the most intellectual races that they have had no word to express it; "religio" and Σύνεσις (New Testament Συνείδησις) scarcely conveying a higher notion than "scruple" and "consciousness." So far as the operation of conscience, properly so called, was a matter of observation, it was most usually as the vengeance of a Nemesis tracking down evil. "Sua quemque fraus et suus terror maxime vexat; suum quemque scelus agitat amentiaque afficit; suæ malæ cogitationes conscientiæque animi terrent. Hæ sunt impiis assiduæ domesticæque Furiæ."[2] "Prima et maxima peccantium est pœna, peccasse; nec ullum scelus, licet illud fortuna exornet muneribus suis, licet tueatur ac vindicet, impunitum est, quoniam sceleris in scelere supplicium est."[3] But a higher and better view is found in Plato,[4] as also in Cicero,[5] and Epictetus acknowledges the ἔμφυτος ἔννοια of all that is good and excellent within.

The revealed Word alone declares to us the source from whence this spark of heavenly light, this "scintilla conscientiæ"[6] was derived. The voice of God spoke with Adam in paradise, and was heard and perfectly obeyed for a while, because his will was wholly one with his Maker's. Conscience and the practical cognizance of good were in his case one and the same thing; and after the Fall conscience maintained its position as that communion with God that is intimate in proportion as the revelation of heaven is willingly obeyed. And, in this way, the Word is still "the light, that lighteth every man that cometh into the world;" when that light is obeyed it is the light of man's countenance, bringing happiness and contentment, and all the brightness of innocent joys. "A good man is united to God, κέντρον κέντεῳ σύναψας, as a flame touches flame, and combines into splendour and glory; so is the spirit of man united unto Christ by the Spirit of God."[7] Conscience thus links together heaven and earth, and the purification of the conscience is the cleansing of the very heart-spring within.

Conscience then in an absolute sense is the utterance of God's voice in the soul, in the heart, and reins, as Hebrew ethics would say; and it is the direct revelation of truth, and purity, and justice made by the Spirit of God to the spirit of man. This phase of conscience is from its nature beyond our direct control or power of development. It is quâ Divine, infallible, and in it is "no shadow of turning." It is the absolute rule of right. But in a relative sense conscience is our own moral consciousness under the eye of God, our own positive assimilation within the soul of those eternal principles of truth and goodness which are necessary in order to bring our will into nearer unison with the will of God. In this phase conscience is capable of continual education and development by rules formed for its guidance in accordance with the rule supreme. As sight only exists in the perception of objects that are illuminated by the light of heaven, so conscience lives only as the inward perception of moral obligations, on which a clear light is thrown by the Spirit of God. And the culture of this faculty involves the adoption of rules of duty as guides of action.[8]

Conscience in this relative aspect is the vice-

[1] Whewell, Elem. of Mor. 2d ed. sec. 263.

[2] Cicero, Or. pro. S. Rose. Amerin. sec. 24.

[3] Seneca, Ep. 97.

[4] Plato, de Leg. x.

[5] Cicero, de Leg. x. 40; de Off. i. 10.

[6] Jerome, in Ez. iv.

[7] Bishop Jeremy Taylor, Sermon before U. Dubl. sec. 5. Whewell, Elem. of Mor. sec. 262.

Conscience

gerent of God, and is invested with the authority of supreme law. In this sense it was termed by early moralists Συντήρησις, the "inner guard," keeping watch and ward over the hidden sources of the will.[1]

Conscience also reacts on the individual, judging, accusing, and pronouncing its verdict on the morality, or otherwise, of thoughts and concrete acts in word and deed, in which phase it acts in subordination to the former, as the judicial function is subject to the legislative. In this subjective sense it was termed Συνείδησις, or conscience; and "conscience the judge must pronounce its decision according to conscience the law."[2] In both of these phases, quâ human, it is subject to disturbing forces, according as the moral and spiritual life of the individual has attained to a stronger or weaker degree of development. Thus in some individuals it may be keen, and quick, and direct, detecting intuitively the slightest quivering of the index within, and pronouncing with exact truth on the moral indications conveyed by it to the soul; and it may be eagle-sighted in adjudicating upon the moral right or wrong of word or thought or deed, as they are presented to the mind in its inner consciousness. Or, it may be altogether deprived of the faculty of moral judgment from disuse and wilful closing of the eyes to the light, or from prejudice; in which cases it becomes wholly inoperative for good, and incapable of discerning, much less of pronouncing judgment on, the rule of right.

Hence conscience may be distinguished in various individuals into honest, i.e. incorrupt and incorruptible; and deceptive; steady and wavering, sound and morbid, enlightened and dark. In its objective phase, as a rule for action, it may be true or it may be distorted through ignorance or vice. Similarly, in its subjective or judicial relation it may justify and bring peace as the effect of goodness; or it may condemn, and vindicate by inward pangs of remorse the warning of the written Word, "There is no peace, saith my God, for the wicked."

Finally, two rules are indispensable for the healthy action of conscience. I. We should never undertake any action of moral import, much less embark on any course of action without first obtaining a distinct utterance from the conscience, in affirmation or derogation of the moral lawfulness of such action. We must not allow ourselves to act on a mere probable opinion, or doubt with respect to the right or wrong of the action. "He that doubteth is damned if he eat" [Rom. xiv. 23]. The verdict of the inner man should be sharp and decisive if he would be loyal to the Supreme rule, and to the Author of that rule. Action determined under a condition of doubt has nothing to do with either conscience or reason; nothing better than mere intellectual fancy is here the guide. It is only when the judgment and understanding are guided by conscience, on a deliberate purview of the matter before it, that action is safe; even as in matters of religion, "everything that is not of faith is sin" [Rom. xiv. 23].

II. It is an absolute rule, and one for universal observance, that we should never act contrary to the dictate of conscience; even though it be warped by error or prejudice. The moral tone of every action depends on its close dependence with the inner rule; and the morality of the agent maintains a relative proportion with respect for the decision of conscience, and an honest determination in following it out to its legitimate conclusion. To act contrary to conscience must always be wrong, irrespectively of the abstract right or wrong of the action; and whether that wrong be capable of correction or not. For moral culture is the abiding duty of man; our position to-day must not be taken as a fixed point, but as a state of transition to something better. The law of the mind must be brought gradually into closer conformity with the law of God, that is absolutely "holy and just and good;" and "converting the soul" in proportion as it seeks to assimilate its teaching. "Conscience is never formed, but is always in the course of formation."[3] Therefore, though for the present, we may err in following the guidance of a mistaken conscience, yet it is better to err for a while in this direction than to be disloyal to the inner rule, which would only weaken its check upon our actions, when conscience becomes more completely informed by the supreme rule. To be unconscientious is always to be immoral.

He therefore whose conscience is clouded by error that is not perceived, must abide by the consequences of such error; but he sins not in the mere following of his conscience. But he whose conscience has a wrong direction, which with proper pains and regard for the truth might be adjusted, sins when he acts in accordance with its dictates. Saul was a persecutor of the Church from a conscientious belief that he was doing God service, and he obtained mercy in that he did it "ignorantly in unbelief" [1 Tim. i. 13]. Simon, the sorcerer, felt no uneasiness of conscience in offering money for the gift of the Holy Ghost; but the sin of simony in its first origin was too gross even for self-deception; and therefore he was in the "gall of bitterness," so long as he persisted in the self-condemned error of his way.

The words of a great and good man may serve to bring this article to a conclusion: "A man to be moral, must be careful to satisfy himself what the decision of his conscience is, and must be resolved to follow the course thus prescribed, at any risk and at any sacrifice. Nothing can be right that he does not do with a clear conscience. Whatever danger or sorrow lies in that direction, whatever advantage or gratification of the desires and affections in the other, he must not shrink or waver. Whatever may be gained by acting against his conscience, the consistency and welfare of his whole moral being is lost. His moral progress is utterly arrested. . . . To be steadily, resolutely, and carefully conscientious, is a rule which every one who aims at his moral progress must regard as paramount to all others." [Whewell, Elem. of Mor. sec. 275.]

[1] Whewell has rendered the word as the "internal repository," sec. 263, which seems a scarcely adequate interpretation. The word was barbarized by the schools into Synderesis, being attracted by its correlative Συνείδησις. Greg. Naz. Or. ii. uses the word as the "bond of union" between body and soul: the "living guard of union."

[2] Whewell, sec. 267.

[3] Whewell, sec. 267.

CONSECRATION. Episcopal benediction of persons, places, or things, by which they are set apart for the sacred service of God. Thus the ordination of a bishop is called consecration: and so also is the benedictory dedication of churches, cemeteries, and the instrumenta of Divine Service. Such benedictory dedications are perpetual in their effects, making the church or cemetery so consecrated permanently sacred, so that [1] it cannot be claimed as private property, [2] nor permanently alienated from sacred uses, [3] nor temporarily appropriated to any use dishonourable to God without profanation. But it must be added that the first two results have never been considered so absolute but that for righteous causes, and by proper ecclesiastical authority, consecrated places and instrumenta may be secularized without irreverence. There should however always be a rigid scrutiny of all alleged reasons for secularizing sacred places and things; and only the highest Christian expediency can justify it. [Benediction. Mede on Churches. Harrington's Consecration of Churches.]

CONSENT OF ANTIQUITY. The Consent of Antiquity may mean the agreement of Primitive Antiquity, which though not absolutely binding as Apostolical Consent would be, is still entitled to the reverential regard of every after age; or it may mean the Consent of Relative Antiquity, which is equally valuable where it may be held to reflect the judgment of the Primitive Church; otherwise where it stands in severance from primitive practice, it may be followed or not by particular churches, as conducive or not to edification. If monastic institutions were traceable, as their advocates maintain, to the words of our Lord, they would of course be binding upon the whole of Christendom, and in every age; but the proof is wanting, and as a growth of the third century their claim of catholicity breaks down. "Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus" is the old rule that, properly understood, exactly expresses the authority due to the traditions of the past. "Quod semper" marks the necessity for decurrence from primitive times, and an uninterrupted observance; "quod ubique" implies the Catholic consent of the Church throughout the world; "quod ab omnibus" the assent of Christian men in the aggregate. Where opinions have obtained currency in primitive times, yet have never been sanctioned by the Church Catholic, such tenets may very possibly express no more than the private view of writers who have broached them. The belief in a millennium reign of Christ with His saints on earth, though expressed by four primitive writers, was not accepted by the Church Catholic; and as lacking all three notes of reception, it is not endorsed to us by general Consent of Antiquity. The high Predestinarian theory of Augustine, received by the Church of Rome, and followed out to its hard logical consequences by Calvin, was unknown until developed by the Bishop of Hippo [de Præd. et Persev. i. sec. 3]; as soon as he broached it, it was taxed with novelty [Epp. Prosp. et Hil. inter opp. S. Aug. Epp. 225, 226]. It cannot claim Catholic consent, however wide may have been the area of its reception. Our three notes do not cover it. [Augustinianism.] Neither can appeal be made to them as a sanction for customs and traditions that only date from the Middle Ages. "Quod semper" cannot be predicated of innovation. The practice of invocation of saints, the rule of clerical celibacy and monastic vows, the Roman doctrines of purgatory and transubstantiation, all are without the category of things received under the Consent of Antiquity.

But there are other matters of vital necessity that can claim the full authority of this triple rule. The Creeds of the Church may be traced back in their main substance to the Church of the Apostles' days, with a priority of time higher than that of the writings of the New Testament. [Creeds.] The Canon of the New Testament Scriptures formed gradually by consent of the churches, so soon as the ink of each successive gospel or epistle was dry, was confirmed collectively by the Primitive Church, to the exclusion of the spurious writings that abounded from the first. It comes to us stamped with the authoritative judgment of apostolic men; and claims the gratitude of all who in any sense profess the faith of Christ. [Canon. Scripture.] The use of liturgies built up on one definite plan, and preserving in parts a verbal agreement, shew the Consent of Antiquity in establishing that "use." [Liturgy.] The observance of the Lord's Day, a bond of unity between all who worship Christ, whether within or without the Church Catholic, established by the Apostles, and confirmed by continuous practice, is a standing memorial of the authoritative judgment of the Primitive Church. [Lord's Day.] So also the administration of the Church under bishops, priests and deacons may be traced as clearly in the Church of the Apostles as in our own. Consecration by the imposition of hands has maintained within the Church a permanent ministry in things sacred; and a perpetual stream of living witnesses to the truth and power of Christian doctrine. The substantive verity of the Holy and Undivided Trinity; the union of the Godhead and Manhood in one Christ; salvation through faith in the Atonement made once for all upon the cross; were all embosomed deep in the faith of the Primitive Church, and shone as beacon lights so soon as controversy called them forth; her jewels have ever been kept back from curious gaze and rougher handling, until their truth and genuineness have been called in question. The two Holy Sacraments, ordained of Christ, are administered in all essential particulars as they were committed to the Church in the beginning. These, and other particulars that might be added, have come down to us commended by the judgment and Consent of Antiquity; they have always been received by the Church in every age and clime, and each individual Churchman relies upon them as more or less immediately connected with his hope of salvation. That which is loosely called Catholic consent, if referring to matters unknown in Primitive Antiquity can only reach down from the time of origination. Such points have usually caused so much discussion and opposition as to shew that they can plead neither of our three marks of consent. Cardinal Bona has justly censured those who have reversed the process, and have imagined that customs and practices current in the Church of modern date must of necessity have come down from Primitive Antiquity [Bona, Rer. Liturg. I. xviii. 1]. The Consent of Antiquity where it can be certainly known, is a link connecting the Church of all ages with Primitive Truth that nothing will ever be able to sever.

CONSISTENTES [Συνιστάμενοι]. The fourth or highest order of penitents in the primitive Church. They were those persons whose penance was so far completed that they were permitted to stand among the communicants at the time when the Holy Eucharist was being celebrated. They were, however, distinguished from the latter by not being allowed to receive the sacrament. In the twelfth Canon of the Council of Nicæa, they are called "partakers of the prayers" [τῶν εὐχῶν κοινωνήσουσι]; and in the thirteenth Canon it is directed that they shall receive the Eucharist if at the point of death, returning to the position of consistentes if they shall recover. After a year of discipline and probation (the fourth year of penance) the consistentes were admitted again to the full privileges of communion. [Flentes, &c.]

CONSISTORY. The court of a bishop, in which the principle is that he is surrounded by representatives of the clergy of his diocese, who act as his council. The Pope's council of cardinals is so called. In modern times, however, the consistory courts of bishops are held by deputy, the chancellor of the diocese, or a commissary acting for him, being the sole representative of bishop and clergy.

CONSTITUTIONS, APOSTOLICAL. The Apostolical Constitutions, so far as their most ancient matter is concerned, cannot have been written later than the second century; though Cotelerius declares his inability to name any probable date for them between the time of the Apostles and the middle of the fourth century, when we have the clear testimony of Epiphanius. The more usual name for this work is διατάξεις or διαταγὰι τ. A.; but it is termed also διδασκαλία and διδαχὴ τ. A. Eusebius [H. E. iii. 25] mentions the "doctrine of A." as spurious, though often read as canonical scripture. Athanasius [Ep. Fest. and Synopsis S. Scr.] gives the same testimony. Epiphanius speaks with respect of the "Constitutions" [διατάξεις], and quotes passages from them. [Hær. xlv. 5, lxx. 10-12, lxxv. 6, lxxx. 7.] His expressions justify the belief that the "Doctrine" and the "Constitutions" of the Apostles are identical. The Quinisext or Trullan Council of Constantinople [A.D. 692], while it declares the Apostolical Canons to be a work of authority, rejects the "Constitutions" as marred by heretical interpolations. Photius, a good and critical judge of such matters, records that the "Constitutions" were read in his time as a work of Clement, but says that their authority was lowered by interpolations, though these might be purged away by a sound criticism; by irreverence as regards the Book of Deuteronomy, though this too might be cleared; and by a charge of Arianism that could only be refuted, βιαίως, with difficulty. Against our present copies the two last objections do not lie. The Æthiopian Church alone received the Apostolical Constitutions without hesitation. Daillé has imagined that two editions of them existed; one a full copy, the other an epitome of useful "legenda" such as we now possess. The character given to these "rudera" of Christian antiquities by Professor Blunt exactly expresses their value; "with much alloy there is much of the most venerable antiquity in these remains" [Ecc. Hist. cent. ii.]. They contain treatises so primitive, as to have been known in all probability to St. Luke [i. 1] and St. Paul [2 Thess. ii. 2; Gal. i. 6]. They describe the Church of primitive times in its antagonism with heathen life, and in its over-depressed and, humanly speaking, mean condition, when as yet "not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, were called" [1 Cor. i. 26].

The length of these Constitutions, occupying, with a Latin translation, 220 folio pages in the Collection of Cotelerius, precludes any attempt at close analysis. The disorderly way in which the following subjects are scattered up and down the eight books, shews that their origin was not simultaneous. Book I. Ten chapters on moral and religious duties. II. Sixty-three chapters on episcopal duties, administrative and judicial; clerical, social, congregational and penitential duties; oblations. III. Seventy chapters on clerical functions; against usurpation; on widows and alms; baptism and the consecration of bishops. IV. Fourteen chapters on alms and offerings; relative and political duties. V. Twenty chapters on the duties of the persecuted martyrs; on fasts and feasts, and on Messianic prophecy. VI. Twenty-nine chapters on schism, heresy, and Judaizing error; apostolical preaching; spurious writings; re-baptism, clerical marriage. VII. Forty-nine chapters, chiefly on religious duties; fast days; meats, idolothyta; baptism, catechumens, chrism; Holy Eucharist; the Lord's day; liturgica. The last twenty-seven chapters are of great importance. VIII. The ordinal and liturgy; benediction of water and oil; offerings; canonical hours; commemoration of dead. This book contains forty-seven chapters, and is the liturgical section of the Constitutions.

Drey has arranged the eight books chronologically into four classes: [I.] i.—vi., which he refers to the latter half of the second century, and believes to be the "doctrine" of Athanasius and Eusebius. [II.] vii.; he says this book is by a different author, as shewn by its more concise style, and repetition of former matter; he considers it to have been an independent work; both of these sections are in an epistolary form. [III.] viii. 1—46. The term διάταξις is here introduced for the first time, and the name was soon extended to the entire collection. He gives reasons for assigning classes [II.] and [III.] to the Nicene period. [IV.] viii. 47, is an appendix of the Apostolical Canons, and must be referred to the fifth century, but prior to the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. [CANONS, APOSTOLICAL.] Drey, however, refers the canons completed to a later date. The creed found in vii. 41, contains additions to the usual clauses of an anti-Sabellian cast in viii. 12. The liturgical formulæ of the latter portion of the same book may have been the originals from whence Basil at first hand, and from him Chrysostom, condensed their respective liturgies. Internal evidence points to a Syrian origin for the entire work. The names of the months are such as were in current use in Syria during the first ages of Christianity. The office also assigned to the deacon of keeping flies from the cup of blessing agrees well with this supposition [viii. 12]. The prayer for monks, ἀσκηταί, viii. 13, makes an earlier date than the beginning of the fourth century impossible. [Cotelerius, i. Lagarde, A.D. 1862; Drey, N. Untersuch.]

CONSTITUTIONS OF CLARENDON. The Constitutions of Clarendon were enacted in January 1164, in the reign of Henry II. at Clarendon in Wiltshire. They owed their origin to the quarrel between Henry II. and Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, or rather to the struggle in which Henry and à Becket were the representatives of the spiritual and secular powers. Jealousy between the "courts Christian," as the spiritual courts were termed, and the lay tribunals had long existed, and the privileges which the former gave, not only to persons in holy orders, but to all who had been admitted to the tonsure, had aroused a spirit of bitter enmity between the supporters of the two systems. The privileges of the clergy not only entitled them to be tried in the spiritual courts alone, but even in those courts rendered them liable to no severer punishments than flagellation, fine, deprivation, and imprisonment for any crime whatsoever. A dispute in which Philip de Brois, a canon of Bedford, was the aggressor, and Fitz Peter, one of the royal justiciaries, the injured party, having been tried in the spiritual court, and the sentence not being considered sufficiently severe, the king summoned the bishops to Westminster, and required them to consent that if in future any clergyman were degraded by a spiritual court for a public crime, he should be handed over to a lay tribunal for punishment. The bishops refused, and with one exception, gave an evasive answer to the next demand of the king, that they would promise to observe the "ancient customs" of the realm [A.D. 1163]. The brunt of Henry's anger fell on the primate, who at last seemed to yield to the entreaties of his friends and the threats of the king, and promised to appear at a great council to be held at Clarendon in January 1164.

At this council, a committee was appointed to inquire into the ancient customs of England, and the result of their investigation appeared in sixteen articles, which were presented to the council, and which are known as the Constitutions of Clarendon. After considerable intimidation, the bishops consented to subscribe their names, but Becket soon repented of his compliance, sought absolution from the Pope for the sin he believed himself to have committed in attending the council, and by his subsequent resistance deepened the quarrel, which ended in his iniquitous murder.

The most important of the Constitutions of Clarendon are:—That the custody of every vacant archbishopric, bishopric, abbey, and priory of royal foundation ought to be given, and its revenues during the vacancy paid, to the king, and that the election of a new incumbent ought to be made in consequence of the king's writ, by the chief clergy of the Church, assembled in the king's chapel, with the assent of the king, and with the advice of such prelates as the king may call to his assistance.

That in almost every suit, civil or criminal, in which each or either party was a clergyman, the proceedings should commence before the king's justices, who should determine whether the cause ought to be tried in the secular or episcopal courts; and that in the latter case a civil officer should be present to report the proceedings, and the defendant, if he were convicted in criminal action, should lose his benefit of clergy.

That no tenant in chief of the king, no officer of his household, or of his demesne, should be excommunicated, or his lands put under an interdict, until application had been made to the king, or in his absence to the grand justiciary.

That no archbishop, bishop, or dignified clergyman could lawfully go beyond the sea without the king's permission.

That appeals should proceed regularly from the archdeacon to the bishop, and from the bishop to the archbishop. If the archbishop failed to do justice, the cause was to be carried before the king, that by his precept the suit might be terminated in the archbishop's court, so as not to proceed further without the king's consent.

The remaining articles relate to advowsons, the tenure of land by clergymen, the ordination of the sons of villeins, and other such matters [Matth. Paris, ad ann. 1164; Wilkins' Conc. i. 435].

Ten of the Constitutions of Clarendon were expressly condemned by the Pope (Alexander III.), and the framers were excommunicated by Becket, whose subsequent murder produced so strong a sympathy with this cause that the Constitutions were not enforced until some years later, when they received important modifications at a council held at Northampton [A.D. 1176]. The chief modification was that no clergyman should be personally arraigned before a secular judge for any crime or transgression, unless it were against the laws of the forest, or regarding a lay fee for which he owed service to a lay lord.

CONSUBSTANTIATION. The term by which the Lutheran belief in the Real Presence is usually expressed, namely, that after consecration of the Eucharist, the substance of the Lord's Body and Blood co-exists in union with the substance of Bread and Wine, just as iron and fire are united in a bar of heated iron.

The belief of the ancient Church that after consecration the species of Bread and Wine co-existed with the Sacramental Body and Blood, must not be considered as identical with the Lutheran tenet, which implies a material conception of the heavenly mystery, as if in an earthly mode Bread and Wine were mixed with the Lord's Body and Blood—an opinion opposed to Scripture and the teaching of the Church. The invention of this theory is attributed to Luther, and will be found in his letter to Henry VIII. He says, "The Body of Christ is (the Bread still existing) in the Sacrament, as fire is in iron, the substance of the iron existing, and God in man the human nature existing—the substances in each case being so united, that each retains its own operation and proper nature and yet they constitute one thing."[1] The teaching of Luther, however, on the Eucharist, as Dr. Pusey shows, was not uniform, and he often expresses his views in a less objectionable manner than in the extract given. Luther's illustration, and the mode of the sacramental Presence implied, has not been adopted by the Reformer's followers, nor is it found in the Lutheran confessions of faith. The Augsburg and other confessions given below[2] merely state the co-existence, after consecration, of Bread and Wine with the Body and Blood of Christ.

CONTEMPLATION. [See MYSTICISM.]

CONTRITION. Three steps are required to constitute a true repentance—contrition, inclusive of its first weak beginning as attrition [which see], confession, and satisfaction. Repentance itself is a permanent condition, the fruits of which are the necessary daily workings of spiritual life, so that a life of faith and a life of repentance are synonymous. It signifies "all that piety and obedience which we pay to God in the days of our return, after we have begun to follow sober counsels."[3] Obedience to the commandments of God, faithful walking by the light of His love, and the "hope that maketh not ashamed," form the indispensable habit of repentance. But it is clear that such a state cannot be attained by any sudden transition from the corruption of sin, and in a moment of time. The gradations that lead from the darkness of night to noonday brightness are not more imperceptible than the gradual growth in grace that conducts the soul from its particular shade of sin and disobedience to an established state of justification. Beginning with alarm for the penal consequences of sin, the work of reconstruction must from thence proceed, "line upon line, and precept upon precept," as the building advances towards completion. It is contrition that in a spirit of love and obedience establishes the sinner on the solid foundation of a true repentance, through faith in God and Christ. Still, whatever be the progress made, it is impossible to say when the faithful penitent is accepted to final pardon. "God keeps the secrets of His mercy in His sanctuary, and draws not the curtain till the day of death or judgment."[4]

The first penitential steps have been described under the article Attrition. That servile state of fear may lead on to better things. God's grace, at first impeded by carnal ways of thinking and acting, has on the whole been gaining power over the soul; fear and hatred of sin have wrought the desire of pardon, and desire hope; and as it is of the nature of hope to hang with ardent affection on the thought of its object, so hope in this case has lighted up in the soul a sense of God's goodness, and that love of God is shed abroad in the heart which leads to the purifying of every deep welling spring of thought. The will is changed to desire and fear in accordance with the will of Him who is the bestower of such grace; "The chiefest thing in contrition is that alteration whereby the will which before was delighted with sin doth now abhor and shun nothing more,"[5] and the reclaimed penitent exhibits in his life the sure truth, "this is the love of God, that we keep His commandments."

Attrition, through this union with love and hope, passes into the more perfect grace of contrition. The attrite forsook sin from an intense fear of its consequences; the contrite has exterminated it and mortified it by the love of God shed abroad in his soul; he hates sin because it is hateful to God and contrary to right reason, and he watches and prays against its recurrence, with the sure hope of being heard, and of receiving grace "to help in time of need."

Attrition and contrition in this way are as the converse and obverse sides of the same coin. The first has for its active principle dread of the temporal and external consequences of sin; its strength lies in the power of its hate. The second is full of love and hope, which have God's

[1] Quoted from Dr. Pusey, On the Doctrine of the Real Presence [1855], where a full account is given of Lutheran opinions on the Eucharist, p. 43, &c.

[2] Augustana Confessio [1530]: "De Cœna Domini docent quod cum pane et vino vere exhibeantur, corpus et sanguis Christi vescentibus in Cœna Domini. Hæc in alia Editione reperiuntur. De Cœna Domini docent quod corpus et sanguis Christi vere adsint et destribuantur vescentibus in Cœna Domini et improbant secus docentes." Saxonica Confessio [1551]: "Docentur etiam homines, sacramenta esse actiones divinitus institutas, et extra usum institutum, res ipsas non habere rationem sacramenti sed in usu instituto in hac communione vere et substantialiter adesse Christum, et vere exhiberi sumentibus corpus et sanguinem Christi." Wirtembergica Confessio [1561]: "Cum de pane dicitur Hoc est corpus meum, non est necesse ut substantia panis mutetur in substantiam corporis Christi; sed ad veritatem sacramenti sufficit quod corpus Christi vere sit cum pane præsens, atque adeo necessitas ipsa veritatis sacramenti exigere videtur, ut cum vera præsentia corporis Christi verus panis maneat." Corpus et Syntagma Confessionum Fidei [1654].

[3] Bishop Taylor, Rep. c. x. i. sec. 1.

[4] Bishop Taylor, Rep. x. ii. sec. 5.

[5] Hooker, Eccl. Pol. vi.

commandments and promises as their object, and benefits that are either present or contingent. Its holiest principle is a true ray of the love of God. "Contrition loves God and hates sin; it leaves this and adheres to Him; abstains from evil and does good; dies to sin and lives to righteousness, and is a state of pardon and acceptable services."[1] We can still only hope indeed as penitents of the porch to be accepted to the inner mercies of God in His good time; and the life of the believer is a lifelong repentance, leading on from the first faint aspirations for good to the firm faith and love and hope of the dying saint. But the will of the contrite has received its proper adjustment once more, and harmonizes on the whole with the will of God. His law has ceased to be a galling yoke upon the neck, causing reluctance in obedience and dread in its violation. The Gospel is still a law indeed, but it has become through this altered will the perfect law of liberty.

CONVERSION. [Conversio. Ἐπιστροφή.] This word has acquired a factitious importance as regards the religious life from its use in a mystical sense by the Methodists, and by those of the Church of England whose religion took much of its colour from them. In Holy Scripture it is used in two senses: [1] first, of a change from false religion to true religion, as in "the conversion of the Gentiles" [Isa. lx. 5; Acts xv. 3]; and [2] secondly, of a change from the state of habitual sin to the state of habitual holiness; that is, the conversion of those who profess the true religion but do not act under its influence [Psa. li. 13; Matt. xviii. 13]. Used in a strict sense, the word expresses no more than the practical result of CONTRITION, but in the more modern and conventional sense it is made to include nearly all that properly belongs to the term SANCTIFICATION. Some have gone to a fanatical length in the use of the word, making conversion identical with "new birth" or REGENERATION, irrespective of the true regeneration effected by holy baptism.

CONVOCATIONS. The synods necessary for the good government of a church are two: one in which the bishop consults with his brother bishops on all matters that concern the welfare of the church; one in which the bishop consults with his presbyters how to carry out the determinations of the superior synod, and in subordination to those determinations arranges all that relates to the due execution of the priest's office. The framework and status of a church may occasion other councils. The framework of a church may be developed into a patriarchate; the status of a church may be that it is a National Established Church; thus we obtain patriarchal and national councils. But these are not essential; they differ not in principle but in extent from the simple provincial council of brother bishops. In England we have two provincial councils, held under archbishops, meeting separately, but communicating when common action is required; and forming, when in such communication, the Synod of our National Church, the Church of England by representation. Again, presbyters are not of the essence of a provincial council. They are admissible and generally are admitted; but the numbers admitted and the privileges accorded them, are under the regulation of each church according to its own sense of expediency. In England the presbyters admitted are many, and are so chosen as to afford a systematic representation of the clergy. They have also great privileges.

The object of this article will be to describe the form of our provincial councils, to shew how they acquire that form, and to give a summary of such acts as have materially influenced the course and history of the Church of England.

Our provincial councils, then, are summoned in time of Parliament by canonical authority, in virtue of Crown writs directed to the Archbishops of Canterbury and York. By the 25th Henry VIII. c. 19, it is expressly enacted that the convocation shall always be assembled by authority of the King's writ; and it was resolved by the judges upon this statute [8 Jac. 1], that a convocation cannot assemble by their own or the archbishop's convoking without the assent of the King, that is, by writ under the Great Seal of England. The writ issues from the Crown Office in Chancery; and it is now agreed that the convocations are of right to be assembled concurrently with Parliament [Phillimore's Burn, II. 29], and may act and proceed as provincial councils, when the Sovereign in his royal wisdom shall judge it expedient. The writ summoning the clergy concurrently with the peers and commoners has been issued from the time of Edward I. to the reign of the present Sovereign. [Pearce, Law relating to Convoc. c. iv.] The archbishops having received the Queen's writs issue their mandates summoning their bishops and clergy. They summon them to appear "before us." For the archbishops use the fixed and canonical method that they always used; the King having a right to the assistance of the clergy, and a right to be obeyed by the archbishop in calling them together for that end, yet in the dispatch of business leaves them to proceed according to the known rules of a provincial synod; that is, to be summoned before their metropolitan, and to the place he shall think fit to appoint. [Gibson, Synod. Angl. ed. 1854, p. 14.] In Canterbury the archbishop issues his mandate through the dean of the province, the Bishop of London; in York, where there is no dean of the province, direct to the suffragans. The bishops, deans, and archdeacons, are summoned to appear in person or by proxy; the chapters by one proctor; the clergy, in Canterbury by two proctors for each diocese, in York by two proctors for each archdeaconry.

English provincial councils, then, differ from the ordinary form of such councils in this systematic representation of the clergy. To a provincial council bishops only are of necessity to be summoned. "Twice in the year let there be a synod of bishops to examine doctrines of religion, and to terminate

[1] Bishop Taylor, Rep. x. iii. sec. 28.

Convocations

all ecclesiastical controversies that may happen." [Apost. Can. xxxvi. ed. Bruns.]. Before this synod an accused bishop is to be convened [Ib. lxxiii.]; without this the primate is not to act [Ib. xxxiii.]. Upon which Balsamon's comment is, "Non posse autem primum quidquam facere sine sententia episcoporum suorum ne dixeris intelligenda de omnibus quæ ab illo facienda sunt, sed iis tantum quæ sunt magni momenti." Zonaras interprets, "res magni momenti tales quales ad statum communem Ecclesiæ respiciunt, cujusmodi sunt dogmaticæ questiones, super erratis communibus dispositiones, et ejusmodi." [Howel's Synopsis, p. 6.] To this council also it was the general practice for a metropolitan to refer the appeal of a presbyter or deacon against his bishop. [Bingham, ed. 1834, i. p. 160.]

This council of bishops, however, admitted presbyters. Bingham cites the Alexandrian Council, A.D. 230, which deposed Origen; the Roman, A.D. 252, against Novatian; that of Antioch, A.D. 264, against Paul of Samosata. At Elliberis, A.D. 305, there sat thirty-six presbyters with the bishops. The presbyters sometimes, perhaps generally, voted; and sometimes subscribed the decrees. But it does not appear that the rights of the presbyters were defined. It is left to each church to assign such rights to its presbyters as are expedient under the circumstances of the church. It was then quite within the power of the Church of England to adopt a systematic representation of its presbyterate, and make the concurrence of her presbyters necessary for the passing a provincial act. These are doubtless large powers, although they fall short of those erroneously claimed by Atterbury and others, privileges beyond those of presbyters in primitive times, or of presbyters in other episcopal churches. In judging of these powers it must be remembered that they act as a safeguard against an undue influence of the Crown through its possessing the appointment of bishops. The close connection of the English Church with the State has vested in the Crown the choice of bishops, and taken from the Church all power of resisting an ill appointment, unless the ministry of the church to save their consciences endure the penalties of a Præmunire. On the other hand the same connection of Church and State has given to presbyters a veto on the proceedings of the bishops so nominated. The benefit of this as a counterpoise was signally shewn by the defeat of the attempt of the bishops of the Revolution period to tamper with the Prayer Book.

We have now to trace the origin of our form of synod. Our position is, that the form in which the clergy were necessarily convened for state purposes and for matters in which the temporalities of the Church were concerned, has been accepted and adopted by the Church as the form of her proper synod.

Under the Normans the public assemblies of the kingdom were the Concilium, Magnum Concilium, Commune Concilium, Curia, Baronagium. [See Parry's Parliaments and Councils of England, 1839, Introd. p. x.] The last two were courts of justice. The first was the king's ordinary council; the second, a larger assembly of persons of rank and property, convened on extraordinary occasions. The Commune Concilium was a still more numerous body collected together for more general purposes. This larger assembly appears in the Great Charter by John, A.R. 17, A.D. 1215, where he promises to summon all archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls and greater barons personally, and all other tenants in chief under the crown by the sheriffs and bailiffs, to meet and to assess aids and scutages when necessary. In the forty-ninth year of Henry III., A.D. 1265, the sheriffs were directed to return two knights for each county, two citizens for each city, and two burgesses for every borough; and from that epoch we may date the constitution of parliament. Under Edward I. the constitution of parliament settled into a form very nearly approaching the present form. Meanwhile, under Henry II., the lay and ecclesiastical jurisdictions had been completely separated, and the clergy were become amenable to no other than ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The king assumed a right to compel the attendance of the prelates in respect of their lay fees alone, and the clergy claimed the right to be taxed as such, only of their own gift, and in their separate and distinct conventions. For this purpose it became necessary to bring the clergy together. The pure episcopal synod had no power of taxing the inferior clergy. The bishops might recommend a subsidy or benevolence, but they could not enforce its payment. Consequently there appear in our records a large number of conventions of the clergy, over and above the pure episcopal synods. In these the system of representation was gradually introduced, for the same end mainly which caused its introduction into parliament, viz., taxation, and for dealing in other ways with the temporalities of the Church. Pure episcopal synods were held in the same period, but they could not do the work of conventions, while every convention might pass into a synod, there being no reason why the clergy who were summoned on account of their rights of property should not be of council with their bishops in purely ecclesiastical matters. Thus gradually the pure episcopal synods were disused, their business thrown into the conventions: and the conventions which were always regularly summoned by the archbishop, or the Pope's legate, completing their form, became our convocations, our proper provincial councils.

It would be far beyond our limits to attempt a complete survey of the conventions and councils of this transition period; but we may give some leading instances.

A.D. 1195. To a legatine council are summoned archdeacons, priors, rural deans, "personæ ecclesiarum." Repairs of churches from the endowments of the livings, and the farming of churches and tithes are treated of. [Hody, Hist. of Councils, part iii. p. 80. Johnson, Canons, ii. 75.]

A.D. 1237. To a legatine council the priors installed bring letters of proxy from their chapters; constitutions are made on the farming of churches. [Hody, iii. 95; Johnson, ii. 150.]

A.D. 1240. The rectors of churches are summoned. For the legate had demanded of the bishops a benevolence of a fifth for the pope. The bishops reply, "Omnes tangit hoc negotium, omnes igitur sunt conveniendi:" and the legate convenes the rectors of Berkshire and some others, endeavouring to persuade them to a contribution. Their answer in the Burton Annals runs in the name of all the rectors of England, and it sufficiently appears, says Hody, that all the rectors of churches in England were present in that council. [Hody, iii. 101.]

A.D. 1277. An archiepiscopal convention. Proctors of the clergy are summoned. The mandate refers to a "congregatio" lately held at Northampton, when sundry business was proposed, "in quorum executione licet viæ de communi consilio excogitatæ fuissent, et executores viarum . . . deputati, quia tamen . . . adhuc exitus est incertus," &c. This must be understood, we suppose, of a subsidy granted at Northampton by prelates only, and the payment refused, on which account the clergy are summoned [Wake, State of the Church, app. xv.].

A.D. 1279. A council was held at Reading of bishops only. They command that at their next assembly, "Veniant duo electi ad minus a clero episcopatuum singulorum, qui auctoritatem habeant una nobiscum tractare de his quæ ecclesiæ communi utilitati expediant Anglicanæ, etiamsi de conturbatione [sic Lyndwood] aliqua vel expensis oporteat fieri mentionem." [Lyndwood, Constitutiones Peccham. p. 25.] Johnson [Canons, ii. p. 268] translates this last clause, "if a proposal should be made concerning a contribution or expense," proposing to read "contributione." He adds, "It is asserted by some that this last paragraph is in none of the ancient copies." It is found, however, in a provincial of the fourteenth century [Cambridge Univ. Library, Dd. ix. 38]. This book belonged to Reading Abbey, and must be held of good authority in this case, for the Abbey of Reading would surely preserve accurate records of the Council of Reading. And it reads "contributione," which Johnson saw to be necessary; and in place of "etiamsi" has "et" with "si" written above it. It is easy to understand the omission in ordinary copies. This last constitution was looked upon as not of general concernment.

A.D. 1280. At a convention for granting a subsidy the clergy are present.

A.D. 1281. Diocesan proctors do not appear, and there is no call for a subsidy [Hody, iii. 130].

A.D. 1282. Two proctors for each diocese appear. After the convention of 1281, two pure episcopal synods were held. In the interval between them, the bishops and prelates were summoned by the archbishop, in consequence of a royal wish, but the assembly being convened for a subsidy, and the proctors of the diocesan clergy not being summoned, it was looked upon as irregular, and nothing was done. In the mandate for the new assembly, the clergy are required to debate upon the business (of the subsidy) in their respective dioceses, and to appoint two of their body to go up to convocation to give in their resolutions.

The pure episcopal synods did not at once cease. Such were held A.D. 1295 [Hody, iii. 147]; A.D. 1310 [Wake, p. 260]. In 1313, W. Reynolds, intending to summon a synod of his suffragans, is prevented by a royal writ, enjoining him to summon both bishops and clergy [Hody, iii. 170].

Again, while the inferior clergy are thus peremptorily summoned when a subsidy is required, they are at other times invited to attend the episcopal synod: as A.D. 1312; "Denuntietis decanis et prioribus . . . eorumque capitulis quod si ad idem concilium venerint, et ad id petierint se admitti, juxta juris exigentiam admittentur" [Wake, app. xlvii]. In 1341, the archdeacons are invited, "si eis expediens videatur," and the clergy by proctors "si sua crediderint interesse" [Wake, app. lxxxviii]. In 1342, "si eis utile videatur," "si sua prospexerint interesse" [Wake, app. lxxxix]. This clearly marks the steps by which the pure episcopal synod was brought to the form of the convention.

It must be remarked that in A.D. 1295, the præmunientes clause was inserted in the bishops parliamentary writs. This clause summoned the proctors of the clergy to parliament, and doubtless aided not a little to fix that representation of the clergy in conventions and synods which had before been begun. For the clergy, chosen in obedience to the præmunientes clause, would naturally be the same as those chosen for the conventions and synods. There was also occasionally, during a few years, a provincial execution of the parliament writ [Wake, p. 260], which tended the same way. The attempt to bring the clergy into parliament made them more punctual in assembling in convocation. If they voted subsidies in convocation their attendance in parliament would be dispensed with. By such steps our convocations were formed. "The civil property of the clergy could not be disposed of but by their own consent, and the necessity of having this gave them a negative upon the bishops in subsidies, which was then the chief business of convocation: the canons and constitutions of the Church being for many ages after (i.e. after the first accounts of a convocation or convention) constantly made in synods, consisting only of the archbishop and his provincial bishops. But the affairs of the church, as they came to be transacted in convocation, fell under the rule and methods that had been established there upon civil accounts; by which means the inferior clergy came into the same share in the ecclesiastical that they had enjoyed in the secular business: and custom has given them a legal claim to several privileges of that kind unknown to the primitive presbyters, or even to the presbyters of any other episcopal church at this day" [Gibson, Syn. Angl. p. 10. Compare Mod. Univ. Hist. xxxiii. 18, quoted in Blackstone, regarding the diet of Sweden].

One advantage of these peculiar privileges of the clergy has been noticed already, the safeguard, namely, against crown influence through the nomination of bishops. Another great advantage is that the synod so formed gathers into itself the results of the consultations of the clergy and bishops in their diocesan synods. The proctors are the representatives of synods, of consulting bodies, not as in the case of members of parliament of a mere aggregation of independent electors. In great matters which require decision, the proctors may be, and ought to be, instructed by the synods which accredit them. On this point there is much misconception current. For example, a New Zealand prelate writes [Col. Church Chron. Feb. 1869, p. 41]: "The lay representatives (not delegates observe: for they, with their clerical brethren, claim the freedom of members of the House of Commons to vote according to their own views, and not to be merely the mouthpieces of their constituents) were," &c. Now, on the one hand, the freedom of members of parliament is sadly abridged by the pledges which they are forced to make on the hustings, when they are the representatives of an unconsulting and often unreflecting body of constituents; and, on the other hand, it is by no means fair to describe the man who has joined in consultation with his constituents, and is chosen to represent them because he is the best fitted to express their common opinion, as the mere mouthpiece of those constituents. He does not the less express his own views, because he expresses at the same time the views of his synod. He takes far higher ground when he can allege, in addition to his own opinion, the deliberate sentence of a synod. In the present attempt to revive convocation, this matter has been unaccountably neglected: and here we have probably the great cause of the weakness of convocation. A pure episcopal synod has its advantages: a representation of the clergy has its advantages. The present state of convocation loses both one and the other. The bishops cannot consult as they would if they had no lower house to deal with, and the lower house is not what it ought to be to them, an expression of the deliberate judgment of the body of the clergy. Until our diocesan synods are revived, the proctors cannot hold their proper place in convocation, and the action of that body will remain weak as it is now. Nor can the conferences which are coming into fashion take the place of the synods: for they are mere voluntary assemblies for discussion, useful in their way perhaps, but with no powers, rights, or privileges, under no necessity of proceeding to action, and with no legal connection with convocation.

To return, then, to that which is the theory of convocation, and which it is hoped will soon be again its practice.

The two convocations thus formed make by their connection the "sacred synod" of Canon cxxxix., the "true Church of England by representation." It meets concurrently with every parliament, but by the Act of Submission, based upon the promise of the clergy [25, Hen. VIII. c. 19], it cannot "presume to attempt, allege, clayme, or put in ure any constitucions or ordinaunce provynciall or synodalles, or any other canons, nor shall enact, promulge, or execute any suche canons or ordinaunce provynciall . . . onles the same clergie may have the kynges most royal assent and license . . ." Short of making canons, however, the convocation may consult, petition, recommend. But the debates for these purposes may at any time be cut short by an injunction to the archbishop to prorogue or dissolve.

Archbishop Parker's form of holding convocations and of choosing the prolocutor, which is still followed (with the omission, it is feared, of the celebration of the Holy Eucharist), was printed by Kennett, and is prefixed to his History of the last Convocation [1730]. It was reprinted with additional notes in Synodalia [London, 1853].

Each convocation consists of two houses, the lower house meeting under a prolocutor chosen by the clergy, and presented for approval to the President. In the province of York the distinction between the two houses has not been observed, except on occasions of bonâ fide transaction of business, whence it has been commonly but erroneously said that the Convocation of York consists but of one house [Trevor, The Two Convocations, 1852, p. 126]. The upper house is the true locus synodi, as is evident from a consideration of the nature of a provincial council; and the prolocutor of the lower house is the referendary or reporter of all messages from the upper house, and moderates the debates of the lower in the stead of the archbishop [Gibson, Syn. A. p. 294]. The archbishops are presidents of the whole convocation, acting (except when a mandate from the crown is received) "cum consensu fratrum," having the right to require the clergy to consider any particular business throughout the convocation, to prescribe a time for the return of such business, to require it to be delivered in writing, to order committees of the lower house, or a committee of the whole house, to require the attendance of the prolocutor or of the house, and within the limits allowed by the royal mandates to appoint the days of session, and to prorogue accordingly. But the archbishop, as a distinct element of the convocation, has also his peculiar rights and powers; he "has a veto on all measures, a privilege which he retains for himself whenever another bishop presides for him; he has the right of giving leave of absence of the members of the lower house, and of absolving or punishing them for their absence in other cases; of admitting or refusing proxies, and of determining controverted elections" [Cardwell, Synodalia, preface, p. xix.]

The rights of the lower house are reduced by Gibson [p. 112] to these four heads: To present their own and the Church's grievances to the president and bishops; to offer to their lordships their petitions of any other kind; to be with them as a part of the judicature upon persons convened and examined in convocation; to dissent finally from any matter, so as to hinder its passing into a synodical act. These being acknowledged privileges of the lower house, it follows that so much of independent action and separate authority as is necessary for the due exercise of these privileges must be conceded to the lower house; otherwise the great principle of a synod must be held firm—that the synod is one, a body of presbyters in council with their bishops under the archbishop, who is the moderator of the whole convocation, not the speaker of the upper house; that the lower house accordingly is subordinate to the upper, and not coordinate with it; that the true strength of the lower house lies in their conjunction with the bishops, not in independence of them. Regarding the power of the archbishop, the opinions of Sir F. Thesiger, Sir W. P. Wood, and Dr. R. Phillimore [London, 1853], should be carefully studied.

Convocations

Regarding the concurrent action of the two convocations, the formal and most regular mode is that the resolutions of one council be transmitted to the other council and fully considered. In 1661 several clergymen were commissioned to sit and act as proctors of York, in the Convocation of Canterbury [Lathbury, Hist. of Convoc. pp. 286-7].

It remains now to name (we can scarcely do more) the business which our convocations have transacted since the Act of Submission. Our concern is with convocation as it stands at present, and it was the Act of Submission that changed its status. Prior to that act the archbishop of each province could assemble his provincial synod at his pleasure; or when the convocation met at command of the king, he could dissolve it when the business of the crown was finished, or continue the synod for other purposes, at his pleasure. But by the Act of Submission four points are settled. First, that the convocation can only be assembled by the king's writ; secondly, that when assembled it cannot proceed to make new canons without a royal license, which is a quite separate act from the permission to assemble; thirdly, that having agreed upon canons, in conformity with the royal license, they cannot be published or take effect until confirmed by the sovereign; fourthly, that even with the royal authority no canon can be enacted against the laws and customs of the land, or the king's prerogative [Lathbury, Hist. of Convoc. p. 110]. The second point was stated even more strongly by the judges, 8 James I. [Coke's Reports, xii. p. 92], who say that the convocation cannot confer to constitute any canons without license.

I. Convocations 1534-1559. Regarding these, Fuller [Ch. Hist. v. p. 188] remarks: "Upon serious examination it will appear that there was nothing done in the reformation of religion save what was asked by the clergy in their convocation, or grounded on some act of theirs precedent to it, with the advice, counsel, and consent of the bishops and most eminent churchmen, confirmed upon the postfact, and not otherwise by the civil sanction, according to the usage of the best and happiest times of Christianity." Dr. Hook, quoting this passage [Life of Cranmer, ii. 210], remarks, "Mr. Joyce, in his able and learned History of Sacred Synods, brings proof for the confirmation of this assertion in every particular." Thus,

A.D.

1534. Declaration that the Pope has no greater authority in England than any other foreign prelate.

1536. Fifty-nine Popular Errors complained of: and the Ten Articles of Religion carried [Collier, iv. 359, ed. 1852].

1539. The Six Articles approved.

1542. First book of Homilies introduced and authorized, published in 1547.

1543. Necessary Doctrine and Erudition confirmed.

1544. The Litany nearly in its present form authorized.

1547. Communion in both kinds. Repeal of Prohibition of Marriage of Clergy voted for. Edward VI.'s First Service Book approved.

1550. Revision of Liturgy considered.

1552. Cranmer's Forty-two Articles ratified. Edward VI.'s Catechism authorized by delegates of the Convocation.

1553. Only six of the Lower House own the Reformation. "It was not difficult for the Government to pack both the parliament and the convocation" [Hook. Life of Cranmer, ii. 321].

1554. Convocation absolved by Pole.

1558. Various matters of discipline treated of preparatory to presentation to Cardinal Pole.

1559. "It would have been chimerical to have expected anything from that convocation which assembled with Elizabeth's first parliament; and therefore the work (of reviewing the Book of Common Prayer) was entrusted to a committee" [Lathbury, Hist. of Convoc. p. 158].

Such in brief was the action of convocation in the former part of our Reformation. Other and less creditable determinations must be named. Convocation, which had before declared the nullity of Catherine's marriage to Henry, confirmed in 1536 the divorce of Anne Boleyn, and in 1539 resolved that the marriage of Ann of Cleves should be set aside. It is saying but little for the spirituality to remark [see Joyce, p. 403] that the praise or blame of these proceedings must be shared by the temporalty. Who ought to be foremost in defending the right? In the case of Anne of Cleves there must be something yet untold. Her letter to her brother, given by Burnet, cannot be explained except on the supposition that she wrote it under compulsion, or that there was something behind which she would not have dragged to light. As the matter came before convocation [see the detail in Joyce] we can only call their conduct a disgraceful compliance with the king's wickedness. Our sense of this neutralizes perhaps what otherwise might have been justly said of the former cases, that it is easy to conceive a righteous judge sincerely believing that the marriage with Catherine was null, and obliged to declare it so, however much he might feel for Catherine, and however well aware he might be of the king's criminal passion for Anne Boleyn: and in the case of Anne Boleyn, that her confession to just and lawful impediments, coupled with the sentence of the archbishops' court, might be sufficient grounds for the convocations proceeding, so as to free them from the charge of conscious injustice. A most painful disclosure has been made of late as to Cranmer's part in these proceedings [see Christian Remembrancer, April 1868, p. 243]. From such disgrace, at least, the convocation is free. Probably the truth is, that the minds of men had been so familiarized by the action of the Court of Rome to the thought of dispensations and divorces, that they were ready to determine rather according to their views of expediency and state policy than according to strict rules of right and wrong. The members of convocation had denied the Pope's supremacy, but they had been all trained in the maxims of Rome.

Convocations

Convocations from 1559 to 1662. This may be called the second part of the Reformation period. From the renouncing the Pope's supremacy to the settlement under Charles II. there was no rest. On the settlement under Charles II. we have rested during the last two hundred years. On the 20th December 1661, the Reformed Book of Common Prayer—the last version of the Use of Sarum and the other ancient uses of the English Church—was adopted and subscribed by the clergy of both houses of convocation, and of both provinces of the Church. A copy of the new Prayer Book, with the Great Seal attached, was delivered with a royal message to Parliament on the 25th of February 1662. The Bill of Uniformity having passed the Lords on the 9th of April, received the royal assent on the 19th of May, and thus became part of the law of the land [Hook. Lives of Archbishops, new ser. i. p. 144]. In the transactions which issued in this settlement our provincial synods bore their part.

The first parliament of Queen Elizabeth not only repealed the acts of Mary, and so restored matters to the state in which they stood at Edward's death, but also introduced certain alterations into the Prayer Book [see them in Keeling's Liturgiæ Britannicæ]. It has been usually thought that this was done in an irregular manner, without the concurrence of convocation [see Joyce, S. Synods, p. 543]; but Mr. Joyce has lately discovered a document which makes it probable that the alterations were framed by an episcopal synod [Civil Power in relation to the Church, p. 135]. In any case matters soon returned to their constitutional course.

The Eleven Articles of 1559-60 were intended as no more than a provisional test of orthodoxy, which in practice would be superseded when articles should be passed with full synodical and royal authority [Hardwicke, Hist. of Art. p. 120].

A.D.

1562. The Articles were revised and reduced to their present form and number; the Archbishop of York and his suffragans subscribing on behalf of their province. Nowell's Catechism was authorised. Nowell published also an abridgment, and a third or smaller catechism, which differs but slightly from the present catechism. It is probable that Overall abridged the questions and answers on the sacraments from this catechism [Lathbury, p. 168]. The recognition of the Homilies is involved in subscription to the Articles.

1571. The Articles are again confirmed and subscribed. Canons were drawn up and authorized by the upper house, but from some unexplained cause were not submitted to the lower house. These canons authorized Foxe's Martyrology; so that the necessity of the concurrence of the lower house has saved us from the burden of Foxe's falsehoods.

1575. A book of articles of discipline was passed, several of which are embodied in our present canons.

1584. Other articles, as in 1575.

1597. Constitutions were made in matters of discipline.

1604. The consideration of the canons was the commencement of the regular synodical business. The canons were in all probability collected and arranged by Bancroft from the Royal Injunctions, synodical acts, and articles of the reigns of Edward and Elizabeth. The canons were agreed upon with the king's license.

The Prayer Book was revised and published in 1604, but it was not submitted to convocation. "The book so revised received full synodical sanction by the canons of 1603-4. As soon as their own synodical authority was established by both provinces, the alterations in the Prayer Book received the formal approbation of the whole English Church" [Joyce, p. 631].

1605. Overall's Convocation book was sanctioned, but it was not confirmed by royal authority.

1640. A Pontifical was designed, but the design failed. Seventeen canons were passed and confirmed by the king's letters patent. Regarding these canons, see the note, Cardwell, Synodalia, i. 380. Cardwell states that the statute 13 Car. II. c. 12, leaves them to their own proper synodical authority, and merely provides that nothing contained in that statute shall give them the force of an act of parliament.

1661. Occasional services were made: the form of adult baptism, and forms for January 30th and May 29th. But the great business was the revision of the Prayer Book, by which it was brought into its present state, solemnly subscribed and passed: after which the amendments were considered in the privy council, and the book sent to the House of Lords, that the Act of Uniformity might refer to it. "Canons were not concluded, though the convocation had been authorized to treat of them; and it appears that some powerful influence was used to prevent the two houses from proceeding with that important business." Lathbury, p. 296. Lathbury refers to Kennet's Register, p. 630, and Barwick's Life, p. 325, English translation. Upon the whole, Mr Joyce's words quoted before regarding the former period may be fairly applied to this period also. It should be remarked that of this most important convocation, we have the original register of the upper house, and minutes of the lower house. See Gibson's catalogue of remaining acts and registers prefixed to Synodus Anglicana.

In 1664, by an arrangement between Hyde and Sheldon, the clergy waived their right of taxing themselves,—"the greatest alteration," Bishop Gibson said, "ever made in the constitution without an express law." The change has contributed greatly to the strength of other causes which led to the disuse of synods.

Into the long and dreary controversy between the two houses immediately after the Revolution it is not proposed to enter. The principles upon which a solution of the points in debate might with no great difficulty have been found have already been shewn. The action of the lower house has also been referred to as shewing the benefit which may arise from the clergy having a veto on the proceedings of bishops appointed by the crown without reference to the Church. The proposals of the commissioners of 1689 for the revision of the Liturgy are well-known. They were printed by order of the House of Commons in 1854. These proposals the lower house of convocation did not wait to receive. Their determination was shewn by their amending the bishops' address to the crown, which ranked the Church of England with other Protestant bodies. Into whatever errors (and certainly these were not a few) the lower house afterwards fell, there is no doubt that their firmness saved us from the proposals of the commissioners, which were probably transcripts of the wishes of William. The representation of Hoadly's errors was the last word of convocation, a not unfit word to close for a long period the services which that venerable body had rendered to the truth.

The recent revival of convocation is beyond the scope of this article.

COUNCILS. To the middle of the fifth century. More than twenty years had elapsed from the death of Christ before the first legislative council was held at Jerusalem.[1] It was the pattern followed by all others. The peculiar dignity of Jerusalem determined here the presiding authority, and James, Bishop of Jerusalem, evidently occupied the chief position; though St. Peter, through whose agency the first Gentile convert had been baptized, was naturally the first spokesman. At this council the rite of circumcision was declared to be no longer binding upon Christians; viewing the pagan class with which the Church had now to deal, the laws of purity were made more stringent, and the eating of blood was forbidden; for though in appearance this was a matter of Jewish law, it was of universal obligation, dating from the very cradle of the human race.

In primitive times, each Church having its own independent action, councils were held with sufficient frequency; their synodal acts had only a local authority; though since matters of the deepest moment were discussed in them, the decisions of each Church, so far as they agreed with Catholic consent, became the rule adopted by others. The so-called Apostolical Canons are known to have existed at a very early date,[2] before the canons of particular councils were kept distinct; and they have every appearance of being a collection of such canons as had been passed before the end of the third century by various independent churches.[3] The thirtieth of these Apostolical Canons orders that in every province two councils shall be held yearly; one four weeks after Pentecost, the other on the 12th of October[4] (Ὑπερβερεταίου ἀβ). Thus, the first Council summoned by Cyprian to meet the Novatian schism, assembled at Carthage after the bishops had celebrated Easter in their respective dioceses, A.D. 251. And again in the next year, Easter having fallen on the 11th of April, a council was held on the 15th of May. The frequency of the councils held in the African Church indicates that some such Church rule as that cited was observed in the third century; and when the Council of Nice decreed that two councils should be held every year [can. v.], it only enjoined observance of the ancient rule, the time being changed to the early year, before the commencement of Lent, while any optional time might be taken in the fall of the year.

Tertullian, writing before the close of the second century, shews that councils were already held in Greece. "Councils are held in certain localities throughout Greece of all the churches, whereat matters of deeper moment are treated in common, and the presence of all Christendom[5] is celebrated with much veneration" [Adv. Psych.

[1] Acts xv. Other apostolical assemblies had preceded, such as in Acts i. for filling up the apostolate, vi. for instituting the office of deacon, and ix. for receiving St. Paul into the apostolic body; but they had no legislative character, and issued no synodal letters, being purely of an administrative nature.

[2] Alexander of Alexandria appealed to them [A.D. 321], as shewing that bishops excommunicate could not be received into communion by other bishops: τῷ μήτε τὸν Ἀποστολικὸν κανόνα τοῦτο συγχωρεῖν [Theod. Hist.]. "Qui apostolorum dicuntur canones, ut ab ecclesiâ primitivâ constituti et collecti Codex Canonum Ecclesiæ Primitivæ meritissimo jure nuncupantur [Bevereg. Jud. sec. 14].

[3] Firmilian, in his Ep. to Cyprian [ep. 75, sec. 3], says that the convention of yearly synods was a matter of course before the Council of Iconium, about A.D. 231: "Qua ex causa necessario apud nos fit, ut per singulos annos seniores et præpositi in unum conveniamus, ad disponenda ea quæ curæ nostræ commissa sunt."

[4] The time fixed by the Council of Antioch (of the Dedication) A.D. 341, was the fourth week after Easter, and the ides, or 10th of Ὑπερβ.

[5] "Representatio totius Christiani nominis."

13]. The settlement of the Canon of Scripture had been matter of deliberation, for the same writer says that "the Pastor of Hermas would have obtained a place in Scripture if it had not been adjudged to be apocryphal and false by every council of the churches" [de Pudic. 10]. Eusebius mentions several councils having been held upon the Paschal question, and instances the presiding bishops and synodal letters of those held in Palestine, Rome, Pontus, Gaul, Osroena, besides private letters from the Bishop of Corinth and others.[1] He also says that the most grievous infliction under Licinius was the interdict laid by him on the synodal functions of the Church, for "in councils alone can matters of importance be determined."[2]

The spirit that animated these more primitive councils was doubtless such as Fleury has described [2me. Disc. tom. viii. sec. 8.] They were religious acts, and those who took part in them were guided by the will of God, as read in His Word, and exhibited in the simultaneous practice of the Church catholic; there was neither struggle for pre-eminence nor unfair advantage taken of opponents;[3] modesty of opinion was accompanied with deference for the thoughts and spiritual experiences of others; the wisest counsels were honestly sought and loyally carried into practice. Mutual respect, as a bond of union, gave to such assemblies an immense force, and as whole assemblies of honest, right-thinking men cannot be corrupted, so it is easy to guide them by rules of equity and judgment. Thus one or two prelates of sagacity and spiritual knowledge infused their spirit into the rest, who felt themselves swayed by the guidance of wisdom, humility, and charity. The placita of such councils easily obtained the force of law, even beyond the limits of legitimate authority.

These councils, meeting with the sanction of the metropolitan,[4] and under the presidency of the senior bishop, elected to vacant sees, the laity also having a voice;[5] no extraneous bishop having any right to interfere. They took cognizance of the doctrine and discipline of the Church, as in the case of the Paschal controversy, and the condemnation at Alexandria of Origen's opinions [A.D. 230], of Beryllus in a council in Arabia,[6] of Noëtus,[7] Privatus[8] at Carthage, and Paul of Samosata[9] at Antioch. They pronounced with authority on points of Catholic practice; thus it appears that infant baptism was the rule of primitive antiquity, because the council held at Carthage [A.D. 252] declared that the Christian sacrament need not follow the analogy of the Jewish rite of circumcision, or be limited to the eighth day.[10] The laws of the Church were administered by councils, which were also the supreme court of appeal, as a check upon any undue severity of particular bishops.

In the third century, the Novatian schism, as exterminating in its severity, gave scope to much synodal action. The penitential canons of the council of Antioch, borrowed in their leading features from the Apostolical Canons, gave the tone to many subsequent canons of the African church. Their primitive severity was gradually toned down, and whereas, at first, certain classes of penitents were never to be readmitted to communion, the council of Nice at length declared that no offender should be allowed to die without the viaticum. Still primitive severity was mildness, when compared with the unreasoning cruelty of the Novatian discipline in the case of those who had lapsed in the Decian persecution. The principal councils held in consequence of the Novatian schism, and to provide for the case of the lapsed, were those of Antioch, A.D. 252, and of Carthage, A.D. 251, 253.

The Novatian schism having died away, another replaced it on the question of heretical baptism, whether it were to be deemed valid or not. The Apostolical Canons xxxviii. xxxix. clearly pronounced against it, and a council of Carthage under Agrippinus[11] had committed itself to the same decided opinion.

Tertullian,[12] the great authority of the African Church, having been too implicitly followed, another council held at Iconium,[13] under Firmilian, about A.D. 231, reaffirmed the same regulation; as did the council held [A.D. 256] at Carthage under Cyprian, which included also the Numidian bishops. The Church of Mauritania[14] recognised, with the rest of the catholic Church,

[1] Euseb. Hist. v. 23.

[2] Eus. Vit. Const. i. 51.

[3] An exception to this rule helps out the proof. When Victor, Bishop of Rome, threatened to excommunicate Polycrates and the quartodeciman party in the East, he was dissuaded from his purpose by Irenæus, as the mouthpiece of the Gallican churches; a fragment of his letter remains, as evidence of the Christian charity in which it was composed. Many other churches united in the same prayer for peace [A.D. 198]. Cyprian's words to Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, are also to be noted: "Honoris etiam communis memores, et gravitatis sacerdotalis, ac sanctitatis respectum tenentes, ea quæ ex diverso in librum ad nos transmissum congesta fuerant acerbationibus criminosis respicimus, considerantes pariter et ponderantes, quod in tanto fratrum religiosoque conventu, considentibus Dei sacerdotibus, et altari posito, nec legi debeant nec audiri" [Ep. xlv. p. 87, ed. Oxon.]. In sad contrast with such statements are the words of Gregory Nazianzen, when a less orderly spirit had been introduced by the Arian party [Ep. lv. ad Procop.].

[4] Euseb. Hist. v. 23.

[5] Cypr. Ep. 67 to the churches of Leon and Astorga (synodal), where he says that the presence of the laity is essential in the election of bishops, "diligenter de traditione divina, et Apostolica observatione servandum est, quod apud nos quoque, et fere per provincias universas tenetur, ut ad ordinationes rite celebrandas, ac iam plebem cui Præpositus ordinatur Episcopi ejusdem provinciæ proximi quique conveniant et Episcopus deligatur, plebe præsente, quæ singulorum vitam plenissime novit," &c.

[6] Eus. H. E. vi. 20, A.D. 240.

[7] Hippol. c. Noet. 1, A.D. 230.

[8] Cypr. Ep. 59. ad Corn. in a council of ninety bishops, A.D. 240.

[9] A.D. 265 and 269.

[10] Synodal letter. Ep. Cypr. 64, ad Fidum.

[11] Cypr. ad Jubaianum, Ep. 73, p. 199, ed. Oxon.

[12] Tert. de Bapt. c. 15, and de Pudic. 19. Cui enim dubium est hæreticum . . veniam consequi, et in ecclesiam redigi? unde et apud nos ut ethnico par, immo et super ethnicum, hæreticus etiam per baptisma veritatis utroque homine purgatus admittitur.

[13] Ep. Firmil. ap. Cypr. Ep. 75, secs. 6, 13, 19.

[14] Cypr. Ep. 71, ad Quintum.

the validity of heretical baptism, provided that it were administered in the name of the Holy Trinity. Stephen, bishop of Rome, on receipt of Cyprian's synodal letter, refused to hold communion with any who held the views therein expressed. The African church, however, continued to declare itself against heretical baptism; but matters did not approach nearer to an open rupture, and the smouldering embers of discord were finally quenched by the decree of the Council of Nice, which made re-baptism necessary only in the case of the followers of Paul of Samosata, who baptized, but not with the Trinitarian formula. In fact, it was the rise of this heresy that compelled the catholic Church to draw more closely the bonds of charity and love between all whose differences were not of a vital character.

The heresy of Paul, bishop of Antioch, gave rise to two councils at Antioch within four years of each other. A Jew in all his sympathies, he explained the mystery of the Incarnation on Neo-Platonic principles, and declared that our Lord in His human nature was the outward manifestation of the Logos, as in the Platonic philosophy man is the material embodiment of the Divine idea of humanity previously existing. He denied the pre-existence of Christ, otherwise than as subsisting in the Deity from whence the Logos emanated and became united with Christ.[1] From the fusion of the two arose a third substance compounded of the Godhead and Manhood, as electrum is a mixture of gold and silver. It contained the poison of many heresies. It declared with the Ebionite of earliest times, that after the existence of the Manhood had commenced, the Divine principle was united with it; with the Sabellian, that the Logos was an emanation from the Deity; and it paved the way for the Apollinarian and Eutychian errors by a confusion of the two natures. A council was held at Antioch [A.D. 265], when Paul acknowledged his error, and judgment was deferred. But as he obstinately persisted in teaching his heresy, he was formally condemned, and deposed from the see of Antioch [A.D. 269]. His history, which in every respect is a wretched one, need not be pursued further.

No other council of importance was held during the remainder of the third century. In A.D. 305, a council was held at Elvira (Illiberis) in Spain, near Granada, the canons of which, from their number and from their application to a state of things that no longer existed in the fourth century, would seem to have been partly formed from the canons of preceding councils. The eighty-one canons imply a close contest between paganism and Christianity that might have been true enough a century previously, but was now out of date; e.g., the forty-first canon forbids the faithful to tolerate idols in their houses. There was a time when the house was divided against itself, but it was now past. Also by canon lx., if a Christian be killed for breaking in pieces an idol, he is denied the honour of martyrdom. Paganism was in the ascendant, and was not to be rashly provoked; from such slight sparks the fiercest flames of persecution had been developed. There is also a tone of severity about them that was softened down in the acts of subsequent councils after the rise of Novatianism. Communion even sub articulo mortis was denied to those who had relapsed into idolatry or committed other mortal sin; but this was corrected at Ancyra [can. vi.] and Nice [can. xii.], as savouring of Novatian rigour. The clergy might not attend fairs and markets [can. xi.], but might send their sons to traffic for them, showing that as yet the Church of Spain was possessed of no "ricca dote." The married clergy, whether bishops, priests, or deacons, were to live apart from their wives [can. xxxiii.]. The twenty-fifth of the Apostolical Canons was reproduced, which forbids the excommunicated to be received again into communion by any but their own bishop [can. liii.]. Mural paintings were forbidden in churches by can. xxxvi.

The Donatist schism dates from the council held at Carthage, A.D. 312, for the purpose of filling the see rendered vacant by the death of Mensurius. Cæcilianus was duly elected by the clergy and laity, and consecrated by Felix, bishop of the neighbouring diocese of Aptungis. The new bishop having demanded restoration of property belonging to the church from two of the laity, Donatus headed a faction against him, and denied the validity of his consecration, inasmuch as it had not been solemnized by the Primate of Numidia. But custom required that the consecrating bishop should be of the province of Carthage, which the Numidian bishop was not; so custom enjoined that the Bishops of Rome should be consecrated by the neighbouring Bishop of Ostia. The Donatist party therefore elected Majorinus, and for many years continued to nominate their schismatical bishops. The first council summoned by order of the emperor was held at Rome [A.D. 313], to decide between the rival parties, when the election of Cæcilianus was confirmed, and Donatus excommunicated. Where two rival bishops filled one see, the compromise was effected of allowing priority of consecration to give legal possession, and some other church was found for the superseded prelate, who had the title also of chorepiscopus. It may be observed that the term "catholic" was applied to all public ecclesiastical documents from the period of these troubles.

The Donatist party obtained another hearing by the convocation of a council at Arles in Gaul, the next year, but with no other result. The canons passed, in number 22, had a certain general likeness to the Elviran. It was ordered that Easter should be celebrated by one rule on the Lord's day, and not by quartodeciman observance; that heretical candidates for admission to the church should be ordered to recite the "symbol" of faith in which they had been baptized, and if they had been baptized in the faith of the Trinity, that they should be received with imposition of hands, otherwise that they should be baptized. This gives the rationale of the nineteenth canon of the Council of Nice which directs that the followers of Paul of Samosata should be baptized, he having rejected the Trinitarian formula in baptism.

[1] The words of Justin Martyr shew that it was a revival of older error. Tryph. 128.

Councils

In A.D. 314, a council was held at Ancyra, the metropolis of Galatia, which framed twenty-five canons. The case of the lapsed was again taken into consideration, and a relaxation may be observed in the terms of penance awarded, which might be further mitigated by the indulgence of the bishop. The duties of the presbyter are stated incidentally to be preaching and the celebration; of deacons, the collection and administration of offerings, whether in alms or in payments to the clergy as salary; and to proclaim, i.e. to give the names of those who made their offerings at the altar, and to dismiss the congregation. Deacons are permitted to marry upon an engagement antecedent to ordination. The chorepiscopi [can. xiii.] are spoken of as the bishop's ordinaries in country parishes, having no power of ordination; and they are said, by the council held at Neocæsarea in Pontus this same year, to be analogous to the seventy disciples who were sent forth two and two by our Lord.[1]

This council framed also twenty-five canons. Catechumens[2] are shewn to have been classified as audientes, who were allowed to hear the prayers and the Word read; and the consistentes (συνιστάμενοι), who were allowed to join in the prayers, but not to participate in the oblation of the faithful. They coincide with the second and fourth classes of penitents, the first, or flentes, at the porch being omitted, and the third, or substrati (ὑποπίπτοντες), being also passed over. Thirty is made the canonical age for ordination to the presbyterate, on the analogy of our Lord's commencement of His ministry at that age; and priests are forbidden to marry. The deacons also are limited to seven, whatever might be the size of a city. A scriptural precedent that according to Fleury "on a toujours gardé a Rome" [H. E. x. 17]. The primitive abhorrence of second marriages is also indicated by interdicting presbyters from being present at the marriage feast.[3]

A darker cloud than any that had preceded now hung over the Church. Arius, a presbyter of Alexandria, at the commencement of the episcopate of Alexander, opposed his orthodox teaching by asserting that the Son was "created in time," and that there was "a time when He was not." He and his party were condemned in a council held at Alexandria [A.D. 320]. The Emperor Constantine was now, since his victory over Licinius at Hadrianople [A.D. 323], master of the world, and had time to think of ecclesiastical matters, with him a political rather than a religious duty. He had been persuaded, by favourers of the Arian party, that no vital doctrine was at issue; that a mere matter of logomachy between rival bishops distracted the world. He sent Hosius, therefore, Bishop of Cordova, to Alexandria to compose the strife, and to bring the churches of Christendom into harmony as regarded the observance of Easter; but his mission had no success. The first general council of bishops from every church throughout the world was then summoned to meet at Nice, as being contiguous to the imperial residence of Nicomedia. Three hundred and fifteen bishops there met in the hall of the palace,[4] on June 19th, 325.

The creed, as it was drawn up by the council, was a modification of the Creed of the Cæsarean Church produced by Eusebius the historian and bishop of that see. The term ὁμοούσιον was introduced; for the future, the lapis Lydius of orthodoxy; but it was carefully guarded by a definition of the sense in which it was used, and the precise shade of error against which it was designed to guard.

Eusebius, the Arianizing bishop of Nicomedia, declared that he would subscribe to no creed that declared the Son to be ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ Πατρός. There was no better term, therefore, to describe the common faith than the word ὁμοούσιος, provided that it was cleared from a certain amount of suspicion which attached to it from its use in the controversy raised by Paul of Samosata at Antioch. The term Logos had been used by St. John in the same way. Philosophy and heresy, her first-born, had used the term. St. John, writing by the Holy Spirit, allowed the use, but gave to the word its proper Divine meaning. The creed thus framed and explained was accepted by the council.

The Paschal controversy was also finally disposed of; for it was no longer to be tolerated that part of the Church[5] should be fasting, while the rest of the church was jubilant in the services of Easter morn. Uniformity was secured by observance of the cycle first calculated by Meton the astronomer, more than seven hundred years before; who had shewn that the recurrence of the moon's phases, as compared with the solar year, followed approximately a cycle of nineteen years. It was given in charge to Eusebius of Cæsarea[6] to draw out and explain the scheme.

The Meletian schism was also brought to an end (after twenty-four years of mischief) by the deposition of its author; and the precedent of the Roman compromise [A.D. 313] determined the claim of rival bishops in the same see.

Canons, twenty in number, were passed, applying principally to questions of discipline and prerogative; but with a marked relaxation of rigour in the prescribed periods of penance. Generally, it may be observed that canons were framed by the Church in its councils, not as introducing new matter, but as declaring Catholic practice, and as enforcing primitive discipline, with the application of well-proved tests to each novel phase of error; thus the thirteenth canon of Nice commands that in no case should the "viaticum" be denied to the dying, the precedent followed being ὁ παλαιὸς καὶ κανονικὸς νόμος. It was proposed that the married clergy should Χωρεπίσκοποι εἰσι μὲν εἰς τύπον τῶν ὁ. Can. xiii.

[2] See Bingham, xviii. 1, 3.

[3] Can. 7.

[4] Eus. V. Const. iii. 12.

[5] Syria and Mesopotamia.

[6] Eusebius super eodem Pascha canonem decem et novem annorum circulum composuit. Hieron. de Vir. Ill. lxi.

be charged to live apart from their wives, but all attempts in this direction were successfully resisted by Paphnutius,[1] himself an unmarried man of blameless life. The third canon disposed of a scandal, originally introduced by Paul of Samosata, and condemned by the twenty-seventh canon of Elvira. The fourth canon met the confusion caused by Donatus, and ordained that bishops should be consecrated by three of the same province;[2] introducing the term metropolitan for the first time as an ecclesiastical title. The sixth canon pronounces the three Patriarchs of Rome,[3] Alexandria and Antioch to be on an equal footing, and can. vii. reserves to the Bishop of Ælia (Jerusalem) his own prerogative of honour.[4] By canon v. two provincial councils are to be held yearly,[5] before Lent and in autumn. The same canon also forbids bishops from receiving into communion persons excommunicated in other dioceses; and it may be noted that in the preceding year, Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, complained that the excommunicated Arius had been received into communion, "contrary to the Canon Apostolic;" referring to Can. Ap. x. So also the forty-first and forty-second Apostolical Canons explain the rationale of canon xix., all baptism being invalid which was not administered in the Name of the Trinity. The tenth canon exhibits the extreme penance imposed upon those who lapsed, χωρὶς ἀνάγκης, in the Licinian troubles, as well as the different order of penitents. They were to do penance with the "audientes"[6] for three years, i.e., might hear the Scripture and homilies, but were interdicted from the communion of prayer; with the "substrati" for six years, i.e. permitted to hear on their knees the prayers of the Church in their behalf; and with the "consistentes" for two more years, in which they were allowed to be present at all the prayers of the celebration, but not to communicate.

[1] Socr. H. E. i. 11.

[2] When Augustine came over to England seven British bishops [Bede, ii. 2] met him in council; but the quatuordeciman rule that was followed as regards Easter shews that the British Church was a daughter of the Eastern. Gregory ignoring the existence of any British bishop, ordered Augustine to wait for the arrival of Gallican Bishops before he proceeded to consecrate new bishops, "in Anglorum Ecclesia, in qua adhuc tu solus Episcopus inveniris" [Bede, i. 27, viii. resp.]. How then was it a church at all?

[3] Constantinople was still Byzantium, an ordinary seaport, though a town of much mercantile life.

[4] Appeals lay from the See of Jerusalem to that of Cæsarea. [Hieron. ad Pamm. and Lib. adv. err. Joh. Jerus.; and Leo M., Ep. 62 ad Maxim. Antioch.] In other respects the precedent of James, Bishop of Jerusalem, Acts xv., may be observed to have been followed from various historical instances, e.g. at a Council held in Palestine about A.D. 196, Narcissus, Bishop of Jersualem, together with Theophilus, Bishop of Cæsarea, presided [Euseb. v. 23]; and at the Council of Ephesus, Juvenal, Bishop of Jerusalem, claimed to have judicial cognizance, according to Apostolical tradition, over the Bishop of Antioch.

[5] Can. Apost. xxx. prescribes the fourth week after Pentecost for the first, which would fall after the Syrian harvest, and the 12th October (Hyperberetæi xii.).

[6] Compare also Can. Laodic. xix. See also Bingham, xviii. 1, and Cabassutius, Not. Conc. xx.

Synodal epistles are not of less importance than canons, and have much historical interest as indicating the circumstances that led to these marked points in ecclesiastical history, and stereotyped, as it were, the truth for subsequent ages. Such an epistle was now addressed by the council to the church of Alexandria, and to the other churches throughout Catholic Christendom.

Throughout the century, until the second general council was held at Constantinople [A.D. 381], the restless ambition of the Arian party kept the Church in a continual state of turmoil. After that period the evil was finally ejected from the Church, and became their only principle of union to the barbarian hordes that overran the Romish empire in its decline. Arian councils were held to upset, if possible, the work that had been done at Nice; the great Athanasius, as the champion of orthodoxy, being the especial mark of Arian hatred. At the Council of Tyre [A.D. 335] he was accused of the blackest crimes, even of murder, and the hand of his victim was produced; but the murdered man presented himself also before the council alive and well. Yet Athanasius was excommunicated and driven into exile, the Meletian party acting as accusers, the Arian as judge. The sentence was confirmed by a similar council, that "of the Dedication," at Antioch [A.D. 341]. For the next twelve years Arianism, supported by court influence, continued unchecked in its course of intrigue and violence [A.D. 347]. The Council of Sardica under Mount Hæmus interposed a temporary resistance, and reversed the sentence passed upon Athanasius. But he was again deposed by the Council of Milan [A.D. 355], and a price set upon his head. Five bishops voluntarily shared his banishment—Dionysius of Milan, Lucifer of Cagliari, Eusebius of Vercelles, Hilary of Poictiers, and Liberius of Rome. The answer of the latter is on record,[7] when money was offered to him for his journey by an officer of the court: "You have laid waste the churches throughout the world, and you offer me alms as a culprit, ἄπελθε, πρῶτον γενοῦ Χριστιανός." Si ita semper! At the Council of Sirmium Liberius signed a semi-Arian creed, and a condemnation of Athanasius, as Cabassutius says, "desiderio succumbens repetendæ pristinæ Sedis" [Concil. xxxiii.]; and in effect it procured his recall from exile.

The death of the semi-Arian Constantius [A.D. 361] made a way to the throne for the Eclectic Julian. He summoned a council at Alexandria, A.D. 362, to investigate the charges against Athanasius; they were completely refuted, and the orthodox faith once more occupied its proper position. However, precedents as regards the reconciliation of offenders were followed, and the less culpable of the Arian party were allowed to retain their sees on signing the Nicene formulary; the more active and obnoxious were received back into the Church, but only as laymen.

Somewhere about A.D. 370, may be placed the Council of Laodicea, in which sixty canons were passed, the last of which is of most importance as giving the first synodal list of the books of Canonical Scripture. It omits the Apocryphal books, with the exception of Baruch, which is added to Jeremiah, and the Epistle of Jeremiah which follows Lamentations in LXX. The Apocalypse also is ignored. The remaining canons principally refer to ritual and to clerical life.

[7] Theod. H. E. ii. 16.

Athanasius closed a life of glorious struggle for the truth, at threescore years and ten, in A.D. 373, from which period the semi-Arian party passed into the Macedonian heresy which denied the Divinity of the Holy Ghost. This heresy, together with the schismatical conduct of Maximus the Cynic, and the necessity for reaffirming with authority the Catholic faith, caused the convocation of the Second General Council at Constantinople. The cause of schism was the appointment of Gregory of Nazianzum to the patriarchate of Constantinople. In bygone years he had been appointed to the See of Sasime, in the exarchate of Cæsarea, but a dispute arising he preferred to resign rather than contest the appointment, and retiring to his father's See of Nazianzum there assisted him in his episcopal duties. A canon of the Council of Nice, following older prescription, interdicted the translation of bishops from one see to another; and when Gregory was appointed by acclamation to the See of Constantinople, Maximus, coveting the appointment for himself, broke into the metropolitan church by night and caused himself to be enthroned as bishop, asserting that Gregory having been already consecrated to one see, and exercising episcopal duties in a second, was under a canonical disability, and could not be raised to the See of Constantinople. Under this state of things a council was summoned by Theodosius, A.D. 381, and one hundred and fifty bishops with thirty-six of the Macedonian party, met for deliberation. Its first act was to pronounce for the validity of Gregory's appointment. The presiding bishop, Meletius of Antioch, having died at this stage of proceedings, before business could be resumed, the Egyptian bishops who had been duly summoned arrived, and taking offence because the Council had been opened in their absence, revived the objection of disqualification against Gregory. With that self-denial that was so peculiarly characteristic of him, he again declined the contest, and resigned his appointment, to which Nectarius, unknown to fame, was appointed. The council thus received its fourth president. Meletius had opened it; on his death Gregory succeeded; then Timothy of Alexandria took the presidential seat; and finally Nectarius. It is impossible to say under which of them the creed and the canons were put forth, the subscriptions including that of Meletius who died, and of Timothy who came late. At the very outset the Macedonians, as semi-Arians, declared that they would sooner symbolize with the Arians than subscribe to the Homoousion; and leaving the council, wrote to the different churches to dissuade them from accepting the acts of the council, and became openly declared heretics. The alterations made in the creed by the several added clauses may be seen under the article CREED.

Seven canons were put forth by this council: in the first the Nicene faith is confirmed, and all heresy anathematized nominatim, the Eunomian or Anomæan affirming the Son to be of different and inferior substance from the Father; the Arian as represented by Eudoxus; the semi-Arian or Macedonian, who denied the Divinity of the Holy Ghost; the Sabellians, who explained the distinct personality of the Holy Trinity as mere temporary emanations; the Marcellians, who declared that the Son came forth in time and returned again into the substance of the Father; the Photinians or Humanitarians, and the Apollinarians, who denied the true humanity of our Lord by declaring that the Logos occupied the place of a human soul. The second canon, enforcing ancient custom, restrains bishops to the jurisdiction of their own provinces and dioceses;[1] the third canon assigns to the Patriarch of Constantinople the same prerogative of honour as to Rome. The fourth denies to Maximus all episcopal authority and function. The sixth lays down rules that late troubles had made so necessary with respect to accusations brought against bishops, and the court before which they should be heard. The last canon defines the course to be followed in receiving heretics into the church. Those whose baptism was recognised as valid were to be admitted by sacred unction;[2] all others by baptism as pagans, and after a sufficiently long course of penitential discipline. The acts of the council bearing date the Ides of July, were rendered complete by a synodal letter to the Emperor.

Important councils were held at the commencement of the fifth century in consequence of the first rise of the Pelagian heresy. But it was scarcely originated by Pelagius. On his arrival in Rome from Britain he learned his heresy from a Syrian named Ruffinus. Theodore of Mopsuestia also was infected with the same error, and in fact it may be traced far back, to the teaching of Origen with respect to free-will. See PELAGIANISM, under which article will be found an account of the principal councils held in consequence of that heresy.

Nestorius was enthroned at Constantinople, A.D. 428, and at once broached the heresy that there was no hypostatic union between God and man in Christ; that God was in Christ, but not by personal unity of the two natures in the one being of Christ; that the union of the two natures did not commence as the Catholic faith had always taught, with the creation of the first rudimental germ of humanity, but that Christ was born into the world, and then that the Divine Nature was superadded to the human. The term θεοτόκος had been used more than a century previously by Alexander, Patriarch of Alexander, in his First Epistle on the Arian question to Alexander of Byzantium,[1] and it exactly expresses the union of two natures in one Christ, as taught from the beginning by the Church. Nestorius affirmed that the Blessed Virgin was ἀνθρωποτόκος or Χριστοτόκος, but not Θεοτόκος. The point at issue, therefore, was very clear, and Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, having expostulated with the heretical patriarch in vain, wrote to him his celebrated epistle, A.D. 430, containing an appendix of twelve anathemas that exhibit in the clearest point of view the difference between Nestorian error and orthodox doctrine.

[1] The word diocese had a wider meaning than at present, embracing several provinces.

[2] Or by the imposition of episcopal hands, which was tantamount to chrism. [Amalari. Fortunat. de Eccl. Off. c. 27.]

The Emperor Theodosius, urged by all parties, summoned a council for Pentecost, June 7th, in the following year, Ephesus being named as a place of most convenient access by sea and by land. It was also highly appropriate, since the Mother of our Lord, "Blessed among women" as the Θεοτόκος, had there closed her eyes in death. On the day appointed[2] all had met there with the exception of John, Bishop of Antioch, and the Syrian clergy; after a fortnight's delay it was determined to commence the business of the meeting, which was opened accordingly, June 22nd, in the Church of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Gospel being placed on the central throne in token of the Saviour's presence.

Nestorius not having presented himself, the council sent a citation, but found his house surrounded by the soldiers who had accompanied him. The letters written by Nestorius were therefore read by the votary, and the heretical doctrine they contained was condemned uno ore. Sentence of deposition and excommunication was accordingly passed. Heresy, however, had here also the ear of the court, and the Count Candidianus entered a protest against the acts of the council as being invalid without the presence of the Syrian bishops; on the 27th of the month they at length arrived, and a deputation of bishops and clergy delegated by the council to wait upon the Bishop of Antioch and to report the proceedings, were driven away with blows. The legates from the See of Rome having arrived, a second session was held on the 10th of July, at which the former sentence of deposition and excommunication was confirmed, and synodal letters were written to the emperor and to the clergy of Constantinople.[3] John, Bishop of Antioch, who had held a meeting of the Nestorian party and excommunicated Cyril, refused to obey the citation of the council;[4] he and his party were cut off from communion, and debarred from the exercise of all episcopal function. The six canons passed by the council have reference only to the difference caused by the schismatical behaviour of the Syrian party. Maximian was consecrated to the vacant see of Constantinople, October 25th of the same year.

Twenty years later [A.D. 451], complaint was made to Flavian, Bishop of Constantinople, while celebrating his provincial synod, that Eutyches, archimandrite of the monastery in that city, was teaching the opposite error to Nestorius; viz., that the Godhead and the Manhood were not distinct in the Person of Christ, but that a third nature neither wholly God nor wholly man was the effect of the union of the two substances. After the customary tactics, Eutyches first obtained a respite of delay, and used it to gain the support of the secular power. Backed by an armed force he appeared to his metropolitan's citation, but obstinately maintaining his error was deposed from the presbyterate, and deprived of his office as archimandrite. Eutyches now threw off all restraint, and set about collecting a party round him, by whose means the emperor Theodosius was prevailed upon to summon a council to meet at Ephesus. The council met [A.D. 449], but is known in history as ἡ λῃστικὴ σύνοδος, Latronum Synodus, its acts being altogether invalidated by the violent partizanship of Dioscorus, Patriarch of Alexandria, and the compulsory signature of them by the council in the presence of a military force [Conc. Chalc. art. i.]. Theodosius having died [A.D. 450], his successor Marcian summoned a general council, now rendered inevitable. Nicæa was appointed in the first instance, but Chalcedon was substituted as being more conveniently situated on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus, immediately opposite to Constantinople. The council[5] opened on October 8th [A.D. 451]. Dioscorus was excommunicated for his violent conduct and advocacy of the heretical Eutyches at Ephesus, the sentence remaining unaltered. The Nicene symbol was affirmed, and newer phases of heresy were condemned by a synodal definition of its creed. Thirty canons were framed confirmatory of preceding canons, and regulating the lives of the clergy. The authority of the See of Constantinople over the Churches of Pontus and Asian Thrace was asserted, and a co-ordinate rank with the see of Rome was given to it [Hefele, Concilien Gesch.].

COUNSELS OF PERFECTION. It is the command of our Lord Jesus Christ, "Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" [Matt. v. 48]. Every Christian, therefore, is called to strive towards this standard. St. Paul, in accordance with this, declares to the Corinthians, while setting aside the mere wisdom of the world, that nevertheless "we speak wisdom among them that are perfect" [1 Cor. ii. 6], spiritual, heavenly wisdom, suited to their position as "perfecti" [ΤΕΛΕΙΟΙ]. There can be no per-

[1] First termed Constantinople, A.D. 330, it being rebuilt by the emperor. Hitherto the Bishop of Byzantium had recognised the Bishop of Heraclea as his metropolitan. It has been seen that the third of the Constantinople Canons raised the See to an equality of honour with Rome, διὰ τὸ εἶναι αὐτὴν νέαν Ῥώμην.

[2] St. Augustin, was summoned, but death had anticipated the summons.

[3] In this letter it is affirmed that the Blessed Virgin resided at Ephesus with St. John, and there ended her days.

[4] Ex abundanti cautela. In all cases of excommunication it should be understood that the Church universally followed the precept, "an heretic after a first and second admonition reject" [Tit. iii. 10].

[5] The clergy being seated within the chancel, the emperor and a full body of senators in the nave, ἐν τῷ μέσῳ πρὸς τῶν καγκέλλων τοῦ ἁγιοτάτου θυσιαστηρίου.

Counsels of Perfection

fection naturally in fallen man, for the Fall was the loss of an inherent perfecting power of supernatural life, but this power is restored in Holy Baptism. We are therein made partakers of the Divine nature, and the Divine nature is the summary of all possible perfections.

Christian perfection is to be understood in various ways.

1. Immanent, or habitual perfection, which is communicated by the sacraments, being the substantive perfection of Christian life. This is made complete at our confirmation. This is to be distinguished from operative or active perfection, which consists in the exercise of great virtues.

2. Personal perfection is to be distinguished from perfection of state. The one consists in the exercise of virtues according to individual inspiration. The other is attained by exactness in fulfilling the special duties of our calling. We must not, however, suppose that the one can really be without the other. Exactness in the duties of our calling is one of the highest tokens of personal perfection in other acts, and other acts without this are little worth.

3. The perfection of the pilgrim state is not the same as the perfection of the heavenly home. The expression is a very beautiful one by which devotional writers have been used to designate our life of probation and our future life of acceptance. This life is via. That life is patria. In this, our state of wandering or exile, absolute perfection cannot be attained. That belongs to those who have reached the home. It is a heresy to maintain, as the Pelagians, Beghards, Illuminati, and Quietists did in various ways, that spotless perfection is attainable in our present state; nevertheless there is such a perfection attainable in this life, that the soul may be united to God in unbroken love.

4. The perfection attainable in our present state is itself divided into the lower or essential, and the higher or accidental. The first is necessary to the life of the soul; any mortal sin by which the soul forfeits the love of God being a violation of this perfection. The higher perfection consists in the observance of those counsels by which the soul advances more and more in Divine love.

5. As the natural life has its various stages of progress, so also has the heavenly life: and consequently perfection is divided into the perfection of beginners, the perfection of the proficient, the perfection of the perfect. This last is that to which the name truly belongs. It is applied to the two former as leading on to this. This must be the aim of all Christians, who would walk worthy of their vocation, and fulfil our Lord's bidding, "Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" [Matt. v. 48].

The foundation of all true perfection must be in the healthful performance of all duties belonging to our station. Perfection, however, is something beyond natural rectitude of conduct. It is the aspiring of the soul to God with the energy of supernatural love; and this will find its special mode of exercise according to the varying circumstances of individuals. To the rich man our Lord said, "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, . . . and come and follow Me" [Matt. xix. 21].

Every possible human perfection was summed up in the life of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is at once the source of all perfection and the model of all perfection. Whatever may be the perfection which God may set before us, it is contained within those words, "Follow Me." As all receive grace from Christ, so all are called to show forth the likeness of Christ. The call to imitate Christ is universal. "Baptism doth represent unto us our profession, which is to follow the example of our Saviour Christ, and to be made like unto Him." But inasmuch as we cannot attain to all His perfections, we are called each one to be like Him in some special character of His life according to our several positions. His obedience to the Father's will is set before us all as our necessary example. Each loving heart among His people will be eager to choose some special feature of our Lord's life for particular imitation. Love is not satisfied with a merely necessary obedience. Love, even natural love, desires to spend and be spent for the object to which it is directed. Much more does supernatural love demand some opportunity of self-sacrifice, supernatural love which has been kindled by the love exhibited at Calvary. It is God has given us this natural faculty of love, and He being the Author both of nature and of grace, has quickened this faculty for supernatural exercises by the gift of His Holy Spirit; He gives us therefore the opportunity of exerting this faculty in spiritual matters as in natural. While He requires from us certain acts as acts of necessary obedience, He leaves us free to choose in various matters whether or no we will make certain acts of self-sacrifice, and submit ourselves to certain forms of self-sacrifice under the simple impulse of love to Himself. The exercise of this love is the practice of true perfection.

This perfection is regarded by theologians as threefold, being correlative to our threefold temptation as arising from the devil, the world, and the flesh, and connected with our mind, our body, and our estate. The lust of the flesh or sensuality, the lust of the eye or covetousness, and, finally, the pride of life, are the threefold root of sin. Chastity, poverty, and obedience, the discipline of the body, the discipline of the estate, the discipline of the will, are the threefold cord of perfection. These are called the counsels of perfection, because they train the soul for the perfect following of our Lord Jesus Christ. Our Lord exhibited these three conditions in the most perfect manner. Without them, the outer life cannot be wholly detached from the world. As the outer life cannot be wholly detached without them, so they are also great means whereby the inner life may become detached. For, it is to be remembered, perfection does not consist in these three states as such, but they are "counselled" or recommended to us as helps by the faithful use of which we may attain it.

Chastity, when thus technically spoken of, includes both virginity and chaste widowhood. This is commended to us by our Blessed Lord when He says, "There be eunuchs, which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake" [Matt. xix. 12]. While our Lord's mystical life has sanctified matrimony, so that it represents the spiritual marriage or unity which is between Christ and His Church, His life as a man upon earth was a virgin life, and therefore virginity is a special means of likeness to Him. It is also naturally greatly conducive to the purposes of religion. "He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord" [1 Cor. vii. 32]. Marriage of necessity entangles persons in the things of the world, and gives them less opportunity of devoting themselves entirely to God's service. It is ordained by Him that there shall be this means of filling His Church, and of bringing into it on earth those who will be the jewels of Christ's crown in heaven; but He has also ordained for those "who can receive it" the state of holy virginity, in which there may be no care but the care for His glory. Accordingly our Lord Jesus invites to the celibate life, saying, "Every one that hath forsaken . . . wife, or children, . . for My Name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life" [Matt. xix. 29]. We find, moreover, a special promise in the Revelation bestowed upon those who have not defiled themselves with women, for they are virgins. These, it is said, "are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. These were redeemed from among men, being first-fruits unto God and to the Lamb. And in their mouth was found no guile: for they are without fault before the throne of God" [Rev. xiv. 5, 6].

Counsels of Perfection

Poverty is the discipline by which the lust of the eye is especially corrected, the discipline of temptations arising from estate. The Son of God in coming into the world was free to choose what condition He pleased, whether of wealth or poverty. He chose poverty. In choosing poverty He sanctified it, commended it to our choice, made it a special means of grace when faithfully accepted. "When He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor" [2 Cor. viii. 9]. He had not where to lay His head. When a certain man said unto Him, "Lord, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest," our Lord put before him this condition of utter poverty as the condition upon which alone such close discipleship could be attained [Luke ix. 57, 58]. Our Lord's poverty was, moreover, a voluntary poverty. He might at any time have surrounded Himself at will with all the affluence of this world's luxury, even as He fed the thousands in the wilderness. But He never did exert His supernatural power for His own deliverance from any necessity. To have done so would have been a violation of that entire trust in the Divine Providence of the Father's will which was the law of His life. Sufferings of His that arose from poverty would have been no consolation to us, if whenever He felt so disposed He had removed the difficulty by miraculous agency. And as He lived a life of poverty, choosing it from His birth, and willingly abiding in its afflictions and manifold sufferings, so He commends it as a means of special union with Himself. The rich young man came to Him and said, "Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?" and when Jesus put before him the necessity of obedience, he replied that he had kept this from his youth. "What lack I yet?" "Jesus then said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me" [Matt. xix. 16-22]. Thus He invited him to a life of voluntary poverty. He set before him for his personal choice that blessing which is, so to speak, the foundation-stone of His Church: "Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" [Matt. v. 3]. He showed that this beatitude was not to be explained away, as some would do, to signify a mere detachment from the world's glory, a metaphorical poverty. He intended that those who would win this blessing in its fulness should feel along with Himself the pinch of poverty in its reality. St. Peter asks what he and the other Apostles should have since they had forsaken all in order to follow Him. Jesus tells them of the glory of the kingdom which by the terms of His beatitude they were to share, and extends to others the reward which the Apostles had obtained, saying, in the words quoted with reference to chastity, "Every one that hath forsaken . . . lands for My Name's sake, shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall inherit everlasting life" [Matt. xix. 29].

Obedience is the third counsel of perfection. Its object is to perfect our inner nature by the mortification of the will and by destruction of that which is the tap-root of sin, namely, pride. In the same chapter in which our Lord sets before us virginity and poverty as special means of attaining the life of the kingdom of heaven, He seems to invite us to obedience by setting before us the example of little children. Of such, said He, is the kingdom of heaven [Matt. xix. 14]. Thus this chapter appears to be intended to offer a complete view of the highest calls of the religious life. It might have been imagined that this virtue, however necessary for ourselves, would have been inconsistent with our Lord's character, or that herein we must have deviated from His example. But, on the contrary, so truly did He, the Son of God, become man that He exhibits in His own person the obedience which His words command. He was not only obedient to the general Providence of His Father, but as He condescended to become a child, He was subject, giving a child's obedience to His parents, His mother, and His foster-father. From the beginning of His Incarnation, He, the Wisdom of God, possessed all knowledge. He did not therefore submit to His parents out of the mere necessity of childhood or the prudence of conscious ignorance. He submitted to them, the All-Wise submitted to the fallible, as a high exercise of the virtue of humility, to exercise the surrender of the will by which the sacrifice of His whole Being was perfected. Thus He teaches men that no amount of intellectual power exempts from the blessedness of a surrendered will. He must often have been conscious of the imperfection of the parental commands which He had to obey, but this consciousness perfected the obedience with which He obeyed those commands. So it may sometimes happen that persons living under religious obedience to a superior are aware that things which are enjoined are unwise, yet if they are not sinful that they are to be done. Such obedience, however, never involves the doing of anything which the conscience perceives to be plainly wrong. It cannot do this, for our prior obedience to the law of God precludes any such violation of conscience. Obedience to an earthly superior covers all the ground which obedience to God's law leaves open, but it reaches no further. In like manner, obedience to the laws of the Church is prior to obedience to the command of any individual director. Nevertheless, in matters where our own will is left free to act, great blessedness, great wisdom, and great power, will be found to result from submission.

These three counsels, chastity, poverty, and obedience, constitute the basis of the religious life. They are called counsels of perfection because our Blessed Lord commends them to us by word and example, although not enforcing them upon us by universal command, and they are instruments of perfection to such as are really called by God to follow them out. [VOCATION.]

CREATION. The causation of the existence of all things, animate or inanimate, which are not uncreated.

In the creeds of the Church, the fact of creation is asserted as an attribute of God in the inclusive forms, "Maker of heaven and earth," and "Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible." The first appearance of this article is in the account of the creed given by Irenæus, who states it in the words of [Exod. xx. 11, and Acts iv. 24] τὸν πεποιηκότα τὸν οὐρανὸν, καὶ τὴν γῆν καὶ τὰς θαλάσσας καὶ πάντα τὰ ἐν αὐτοῖς [Hær. i. 2], which shews that the form used in the Nicene Creed had been substantially in use from the beginning. This expression of belief in God as the First Cause of all things was, indeed, made necessary by the errors that arose as soon as ever Christianity became the subject of philosophic thought. The fables of heathen poetry had long ceased to have any hold upon heathen philosophers, and yet they had no better substitute to offer than that matter was eternal, or that some element such as fire or water had given existence to all things else. The Gnostics built up a theory of Æons, subordinate eternals, Demiurgi, or working gods, who created all things, while the Supreme Eternal remained at rest. In answer to these and all other theories the Church declared, "We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible."

Scripture evidence. The derivation of all things from a first cause may be reasoned out with some degree of certainty by NATURAL THEOLOGY; but, the fact of inspiration admitted, we have the highest possible evidence on the subject in the statements, direct and indirect, of Holy Scripture. Natural theology leads up to the conclusion that there must have been a First Cause, and that the First Cause must have been God: Holy Scripture says there was a First Cause, God who has Himself vouchsafed to be the historian of His work. It is by no means so certain as is sometimes assumed that there would have been any reasoning out of the evidence at all, if there had not first been the direct evidence afforded by the statement of revelation.

The first words of Genesis do indeed give the key to the whole subject of creation. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth . . . and God said, Let there be . . . and there was" [Gen. i. 1, 3, 6, 9, 11, &c.]. For these two statements declare [1] that all created things were created by God, and [2] that they were created by the power of His will. Assuming that these two statements proceed from God, all other evidence will be of the nature of illustration rather than of proof: the exhaustive character of the Divine words carrying them beyond the region of rational controversy, and the circumstance that they are spoken on a subject outside of the reach of history or experience making it impossible to give them any rational contradiction.

The corroborative statements contained in later parts of the Holy Bible are very numerous; but it is only necessary to quote a few of them for the purpose of this article. The 104th Psalm is thus a hymn of praise founded either on the statements contained in the Book of Genesis, or on information derived by inspiration from the same Divine source. It attributes the creation of light, water, angels, the earth, the vegetable world, birds, the sun and moon, quadrupeds, and, lastly, man, to God. "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works: in wisdom hast Thou made them all. . . . Thou sendest forth Thy Spirit, they are created: and Thou renewest the face of the earth." In a similar manner, but in a more condensed form, the 148th Psalm enumerates the different existences, animate and inanimate, of the universe, and says respecting all, "Let them praise the Name of the Lord, for He commanded, and they were created," which is in exact agreement with the "Let there be . . . and there was" of Genesis. Going forward in historical order we find Isaiah writing, "Thus saith God the Lord, He that created the heavens, and stretched them out: He that spread forth the earth and that which cometh out of it; He that giveth breath unto the people upon it, and spirit to them that walk therein" [Isa. xlii. 5]. Jeremiah writes, "The gods that have not made the heavens and the earth even they shall perish from the earth, and from under these heavens. He hath made the earth by His power, He hath established the world by His wisdom, and hath stretched out the heavens by His discretion" [Jer. x. 11, 12; li. 15]. "Thou," was the song of the Levites on the return from Babylon, "even Thou art Lord alone: Thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth, and all things that are therein, the seas and all that is therein, and thou preservest them all" [Neh. ix. 6]. And so the constant stream of testimony flows from the Old Testament, through the intermediate times [2 Macc. vii. 28], and through the enlightened Apostolic age [Rom. xi. 36; 2 Cor. viii. 6; Heb. xi. 3], right on to the triumphant song of Heaven revealed in the last pages of Holy Scripture, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power; for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created" [Rev. iv. 11]. This continuous consistency of statement by many writers, and in many ages, is, in itself, a proof that in its various forms, the one statement is a divinely revealed truth.

The work of the Son of God in Creation is expressly stated in the Nicene Creed, in the words "By whom all things were made." It is stated with equal distinctness by St. Paul: "For by Him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible . . . all things were created by Him, and for Him" [Col. i. 16]. "And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, Who created all things by Jesus Christ" [Eph. iii. 9], and by St. John, "All things were made by Him; and without Him was not anything made that was made" [John i. 3]. In similar language the ancient Psalms had said, "By the Word of the Lord were the heavens made" [Ps. xxxiii. 6], and "Who by His excellent Wisdom made the heavens" [Ps. cxxxvi. 5]. This mystery cannot be much more than stated and that in such words as are given in Holy Scripture, especially in our Lord's words, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" [John v. 17]. It can only be explained further that the Word made all things, not as an instrument, not as a deputy, but as a co-worker, in one united will, with the Father, and as co-equal with the Father in Almightiness.

Many ancient and modern writers have endeavoured to set aside the idea of an immediate creation by God, and to substitute for it, e.g., creation by intermediate beings [Demiurge]; the eternity (in some more or less modified theory) of matter; or the development of all existent things out of some extremely attenuated matter by inherent force, or law of being. But no such theories attain any very wide acceptance, nor do they exhibit anything like stability. All experience shews that there is as yet no such thing as "finality" in the matter of scientific knowledge; and amid the many theories respecting creation which human wisdom has originated, there is none which can compete for stability and general acceptance with that which Divine Wisdom has set before us. [Nature. Emanation. Matter.]

CREATIONISM. There were controversies in the Church from an early period respecting the origin of the soul; the Gnostics and Manichæans believed that the soul was an emanation from, and thus formed a portion of the Divine Nature or Substance—a view for manifest reasons rejected by the Church as making the Divine Essence liable to change or deterioration.[1] Another opinion which the Church condemned was that of Origen, who believed in the pre-existence of souls, or that God at the creation had formed all finite spirits or souls, which were infused into different bodies, as of angels, demons, stars (which he supposed were animated beings) or men, and that souls passed from one body to another in a higher or lower state, rising or falling according to their merits.[2] This opinion was condemned by one of the councils,[3] and by St. Epiphanius,[4] St. Leo,[5] and other Fathers. The false or heretical opinions mentioned being rejected, only two theories are possible respecting the origin of the soul: the one, that the soul created by God is infused into a child before birth, which is called Creationism; and the other theory, which is termed Traducianism, that the soul and body of a child are derived by propagation of his parents.

We first find a reference to these theories in Tertullian, who advocated Traducianism. "He imagined," says Neander in his Antignosticus, "that the soul of the first man was the source of all other souls which were developed in the continuation of the race, and that the soul of the first man was propagated along with the body—the so-called propagatio animarum per traducem —Traducianism. Thus he imagined that Adam's soul was at first uniform: it had not yet developed that multiplicity of properties which might be educed from the individualizing of all those germs of humanity which were existing in Adam.[6] Not without reason could he recognise a deeper connection in the development of the human race, a deeper unity (which he explained by means of that Traducianism) in the expression of family peculiarities, in the propagation of qualities and propensities. Thus Tertullian opposed his Traducianism to an Atomistic, Nominalist theory of the development of mankind. In this manner also he explained the propagation of a sinful tendency from the first man."[7] Tertullian, also, it may be remarked (which [1] St. Augustine, De Genesi ad literam, lib. ii. c. 2; De Hæresibus, vi.

[2] Naturas enim omnes ratione præditas, hoc est mentes a Deo ante mundi opificium, procreatas, liberoque instructas arbitrio fuisse putavit; qua recte vel male agendi facultate diversis utentes modis, diversis inde vel gloriæ vel ignominiæ ac pœnæ gradus fuisse consecutas; alias siquidem angelorum adeptas esse naturam quæ leviorum essent noxarum fontes: quæ contra, liberi arbitrii munere in deterius fuissent abusæ in crassiora corpora siderum puta vel dæmonum vel hominum esse depressas; sic tamen ut quocunque sint loco, proficere possint in virtute, vel contra, relabi in vitia; et vel regressus sui vel progressus ratione ad superiorem evehantur statum, vel ad inferiorem detrudantur. Huet, Origen. lib. ii. c. 2, sec. 6.

[3] Constant. [A.D. 540].

[4] Hæres. 64.

[5] Epist. xxxv. c. xi., ad Julianum.

[6] "Apparet quanta fuit quæ unam animæ naturam varie collocavit" [De Anima, c. 20]. "Uniformis natura animæ ab initio in Adam" [Ibid. c. 21].

[7] Neander, Antignosticus, p. 463. Bohn's transl.

might seem to support his theory), thought that the soul was of a certain material form.[1]

Again, the origin of the soul became necessarily a subject of dispute during St. Augustine's controversy with Pelagius. St. Augustine believed that Adam's sin had passed to all his descendants by propagation, and the whole human race became "massa damnata"—morally and physically corrupt. This may seem to imply Traducianism, but St. Augustine did not think this inference necessary or inevitable; he cannot, he says, determine the truth of either one theory or the other. "As therefore," he says, "both soul and body are alike punished, unless what is born is purified by regeneration, certainly either both (i.e. soul and body) are derived in their corrupt state from man (Traducianism) or the one is corrupted in the other, as if in a corrupt vessel where it is placed by the secret justice of the Divine law (Creationism). But which of these is true, I would rather learn than teach, lest I should presume to teach what I do not know."[2] Again, he says, "Blame my hesitation as to the origin of the soul, because I do not venture to teach or maintain what I do not know. Bring forward on this so dark a subject what you please, if only that sentiment remain firm and unshaken, that the death of all is the fault of that one (Adam), and that in him all have sinned."[3]

After the time of St. Augustine, we find that orthodox writers generally, though not without exception,[4] held the theory of Creationism. Thus St. Jerome[5] and St. Leo[6] expressly state that this doctrine is orthodox, or the belief of the Catholic Church. In the Middle Ages, as Hagenbach shews, the great Catholic writers maintain and defend the doctrine of Creationism, as St. Anselm, Hugo, St. Victor, Peter Lombard, and St. Thomas Aquinas. This doctrine may now be considered as the orthodox view on the origin of the soul. The chief objection against Traducianism is the material conception of the soul which it implies, as if it could be transmitted like the body by generation, since the inference would generally, or at least might plausibly be made, that if the soul be subject to the same laws and conditions as the body, it is also perishable like the body, only a part of a material organization. This inference, though not really inevitable, would generally be made, and the Traducianist theory, in some degree at least, seems to sanction it. We cannot doubt, therefore, that the Church has, by a wise and unerring instinct, adopted the theory of Creationism as being really in accordance with the true meaning of Scripture, and clearly setting forth the immaterial and divine origin of the soul.

CREEDS. The word "creed" represents the "credo" of the Latin churches. The creed was also termed "regula fidei," as the equivalent of the Eastern κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας, the "standard" of faith, κανὼν being a "builder's square;" but more generally Σύμβολον, symbolum. This latter term meant either the "earnest-money" paid as security for the future fulfilment of a contract, whence συμβόλαιος δίκη was an action to compel such fulfilment, or it meant also the "pass" of military life, and as such it soon acquired a permanent significance. For the heresies that from the beginning troubled the infant Church rejected these compendious forms of faith, the possession of which was a "tessera" of church membership throughout the world,[7] whereby the faithful were known to each other in every church and clime.

As the creeds were the earliest development of the formal faith of the Church, so they are the first and most authentic form of her oral tradition. They were learned and confessed by the candidates for baptism, and openly recited as the rule of faith, one and the same from one generation to another. The creeds, subserving in this way the growth and edification of the Church, are anterior to the Gospels. There are traces of them in fact observable in Scripture. The earliest Gospel, that of St. Matthew, did not appear before A.D. 42. The earliest Epistle, 1 Thessalonians, not before A.D. 52. But the use of the creeds commenced so soon as converts were to be baptized into the Name of Christ; and their first growing germ was supplied by our Lord Himself, when He bade His disciples "go into all nations and baptize in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit." Thus the first converts of Samaria, believing the things preached concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, were baptized, and in a few days their acceptance was sealed to them by receiving at the hands of the Apostles the Holy Ghost, according to the sure promise of the Lord. Their faith in God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit was approved, and through that faith they were justified by the baptismal remission of sins. The necessary truths into which converts were baptized form a tolerably full account of symbolical doctrine, comprising belief in God the Father, God the [1] De Anima, c. 9. De Carne Christi, c. 11.

[2] C. Julianum, v. 15.

[3] Opus Imperf. iv. 104. The following passages were alleged in favour of Traducianism:—Gen. v. 3; Ps. li. 5; Rom. v. 12-19, comp. with 1 Cor. xv. 22; Eph. ii. 3; Heb. vii. 10; and of Creationism:—Ps. xxxii. 15, "qui fingit singillatim corda hominum;" Zach. xi. 1, "qui fingit spiritum homine in ipso;" and Eccl. xii. 7, "the Spirit to God who gave it." The passages in favour of Creationism, as St. Augustine admits [Epist. ad Optatum cxc. sec. 17], are inconclusive, and may readily be answered by the Traducianist:—God can truly be said according to this theory, "to make" or "give" souls. We may quote as the best proof from Scripture of Creationism, Eccl. xii. 7, and of Traducianism, Heb. vii. 10, though neither passage can be considered absolutely conclusive.

[4] As e.g. St. Gregory of Nyssa, who maintains the Traducianist theory: see De Hom. Opificio, c. 29.

[5] After quoting Eccl. xii. 7, he adds, "Ex quo satis ridendi qui putant animas cum corporibus seri, et non a Deo sed a corporum parentibus generari. Cum enim caro revertatur in terram, et spiritus redeat ad Deum qui dedit illum, manifestum est Deum parentem animarum esse, non hominem" [Comment. in Ecclesiast. in loc].

[6] Catholica fides . . . quæ omnem hominem in corporis animæque substantia a conditore universitatis formari atque animari intra a materna viscera confitetur. [Epist. ad Turribium, c. 9].

[7] τὴν ἀπὸ περάτων ἕως περάτων. Symb. Alex.

Son, and God the Holy Ghost, faith in the historical facts of Christ's death, His Resurrection on the third day and Ascension; faith in the Second Coming of Christ in glory, and in the meantime in the judicial power and authority of the Lord delegated to His Church in the doctrine of Repentance and of the Forgiveness of sins [cf. Luke xxiv. 47]. All these are necessary particulars connected with the preaching of the kingdom of God and faith in the Lord Jesus, and instruction upon these points must from the first have preceded baptism.

Next we find early evidence of such a formula of faith as the creed in the various addresses of the Apostles recorded in the Acts, and in conformity with "the principles of the doctrine of Christ" delivered to them by the Lord. Indeed, this is so generally the case that the Articles of the Creed may be tabulated from the instruction of our Lord and Divine utterances of His Apostles.

BELIEF IN

Articles of the Creed.	God the Father.	God the Son.	God the Holy Ghost.	Passion.	Descent into Hell.	Resurrection.	Ascension.	Second Advent.	Repentance.	Remission of Sins.	Church.
Matt. xxviii.	19	19	19			10	Mark xvi. 19				Mt. xxviii 19, 20
Luke xxiv.	49	49	49, Acts i. 4, 8	46	Acts ii. 24, 31	46	51, Acts i. 9	Acts i. 11	Luke xxiv. 47	47	49, Acts i. 8.
John xx. .	17	17	22			9, 20, 28	17	xxi. 22		xx. 23	xx. 21, 23
St. Peter, Acts ii. .	17	22, 33, 34	17, 33, 38	23		24, 31, 32	33		38	38	32
Acts iii. . .	13	13, 15		15		15	21	19-21	19, 26	19	15
Acts iv. . .	24	12, 27, 30		10, 27		10
Acts v. . .	30	31	32	30		30	31		31	31	32
Acts x. . .	34, 36	38	38	39		40, 41		42		43	41, 42
St. Stephen, Acts vii. .	2, 32, 37, 55	52, 55	51	52		55, 56	55, 56
St. Paul, Acts xiii.	17, 23	23, 33, 35		28		30, 33, 34, 37				38	31
Epistle to Hebrews vi.	1	1-6	4	6		2		2	1, 6

The first indication of a Rule of Faith contained in the Sacred Canon is in Heb. vi., where we have six distinct articles [see Tabular view] cited as first "principles of the doctrine of Christ" [Heb. v. 13], the milk of babes. Such "principles," as we believe, were collected together in a concise form for the use of catechist as well as catechumen; for it was no necessary part of the Apostolic ministry to baptize [1 Cor. i. 14, 17; cf. John iv. 2]; the first sacrament was usually administered by subordinates, and a formula of the leading principles of the Christian faith would be of much service to the teacher, that he might give to each doctrine its due weight according to the analogy of faith. St. Paul in all probability alludes on two occasions [1 Tim. vi. 20; 2 Tim. i. 14], to such a form, when he charges Timothy to keep the "good deposit," τὴν καλὴν παρακαταθήκην, for it was something capable of being received, and held fast as a "form (ὑποτύπωσιν)[1] of sound words," and committed "to faithful men, who should be able to teach others also" [2 Tim. ii. 2]. It is almost impossible to find any other meaning for the Apostle's words, if they do not refer to such a formulary as the creed; and other traces of similar allusion may be found.

The use of the creeds, as has been stated already, was in the first place: [i.] catechetical. The vital doctrines of Christianity were kept both before the teacher and the taught, and when the sacrament of baptism was administered, the candidate, at least in the Western Church, repeated it aloud, so that all the faithful who were present might hear that nothing was omitted and nothing was added to the venerated form. In the Church of Rome, says Ruffinus, "an ancient custom prevails that those who are about to receive the grace of baptism should recite the Creed publicly; that is, so as to be heard by the congregation of the faithful; and of a truth the ears of those who precede them in the faith tolerate no addition of whatever kind to the words."[2] The creeds had also [ii.] a commendatory character; they were the test of Church membership whereby, in the first troubled years of the existence of the Church, Christians proceeding from one part of the world to another were at once known and received into unreserved communion as brethren in one common Lord. For this reason the creeds never occur in an unbroken form in the first centuries. They were committed to memory by the faithful,[1] but never to writing, that heresy might not learn to simulate the faith. Gnosticism in its most repulsive phases was perpetually confounded with Christianity by the heathen; every precaution, therefore, was adopted to keep wolves without the fold, and this Disciplina Arcani caused the creeds as a sacred deposit to be reserved from vulgar gaze, and committed to memory alone as evidence of a true faith. Afterwards, when creeds were amplified to meet heretical errors as they came to light, they served [iii.] as a test of truth and error. All that was within the symbolical terms was of the Church Catholic, all that militated against their tenets was heresy. And lastly, the creeds obtained a [iv.] liturgical character when they were formally incorporated in the services of the Church; but this, in the case of the Constantinopolitan, or Nicene Creed, did not take place before A.D. 471, when Peter Fullo introduced it into the Liturgy of Antioch. The Apostles' Creed has been a portion of the Anglican "Order" from the beginning, but the date of its first liturgical use in the Western Church cannot be defined with similar exactness.

[1] ὑποτύπωσις, 1 Tim. i. 14.

[2] Ruffinus, de Symb., § 3; cf. also Iren. i. 3.

A few observations with respect to the development of the Eastern creeds will not be superfluous. Such development was held to be permissible, each church having authority, by its own independent action, of defining its rule of faith, in conformity with the faith of the Church catholic; just as it had power to mould its own liturgy upon catholic principles. Even the Western church was not wholly stiff and unbending; the Church of Aquilegia having added the terms "invisible and impassible" to the confession of faith in God the Father, to meet the Sabellian and Patripassian heresies; for these terms are not found in the Roman or Apostles' Creed. A tabulated form is added: [A] of the Western form of creed, as being the more ancient and simple; [B] of the Eastern Creed, as more elastic and varied.

CREEDS OF THE LATIN COMMUNION.

I.—Roman or Apostles' Creed. Among the spurious writings of Augustine, Serm. ccxl. ccxli. de Symb. 4, 5.	II.—As Explained by Augustine. De fide et Symbolo.	III.—Aquilegian, as explained by Ruffinus.
I believe in God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth;	I believe in God, the Father Almighty,	I believe in God the Father Almighty, invisible and impassible, and in Jesus Christ His only Son our Lord,	and in Jesus Christ His only Son our Lord,	and in Jesus Christ His only Son our Lord,
Who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary,	Who was born of the Virgin Mary by the Holy Ghost,	Who was born of the Virgin Mary by the Holy Ghost, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried;	was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and was buried,	was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and was buried.
He descended into hell,		He descended into hell,
the third day He rose again from the dead,	the third day He rose again from the dead,	the third day He rose again from the dead,
He ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty,	He ascended into heaven and sitteth at the right hand of the Father,	He ascended into heaven and sitteth at the right hand of the Father, from thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead.	from thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead.	from thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead.
I believe in the Holy Ghost,	I believe in the Holy Ghost,	I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Holy Catholic Church, the communion of Saints, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the flesh, and life everlasting.	the Holy Catholic Church, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the flesh.	the Holy Catholic Church, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the flesh.

[1] This continued to be the practice for many years in the Western Church, as we read in the ancient Gallican Liturgy, "Symbolum fratres carissimi, non in tabulis scribitur, sed in corde receptum memoriter retinetur. Et ideo juvat iterare, quod nunquam convenit oblivisci"—the Symbolum being the Apostles' Creed. Mabillon, de Liturg. Gallic. p. 340, Paris, 1729.

CREEDS OF THE LATIN COMMUNION.

Adv. Prax. 2.	TERTULLIAN. De Præscr. 13.	De Virg. vel. i.
We believe in one God, yet . . . of the one God there is	There is one God, and no other Creator of the world, who made all things of nothing by His Word; first of all sent forth;	Belief in one God Almighty, Creator of the universe, the Son, His Word, Who proceeded forth from Him, by Whom all things were made, and without Him was nothing made.	the Word, termed His Son, was by the Patriarchs variously seen, and in the Prophets heard.	and in His Son Jesus Christ
He was sent by the Father, and was born of the Virgin, Man and God, Son of Man and Son of God, and named Christ Jesus,	He was sent down, and made flesh in the womb of the Virgin Mary, and that which was born of her was Jesus Christ; He proclaimed a new Law, and a new promise of the kingdom of heaven; He wrought miracles,	born of the Virgin Mary,
He suffered, died, and was buried, according to the Scriptures,	was crucified,	who was crucified under Pontius Pilate,
He was raised again by the Father,	the third day He rose again,	the third day He rose from the dead, and was received into heaven, He sitteth at the right hand of the Father;	and was received into heaven, He sitteth at the right hand of the Father;	and was received into heaven, He sitteth at the right hand of the Father;
He shall come to judge the quick and the dead.		He shall come to judge the quick and the dead,
He sent from the Father, according to His promise, the Holy Ghost the Comforter and Sanctifier of faith in those	He sent the vicarious energy of the Holy Ghost, Who forms believers.
who believe in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.	He shall come with glory to receive His saints to the fruition of eternal life and of His heavenly promises, and to doom the profane to everlasting fire, either class being quickened again with restoration of the flesh.	in the resurrection of the flesh.
Further articles of baptismal faith.	TERTULLIAN, de Bapt. ii. Remission of sins. The Church.	CYPRIAN, Ep. lxxv. ad Magn. Remission of sins. Everlasting life, by the Holy Church.

CREEDS OF THE SYRIAN AND GREEK COMMUNIONS.

I. JERUSALEM.	II. CÆSAREA.	III. NICE.	IV. CYPRUS.	V. CONSTANTINOPLE.
We believe in one God the Father Almighty,	We believe in one God the Father Almighty,	We believe in one God the Father Almighty,	We believe in one God the Father Almighty,	We believe in one God the Father Almighty,
Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible;	Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible;	Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible;	Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible;	Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible;
and in one Lord Jesus Christ,	and in one Lord Jesus Christ,	and in one Lord Jesus Christ,	and in one Lord Jesus Christ,	and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all ages, very God,	the Word of God, God of God, Light of Light, Life of Life, the only begotten Son, first born of every creature, begotten of God the Father before all ages,	the Son of God, the only begotten of the Father, of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, of one substance with the Father,	begotten of the Father before all ages, of the substance of His Father, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, of one substance with the Father,	the only begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all ages, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, of one substance with the Father,

CREEDS OF THE SYRIAN AND GREEK COMMUNIONS—Continued.

by whom all things were made;	by whom all things were made;	by whom all things were made in heaven and earth;	by whom all things were made in heaven and earth;	by whom all things were made;
He was incarnate and made man, of the Virgin and the Holy Ghost,	who, for our salvation, was incarnate, and had His conversation among men,	who, for us men, and for our salvation, came down, and was incarnate, and was made man,	who, for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost, of the Virgin Mary, and was made man,	who, for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost, of the Virgin Mary, and was made man,
He was crucified and buried,	He suffered	He suffered	and was crucified for us under Pontius Pilate, He suffered, and was buried,	and was crucified for us under Pontius Pilate, He suffered, and was buried, the third day He rose from the dead,	and rose the third day,	and rose the third day,	and the third day He rose again, according to the Scriptures,	and the third day He rose again, according to the Scriptures, and ascended into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of God,	and ascended to the Father,	and ascended into heaven,	and ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father;	and ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father;
and shall come in glory to judge the quick and the dead;	and shall come in glory to judge the quick and the dead;	He shall come to judge the quick and the dead;	and shall come in glory to judge the quick and the dead;	and shall come in glory to judge the quick and the dead;
of whose kingdom there shall be no end;			of whose kingdom there shall be no end;	of whose kingdom there shall be no end;
and in one Holy Ghost the Comforter, who spake by the prophets.	We believe also in the Holy Ghost. Finis.	and in the Holy Ghost. Finis.	and in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father, who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified, who spake by the prophets;	and in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father, who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified, who spake by the prophets;
In one baptism of repentance for the remission of sins, and in one Holy Catholic Church; in the Resurrection of the flesh, and life everlasting.			and in one Catholic Apostolic Church. We confess one Baptism for the Remission of sins, and we look for the Resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come.	and in one Catholic Apostolic Church. We confess one Baptism for the Remission of sins, and we look for the Resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come.

CREEDS OF THE SYRIAN AND GREEK COMMUNIONS.

VI. Apostolical Constitutions, vii. 41.	VII. Lucian M. Antioch.	VIII. Alexandrian.	IX. Athanasius.
One unbegotten only true God, Almighty Father of Christ,	One God the Father Almighty,	One God the Father Almighty,	One God the Father Almighty,
the Creator and Maker of all things, of whom are all things,	Maker and Designer of the Universe, of whom are all things,		Maker of all things visible and invisible, and in the Lord Jesus Christ His only begotten Son,	and in one Lord Jesus Christ His Son, God the only begotten, by whom are all things,	and in God the Word, begotten of Him before all ages,	and in one only begotten Son,

CREEDS OF THE SYRIAN AND GREEK COMMUNIONS—Continued.

first-born of every creature, who was begotten by the good pleasure of the Father before the worlds,	begotten of the Father before the worlds, God of God, Whole of Whole, Only One of the Only One, Perfect of Perfect, King of King, Lord of Lord, the Living Word, the Living Wisdom . . .
by whom all things visible and invisible in heaven and earth were made,		by whom all things were made, both things in heaven and things on earth, who in these last days came down from heaven, and took upon Him flesh, and was born of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and led a holy life according to the laws of God His Father,	who in the last days came down from above, and was born of the Virgin, according to the Scriptures, and became Man, the Mediator between God and Man . . .	who came down and was incarnate,	who, having come down from the bosom of the Father, took upon Him our Manhood, Christ Jesus of the Immaculate Virgin Mary,
and was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and died for us, and having suffered,	who suffered for us,	He suffered	in which Manhood having been crucified, and having died for us,
He rose again from the dead the third day,	and rose again the third day,	and rose again,	He rose from the dead.
and ascended up into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God,	and ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father,	and ascended into heaven,	and was received up into heaven, and He shall come again with glory in the end of the world to judge the quick and dead,	and He shall come again with glory and power to judge the quick and dead;	and cometh again to judge the quick and the dead;	in which (Manhood) he shall judge the quick and the dead;
whose kingdom shall have no end;
and in one Holy Ghost, the Comforter, who hath wrought in all Saints from the beginning, and was sent forth by the Father on the Apostles . . . and upon all of the	and in the Holy Ghost, vouchsafed to believers for their comfort, and sanctification and perfection. Finis.	and in the Holy Ghost,	in like manner in the Holy Ghost. Finis.
Holy Catholic Church, that believe in the Resurrection of the flesh, in the Remission of sins, in the kingdom of heaven, and in the life of the world to come.		the Resurrection of the flesh, the life of the world to come, the kingdom of heaven, and in one Catholic Church of God, that is from end to end of the world.

On comparing these columns it will be seen at once that the primitive creeds which have come down to us are referable to two distinct families, both of which derive their origin from the baptismal formula enjoined by our Lord. There is the same substructure, in both cases, of faith in the Holy Trinity, and to a certain extent the same development, though this proceeds further in the case of the Eastern than of the Western creeds; owing to the multiplied forms of heresy that the former section of the Church catholic had to meet. Thus, since nearly every form of early error was based on the dualistic principle of Oriental theosophy, the Eastern creed took care to express faith in one God. If Docetism denied the reality of our Lord's true human nature, and affirmed that the Æon Christ descended upon the Lord Jesus at His baptism, and left Him at His crucifixion, dividing into two the person of Jesus Christ, the Eastern creed declared faith in "one Lord Jesus Christ." Similarly as regards other added clauses. Every Gnostic heresy denied that the Supreme God, Bythus, as they termed it, was creator of all things, and affirmed that the Demiurge, a remote emanation from Bythus, reduced the world into cosmic order, and that the spirits of the invisible world came into being as successive emanations from their immediate antecedent cause. Therefore the Church was compelled to assert in the creed that God the Father was Creator of all things visible and invisible. And with respect to the filiation of the Son, there was no name of venerated use in the Church but what had been polluted by the harpy touch of heresy. Christ, the Logos, the Only-begotten, were terms well known to heresy; hence the more careful definitions of the Eastern Church asserted the true filiation of the Son, as inheriting the perfect nature and every attribute of the Father, saving only paternity, even as the Father has the perfect nature and every attribute of the Son saving only sonship; and the Second Person in the Godhead is declared to be God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, in terms that varied in the different churches of the East. It was for this same reason that in Arian times the term Homoousion, or "of one substance," was formally embodied in the creed by the Council of Nice. By this council the process of symbolical development was finally stopped by the Eastern Church: and the Nicene creed in the East, as the Roman creed in the West, became the one form of faith for the catechumen, the teacher, and the divine.

Hence when the churches of the West declared that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father and the Son, the churches of the East, though not denying the scriptural truth of the definition, refused to accept it as being an addition to "the faith," and the ultimate schism of East and West was accepted as a less evil than the alteration of a single word in the symbol that had been put forth by the holy 318 Fathers at Nice. The Nicene Creed, as preserved to us by Eusebius, breaks off with the words "and in the Holy Ghost," as being all that was germane matter to the pending controversy; but within a few years Epiphanius supplies to us the fuller form as the creed of the Church of Cyprus, which was reproduced almost verbatim by the Council of Constantinople; and has ever since been the recognised creed of the Church Catholic, the Nicene Creed.

The so-called Athanasian Creed, critically speaking, is scarcely of equal authority to its more venerable predecessors. Waterland has traced its origin to the early part of the fifth century, immediately anterior to the Ephesine Council in A.D. 431; and to the Gallican Church. [NICENE CREED. FILIOQUE. HOMOOUSION. Pearson, Barrow, Waterland, King, and Harvey on the Creeds.]

CRITICISM. The so-called "higher criticism" of modern times is a department of a more extensive science. What the Germans style "Kritik" is, in general, the passing judgment on, or testing any object; and hence, the science which enables to pass such a judgment. Thus criticism is "philosophical," "historical," "philological," "æsthetic," &c. Philological criticism is the testing written documents, particularly ancient documents, either for the purpose of removing from the text foreign interpolations, or of establishing the claims of the reputed author. Strictly speaking the "higher criticism" (as distinguished from the "lower," or criticism based merely on conjecture) is the inquiry as to the genuineness and authenticity of a document, resting either on external or on internal grounds. Internal evidence, as opposed to external or historical, appeals to the contents, spirit, style, language of the writing itself; and, as a matter of fact, the criticism which at the present day arrogates to itself the title of "higher," practically ignores the value of evidence which is merely external. On the other hand, it may confidently be affirmed that the only safe test of either genuineness or authenticity is external evidence. There are certain cases, no doubt, where internal evidence is seriously to be considered, e.g., in such writings as the Scriptures profess to be, the occurrence of immoralities or inconsistencies would seriously affect the conclusion that such or such a Book was the composition of a person inspired by the Spirit of God. But, apart from such charges (which are at times erroneously urged against portions of the Bible), internal evidence, if it stand alone, and à fortiori if opposed to external evidence, is almost totally valueless as an argument against the reception of any ancient work or passage in a work. E.g. in the well-known text, 1 St. John v. 7, no one can maintain that the Apostle could not have expressed the thought that the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost ἕν εἰσι, who knows what he has actually written in his Gospel [St. John x. 30]; but, in the absence of all manuscript authority of any weight, nothing remains but to admit, without reserve, that the text of "the Three heavenly witnesses" is not a genuine text.[1]

But our modern critics rely upon a further principle. Criticism, writes M. E. Rénan, cannot dream of accepting a miraculous narrative as it stands, "since the essence of criticism is the negation of the supernatural. . . . He who speaks of 'above nature,' or 'outside nature,' in the order of facts utters a contradiction."[2] To give an example: The "higher criticism" has decided that the latter portion of Isaiah [chap. xl.-

[1] Mr. Grote's commentary on the application of the "higher criticism" to the writings of Plato illustrates the worthlessness of this method. He examines the course pursued by Schleiermacher and his followers in reasoning as to the authenticity of each dialogue from the evidence afforded by the style, the handling, the thoughts. A fixed residence and school at Athens had been founded by Plato, and transmitted to his successors: "It appears to me," writes Mr. Grote, "that the continuance of this school . . . gives us an amount of assurance for the authenticity of the so-called Platonic compositions such as does not belong to the works of other eminent contemporary authors [Plato, vol. i. p. 136]. . . . I have reviewed the doctrines of several recent critics who discard this canon [that of Thrasyllus] as unworthy of trust, and who set up for themselves a type of what Plato must have been, derived from a certain number of items in the canon, rejecting the remaining items as unconformable to their hypothetical type." It is surely hazardous, he adds, to limit the range of Plato's varieties "on the faith of a critical repugnance, not merely subjective and fallible, but withal entirely of modern growth" [Ibid. p. 206].

[2] Etudes d'Hist. Religieuse, 5me ed. p. 207.

lxvi.] must be ascribed to an unknown prophet living towards the end of the Babylonian captivity—a prophet whom Ewald styles "the great unnamed," "der Grosse ungenannte."[1] The whole weight of this assertion rests on the principle declared by M. Rénan to be "the essence of criticism," viz., that to predict the future is impossible; a prophet's foresight, it is dogmatically laid down, being bounded, as that of other men, by the horizon of his own age. The other reasons assigned—e.g. that the manner, the usus loquendi, the style, are not those of Isaiah—are confessedly subordinate. Thus, Ewald writes:[2] "One cannot assign to Isaiah, as to other prophets, a special peculiarity and favourite colour of expression. . . . As his subject demands every kind of diction, every change of expression is at his command. . . . His diction is calm and stern, hortatory and menacing, sad and joyful, sportive and serious; but always returns, at the right time, to its original elevation and repose."

As to the confidence to be placed in the "higher criticism" as a "scientific" method for attaining results on which we can rely, the treatment of the writings of St. John supplies a lucid illustration. "While the older critical school," writes Lücke,[3] "upheld the Apostolic authenticity of the Gospel and Epistles of St. John, and thence inferred that the Apocalypse is not authentic, the more recent critical school of Dr. Baur, on the other hand, infers that the Gospel and Epistles are as certainly not the composition of John, as the Apocalypse is the only sufficiently attested,—the only authentic writing of that Apostle to be found in the New Testament." This conclusion has been lately reproduced in England: "If the Apostle John," writes Mr. Taylor, "be the author of the Apocalypse, he cannot have written the Gospel;" and were the evidence to be balanced as to which of the works "best corresponds with the character of their reputed author, we could hardly hesitate in replying—the Apocalypse."[4] [Canon.]

CRITICISM, COMPARATIVE. The phrase "comparative criticism" has been employed by Dr. Tregelles to designate the process by which the comparative value may be determined, and the mutual relation traced, of the various authorities by the aid of which we seek to ascertain the original text of the New Testament. There are two leading systems according to which the study of "comparative criticism" is pursued at the present day. Dr. S. T. Tregelles [see his Account of the printed text of the New Testament] may be taken as the representative of the one system, and Mr. F. H. Scrivener [see his Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament] as the representative of the other.

According to Dr. Tregelles, the true reading of any passage in the New Testament is to be sought exclusively in the most ancient documents, especially in the earliest uncial codices:—"The mass of recent documents," he writes [i.e. those written in cursive characters from the tenth century downwards], "possess no determining voice in a question as to what we should receive as genuine readings" [p. 138].[5]

Mr. Scrivener, on the other hand, maintains "that the few most ancient records, whether MSS., Versions, or Fathers, do not so closely agree among themselves as to supersede all further investigation, and to render it needless so much as to examine the contents of later and more numerous authorities" [l. c. p. 404]. "Does any one," he asks, "suppose that the mass of our cursive documents are only corrupt copies, or copies of copies drawn from existing uncials? . . . Let us frankly accept the sole alternative, that they are representatives of other old copies which have long since perished, respectable ancestors (as one has quaintly put the matter) 'who live only in their descendants.' . . . That the testimony of cursives ought to be scrutinized and suspected, and (when unconfirmed by other witnesses), as a rule, set wholly aside, may be conceded even by those who have laboured the most diligently to collate and vindicate them" [ib. p. 407].

CROSS. In accordance with the main scope of the present work, the subject of "The Cross" will here be treated mainly in its connection with Christian theology and ritual. It would be impossible, within the limits of this article, to follow up its various ramifications into the regions of Jewish, classical, and mediæval history, of art, architecture, archæology, and other subjects with which it is more or less closely connected. Such readers, however, as desire further information of this kind, may find it in the books mentioned below, and in others of similar character.

Writers on the cross have been accustomed to classify its varieties into simple and compound. The simple cross was merely a pole set up in the earth, or a naturally growing tree, and the victim was fastened to it with chains, cords, or nails. Sometimes it was a sharp-pointed stake, on which he was impaled. The compound cross was of three kinds, the Crux Decussata, Crux Commissa, and Crux Inmissa. The first was formed of two pieces of wood fastened in the centre in the form of the letter X, and is called the cross of St. Andrew, on account of the ancient tradition that this Apostle suffered martyrdom on such a cross. The second, or Tau cross, is so called from its resemblance to the Greek letter T, and it is possible

[1] Die Propheten de alten Bundes, b. ii. sec. 403.
[2] Ibid. b. i. § 173.
[3] Einleit. in die Offenb. des Johannes, 2te. Aufl., Abth. ii. § 748.
[4] An Attempt to ascertain the character of the Fourth Gospel, London, 1867, pp. 14, 144.

[5] Uncial MSS. are written in capital letters, formed separately, having no connection with each other, and, in the earlier specimens, without any space between the words—the marks of punctuation being few. The cursive, or running hand, comprises letters more easily and rapidly made, those in the same word being usually joined together, with a complete system of punctuation not widely removed from that of printed books. Uncial letters prevailed in the Greek MSS. of the New Testament from the fourth to the tenth century—as in the Alexandrine MS. or A, the Vatican or B, &c. "The earliest cursive Biblical MS. we can mention is Sylvestre, No. 78, Paris 70, Wetstein's 14 of the Gospels, A.D. 964." [Scrivener, l. c. p. 36.]

that our Lord may have suffered on a cross of this kind. But it has been much more generally believed that the Holy Cross was the Crux Immissa, or Latin cross, as we usually see it represented. The traditional "sign of the cross" points to this form, and St. Jerome, speaking of it as made by the Christians of his day, says it was like the ancient Hebrew final letter Tau, which was not like the Greek letter, but had the perpendicular stroke going a little way above the other, thus †. The cruelty of man devised other forms of the compound cross, which may be seen figured and described in Lipsius De Cruce, and other works, but we need only concern ourselves with that form on which our Lord is believed to have suffered. The Jews had been accustomed to hang malefactors on trees, and they may have derived this usage from the Egyptians [Gen. xl. 19], who practised it in common with other ancient nations. But there is no evidence that they hanged persons before death: they rather adopted this method of exposing their dead bodies in terrorem and for public execration, and every one who hanged on a tree was held "accursed of God" [Deut. xxi. 23].

Crucifixion proper was rather a Roman than a Jewish punishment, and as such it was inflicted on our Lord by the authority of Pilate the Roman governor. We know from the Gospels that Jesus was nailed to the Cross, but we do not know whether this was before or after the fixing of the Cross in the ground, whether with four nails or three, or whether the Cross had a suppedaneum or support for the feet to rest on; questions which have been discussed at great length by some writers. We know that the title or accusation was according to custom set up above the Sacred Head, and in the Greek Church this is often conventionally represented by a shorter additional cross-piece above the other, and the support for the feet by a cross-piece below made oblique as if moved in the agonies of death.

The material of the Cross of Christ was foreshadowed by the Tree of Life, by Noah's ark, by the wood which Isaac carried up Mount Moriah, by the pole on which the brazen serpent was hung, by the wooden spit to which the Paschal Lamb was fastened, by the lintel and the door-post: its form, by the hands of Moses stretched out, and perhaps by the crossed hands of dying Jacob. Indeed the real or supposed types of the Cross are almost innumerable. The ancient Fathers delighted to trace in the four principal dimensions of the Cross the "breadth and length and depth and height" of the love of Christ, as shewn pre-eminently in His painful and ignominious death thereon.

The Cross soon became surrounded with holy memories that tended, though slowly, to displace its disgraceful associations: and where St. Paul says "God forbid that I should glory save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," he is probably expressing the same feeling as that which led the early Christians to sign themselves with the sign of the cross, a practice which Tertullian [A.D. 200] speaks of as traditional in his time (frontem crucis signaculo terimus, De Cor. Mil. iii.). Lactantius [A.D. 306] speaks of the sign of the cross as putting demons to flight, and frustrating the magical devices of the pagans. The same holy sign has been used by the Church from the earliest times in sacraments, benedictions, private and public prayers, &c., in recognition of the efficacy that all acts of devotion acquire through the Cross of Christ, and of that which the very sign itself may in like manner possess when used in faith. The gesture of signing with the cross has from ancient times been made in three ways. 1. When the sign is made separately on the forehead, mouth, and breast, it is made with the thumb only, which mode is also used in signing anything by contact, or with chrism, as in sacraments and benedictions. 2. In the second method, the person first raises his hand to his forehead, then draws it down to the lower part of the breast, then to the left, and then to the right. Sometimes all the fingers, sometimes one, two, or three have been used in making the sign; according to the symbolical reasons uppermost in the minds of the faithful at various times. The Eastern Christians make the sign first towards the right and finish at the left side. 3. The third method is to make the sign in the air with the whole hand, or with three or two fingers, as in blessing the congregation. The right hand is always used, as more honourable than the left as well as more convenient. Spiritual writers have enumerated many reasons why Christians should use this holy sign; the chief of which are the following. It is a mark of distinction between Christians and Jews or heathens; it incites us to the imitation of Christ crucified; it kindles charity; it cherishes faith and hope; it is the sign of our redemption; it excites our sorrow for Christ's sufferings and for our sins; it is most terrible to evil spirits.

The sign of the cross as a gesture has been dwelt on here immediately after the Cross of Calvary, because it is one of the most ancient modes of keeping alive in the hearts of the faithful the memory of the Passion. St. Jerome [A.D. 390] speaks of Christians frequently using it also in inscriptions, "Frequenti manus inscriptione signatur" [In Ezek. ix.]. We should expect to find it in the early monumental inscriptions in the Catacombs, but although these abound in Jewish and Christian symbols, including the monogram of the name of Christ, it is doubtful whether the sign of the cross occurs during the first four centuries. It appears, however, on coins and in a mosaic at Ravenna of about the middle of the fifth century, and from about a century later is found on tombs, fonts, &c., pretty generally. The crucifix or cross bearing a figure of our Lord does not appear till considerably later, and in the earliest the figure is always robed, and sometimes crowned with a royal diadem instead of the crown of thorns. The Sacred Body has always been represented in both manners, as dead and as living. The earliest examples have a nail in each foot, later ones have the feet crossed, with a single nail transfixing both. The earliest existing crucifixes are supposed to be of the ninth century, but there may have been earlier ones than these.

The cross came first, then the crucifix, then representations of the scene of the crucifixion; "each forming," as Lady Eastlake says, "a stage in the development of the same idea, and each overlapping the other in the attempt to anticipate the next step." And if we inquire into the reasons for the absence of the cross and crucifix in early times we shall find it sufficiently accounted for by the ignominy and horror that were associated with the idea of crucifixion, until the edict of Constantine prohibited the employment of the cross as an instrument of punishment. Even then it would require an interregnum of some generations to efface the traditional ideas that were connected with the "arbor infelix," and to bring it to be regarded not as an indication of ignominy but as the most glorious of trophies.

When Christians came to regard the cross in this way, it was but natural that they should give it a place of honour in churches, and accordingly it was set up over the altar, either with or without the figure of Christ upon it. It adorned the topmost points of the exterior, as it now does the domes of St. Peter's and of St. Paul's and the gables of Gothic churches. Sacred vessels and vestments were marked with it, to shew that they belonged to Christ. Children were taught to make the sign at the beginning of their alphabet, which was accordingly called the "Criss-cross Row." It was used at the beginning of all sacred inscriptions, and as the "signature" to the subscription of documents. Altar slabs were marked with five incised crosses, in memory of the five sacred wounds. The last resting places of the faithful were hallowed by the cross, to shew that through it they had overcome sin and death. Wayside crosses were erected in villages and public roads that all who passed by might think on Him who died for them. Crosses, in short, were multiplied in every conceivable way in mediæval times, partly for the above and other like pious reasons, partly, perhaps, for superstitious reasons, and partly because it was the fashion of the time. But there is no doubt that there is one great and deep theological principle underlying the wonderful esteem in which the Cross has now long been held as a Christian emblem, and in which the sign of it appears to have been held from apostolic times; namely, that the death of our Lord upon the Cross was the consummation of that life of sacrifice by which He redeemed mankind. It was the most distinctive feature in His human life that He should die as mortal man, and at the same time it was the passage to His Resurrection and to ours. Through His falling asleep on that painful bed of sorrows, He became the First-fruits of them that slept, and His Cross became the Tree of Life in the midst of the Paradise of God. This idea is strongly impressed on many symbolical uses of the cross in Christian ritual. Whether we look at the altar cross, the churchyard or wayside cross, the gravestone cross, the gable cross, or the cross in any embroidered work or surface decoration, we shall seldom see the perfectly plain cross except in work of debased character, or where there are no pretensions to exact taste. The reason is partly to be found in the hard and angular form, harmonizing so ill with all around, but partly also in the symbolical meaning of the decorated cross. The first thing was to adorn it with jewels, but as Christian art developed the cross assumed various outlines and combinations, which tended to banish its painful associations, and to suggest only those of glory and triumph. So we see the arms terminating in the trefoil or fleur-de-lys, and the circle surrounding the intersection; while in many beautiful grave-slab crosses the upper part and stem together have, like Aaron's rod, budded and borne blossoms. The same feeling is beautifully expressed in the words of the well-known hymn for Passion-tide—

> "Crux fidelis, inter omnes > Arbor una nobilis;
> Nulla sylva talem profert
> Fronde, flore, germine."

The idea was sometimes elaborated so far, particularly in illuminations, as to make the branches bear prophets and kings arising out of their foliage, and fruits inscribed with the names of virtues. Such representations are supposed to be based on St. Bonaventura's exposition of the second verse of the twenty-second chapter of the Revelation [cir. A.D. 1300]. In these the figure of our Lord was introduced, but it is to be noted that wherever the dead or suffering Saviour is represented on a decorated cross there is a confusion of ideas. The plain cross is properly the cross of suffering, and the flowering cross the cross of triumph—the sign of the Son of Man in glory. The vacant cross, like the empty tomb, speaks of Him as not here, but risen, and when adorned or combined with the circle, it speaks of Him as clothed with majesty and honour for ever and ever.

[Lipsius, De Cruce; Gretser, De Cruce; Beyerlinck, Magnum Theatrum, s. v. Cruce; Pearson, On the Creed, art. iv.; Lady Eastlake, History of our Lord; Dr. Rock, Hierurgia; Smith's Dict. of the Bible, articles, "Cross" and "Crucifixion," and works there cited or referred to. Those interested in village and churchyard crosses may find references to a great many in the Manual of English Ecclesiology, and in the works of Petrie, Blight, and Pooley, on Irish, Cornish, and Gloucestershire Crosses.]

CULDEES. This name was given to a religious order established in various parts of Ireland, Scotland, and the adjacent islands; but chiefly in the island of Iona. The name is very variously derived. According to Buchanan it is an abbreviated form of "cultores Dei." Others have thought that the name arose from the cells in which they lived. Bishop Nicholson [Pref. to Irish Hist. Library] gives as the origin of the word, the Irish Culla, which denotes a cowl. Another derivation is given by O'Brien [Irish Dictionary] from the Irish keile, a servant and De, God, a derivation supported by the fact, that in ancient MSS. the word is written Keledei, not Culdei. In the life of St. Columba by Dr. Smith, the same derivation is given, and the word is said to be the Latinized Gaelic of Gille De, servants of God. In the Statistical Account of Scotland [ii. 461, 462] the name is referred to the Gaelic cuil or ceal, a cave, cell, corner, &c., those inhabiting such places being called Cuildich, or in the Latinized form Culdei.

According to Irish historians, the Culdees were established in Ireland A.D. 546, and some years later in Scotland, by St. Columba, who had, at the age of twenty-eight, founded the monastery of Dairmeagh, understood by some to be Armagh. There is no evidence to prove that the Culdees were established in Scotland before that period, though their doctrines and usages were known long before.

St. Columba, having crossed over from Ireland and converted the Northern Piets, received from their king a grant of the island of Iona, for the purpose of founding a monastery. In A.D. 563, he founded there a society which rapidly extended itself to many places in the mainland, Iona, the principal seat of the order, receiving from him the name of I-colm-kill, the Island of Colum of the Cells. Iona was devastated by the Danes in A.D. 801, and about seventy years later the relics of St. Columba were removed for greater safety to Ireland. The Culdees did not constitute a monastic order so much as a body of seminary priests, who taught various branches of useful learning, and trained others for the priesthood.

In each of their colleges there were twelve brethren presided over by an abbot, elected by and from among themselves. Bede says of them, "proprio labore manuum vivunt." They allowed the marriage of priests, and held it in honour. In after times, the principle of hereditary succession was allowed to prevail, as under the Jewish law, and we learn from St. Bernard that at Armagh there was an hereditary succession of Culdees for fifteen generations [Vit. Malach. c. 7].

The Culdees did not acknowledge the authority of the See of Rome, and differed from it in several of their usages. Bede, writing of St. Aidan, who was one of them, says that he observed Easter after the manner of his own people. They opposed auricular confession [St. Bernard Vit. Malach. c. 2], rejected the tonsure, and baptized infants without the consecrated chrism. So bitter was the mutual hostility, that Bishop Dagan, one of the Culdees, refused to eat or remain in the same house with Lawrence, who succeeded St. Augustine in the See of Canterbury; and in a synod held at Streneshalch, now Whitby, in A.D. 662, for the purpose of settling the Easter controversy, the Culdees, headed by Bishop Colman, answered to the claims of the successor of St. Peter, that the authority of St. John, by whose disciples their forefathers had been taught, was of equal weight with that of his fellow Apostle. Even after the Northumbrian priest Egbert had prevailed on the Culdees of Iona in 716 to receive the tonsure, and to follow the general custom of the Church as to the observation of Easter, the Council of Cealchyth decreed that no Scottish priest should be allowed to minister in England. [PASCHAL CONTROVERSY.]

The principal seats of the Culdees were at Abernethy, St. Andrews, Brechin, Dunblane, Monimusk, Scone, Kirkcaldy, and Lochleven. In the twelfth century, many of these bodies were suppressed, the means employed being the promotion of their abbots to bishoprics, the introduction of canons regular, and the suppression of churches in favour of the newly erected abbeys, the consent of the Culdees being gained by the reservation of their rights during their own lifetime. There continued, however, to be Culdees at Iona until 1263, and at St. Andrews until 1297, when their prior, William Cumming, was sent to Rome to plead their cause before Boniface VIII.

CURATE. A priest having CURE OF SOULS. The term has been extended in quite modern times to priests and deacons acting as deputies to rectors and vicars, but it belongs in strict propriety to the latter only, i.e. to priests who have received institution, the Anglican ceremony by which MISSION is given.

CURE OF SOULS. The pastoral care of souls is vested primarily in the bishop of each diocese, and every priest intrusted with it acts as his deputy. Parish priests hold a cure "in foro interiori tantum," over the residents within their parish only; archdeacons, being "sine pastorali cura," have authority "in foro exteriori," being able to suspend, absolve, and excommunicate; but bishops having jurisdiction over the entire diocese, have cure "in interiori et exteriori foro simul." Gerson, the theologian of Paris [c. A.D. 1408], held that all clergy having cure of souls are the successors of the seventy disciples who were the assistants of the Apostles in preaching and ministration of sacraments, and are called apostles by Origen [in Ep. ad Rom. c. xvi. lib. x. sec. xxi; tom. vii. p. 465, ed. Caillau; and St. Chrysostom, in 1 Cor. Hom. xxxviii. sec. 4, tom. x. p. 327, ed. Migne; compare Aquinas, p. iii. qu. 67, art. ii., ad ii; et Sec. Sec. qu. 188, art. 4]. He adds that their right of burying the dead, of administering discipline, and receiving tithes and other parish dues, constitute them in the second order of the hierarchy and minor prelates. The general opinion of the Church was that, as the seventy were appointed by our Lord Himself, and received a distinct commission, so "de jure divino" curates succeed to their jurisdiction and authority received immediately from Christ (as bishops are the successors of apostolical authority): and their position was regarded as analogous to that of the priests and Levites under the Law. Upon the first consideration was grounded the belief that they ought to be summoned to a general council. The episcopate is, in this view, the source and fulness of the priesthood, the fountain which, without diminution, supplies the lesser streams; just as the Holy Spirit put on the seventy elders a portion of the spirit of Moses, without any loss to the plenitude of the latter; curates hold a delegation of jurisdiction and authority from God, only in degree differing from that of bishops. Fulbert, Bishop of Chartres [A.D. 1006], mentions as a custom of his own and neighbouring churches, that the newly ordained priest received from the bishop a single host, which he consumed in portions day by day during forty days after his ordination, as a token that he had been entrusted by him as one of his vicars and coadjutors, with the instruction of the people committed to his charge [Ep. iii. p. 195, ed. Migne; Patr. tom. cxli].

The parish clergy in early times formed the cathedral chapter, and in this sense we must understand the prohibitions given by the Councils of Elvira [A.D. 305, c. xxxii. Bail, Summa Concil. tom. ii. 20] and Arles [A.D. 314, c. xix. ibid. p. 25] against such clergy acting without episcopal permission, or in cases of necessity administering reconciliation or holy communion. In the country the parish clergy had the latter right, but in cities only the privilege of preparing the candidates for baptism at Easter and Whitsuntide. Anastasius and Platina attribute the division of parishes to Evaristus, but their view has been contested. The Third Council of Carthage [A.D. 397] permitted priests to reconcile penitents and consecrate virgins with the bishops' license, but not to make chrism [c. xxxii., xxxvi. Bail, Summa Concil. i. p. 99]. The power of excommunication was given to priests [St. Jerome, Epist. xiv. (al V. Bened. Edit.) ad Heliodorum, sec. viii., ed. Migne, tom. i. p. 352; St. Augustine, Ep. cviii. sec. xx., ed. Caillau, tom. xxxix. p. 333], and also that of absolution and preaching.

The Apostolical Canons permit priests to baptize [Can. xlix. 1; Bever. Cod. Canonum, Works, xi. p. 51, ed. 1848] with the bishop's permission; and the Council of Gangra [c. A.D. 324] condemned all assemblies of laymen with a priest who had not the episcopal license [Canon vi. ap. Bail, i. p. 99]. Examples are not wanting of bishops acting as parish priests [Conc. Nicæn. c. viii. ap. Bail, i. p. 167; comp. Conc. Chalc. Act. iv., can. xxviii.; Ibid. p. 258]. The Apostolical Constitutions [l. iii. c. 26; ed. Ultzen, 1853, pp. 84, 170] permit baptism and confirmation to be administered by priests. See also St. Jerome, contra Lucif. c. ix., ed. Migne, ii. p. 165; Second Council of Seville, A.D. 619, c. viii. [Summa Concil. i. p. 480], and Council of Verne [A.D. 755; c. viii.; Ib. p. 636], for priests baptizing under restrictions.

Until the sixth or seventh century, all priestly functions were reserved to the bishops when present, but owing to their negligence, or rather the impossibility of constantly visiting parish churches, the clergy of the latter began to celebrate more independently; and the lingering trace of the old discipline is seen in the Canon of the Council of Auxerre [A.D. 590], which forbids a priest to celebrate at the same altar and on the same day as his bishop [Can. x. ap. Bail, ii. p. 230], but the bishop clearly could celebrate after the priest. The Council of Riez [A.D. 439] allowed priests to give the benediction in the country, in the field, and private houses [Canon iv. ap. Bail, i. 140], but the Council of Agde [A.D. 505] forbids the priest to give the benediction in church to the congregation or a penitent [Can. xliv. ap. Bail, ii. 176]. The First Council of Orange [A.D. 441], however, permitted priests in the absence of a bishop to administer chrism and benediction to a heretic reconciled at the point of death [Can. ii. ap. Bail, ii.], and the First Council of Orleans [A.D. 511] allowed him to celebrate, and in absence of the bishop even to give the blessing [Can. xxviii. ap. Bail, ii. 179].

The cure of souls is given to priests in the Church of England by the ceremony of institution to a benefice: the "license to a curacy" not conferring it, and being given to deacons (who cannot receive cure of souls) as well as to priests. In this ceremony the priest kneels before the bishop, and holds the seal of the deed of institution while the bishop reads the document "In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," committing unto him "the cure and government of the souls of the parishioners of the said parish." It is usually performed in private, but occasionally in the presence of the priest's future parishioners [Thomassin, de Disciplina Ecclesiastica; ed. Bourassé, s. v. Curé; Hooker, V. lxxx. 2; Field, of the Church, bk. v. c. 28].

CYCLE. [PASCHAL CONTROVERSY.]

D

DAMNATION. [1] The judgment to be pronounced upon the wicked at the last day; and [2] the punishment by which that judgment is to be followed. The use of the term in the New Testament (κρίσις, κρῖμα, words which are applied indiscriminately to the sentence and its execution) is nowhere accompanied by any discription of the nature of the punishment to be inflicted,[1] and these details have to be supplied from such passages as Matt. xviii. 8, xxv. 41. The doctrine of the eternity of its duration is also a deduction from these expressions and from Mark ix. 44, 46, 48.[2]

I. The nature of the punishment of the wicked. The expressions used in the New Testament to describe the punishment of the wicked were received by the early Fathers, with but few exceptions, in a literal sense. Thus Clement of Alexandria speaks of an actual fire,[3] Minucius Felix uses similar language,[4] and Tertullian in a famous passage describes the physical sufferings of the wicked with terrible minuteness.[5] Even Origen, whose spiritualizing temper led him to construct a more lofty ideal of heaven than his contemporaries,[6] and who in some passages of his works appears to have formed the conception of a hell of mental torture,[7] yet displays on other occasions a tendency to the same materialistic views. But a figurative interpretation of these expressions gained ground in the succeeding centuries, and although in Basil the Great[8] and Chrysostom[9] allusions are still found to the torments of a material fire, yet the Gregories in the East,[10] and Augustine[11] in the West, agree in describing the punishment of the wicked as a mental torture arising from the separation of the soul from God and its consciousness of its own guilt. After the references to the character of final punishment in the works of John Scotus Erigena[12] in the ninth, and Thomas Aquinas[13] in the thirteenth century, by both of whom it is represented as being of a spiritual nature, we find no further recurrence to the material view, nor indeed further speculation on this branch of the subject. The more important question of the duration of the sinner's sentence seems henceforth to have occupied the attention of those theologians who constructed any theory of the last things. The Church, as a whole, has never lent her authority to any special interpretation of the words of Scripture upon the point.

II. Of the duration of the punishment of the wicked. Save in the bold speculations of Origen upon this subject,[14] we find amongst the early Fathers no trace of a belief in the final remission of punishments. There are indeed in some of their writings signs of the doctrine which was afterwards propounded by Arnobius,[15] that namely of the ultimate annihilation of the condemned. But with this exception, they are unanimous in asserting the sentence of condemnation to be irreversible.[16] Nor does the opposite view seem to have gained any prevalence in the succeeding centuries, at least amongst the more eminent of the Fathers. Augustine argues that the punishment is everlasting from Matt. xxv. 41, 46, and on the ground that the word ἀιώνιος must have the same meaning in reference to both life and punishment.[17] Chrysostom, though a pupil of Diodore of Tarsus, who held Origenist views, strenuously maintained the same doctrines as Augustine;[18] and Gregory of Nazianzum, though he expresses hopes of a final remission, never ventured to propound it dogmatically.[19] Gregory of Nyssa, however, speaks more plainly on the point.[20] The Anabaptists in the sixteenth century, and [1] Matt. xxiii. 33, Mark xii. 10, Luke xx. 47, Matt. xxiii. 14: the parallel of these latter two is rejected by Alford.

[2] The phrase "eternal damnation" in Mark iii. 33 is a translation of αμαρτημάτος ἀιώνιου, which Alford would prefer rendering peccati non delendi.

[3] Clem. Alex. Cohort. ad Gent. sec. 35, p. 47, πῦρ σωφρονοῦν.

[4] Minuc. Fel. 35—ignis sapiens.

[5] Tert. de Spect. sec. 30.

[6] Orig. de Princ. ii. 11.

[7] Orig. de Princ. ii. 10, Opp. i. p. 102.

[8] Basil, Homil. in Ps. xxiii.

[9] Chrys. Opp. I. iv. 560, 561.

[10] Greg. Naz. Orat. xvi. 9.

[11] August. de Morib. Eccl. Cat. c. 11.

[12] J. S. Erig. de Div. Nat. v. 29.

[13] Thom. Aquin. Elucid. 80.

[14] Origen, de Princ. i. 6.

[15] Just. Mart. Dial. Tryph. c. 5. ἐς τ' ἂν αὐτὰς καὶ εἶναι καὶ κολάζεσθαι ὁ Θεὸς θέλῃ. It should be added, however, that the common interpretation of this passage has been questioned [Gallandii Bibl. vet. Patrum, i. 467, n. 4]. Cf. however Iren. ii. 34, quoadusque Deus et esse et perseverare voluit.

[16] Clement of Rome, Ep. ad Cor. c. 8. Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 8; Minuc. Felix, c. 35; Cyprian, Treat. viii. (ad Demet.) 23.

[17] Aug. de Civ. Dei, xxi. 23.

[18] Chrys. Hom. xxxix. in Ep. 1 ad Cor. xv. 28.

[19] Greg. Naz. Orat. xl.

[20] Greg. Nyss. Orat. Cat. c. 8.

Dark Ages

the Universalists of our own day, represent the more modern efforts to propagate a belief in the final restitution. The Church, although by its conciliar condemnation of this amongst others of Origen's doctrines at Constantinople [A.D. 544] it has indirectly asserted the eternity of future punishment, has never promulgated it as a positive dogma. The Anglican Church, although we are not permitted to doubt its mind upon the subject, has nevertheless adopted the same course. Accordingly the forty-first of the Articles of 1552, entitled "All men shall not be saved at the length," was struck out at the revision of 1562, nor has any authoritative statement of doctrine of the Church upon this point been promulgated since that period. [EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT.]

DARK AGES. A name applied either to the whole or to some part of the period between the first and the sixteenth centuries. Its application to the whole of this transition-period indiscriminately is now rarely found except in popular or rhetorical writers; but is due originally to the Baconian reaction against the Scholastic method, and to the strong antagonism of popular Protestantism to the influence and claims of the Latin Church. In literary history, the "dark" period is that between the extinction of classical and the rise of vernacular poetry, or between the decay of Greek studies and the Renaissance, or again between the closing of the schools of Athens by Justinian and the growth of modern science. Fleury, Guizot and Hallam agree in placing the lowest depth to which the European mind has sunk in historic times in the seventh century, the century before Charles the Great. Milner and Robertson, on the other hand, apply the term "dark" to the interval between the beginning of the ninth and the end of the twelfth centuries; and it is this period of which the late Dr. Maitland treats in his essays on the Dark Ages.

To prove with Dr. Maitland that kings were not so illiterate, ministers of religion not so unfit, the administration of church ordinances not so slovenly, the learning of the monks not so useless, their morality not so questionable, as Milner and Robertson had asserted them to be, is scarcely enough by itself to vindicate this period against the accusation of darkness. The real answer to the charge is found in the consideration, that Western Society was saved, after the collapse of the Roman Empire, by the growth of the Latin Church into a great political institution, by the organization of feudal land-tenure within its bosom, and by the ultimate culmination of suzerainty in the Holy See itself; and that, in these four centuries from Charles the Great to Innocent III., this process of reconstruction attained its highest consummation. Religiously too, it might be said, these four centuries were anything but "dark;" when, by reason of the very antagonism of the Church and the world, the higher spiritual life reached, in the isolation of the cloister, a degree of intensity which is rarely found amidst the altered conditions of modern Christendom. Æsthetically again, these centuries are the age of the great Gothic cathedrals, and of the beautiful barbaric incidents of the tournament; whilst the latter half of the period was enlivened and refined by the romances and lyrics of the troubadours. In the sphere of intellect, lastly, the undisputed sway of Realism preceding the age of Roscelin and Abélard will only be a sign of darkness to those who find it most easy to explain the universe upon the assumption that "universals" are merely fictions of the understanding or of the organs of utterance. [CONCEPTUALISM.]

Darkness is matter of degree; and, in one sense, every fresh period of light and civilization is preceded by one of comparative darkness and barbarism, arising out of the immaturity of the new, and the decay of the old, constituents of social well-being. Hence the so-called darkness of the Middle Age belongs rather to the centuries immediately preceding the Reformation, when the Holy See, hitherto the source of civil as of ecclesiastical authority, was declining in influence and becoming corrupt; when the obscuration of the true Object of worship by superstitious and abusive practices had begun to awaken the scepticism, before it alarmed the reason and devotion, of Christendom; whilst the political fabric of mediævalism was giving way before the growth of an urban industrial population which it lacked the means of adequately dealing with. Such periods of decay seldom pass over into a new order of things without a crisis more or less prolonged and aggravated. And from a crisis demoralization and anarchy—religious, moral, intellectual—are inseparable. The anarchical and Antinomian tendencies which darken the two centuries preceding the Reformation were gathering strength, as the ephemeral literature of the time abundantly proves, during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, until they reach a second and final crisis in the French Revolution. [ATHEISM.] Thus the darkness of the last part of the Middle Age may be said more properly to be due to the modern movement to which it forms a kind of background; and these considerations, if correct, indicate also the true limits within which the "Dark Ages" par excellence are to be found, i.e. not in the mediæval period itself, but immediately preceding it. We may conveniently consider the characteristics of this period under the three headings of the Empire, the Barbarians, and the Church.

[I.] The Roman Empire, when its hour had come, gave way much more suddenly than the mediæval polity. M. Renan speaks of its decline as "rapide ou, pour mieux dire, tout à fait subite" [Les Apôtres, p. 329, follg.]. This was not so much owing to the invasions of the Teutonic barbarians, many of whom were already half-romanized, as from the enormous size of the empire, the consequent remoteness of the heart from the extremities of the organism, and the ultimate discontinuance of vitality at the centre. As Horace had long ago prophesied:

Suis et ipsa Roma viribus ruit.

From the first the Roman state had been a military system; as it expanded it became of necessity more exclusively so, and its very existence as a military system depended upon its continued ability to expand. The defeat of Varus by the Germans being the first effectual check to its expansion, may therefore be taken as the date at which its decline definitively began, and consequently as the extreme limit, in one direction, of the Dark Ages. Chronologically it would be an inaccuracy to say that the Dark Ages commenced so early; but this defeat was the first shadow cast upon the Old World, and the first harbinger of the New. The limits in the opposite direction may be identified roughly with the rise of the Papacy in the seventh century, of Feudalism and of the Germanic Empire in the eighth and ninth, of Scholasticism in the twelfth, of vernacular literature in the fourteenth. The age of darkness may be said to culminate in the fifth century, between the capture of Rome by Alaric and the battle of Chalons. But for many generations on each side of this interval the dissolution of imperial society, the decay of law and government, the ruin of the middle classes in the provinces by bad taxation, the depopulation of whole regions by chimerical attempts at re-conquest, the concentration of enormous wealth in the hands of the Roman nobles, the pauperization of the masses of the metropolis by a wholesale system of public charity, the demoralization and at the same time the omnipotence of the army, —combine to make this the darkest age in history. These tendencies were beginning to appear as early as the time of Tacitus, whilst in the perhaps somewhat highly coloured accounts of Ammianus Marcellinus (fourth century) we see them in full operation [Gibbon's Decline and Fall, chap. xxxi.; Ammianus Marcellinus, xiv. 6; xxviii.].

Dark Ages

The trial of Theodorus for magic [A.D. 371] led to a wholesale destruction of libraries throughout the Eastern provinces, in the hope of suppressing magical treatises. "Deinde congesti innumeri codices, et acervi voluminum multi . . . concremati sunt" [Ammianus, xxix. 1, 40]. And again: "Inde factum est per Orientales provincias ut omnes metu . . . exurerent libraria omnia: tantus universos invaserat terror. Namque, ut pressius loquar, omnes eâ tempestate velut in Cimmeriis tenebris reptabamus" [Ibid. ii. 1]. A generation later [A.D. 408] the last remnant of pagan culture was extinguished in the West, through the dispersion of the educated classes by Alaric. "Nulla est regio," writes St. Jerome [Ep. 98], "quæ non exules Romanos habeat." It was to convince these exiles that Christianity was not the cause of the ruin of society, and at the same time to lift the mind from the miseries of the earthly to the glories of the heavenly city, that St. Augustine wrote his treatise de Civitate Dei.

A century later we find Britain, Gaul, Rhætia, Pannonia, Vindelicia, reduced to desolation, foreign commerce well-nigh extinguished, home trade reduced to the exchange of the rudest commodities, the mercantile classes crushed by the invading Goths and Vandals under the supposition that they were favourable to Rome. [Finlay's Byzantine Empire, i. p. 62, 329, &c.]. At the same time the wholesale extortions of the Eastern Empire are producing "the death of thousands, the poverty of millions, the ruin of cities and desolation of provinces." In Italy under the strong and in many respects beneficent government of Theodoric the Great, Boethius, the last representative of the old culture, is awaiting his execution; "the mind of man is sunk to the lowest depths of dulness, and the lamp of thought extinguished in outer darkness" [De Consolatione, i. 2].

Perhaps few things better illustrate the hopeless deterioration of the population of the Roman Empire in the Dark Ages than the following facts. The army since the time of Augustus had begun to be, and by the time of Theodosius was wholly, recruited from the barbarian tribes. In the great battle with the Huns at Chalons [A.D. 450] the imperial army consisted entirely of Saxons, Franks, Burgundians, and Visigoths: and there is no evidence that the provincial populations, when abandoned to themselves, attempted any resistance whatever to the barbarian incursions.

[II.] Of these barbarians it is now necessary to give some account. They were essentially the same Germanic race as those who had defeated Varus, and who being nomadic peoples, had, like the Arabians in the time of Darius, and the Scythian hordes, successfully resisted all attempts at conquest. Unlike the lower tribes of Huns and Avars, who swept again and again over the face of the Empire without effecting a settlement, these Germanic nations had hovered long upon the borders of the Empire, and as the provinces became depopulated, small bodies of them had crossed the frontier and occupied the waste lands. Their youth had gradually become, as was said above, the staple element in the Imperial army; their great men had not infrequently disgraced or adorned the purple itself. In the busts of the Roman Emperors which have come down to us, the transition from the classical to the Germanic type of face is unmistakeable. Above all, whether within or without the frontier-line, their imaginations were filled with the greatness of the Roman name, the phantom of which they were destined in after times to resuscitate and to keep alive until almost the end of the Middle Ages.

On the other hand, the German nations, especially those upon the eastern bank of the Rhine, have always manifested a remarkable backwardness in development. At the time of their first incursions into the Empire many of them had scarcely passed beyond the "hunting and fishing," few beyond the nomadic, stage of barbarism: so that they had to make the transition from the nomadic to the agricultural condition of life, from the chase to the military, and from the agricultural and military to the political state of existence, after they had already entered and begun to form the dominant and most lively element in the population of the Empire.

This immaturity in the Teutonic barbarians was further aggravated by two very characteristic tendencies of the German race in its infancy. One of these is the tendency to personal independence, and the other is the shallowness of sentiment respecting right and wrong. It is sometimes said that the Teutonic race is incapable of conspiracy; but however that may be, it is certain that in the separated and personal character impressed upon the feudal polity, in the identification of sovereignty with property, in the trial by judicial combat, in the infliction of legal penalties by private revenge, in the degeneration of feudal laws into class-privileges, not to speak of the perpetuation of small independent fiefs even into modern times, what has been called the individualism of the German race has attained an historical and permanent expression.

The German customary codes, again, are singularly inadequate in their conception of the nature of crime. Murder, for example, as Tacitus tells us [Germ. c. 21], is regarded not as a crime against the community, but as injury committed against an individual and his family, which may be recompensed by a fine of sheep or oxen. In the Salic law, all crimes are brought under the two heads of robbery and violence, and except in the case of slaves or labourers, there are no corporal punishments, no imprisonment, few capital penalties, all of which can be redeemed by the payment of composition.

These considerations with respect to the immaturity, want of coherence, and vagueness of moral sentiment in the German races, are confirmed by the history of the earliest barbarian kingdoms. The kingdoms of the Salic Franks in Gaul, of the Ostrogoths in Italy, of the Visigoths in Spain, of the Vandals in Africa, of the Suevi, Burgundians, and Lombards, were all immature, all lacked cohesion, and passed away in a few generations. Even the empire of Charles the Great broke up after his death.

Coincident with this, lastly, is the curious fact of the rapid deterioration and extinction of the first barbarian reigning families. The Merovingian "rois fainéants" declined both physically and mentally with a rapidity unequalled even in Oriental dynasties. The later monarchs of that family were all parents at fifteen years of age, and old men at thirty; while out of thirteen, six died at or before twenty-seven years.

This unripeness of the barbarian immigrants rendered them peculiarly susceptible of all the evil influences of the fast subsiding empire into which they came. "Half the vices," says M. Ozanam, "attributed to the barbarians were those of the Roman decline, and a share of the disorders charged upon nascent Christianity must be laid to the account of antiquity. In this category must be placed the vulgar superstitions, the occult sciences, the bloody laws put in force against magic, which do but repeat the old decrees of the Cæsars; the fiscal system of the Merovingian kings, which was entirely borrowed from the imperial organization; the corruption, lastly, of taste and the decomposition of language, which already prognosticated the diversity of idioms" [Civilization in the fifth Century, vol. i. p. 71].

We have thus made out two characteristic conditions of the "Dark Ages," viz.: the rapid internal decline of the Roman Empire, and the immaturity, slow growth, and anti-social qualities of the German immigrants. The result was that human life became little else than the struggle for foot-room and existence; education, learning, culture, literature, law, government, even physical well-being, seem for a time to have deserted the world.

[III.] The Mediæval Church, and especially the Papacy, is not uncommonly held accountable for the darkness of the Dark Ages. So far is this from being just, that it would be more true to say that it was the Church which saved society, art, literature, government, out of the degradation into which they had fallen; which educated the barbarians, and deepened with religious sanctions the shallowness of their moral feelings; which refined the gross military chieftains by the spirit of chivalry, and at length united and sanctified them through the presentation of a great religious aim in the Crusades. The first onset of Islam and the rise of the Papacy as the centre of the new world, i.e. pressure from without and organization within, Christendom, are coeval.

On the other hand, there are certain conditions surrounding the early existence of the Church which require to be taken into consideration to account for the fact that it was able to do so little to regenerate the world during the period of the Dark Ages.

a] First, the effect of persecution upon the religious life of the Church was to lash it into a state of feverish excitement. The mere fact of recent conversion is sufficient to do this amongst masses of rude population, and in the case of many of the barbarian tribes, who were originally Arian, the excitement of conversion was repeated when they were re-converted to the Catholic faith. The rivalry, too, of the two forms of Christian belief deteriorated into the merest political intrigue. Clovis, for example, owed his success in great measure to the support of the Catholics; in Italy, Theodoric's party were Arian, the Imperial party Catholic; Genseric, in Africa, was aided by the Donatists; the death of Hilderic was compassed by the Arians. This rivalry, combined with the entrance of many of the barbarians into the ranks of the clergy, had the effect of impairing the moral power of the Church in the world.

b] Then, again, these same causes tended to produce an intellectual decline within the Church during this period, which was increased by the position that Christianity had of necessity to assume towards the prevailing remnant of Greek philosophy, which simulated, whilst secretly corrupting, its doctrines. This, and the libertinism prevailing amongst the old Roman population, brought the Church by degrees into direct opposition to the existing remnant of pagan cultivation. Thus St. Jerome condemns classical study, the Church discouraged it, until at length the Council of Carthage [A.D. 398] prohibited the bishops from reading pagan literature. Under these circumstances it is scarcely to be wondered at that many, even of the bishops who sat in the early councils, were almost wholly uneducated men.

c] More than all, the withdrawal of the Christian life—the only really active regenerative force in these times—into the desert and the cloister, was a cause of the darkness of the ante-mediæval period. The conditions of this seclusion did not lie in the spirit of Christianity itself, as M. Renan has suggested, but in the barbarism and violence of an age in which the mere struggle for existence reached an unparalleled intensity [see MONASTICISM]. The darkness of the world necessitated that the light should be put under a bushel, and this increased the darkness. It was not till Gregory I. that the Church really began to hold its own in and against the world.

The new spirit, which was thus at first condemned to work underground in catacombs, prisons, and monasteries, emerged in due time in a variety of forms to take possession of the different sides of human life—the Latin Church, the new Christian empire of Germany, the feudal system, the Scholastic philosophy, Christian art and poetry. But the interval between the decay of the old and the rise of the new forms an hiatus in human history and civilization, through which we obtain instructive glimpses of the abyss upon which society reposes.

DEACON. The word διακονία in the New Testament [Acts i. 17, 25, vi. 4, xx. 24, xxi. 19; 2 Cor. iii. 8, ix. 12; Rom. xi. 13] generally refers to religious or spiritual service and ministration for the edifying of the Church. The Apostles themselves are called deacons of Christ and the Church. The term Levite was restricted to the deacon properly so called. The order of a deacon is designated by διάκονος, a Greek work Latinized in canon law as "minister," as the Fourth Council of Carthage says the deacon is consecrated to a ministry. The word ὑπηρέτης used in Acts xiii. 5 for a deacon was afterwards attributed to sub-deacons, who discharged the subordinate duties of the diaconate. Thorndike and others consider that deacons represent the Pauline ἀντιλήψεις, or helps. The diaconate always existed in the Church: deacons, like priests, being ordained by the imposition of hands, and with the "si quis," or consent of the people.

The diaconate was founded by the Apostles, seven men of good report and full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, being ordained by them as almoners of the Church [Acts vi. 1-7]. Their office is mentioned in the Epistle to the Philippians, and St. Paul regulates the indispensable qualifications for its tenure in 1 Tim. iii. 8-13. The original ministry of the diaconate was service at the altar in church, assisting the bishop or priest in the distribution of the Eucharist, warning the faithful when to pray, when to kneel, and when to rise, when to come forward, when to retire at the time of Holy Communion; to maintain order and silence, assisted by the porters and sub-deacons. Before acolyths were instituted the deacons attended the bishop when preaching. The duties at length were extended to the giving of instruction to the catechumens, to baptizing in case of necessity, and to preaching if licensed by the bishop. The Council of Elvira [c. lxxvii.] recognises baptism by deacons, and also their tenure of parochial cures, and ministration of the holy Eucharist at the bidding of the priest. The deacons acted as visitors of the faithful out of church, had charge of all the temporal works of charity, received alms and distributed them according to the directions of their superior: they reported to the bishop any quarrels or notorious sins within their district; they attended bishops on their journeys, and acted as their messengers to the priests of distant missions, and are hence called by Apostolical Constitutions the bishops' angels or messengers, and prophets or interpreters. These privileges occasioned insubordination on the part of deacons towards priests. All that is rare is more eagerly sought, said St. Jerome: deacons because few, are honourable; priests because many, are lightly esteemed; for in imitation of the Apostolical number at Rome, and by the Council of Neocæsarea [c. xv.], seven permanent deacons only, the number mentioned by Sozomen, and at Rome by Eusebius, were appointed in a single city; but Edessa possessed thirty-eight at the time of the Council of Chalcedon, and Justinian raised the number to one hundred at Constantinople. Sozomen mentions that the number varied in places. In the early English Church deacons are rarely mentioned, and it is probable that then, as now, deacons soon became priests.

Thomassin says that the diaconate was not only an order and office, but a benefice in the Church for twelve centuries: the archdiaconate, though now held only by a priest, being a relic of this fact. In the fifteenth century in England, however, deacons usually held the office. [Du Maillane, du Droit Canonique, ii. 319; Palmer, on the Church, i. pt. vi. c. iii.; Thomassin, p. I. lib. ii. cxxxiii. lib. 1. c. li.]

DEACONESS. The necessity of feminine attendance at the baptism of adult women originated a distinct class of religious women in the early Church; and when other duties arose, such as attending upon the sick, they gradually acquired the name of Διακόνισσα. St. Clement of Alexandria, St. Chrysostom and Theophylact, consider the γυναῖκας of 1 Tim. iii. 11, to have been deaconesses, and Phœbe is said to be διάκονον τῆς ἐκκλησίας τῆς ἐν Κεγχρεαῖς in Rom. xvi. 1. In Pliny's Epistle to Trajan, two ancillæ quæ ministræ dicebantur [Plin. Ep. xcvii.] are mentioned by him; St. Ignatius salutes "the virgins who are called widows" [Ignat. ad Smyrn. xiii.]. The Apostolical Constitutions decree that deaconesses were to be chosen from among the virgins, or from among the widows who had been only once married [App. Const. vi. 17, i.]; the nineteenth Canon of Nicæa [A.D. 325] names schismatical deaconesses, and the Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451] expressly enjoined, "Let not a woman receive imposition of hands as a deaconess [Διάκονον μὴ χειροτονεῖσθαι γυναῖκα] before she is forty years old" [Can. xv.]. It thus appears that for some centuries there was a recognised class of women going by this name in the Church, and that at their appointment they received formal benediction with the ceremony of imposition of hands, then commonly used in all benedictions.

In the Eastern Church deaconesses continued to be appointed so late as the twelfth century [Balsamon, i. p. 381], yet they had been forbidden, if they are really meant by πρεσβύτιδας, by the eleventh Canon of the Council of Laodicea [circ. A.D. 365]. In the Western Church their appointment was also forbidden by several councils in the fifth and sixth centuries [Araus. can. xxvi.; Epaun., can. xxi.; Aurel. can. xviii.]; yet Cardinal Bona [Rer. Liturg. I. xxv. 15.] considers that they did not altogether cease until the tenth or eleventh century.

The duties of the deaconess were to attend to women at their baptism, and to catechize them in private during their preparation for that sacrament; to visit sick women and attend when they were anointed; also to minister to the confessors and martyrs when men could not gain access to them. They also had some humble feminine duties to perform in respect to the churches. Probably these duties were undertaken in later ages by nuns, and thus deaconesses were absorbed in the female religious orders [Baronius, i. A.D. 44; Bingham, II. xxii.; Döllinger, i. 214].

DEATH. The separation of the soul and spirit from the material body. By it the latter being deprived of that by which its molecular integrity was preserved, enters immediately upon the process by which it is eventually resolved into inorganic substances. Nothing is more certain than that one of the consequences of death is the return of the body to the dust: a few ounces of dust being its final residuum. For the results of death as regards SOUL and SPIRIT, see the articles under those words.

That death was originally a consequence of sin is distinctly stated in Gen. ii. 17, iii. 3, 19 [ORIGINAL SIN]; and it is the opinion of the best theologians that our nature would in some manner, perhaps by the sacramental virtue of the Tree of Life, have been secured against death if sin had not "entered into the world" [Rom. v. 12]. This is expressed in clear terms in the Book of Wisdom: "For God created man to be immortal, and made him to be the image of His own eternity. Nevertheless, through envy of the devil came death into the world" [Wisdom ii. 23]. Death was not, however, the consequence of an arbitrary decree of the Creator, but of that moral lapse by which man shut himself out from the means by which immortality might have been preserved.

The ancient writers of the Church unanimously maintain that death, as a consequence of sin, was a merciful provision of the Creator: since it was a means by which the spiritual results of sin might cease, the holy dead being no longer included in the category of sinners, although they must needs be so as long as they are living in bodies capable of ministering to sin.

SPIRITUAL DEATH is so called by analogy, being that privation of grace which is the present consequence of original, and of persistent actual, sin.

ETERNAL DEATH is also a term used by analogy, signifying that privation of the life of blessedness in Heaven which will be the final lot of those who die impenitent. The term SECOND DEATH [Rev. ii. 11, xx. 6, 14, xxi. 8] appears to be synonymous with this. [ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. HELL.]

DEATH OF CHRIST. The morally immaculate character of our Lord's Human Nature, and the incorruptibility of His Body, made the mode of His Death an exception to the ordinary law by which human nature dies, as His Conception and Birth were an exception to the ordinary law by which it enters on existence. And, considering how close an association there is between the inheritance of original sin and inheritance of the capacity for dying, it may be doubted whether the immaculate Human Nature of Christ could have been naturally subject to death, any more than His holy Body could be subject to molecular dissolution.

Its voluntary character was asserted by our Lord beforehand: "I lay down My life that I might take it again. No man taketh it from Me, but I lay it down of Myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." [John x. 17.] It was also indicated by His words on the cross, and by the manner of His death. For, "knowing that all things were now accomplished . . . He said, It is finished; and He bowed His head, and gave up the ghost" [John xix. 28-30]: having previously said, "Father, into Thy hands I commend My Spirit" [Luke xxiii. 46].

Its miraculous character was also asserted beforehand in the words quoted: for the power of resurrection, which was undoubtedly miraculous, is put in apposition with the power of death, shewing it also to be so. This was also indicated by the circumstances of Christ's death. For crucifixion was, and is, a lingering mode of death, as is testified by ancient writers, and by those who have witnessed it in the East and in Madagascar within our own time [Origen, Opp. ii. 237; Ellis, Hist. Madagascar, i. 371; Wiseman's Connection between Science and revealed Religion, i. 265-275], and although it was inflicted as a capital punishment, actual death was usually effected by stabbing, unless the criminal was left to die of thirst and hunger. But our Lord died within a few hours; and that immediately after He had signified that the time for His death had arrived, although He had previously spoken, and "cried aloud," with the appearance of still vigorous vitality.

Whether natural means were used to effect this miraculous and voluntary death of Christ is a question of very little importance, because the Will which effected original creation, and which manifested its miraculous power so often during His ministry, could equally operate in the separation of His body from His soul. But if He was pleased to work the miracle of His death by natural means, it is probable that rupture of the heart was the means used; it being certain that death was not effected (as some Rationalists have irrationally asserted) by the piercing of His side, and being improbable that it was effected by the crucifixion itself. For evidence on this particular point, and for much other useful and learned information on the general subject, the reader is referred to a "Treatise on the Physical Cause of the Death of Christ, &c., by William Stroud, M.D.," 1847. For the relation of the death of Christ to His work as Redeemer see the articles ATONEMENT, SATISFACTION.

DECREES, ETERNAL. The Scripture speaks of God's purposes or decrees as being eternal, and clearly intimates that events are not fortuitous or accidental, but are known and foreordained by infinite Wisdom [Ps. lxxvi. 10; Prov. xvi. 1, 9, xix. 21; Isa. xlvi. 10; Dan. iv. 24, 25; Acts ii. 23, xv. 18; Eph. i. 11]. The teaching of the Word of God on this subject has been brought forward in support of the Calvinistic tenet, that man's salvation or condemnation are not dependent upon his good or evil works, but on God's eternal decree, founded on wise though inscrutable reasons [CALVINISM]. The chief objection against this Calvinistic theory is that it is partial and one-sided. We are reminded by its advocates that we are not competent to judge of God's dealings:—He is a Sovereign and doeth what He will in the armies of heaven and amongst the inhabitants of earth,—that He is the Potter and we are the clay—statements which rightly understood are undoubtedly true. But at the same time it must be remembered, that we cannot infer from God's sovereignty as our Creator that He acts, according to the representation of Calvinism, unjustly or from mere caprice, as men too often do when possessed of unlimited power. In judging of God's dispensations, we must not look merely at His absolute sovereignty, and then from our own earthly notions and experience presume to judge of His conduct, but we must remember His other attributes of love and justice, without which His character and dealings cannot be rightly known or understood. Viewing these attributes it is impossible to suppose, that God's decrees respecting individuals or nations, though necessarily immutable on account of His Omniscience and eternal foreknowledge, can, speaking generally, originate from any other cause than His foresight of man's own voluntary conduct—his improvement or abuse of free-will. How God's foreknowledge of, and foreordaining all things, can be reconciled with man's free-will is a profound, unfathomable mystery; which cannot at least be solved (if we admit the authority of Scripture) by denying either one doctrine or the other.

DECRETALS. [LAW, CANON.]

DECRETALS, FALSE. This is the title commonly applied to a number of fictitious canons and canonical dicta contained in a collection of which the authorship and the exact date are alike uncertain, but which was (at least partially and for some time) received as a genuine body of canonical law.

[I.] Contents. The oldest edition of this collection of canons is divided into three parts, of which the first contains (after a preface extracted from the genuine collection of Isidore of Seville [LAW, CANON] the Canons of the Apostles, followed by fifty forged briefs and decrees of the thirty earlier Popes from Clemens [A.D. 91] to Melchiades [A.D. 313]. The second part contains, after an introduction, the celebrated forged Donation of Constantine, more extracts from the preface to the Spanish collection, one extract from an old Gallic collection of the fifth century, and the canons of several Greek, African, Gallic, and Spanish Councils, also taken from the Spanish collection in its augmented edition [A.D. 683]. The third part, after another extract from the Spanish preface, contains in chronological order the decrees of the Popes from Sylvester [A.D. 335] to Gregory II. [A.D. 731], amongst which are thirty-five forged decrees, and the canons of several doubtful councils, the genuine passages being from the Gallic and Spanish collections, and from that of Denis le Petit, many of these however falsified by interpolations. After the Decree of Gregory II., which appears originally to have closed the manuscript, there follow (in the same handwriting) several pieces under the name of Symmachus [A.D. 498-514], notably two fictitious Roman councils; this supplement being followed by a second from the same hand. To the whole is prefixed the name of St. Isidore of Seville. The forged portions treat of dogmatical questions: of the dignity, advantages and privileges of the Romish Church; of the prosecution of bishops and other clergy; of appeals to the Papal chair; and of the due performance of a multitude of church ceremonies.[1]

[II.] Authorship and date. Criticism has been far more successful in exposing the falsity of this work than in discovering its true author; and neither on this point nor on that of the date of its publication is there anything like unanimity amongst inquirers. The inscription at the head of the preface in the most ancient manuscript runs thus: "Incipit præfatio S. Isidori episcopi libri hujus. Isidorus Mercator[2] servus Christi lectori conservo suo et parenti in Domino fidei salutem." It will thus be seen that the author, whoever he was, was desirous of passing off his production as the work of St. Isidore of Seville, upon whose genuine collection it was, as has been seen, principally grounded. That it was not Isidore's is evident from a variety of evi-

[1] Walter, Manuel du Droit Ecel. sec. 89 (traduit par Roquement); Paris, 1840. Fleury, Hist. Ecel. I. xliv. 22; Eneyclopédie, sub verb. Decretales Fausses.

[2] The existence of this form of the surname in this the oldest edition is very singular, and is opposed to the theory of De Marca and others, that the reading "Mercator" is a corruption of an earlier title "Peccator," adopted by the forger in imitation of a mark of humility then common amongst bishops. On the other hand it is still evident (as against the Eneyclopédiste, sub. verb. F. D.) that the title was meant to be taken for that of Isidore of Seville from the prefix "sancti." dence internal and external. [1.] The oldest manuscript in existence contains Papal decrees of a date at least one hundred years subsequent to the death of Isidore. [2.] Even if we assume this MS. to be an augmented edition of a later date than the original, still there has never been a single manuscript of the pseudo-Isidorian collection discovered in Spain,[1] while specimens of the genuine collection of Isidore have always been plentiful in that country. [3.] Again, on the assumption made in [2], it is utterly inexplicable that a work of so famous an author as St. Isidore of Seville, and compiled, as stated in the preface, at the request of twenty-four bishops, who must necessarily have known of its publication, should have remained concealed for at least one hundred years. They were not the work of Isidore, nor even of Spanish origin. The weight of later historic authority has fixed them at a date considerably subsequent to that formerly assigned to them,[2] and is nearly agreed in attributing to them a Frankish origin.[3] The fragments of Canons of the Council of Paris, A.D. 829, and of Aix-la-Chapelle, A.D. 836, are found in them. They cannot, on the other hand, be of a later date than the years 840-847.[4] Their locality has been fixed with great semblance of probability at Mayence, the place at which they appear to have been first promulgated under the pretext that Riculphus, Bishop of Mayence, had received them from Isidore of Seville. Walter, the writer of the greatest research on the subject, assisted by the earlier labours of David Blondel (a Protestant preacher of the seventeenth century, who finally demolished these long-doubted decretals) and of the two Ballerini, has ventured on assigning them to an individual, Benedict of Mayence—author of a supplement to the Capitularies of Adelgesius [A.D. 840-847]—on the following grounds: [1] a striking general similarity in matter between this work of Benedict and the decretals, yet without the one appearing to be either a paraphrase of, or a body of extracts from, the other. [2] A similar stress laid upon the same points in both works, and similar repetitions of these points. [3] A great resemblance of tone in the prefaces of both works. [4] Similar attempts in both to ground their dogmas upon Apostolic authority. [See Durand de Maillane, Dict. du Droit Can., sub. v. Droit Can.; Walter, Manuel du Droit Can.; Blondel, Pseudo Isidorius et Turrianus vapulantes, Geneva, 1628; Ballerini, part iii.; Colquhoun, Summary of Rom. Civ. Law, vol. i.; Fleury, Dict. Eccles. vols. xiii. ix. xi. xvi. &c.; Mosheim, Eccl. Hist. v. ii.; Milman, Hist. Lat. Christ. vol. ii.; Johannis Devoti, Just. Can. vol. i., Encyclopédie, sub verb. Dec. Fauss.]

[1] Walter, sec. 91.

[2] Fleury, c.g., would date them earlier than A.D. 785, from their being quoted in the Sententiæ Ingelramnes, the Canons of Enguerrand, Bishop of Metz [Fleury, Hist. Ecc. bk. xliv. 22]; but these canons are themselves forged, probably by the forger of the False Decretals [Walter, Droit Eccl. sec. 93, following Ballerini].

[3] Walter, sec. 91; Milman, Hist. Lat. Chris. ii. 375; Blondel, Pscud. Isidorius; Ballerini, &c. Eichhorn alone maintains a Roman origin for them [see Walter, contra. p. 109, note K].

[4] They were known by Benedict of Mayence writing in this period.

DEDICATION. [Benediction. Consecration.]

DEGRADATION originarily meant deposal, that is a public and lawful deprivation of order and ecclesiastical rank: the confusion of the terms took its rise in a want of exactness in distinguishing between simple or verbal, and solemn or actual deposal. The latter constitutes degradation proper. Simple or verbal degradation is the sentence of deprivation pronounced by a bishop on an ecclesiastic for some grave fault, by which he loses all his offices and benefices; or of privation from administering his benefice, as in the case of physical incapacity; this is ordinarily expressed by deposal. Solemn degradation, probably no longer practised, actually stript the clerk of his orders visibly. The clerk, robed in all the insignia of his orders, appeared before the bishop, who, seated upon a large raised gallery, and attended by assessors and the secular judge, deprived him of his insignia one by one, commencing with the instrument of his latest order, which he laid upon a side-table covered with a white cloth; and finally he obliterated his tonsure, by cutting some hairs with a pair of scissors, and with the further aid of a barber, leaving him without any mark of the ministry. The archbishop lost his pall; from the bishop were taken his mitre, cross, and ring; from the priest the chasuble and stole, the chalice and paten; from the deacon the book of the Gospels, the dalmatic and stole; from the sub-deacon the book of Epistles, the tunic, maniple, amice, and cruets of wine and water; from the acolyth a candlestick and burning taper; from a lector the book of lections; from an exorcist the form of exorcism; from the porter his keys. In the case of a bishop or priest, his head and hands, where they had received the chrism, were scraped with a knife or piece of glass. In the tenth century, a bishop's robes were rent, and his pastoral staff violently broken. The form was accompanied by these solemn words: "We take from thee the priestly vestment, and deprive thee of the honour of the priesthood"—concluding thus: "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, we take away the habit of a clerk, and deprive and despoil thee of all order, benefice, and privilege appertaining to clerks" [Decret. Bonifacii VIII. degrad. de Pœn. in VI^to^]. This form of degradation was only observed when the clerk was to be given over to the secular arm, and in three cases only, namely heresy, as in the case of Cranmer, falsification of a papal letter, or calumny of his own bishop; the secular judge was present at the solemnity, and at its conclusion took the offender into his custody. The bishop was, however, bound to take every means of saving the criminal from death.

Verbal degradation was made according to the canons, by the bishop or his vicar, and a fixed number of assessors; it did not deprive the convicted person of the privileges of the clergy, and gave him protection against personal violence under pain of excommunication; it could be made in the absence of the person to be deposed: its sentence remitted the offender not to the secular arm, but to a monastery; it deprived him of his office, yet left him his benefices, or deprived him only of his benefices, instead of the loss of both, as in solemn degradation; it left his restoration within the power of those who had deposed him, and even of a chapter in the vacancy of a see, on his shewing himself to be worthy of forgiveness, whereas the sentence of solemn degradation could be reversed only by a dispensation from the Pope.

Both forms had these features in common: in both the formal sentence was indispensable; both deprived of the functions of the ministry, right of jurisdiction and ecclesiastical honour (in this respect reducing the person to the position of a layman); and by both the indelible character was left. Thus, degraded clergy could celebrate, although the act would be sinful; they were incapable of marriage, they were bound to say their office, but without the power of giving "Dominus vobiscum." Every priest who was sentenced to death was previously degraded. [Can. iii. xii. No. Summa Conciliorum, 1706, tom. i. p. 78, 79; André, du Droit Canon. p. 921; Pascal, de la Liturgie, 480; Martène, de Sac. rit. Eccles.; Maillane, du Droit Canonique, ii. 234; Collier, Eccles. Hist. iii. 261; Beyerlinck, ii. 713.]

DEGREES, FORBIDDEN. The restrictions which seem to be imposed by nature on the intermarriage of persons connected by ties of relationship were recognised by most systems of human law. The Mosaic code contained a list of such prohibitions, upon which those in force from time to time at various periods of Christianity were for the most part founded. This list [Lev. xviii.] included relationships not only of consanguinity, i.e. between persons connected in right of a common ancestor, but also of affinity, i.e. that quasi-consanguinity arising from the adoption of a wife or husband into the family with which they respectively ally themselves. The extent to which these restrictions were carried in the Christian Church, including of course the English branch of it, was regulated in times previous to the Reformation by the successive canons of the Romish See, as received into and adopted by our own Canon Law. Up to the thirteenth century intermarriage was forbidden between persons connected with each other by ties either of consanguinity or affinity to the seventh degree.[1] This prohibition of the foreign Canon Law was adopted by the English Church apparently very shortly after the Conquest. In the Council of London, A.D. 1075, held under the presidency of Lanfranc, we find a canon promulgated to this effect,[2] and a similar enactment in the Council of Westminster, held A.D. 1102. But at the fourth Lateran Council [A.D. 1215] the restriction was relaxed, and marriage was forbidden only in cases where the contracting parties were connected in or within the fourth degree.[3] The prohibition, as thus modified, became, probably shortly afterwards, the generally received law of the English Church. We find a canon to this effect in the Sarum Constitutions of 1217, held under Bishop Poore;[4] in the Durham Constitutions of 1220;[5] and in another set of Constitutions of the year 1237, distinguished in Spelman by the title of "Anonymous."[6] The general acceptance by our Church of this alteration in the law is also testified by the dispensations granted for English marriages in times subsequent to this date. We find none sought for or obtained by English subjects for any marriage between persons more distantly connected than in the fourth degree, though many were required for persons connected in this degree.[7] This seems to point to the conclusion that beyond that limit marriages were legal. Again, we find that an Act of Henry VIII., placing all prohibitions of this nature on a statutory footing, recites the then existing restrictions of the Canon Law as extending only to the fourth degree.

The law on this subject remained in this condition until the re-establishment of the Royal Supremacy under Henry VIII. An Act [25 Hen. VIII. c. 22] was then passed prohibiting marriages between persons within certain degrees of relationship therein specified by name; and a subsequent Act [28 Hen. VIII. c. 7] repealing the former Act, contained similar prohibitions with a like specification of the forbidden degrees. This Act passed through the same vicissitudes as did all others of a similar tendency during the succeeding reigns, being repealed under Philip and Mary, and revived as to part of its enactments under Elizabeth. There has been considerable difference of opinion as to whether either, and, if either, which of these statutes of Henry VIII. continued afterwards (on this point at least) in force:[8] but the question is only of importance so far as it affects the decision of a point which has since been frequently litigated—the legality of marriage with a deceased wife's sister. By the 32 Hen. VIII. c. 38 (recognised, as to this enactment, by 2 and 3 Ed. VI. c. 21; and, after its repeal under P. and M., revived by 1 Eliz. c. 1) all marriages are prohibited between persons "within the Levitical degrees."

The peculiar form of this enactment is to be observed; indicating, as it does, the probable intention of the legislature to give the statute a wider disabling operation than merely in restraint of marriages within the express Levitical prohibitions. To carry out this intention lawyers have been guided by two rules in the interpretation of this Act. [1] The word "degrees" must not be considered as referring to steps of vertical relationship; and thus the Levitical prohibition of marriage between parent and child, extends to all marriages between persons in the ascending and descending line "ad infinitum" (e.g. grand-

[1] Decret. pars ii. caus. 35, quæst. i.-v. Corp. Jur. Canon. ed. 1687, a canon of Gregory the Great.

[2] Spelm. Conc. 8.

[3] Fourth Lat. Conc. can. l. Du Pin. Eccl. Ant. xi. 101.

[4] 2 Spelm. Conc. 154.

[5] Ibid. 179.

[6] Ibid. 240.

[7] Stephens' Eccles. Stat. i. 271.

[8] Gibson considers 25 Hen. VIII. c. 22 as repealed, but Hawkins inserts it in his Statutes as unrepealed.

Gibson also thinks [Cod. Eccl. ad loc.] 28 Hen. VIII. c. 7, sec. 9 repealed, but Vaughan, C. J., in Harrison v. Burwell argues from it as unrepealed. Burn, Eccl. Law [ed. Phill.], i. 439, 439A.

parent and grand-child, &c.) as being persons within the same degree. [2] The express Levitical prohibition of marriage between persons connected by a certain degree of relationship is to be extended to all marriages which are "in paritate rationis;" e.g. marriage being expressly forbidden between a woman and her husband's brother, it is also forbidden by implication between a man and his wife's sister, as being within the same degree of relationship as a marriage between the former parties. Agreeably to this principle a table of forbidden degrees was promulgated in 1563 by Archbishop Parker,[1] which contained several prohibitions not expressly insisted on in Lev. xviii., but capable of being deduced from the Levitical prohibitions by the application of the above-stated rules of interpretation. This table received formal recognition in the Canons of 1613.[2] And the course of subsequent legal decision has constantly affirmed these principles of interpretation, not only positively by annulling all marriages which are impliedly forbidden "paritate rationis" by the Levitical law, but negatively, by refusing to interfere with any marriage which could not be brought within the analogy of the Levitical prohibitions. Thus in Hill v. Good,[3] Vaughan C. J. makes it the main ground of his adjudging void a marriage with a deceased wife's sister, that its unlawfulness was implied in the prohibition against a woman marrying her husband's brother. And in Wortly v. Watkinson, a marriage with a wife's sister's daughter was set aside as being within the same degrees as a marriage with a father's brother's wife.[4] But Harrison v. Burwell[5] is an instance of the opposite operation of this principle of interpretation. There a prohibition issued against the impeachment in the spiritual courts of the marriage of a man with the widow of his great-uncle, such a marriage being held not to be within the Levitical degrees. And from many later decisions[6] the law upon this point may now be taken to be established.

But as regards the status of persons who have married within the forbidden degrees an important alteration has been effected by a statute passed within the present century. Previously to this enactment, marriages of this kind were not void but merely what is called voidable; that is to say, they might by impeachment in the ecclesiastical courts, and on proof of their illegality, be annulled and rendered void "ab initio," and the issue of such marriages bastardized. These proceedings might be taken at any time during the lifetime of the offending parties; but after their death, or the death of one of them, the common law forbade such marriages being impeached in the spiritual courts for the purpose of bastardizing the issue; and prohibitions to that effect were in such cases sought for and obtained from the common law courts. But by 5 and 6 William IV. c. 54, all marriages within the forbidden degrees whether of affinity or consanguinity were rendered absolutely and "ab initio" void for the future. With regard to past marriages, however, a distinction was made. Those which previously to the passing of the act had been entered into between persons within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity, and so were voidable, were suffered to remain in statu quo, i.e. in the position of marriages valid until set aside by impeachment in the ecclesiastical courts. But those which at the passing of the act were voidable merely on the ground of affinity, were (provided no proceedings were pending for their impeachment) thereby rendered absolutely good and valid in law and unassailable in any court. This act regulates the legal status of all marriages within the forbidden degrees at the present day.

DEIFICATION. This bold term is occasionally used by the Fathers to express the ultimate effect, the final perfection, of Christ's work in the sanctification of mankind. "Christ became man," says St. Athanasius, "that we might be deified" [Athan. Orat. de Incarn. liv.]. The expression is analogous to, and doubtless grounded on, that of St. Peter, "Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, that by these ye might be partakers of the Divine nature" [2 Pet. i. 4].

DEIPARA. The Latin form of Θεοτόκος. [Theotokos. Communicatio Idiomatum.]

DEISM. Deists may be divided into two classes; those who, believing in one God, deny that He takes cognizance of men and of their actions and reject the idea of any historical revelation made to man; and those who allow the work of Providence. Limiting to the former the name of Deist, Kant has applied to the latter the designation of Theists. Deism synchronises with the Reformation. The coincidence of corruption with the high mission of the Church was fatally mischievous; and men learned not only to question her authority, but to deny the truth of all revealed religion. As Spinoza's system was the result of reaction from Jewish Talmudism, so Deism sprang naturally, as it were, from the condition into which religion had subsided in the sixteenth century.

Viret, a contemporary of Calvin, and his locum tenens at Geneva during his banishment, first mentions "Deism" by name in a work published in 1563 [Instruction Chrétienne, tom. ii.]. Switzerland, therefore, may be considered to be its birthplace, as it was of modern Unitarianism. "It treated," he says, "the work of Evangelists and Prophets as idle dreams, and denied that the Divine Being concerned Himself with human affairs; everything being determined either by fortune or by the prudence and folly of men." England, however, was the foreing-bed that brought the noxious plant to its full develop-

[1] Card. Doc. Ann. i. 316; Gib. Cod. Eccl. 412; Burn's Eccl. Law, ii. p. 447.

[2] Canon xcix.; Card. Synod. i. 122.

[3] Vaughan 314; Stephens' Laws of the Clergy, i. 714. See also Bishop Jewel's Letter, Strype's Parker, App. No. 19.

[4] 2 Levinz, 254.

[5] Vaughan, 242, and see the elaborate judgment of Vaughan C. J. in this case, and Hill v. Good for a complete exposition of the law on the subject.

[6] See in especial, Ray v. Sherwood, 1 Curtis 193, and the judgment of Sir H. Jenner therein.

ment, from whence it ramified into France as the school of Encyclopedists, and into Germany as Rationalism. Confining our view to English Deism, the first name is that of the earnest and chivalrous Lord Herbert of Cherbury, the friend of Lord Bacon and Casaubon; he was born at Powys Castle, in Montgomeryshire, A.D. 1581, and died in London, A.D. 1648, a few months before the miserable trial and execution of King Charles. There can be little doubt that the essays of Montaigne and Charron had become known to him in Paris A.D. 1609, and that the current of Deistical thought in him owed its first impulse to these writers. His system was based on five points common to every form of religion, and innate, as he held, in the soul of man:—[1] The existence of a Supreme Being; [2] that He is the object of worship; [3] virtue and piety being the chief elements of that worship; [4] sorrow for sin, and forsaking it by a true repentance, are wholly necessary acts; [5] there is a system of rewards and punishment both here and hereafter. These points were reproduced in a more condensed form in the three postulates of Kant—God, Freedom, and Immortality. Lord Herbert admitted the possibility of an immediate revelation from heaven, but under such a multiplicity of close restrictions as left little room for belief. It could only be of a primary nature, as vouchsafed to its original recipients; afterwards it was mere tradition, and subject to doubt or proof like any other history.

The memorable illustration of the watch with which Paley opens his treatise on Natural Theology had already occurred to Lord Herbert [De Rel. Gent. xiii.]. He always spoke with respect of the Christian religion, and disclaimed any wish to disturb the best form of religion [Rel. Laici et de Rel. Gent.]; yet its promises of forgiveness were too easy, its obligations to virtue too loose [Rel. Laic.]. His five principles wholly commended themselves to man's reason, but no one could be sure that he understood the demands that faith, under the so called revealed religion, made upon his moral nature. To this uncertainty he traced sectarian difference. Christianity was thereby broken up into specialities, and never could be universal. It could never impart worthy notions with respect to Divine Providence and its care for the human race. A corrective to these notions will be found in Richard Baxter's More Reasons; Whitby's Nec. and Usef. of Chr. Rev.; Haliburton's Nat. Rel. insuff.; Leland's Method with the Deists, and Butler's Analogy. See Tennemann, Phil. x.; Ritter, Chr. Phil.; Thorschmidt Freidenk. Biblioth. iv. 2; Wetzer u. Welt. K. Lexic.; Herzog, Real Encycl. Deismus; Lechler, Eng. Deismus.

T. Hobbes, born at Malmesbury A.D. 1588, was a friend of Lord Bacon, and a travelling tutorship brought him into contact with Gassendi, Descartes and Galileo. He was tutor to Prince Charles, and resided with him at Paris, and there published his first political treatises in 1653. Charles II. gave him a pension upon the Restoration, which Hobbes lived to enjoy till his ninety-second year. He is styled by Thorschmidt the patriarch of English freethinkers. He declared that in state matters the prince or civil power was paramount, and even the Divine Law had no other authority but that which the State enforced. If the prince were to compel a subject to apostatize, the persecutor and not his victim would be the renegade; and no guilt would be incurred by the latter. That right and wrong is only such as the State declares it to be. Social life in its first principles is a state of internecine warfare, resembling the destruction that the microscope exhibits as going on in a drop of putrid water; only the outburst of extreme violence is kept in check by the will of the strongest, whose interest is on the side of maintaining peace. Nothing can exist, according to Hobbes, apart from body; therefore, the Nature of the Deity is corporeal. Similarly the soul is material and mortal; the doctrine of a future state is nothing else than an assertion of the rumour of a revelation. Soul and body also are one, and their distinction a mere poetical figment of Greece. The source of every idea, however abstract, lies in the senses.

Subsequent Deistical writers have borrowed largely from Hobbes' Leviathan and other works, forty-two in number, and Spinoza was his great admirer. The assault made by this Deist on religion was ably repulsed by Archbishop Bramhall, Catching of the Leviathan; Bishop Seth Ward; Archbishop Tenison, The Creed of Mr. Hobbes Exam.; and the Earl of Clarendon. Bishop Parker also, and Bishop Cumberland, wrote in reply. The treatise of Dr. Ralph Cudworth, Eternal and immutable Morality, would have been of especial value had it been published at once during his life time [Cudw. Intel. Syst. i. 31, ed Birch. See also Leland, Deist. Wr.; Tennemann, Phil. v. x.; Ritter, Chr. Phil. iv. 3.]

Charles, son of Sir H. Blount, born A.D. 1654, enlarged into seven the five points of Lord Herbert, and adopted from Hobbes the notion of the transcendental materiality of the soul; warfare as the natural condition of society; and might as the rule of right. Hence Lechler [Engl. Deismus] says that he was a product rather than a factor of Deism. His first work, de Anima Mundi, as preferring natural to revealed religion, was suppressed by desire of Compton, Bishop of London [A.D. 1679]. In the next year he put forth the two first books of a translation of the life of Apollonius of Tyanæa by Philostratus; which were suppressed by authority. It led the van in the Deistical attacks upon the Christian miracles that followed. In his Summary Account of the Deist's Religion [Oracles of Reason] he denies that God is to be propitiated by sacrifices, and consequently that the idea of a Mediator is superfluous. He defended the geologist Burnet when charged with attempting to subvert the Mosaic cosmogony [Misc. W., March 1693], and deduced from the repetition of the history of man's creation [Gen. i. 27 and ii. 7, 22] the idea of a pre-Adamite race; the faithful stock alone commencing with Adam [ib. ii. 218]. His posthumous work, The Oracles of Reason, is in great measure a plagiarism from preceding writers. The book was answered by Dr. Nichols, A.D. 1696, in his Conference with a Theist. Blount shot himself because his sister-in-law refused to marry him.

John Locke, though no professed Deist, gave considerable impulse to Deism in England, more especially in Shaftesbury and Bolingbroke. His aim appears to have been to consolidate the various forms of belief into which professed Christian thought had ramified. If it had not been for his belief in the miracles of the Old and the New Testament, the Law, the Gospel and the Koran would have stood with him on the same level. He said nothing with respect to the Divinity of Christ, and swerved from the subject whenever his argument led him in that direction. Hence Leibnitz said of him, "inclinasse eum ad Socinianos." Immortality was the connecting link between the Father and the Son, and the Resurrection was its proof. The necessary "credenda" of the Gospel are brought by him within very narrow limits, the Mahometan formula being scarcely less meagre. In his Reasonableness of the Chr. Rel., A.D. 1695, he professes to set aside the subtleties of theologians, and to recur to the Bible alone for the elements of faith; the result of his examen being that the only necessary articles of belief are the Unity of the Deity, and that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah [Works, VI. p. 156, 1824]. He distinguishes between the Gospels and the Epistles, and between the history of their actions and their legendary miracles. There was a difference also to be noted between such Apostolic doctrines as were suited only to the earliest times, and others that were universal. If man could fulfil the law of God, he would be above the power of death, but all have sinned against that law, and Christ alone, the first-fruits of the dead, can restore to man the forfeited gift of life. The law of God is the law of reason and of nature. Revealed truth was imparted from heaven, because the generality of mankind have no leisure for such courses of reasoning as would lead them to the truth. The benefit conferred by Christ is a knowledge of the true God and of our duty, spiritual service, a desire for repentance, the hope of immortality, and the certainty of a future state of rewards and punishments, in which not misbelief, but a corrupt life, will be the measure of man's condemnation. Locke had already given a practical application to these principles in his Ep. on Toleration, addressed to Limborch [A.D. 1689], and in the Constitutions drawn up by him for the government of Carolina, which Charles II. had handed over to eight of his lords [A.D. 1669]. The three tests proposed, before any member of the State could be admitted into any religious community, being: [1] belief in a God; [2] admission that public worship is necessary; [3] and that it is the duty of the subject to give true evidence when called upon by the civil governor. [See Locke's Controversy with Bishop Stillingfleet].

John Toland, born, A.D. 1671, in Ireland, a vain but vigorous writer of politico-religious pamphlets and flying sheets, renounced the Roman communion for dissent, and subsequently declared himself a Latitudinarian. He studied in Glasgow and Edinburgh, where he proceeded to his M.A. degree. From thence he crossed over to Leyden, and studied under Frederick Spanheim. In A.D. 1696 he put forth the first and only instalment of his Christianity not Mysterious; the most important Deistical work that had yet appeared; in which he professed to shew that the religion of Christ was in its essence simple, that mysteries were an aftergrowth, and no part of the substance of Christianity. Reason was the sole standard of revelation, which was only a "mean of information." "Mystery" was but an emphatic way of saying "Nothing" [p. 39]. The two theses proposed are: [1] That the doctrines of the Gospel are not contrary to reason; [2] that they contain nothing mysterious or above reason. The book was referred to a Committee on Religion in the Irish Parliament, when it was found that—[1] the title of the book was heretical; [2] that the Divine authority of Scripture was therein called in question; [3] that it withheld irreverently from Christ the title of Lord; [4] that it spoke unworthily of the Sacraments in making them mere ceremonial rites, and in comparing them with Bacchic orgies. The book was sentenced to be burned by the common hangman, and the Attorney-general was directed to institute proceedings against the author, which, however, were forestalled by flight. Bishop Stillingfleet's work on the Trinity was called forth by this treatise, which he styled Socinian Objections, and which he identified with John Locke's principles.

Toland published the Life of Milton in 1699, and supported the poet's view as to the non-genuineness of the Icon Basilike, the work, some think, of Bishop Gauden. The subject led him to declare that Christian antiquity also had its spurious writings; and the expression having been construed as applying to canonical Scripture, he put forth his Amyntor, or defence of Milton's life [Guizot, E. Rev.]. He denied that he thought of Scripture when he spoke of primitive corruption, and gave a catalogue of the apocryphal writings of apostolic times, that must have been interesting and instructive to an age that had never yet heard of them. So far from wishing to curtail the canon, he would add to it the Epistles of Clement, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Barnabas, with the Shepherd of Hermas. This defence brought Samuel Clark into notice as an acute reasoner and clear writer; and after the lapse of nearly thirty years called forth Lardner's exhaustive work on the Credibility of the Gospel History [A.D. 1727], as also Mosheim's Treatise on the Objections raised in the Amyntor [A.D. 1722]. In 1700 the Lower House of Convocation appointed a Committee for the examination of books written against the Christian religion, the Amyntor being especially indicated. But the jealousies of High and Low Church and of the two Houses caused a diversion for Toland, and nothing came of it. His Nazarenus, a Gentile-Jewish syncretic Christianity, was an attack on all professed revelations; as his Tetradydmus was upon all existing rituals and liturgies, and more especially on the Anglican Order. His Pantheisticon [A.D. 1720] is directed against all who hold the Personal existence of the Deity. Toland held a kind of modified Spinosism. His Tribe of Levi was a scurrilous attack on the Christian ministry. Toland died in 1722. [See Mosheim's Tol. and Des Maizeaux.]

Anthony Collins [born A.D. 1676, died A.D. 1729], though a follower of Locke, advanced far beyond the previous Deistical writers, and openly attacked the outworks of religion. First, however, he opened fire upon the Church of England. In his Priestcraft in Perfection [A.D. 1709] he denied the genuineness of the opening clause of the Twentieth Article, in which it is said that "the Church hath power to decree rites and ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith;" and returned to the subject in his Essay on the Thirty-nine Articles [A.D. 1724]. He stated that the clause had the authority of neither Convocation nor Parliament; that the original draft signed by both houses of Convocation in A.D. 1562 [penes Corp. Chr. C. Cantab.], and that signed by them again in A.D. 1571, omitted the clause. It was also wanting in the Articles of Edward VI., A.D. 1552 [Hardwicke's Hist. of the Articles, p. 140]. Bishop Browne supposes that the council inserted the clause by the Queen's wish, from the Wirtemberg Confession, and that it received the royal sanction, though copies still continued to vary. If convocation did not embody the words in A.D. 1571, it is strange that the Queen's printer should have done so, as may be seen in Dr. Cardwell's Synodalia [i. 98]. Collins next took wider ground, and published his Discourse of Freethinking [A.D. 1713], in which much was said about the narrowness of the clerical mind, pious frauds, corrupt MSS. of Scripture, forgeries, interpolations and patristical misstatements. The treatise met with a full answer from Hoadly, Whiston, and Ibbot, as Boyle lecturer for the year. But the most severe castigation was administered by Bentley, under the assumed name of Phileleutherius Lipsiensis, who anatomatised each fallacy with a minuteness that is more like vivisection than ordinary criticism. Collins, with characteristic coolness, covered his worst blots in a French translation of the Discourse, prepared under his eye [A.D. 1714], thereby giving to Bentley's critique an appearance of inconsequence to foreigners. In A.D. 1724, Collins published his Discourse on the grounds and reasons of Christian Religion, in which he assumed, though with transparent falsity, that the whole proof of Christianity lay in the fulfilment of prophecy; that prophecy was allegorical, and hence that Christianity exhibits only the allegorical meaning of the Old Testament, and in fact was a mere mystical Judaism; much as the modern intellectual Jew styles Christianity Paganism tempered by the Gospel, and Mohammedanism the same, tempered by the Korân [Phillippson, Lect.]. Answers were prompt and plentiful from Bishop Chandler and the Presbyterian Dr. S. Chandler, Dr. Bulloek, Dr. Sykes, Whiston, and Sherlock in his Use and Intent of Prophecy; many of whom also answered the last work of Collins [The Scheme of Literal Prophecy, A.D. 1727]; the most notable feature in which was an attack on the antiquity and authority of the Book of Daniel. The writings of Collins were the text-book of the French Encyclopedists, who met in Paris at the house of Holbach; and Diderot incorporated his Philosophical Inquiry concerning Human Liberty as a separate article in the Encyclopédie [Schlosser, Gesch. d. 18, 19, Jahrh.].

Anthony Ashley Cooper [born A.D. 1671], third Earl of Shaftesbury, and grandson of the statesman and member of the Cabal under Charles II., was self-educated by travelling in France and Italy, and by a diligent study of Locke. On his return through Holland he became acquainted with Leclere and Bayle. He is scarcely to be termed a Deist, but nearly approached the German Rationalist of the last generation. Although Voltaire's keen sight detected in Shaftesbury the fatalism of a Pantheist, yet he spoke in mere bitter irony when he said that he was too open in his dislike of Christianity; for nothing could be more covert than Shaftesbury's attacks, and for the simple reason that it was the State religion, which, on his own principles, it was an act of profanity to assail. Truth, he said, should only be spoken with discretion: "We never do more injury to truth than by discovering too much of it on some occasions; it is a real humanity and kindness to hide strong truth from tender eyes" [Characteristics, A.D. 1714]. Hence his writings barely aroused the suspicion of contemporaries, though not unnoticed by Berkeley, Wotton, and Warburton. Balguy's Letter to a Deist [A.D. 1729] was directed against them, and a more thorough answer, by J. Brown, appeared nearly forty years after Shaftesbury's death [Essays on the Characteristics, A.D. 1751]. Shaftesbury was a professed humorist, and dealt with deep questions in a tone of polished irony and banter that made his writings especially dangerous to those who by education could appreciate it. He took this line on principle, in accordance with the Horatian maxim—

"Ridiculum acri Fortius et melius magnas plerumque secat res."

He even ventured to call Christianity "in the main a witty, good-humoured religion" [Char. iii. 98], and speaks of a "burlesque Divinity" [iii. 251]. Hence it is not always easy to see when he is in earnest, when in jest. He agreed with Hobbes in maintaining that the civil governor was the proper judge of religious truth, and that the subject was bound to submit his judgment to the State. But he differed from Hobbes in giving its own independent character to morality. With him right is right, whatever the State might determine. His wit and satire is nowhere more pungent than when dealing with fanatics of his day, who held that to preach up social morality was to be disloyal to the specific doctrines of Christianity. To set the inducements to virtue on the hope of future reward, he said, was to place the matter on a wrong basis altogether. Virtue was to be followed for its own sake, it had its own present reward. Kant has said the same thing. He did not deny the inspiration of sacred writers, but no external proof could be given of it; the recipient must judge for himself what manner of spirit he was of. There was no external difference between inspiration and the self-delusion of enthusiasm. The former is a genuine, the latter a mistaken notion of the present Deity, and "Bartholomew Fair" [sic] raillery is its best solvent. Inspiration itself is, in fact, a Divine enthusiasm. Revelation, to be true, should be its own justification, and stand in need of no external testimony. It should fear neither critic nor analyst. Its very nature may cause men's judgments to differ. The way in which he masses together [Char. iii. last misc.] all kinds of objections against Scripture, on the score of want of genuineness and authenticity, textual variation, discordant interpretation, and apocryphal fraud, sufficiently shews what his real regard for Scripture was. Miracles he held to be no necessary proof of the truth of religion; if wrought in confirmation of a believer's faith, they are superfluous; if opposed to it, they would be rejected as an imposture, even though wrought by an angel. A main defect in the Christian religion he held to be its silence with respect to the sacred character of human friendship and patriotism, as though the former were not included in the wide category of Christian love; while the latter is held in check, as it ought to be, by the more enlarged sympathies of an universal humanity. Brotherly love, he says, only leads its advocates to plague each other's hearts out for the good of the soul. Intolerance and persecution has too often been its outward expression. Religious zeal leads only to self-deception and the misguidance of others. Leibnitz was an especial admirer of Shaftesbury. [Schlosser u. Bercht's Archiv. f. Gesch. p. 22, and 18, 19 Jahrh.; Leland; Thorschmidt; Lechler.]

Passing over W. Whiston, Fellow of Clare Hall, and Lucasian Professor in the University of Cambridge, who for his Arian opinions was deprived of his fellowship and office and expelled the University [A.D. 1710], and whose impugnment of the truth of prophecy led Collins to publish his Discourse of the Grounds, &c. [A.D. 1724; Lechler, iii. 1], the next Deistical writer to be noticed is the mystic recluse Woolston, a fellow of Sidney, who likewise was deprived of his fellowship [A.D. 1720] for upholding Quakerism as the nearest approach to primitive Christianity, and endorsing the dictum of that sect, that the clergy were blind leaders of the blind, priests of Baal, &c. He had the effrontery to challenge the bishops and clergy to discuss the question, whether the clergy of the day were not worshippers of the Apocalyptic Beast, and servants of Antichrist. In his self-constituted office of moderator between Collins and his opponents [Moderator between an Infidel and an Apostate, 1725], he attacked the Christian miracles, and treated as an idle tale the cardinal miracle of our Lord's Resurrection. Everything with him was allegory. Voltaire, who was in England in this year, says that 30,000 copies of his six scurrilous pamphlets on Miracles [A.D. 1727-1730] were sent over to America. The author was prosecuted to conviction by the attorney-general, fined £25 for each pamphlet, and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. Being unable to obtain recognizances for good behaviour, he died in prison, A.D. 1731. With characteristic insolence, Woolston dedicated his First Defence to the Queen, to whom the Bishop of St. David's had inscribed his answer; and the second to the Lord Chief Justice, under whose sentence he was imprisoned. Each of his six pamphlets also had been dedicated to a member of the Bench of Bishops in terms of offensive sarcasm. Woolston was answered by Bishop Gibson, in his Five Pastoral Letters [A.D. 1728]; Lardner, in his Vindication of Three of the Miracles; Dr. Zachary Pearce, Miracles of Jesus Vindicated; Smallbrooke, Bishop of St. David's, Vindication [all three A.D. 1729]; and in the same year by T. Sherlock in The Resurrection of Jesus Considered, the most remarkable work of all, in which the witnesses of the Resurrection give their evidence as in a court of law. A reply to this from Peter Annet [A.D. 1744] produced a rejoinder from Sherlock [A.D. 1749] and two years previously from Gilbert West, a reputed freethinker, who received the thanks of the University of Oxford and the honorary degree of LL.D. Annet's principal opponent as regards St. Paul's witness to the truth of the Resurrection was Sir George Lyttelton, himself formerly a freethinker, but reclaimed by West.

Woolston's extravagances had produced sufficient disgust to cause a strong reaction from Deism; when Matthew Tindal [born A.D. 1656], a student of Lincoln College and Fellow of All Souls, the "great apostle of Deism," put forth his Christianity as Old as the Creation [A.D. 1730], of which a fresh edition was required in four consecutive years. It is the standard work of Deism. The work is complete, although the materials for a second part were left by him on his death. The title seems to bespeak an unobjectionable work, but it is a thoroughgoing advocacy of natural religion, Christianity being only allowed to be true so far as it agrees with this. Morality in obedience to the will of God is the substance of religion. Reason, the connecting link between earth and heaven, the creature and the Creator, is the source of morality. It is identical with religion, a sense of which is the distinctive character of human reason, as Lord Herbert had also asserted. Every religious system in proportion as it diverges from natural religion is superstition. Mystical doctrines and ceremonial pomp have been introduced by the clerical order from motives of self-interest, though he is careful to add that this refers to the Church of Rome. Nothing can be added to the force of natural religion, and nothing subtracted from it; hence revelation is superfluous, and all pretence to it may be resolved into enthusiasm or imposture. Christianity is no novelty, but is the religion that God stamped upon man's soul from the beginning: the name alone is recent.

It is a republication of the Law of Nature, and nothing more. Reason is the sole judge of all articles of faith and of the truth of Scripture. Everything may be accepted as revealed truth that has a manifest tendency to promote the honour of God and the welfare of man. The maxims of Confucius and those of Christ stand upon the same level; and obscurities in the latter may receive light from the more simple and clear teaching of the Chinese Moses; but Scripture is only likely to perplex and misinform the uninitiated. He gives up the prophecies of the Old Testament as hopelessly confused. Neither can reliance be placed in those of the New Testament, because the immediate followers of Christ were misled by them to expect the Second Advent and end of the world in their own generation; and if Apostles were deceived in this matter, what security have we that they were not equally mistaken throughout? Tindal termed himself a Christian Deist; ordinary Christians were Demonists, who venture not to call in question the authority of Scripture: whereas he places not his faith in doctrines because they are contained in Scripture, but honours Scripture so far as it contains the doctrines that he deems worthy of right reason. The importance of this work called forth many answers; those of shorter compass are Bishop Gibson's Pastoral Letter, Dr. T. Burnet's Review, Waterland's Scripture Vindicated, Law's Case of Reason, Jackson's Remarks, Stebbing's Discourse and Defence of Dr. Clark's Evidence, Balguy's Two Letters to a Deist and the Essay on Redemption, Atkey's Main Argument. More exhaustive answers are Foster's Usefulness of the Christian Revelation, Conybeare's Defence, and Leland's Answer, an abstract of which is given in his work on the Deistical writers. See also Lechler's Engl. Deismus.

Deism now descended to men of low estate. T. Chubb [born A.D. 1679], son of a Wiltshire maltster, a glover's apprentice, and shopman to a tallow chandler in Salisbury, was the next to achieve distinction. He was a man of little education, but gifted by nature with a flow of thought that was not always either logical or consistent. The Deistical writings of the time were eagerly read by him, and he gained a certain degree of facility with his pen by making copious notes and observations on his readings. A critique of his on Whiston's Primitive Christianity Revived having fallen into the author's hands he urged its publication, and it duly appeared under the Socinian title, The Supremacy of the Father asserted [A.D. 1715]. A collection of Tracts appeared in A.D. 1730. Pope writing to Gay speaks with admiration of his power as a writer. Two posthumous volumes [A.D. 1748] were preceded in his lifetime by The true Gospel of Jesus Christ [A.D. 1738]. It purposes to show that Christianity in its essence is not doctrine but practice. Moses Mendelssohn declared the same thing of the religion of the Jew. Christ is our Saviour, because He declares to us God's favour and happiness in another world; yet he treats with ridicule the notion of a future state of retribution derived from the unequal condition of men in this life. "Horses," he says, "have cruel masters, but there is for them no compensation." He denied an overruling Providence. Everything befals us by the steady action of second causes: his Deity was as that of Spinoza, the vital energy of nature; and he speaks in doubt whether or no the soul be of a material substance. Christ, he says, demands that our lives should be regulated by the eternal rule, the "reason of things," a summary of which is exhibited in the Ten Commandments. Christ preached his own life, and lived the doctrine that he preached. Repentance is efficacious, and there comes a day of judgment: ideas that coincide with the three last of Lord Herbert's five points. Christianity teaches nothing new, it is but a republication of the law of nature. Its name alone is recent. It was preached to the poor before the main facts of the Gospel history were known, therefore they are irrelevant. It is a simple matter that simple men may understand. The palpable Socinianism of his Christology need not be indicated. The rapid establishment of Christianity he allows to be a proof that Christ lived and taught, and died, as the Gospel declares: and He was the Son of God, because unto Him "the Word of God came;" but our hope of salvation has no more relation to the sufferings of Christ than colour has to sound. As regards the Gospel, he says that the truth must be sifted out from the private opinions of the Evangelists. The opening of St. John's Gospel is only an expression of the writer's own human thought. Even the recorded maxims of Christ are made the subject of cavil. To "love our enemies" is to make no distinction between good and evil. To take "no care for the morrow" is to encourage reckless living; so little could he understand the duty of doing God's work with no earthly hope of reward, and merely because it is God's work. A sharp line of distinction, he said, is to be drawn between the words of Christ and the writings of the Apostles. Church dogma is a clear enunciation of the spirit of Antichrist. "Do this and live," says the Saviour; except a "man believe faithfully he cannot be saved," declares the Athanasian anathema. The germ of the Rationalist distinction, therefore, between the doctrine of Christ, and doctrine concerning Christ is contained in Chubb's writings. As with the Quaker, titles of honour were a mortal offence to the Wiltshire chandler. Chubb's opinions had been effectually answered in preceding controversial publications. Special answers, however, were put forth by Hallet [Consistent Christian], Le Moine and Fleming. A very useful analysis of his posthumous works is given by Leland.

Dr. Morgan, a dissenting preacher expelled communion for Arianism, advanced but little that was new in his Moral Philosopher, a dialogue between a Christian Deist and a Christian Jew, published anonymously in A.D. 1737. He allowed that there was a special overruling Providence. The light of Nature was the only source of religion; revelation useless, and therefore nil, except so far as natural reason reveals the truth to man. The reason and fitness of any precept is the only test of its worth. Christianity is only a republication of natural religion. The Apostles preached different and antagonistic gospels. St. Paul he speaks of with respect as a freethinker and an enemy to the Law. Like the Marcionite of old, he rejected all the other apostolic writers, with the exception of St. Luke, the companion of St. Paul. Like the Gnostic also he distinguished between the God of the Old Testament and that of the New. He declared that the prophets were the instigators of the long feuds that preceded the captivity; and that Ahab and Jezebel acted the part of patriotic princes in exterminating them. The Church of the Apostles was essentially Jewish, and altered and corrupted the Gospels to suit its Judaism. The true primitive Christian was the Gnostic. Miracles and inspiration, and every kind of supernatural agency, he wholly denied. There is much in his miscalculation of Levitical revenues and subjects connected with the Mosaic institution that reminds us of the Natal controversy. Morgan was answered by Hallet, Immorality of the Moral Philosopher, 1737; Dr. Chapman's Eusebius, a short epitome of which is given by Leland. A second volume was put forth, and answered in the same year by Lowman, Dissert. on the Civ. Gov. of the Hebrew; and a third volume, 1740, again answered by Hallet, Rebuke to the Moral Philosopher; also by S. Chandler, who first indicated Morgan as the "moral philosopher." Morgan's writings called forth the Divine Legation of Moses by Warburton, 1738, who found himself at issue with orthodox as well as Deistical writers by reason of the paradox on which his argument is based. [See Lechler, p. 391.]

H. St. John, Viscount Bolingbroke, born A.D. 1672, was educated at Eton and Oxford, and took office under Harley as minister of war. Having favoured the cause of the Pretender, he was compelled to flee the country, A.D. 1715, forfeiting also his title and estates. These latter were restored to him in 1723. He died after a long and painful illness in 1751, and bequeathed to D. Mallet, a Scotchman, the care of publishing his MSS. During his residence in France he became intimate with Voltaire and Montesquieu, and their exchange of sceptical thought prepared the way for the Age of Reason. His writings consist of loose rambling essays, often brilliant, but tedious from want of methodical arrangement of ideas. A flashy display of infidelity takes the place of the comparative erudition of some preceding Deists. He was the apostle of freethinking among the upper thousand, as Chubb had been among the tradesman class. The cavils of preceding Deists with respect to Holy Scripture are repeated by him [Leland's Reflections]. The wisdom and power of God are alone revealed to us, and to speak of His moral attributes is presumption; as though the goodness and justice of God were not as clearly revealed in His moral government of the world as His wisdom and power are stamped upon the face of creation. He denies a particular, but allows an universal Providence extending over nations, but not troubling itself with individuals; the Deity in his system being little else than the mundane soul of heathen philosophy. Similarly he commends the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and of a future state of rewards and punishments as useful, but speaks sceptically of it as a philosophic proposition; in fact he identifies soul with vital spirit, the continued existence of which only corresponds with the duration of life in the body. Religion he considers to be of use only as an aid to government. Natural religion was the one true object of man's simple faith, specific forms of religion being derived from Egyptian and Oriental forms of priestcraft. The Gospel of Christ was one thing, that of St. Paul something widely different. The Evangelists would as little have understood St. Paul's writings, though one of them was his amanuensis, as St. Paul would have comprehended his diligent expositor Augustine. Tradition from the beginning was only based on ignorance and fanaticism; the Church also had erred grievously in condemning polygamy, which was essentially necessary for the development of population; yet it is a patent fact that the most populous countries are those in which polygamy has been made a crime. It was worse than useless to endeavour to reconcile the antagonism of Scripture and philosophy; the attempt could only lead to the hopeless annihilation of the former.

Deism now passed into the scepticism of Hume and the younger Henry Dodwell; and Methodism secured the lower classes from that form of opposition to Church authority which leads to infidelity. This English heresy was the teeming parent of French Atheism and German Rationalism, for which Spinoza had already prepared the way. Many points of Deism were reproduced from the scholastic philosophy of the Middle Ages; or rather from those Latin translations of Arabic versions of Aristotle, made in the thirteenth century, on which the later scholastic system was built up; these by asserting one universal mundane soul led straight to Pantheism. William of Auvergne [Op. i. 329, and de An. vi.] says that there were "ill-conditioned beings, that seeing themselves crossed by religion in present enjoyments, and expecting no future joys, could not be persuaded that the immortality of the soul was anything more than a delusion encouraged by princes." Averroes has been taxed with being the first who asserted in modern times that all religions are equally false and equally useful.

To the works that have been mentioned may be added, Trinius, Freidenker Lex. 1759; Schlosser, Archiv. f. Gesch. u. Lit. 1831; V. Busche, d. freie Relig. Aufklärung, 1846; Wolfenbüttel, Fragment.

DEMIURGE. This term, first coined by philosophy, and adopted from thence, with other Neo-Platonic terms and notions, by the Gnostic heretics, means the orderly Disposer of the Universe. Its derivation from δῆμος, the people, and ἔργον, work, would seem to indicate the human race only as the object of the creative energy. But the origin of δῆμος is in δᾶ = γᾶ or γῆ the earth, and as the Athenians boasted an autochthonic descent, δῆμος came to signify "the people of the earth." So Δημητὴρ, Ceres, is nothing else than Γῆ μήτηρ. Hence philosophy, the conservator of ancient terminology, spoke of the orderly arrangement of the earth and entire universe as a δημιουργία, and the Disposer thereof as "Demiurge." From thence it obtained a secondary meaning, applying to any handicraft, and in that sense it is used once in the New Testament [Heb. xi. 10; cf. Xenoph. I. iv. 9, δημιουργους].

Demiurge

Plato [δημιουργία ζώων, Timæus], and the Neo-Platonists generally, speak of the Creator as Demiurge. So Philo who was of the earlier period of that school, as established at Alexandria, says, "God is not only the Demiurge or Architect of the world, but also its Creator" [De Somn. 577]; distinguishing between the creation of matter and its arrangement in forms of order by the Demiurge. It was another term for the mundane soul of Plato, and generally every system that admitted it into its nomenclature may be considered Pantheistic. Philo's account of the material world was essentially Pantheistic, in anticipation of Spinoza's "Alles ist eins, und eins ist alles." The Demiurge, he says, is τῶν ὅλων τόπος, the space that holds the universe. He himself being one is the universe; εἷς καὶ τὸ πᾶν αὐτὸς ἐστίν [Leg. Alleg.]. There is no distinction here between the Supreme Nûs and the world of matter. But it is in the Enneads of Plotinus that we must seek for the Neo-Platonic account of Demiurge. Here the remote fundamental principle is Absolute Unity. But it is an unity that is wholly Incomprehensible. The first Principle is not Intelligence, is not Goodness, is not Power, is not Unity, according to our human ways of thinking and speaking, but far removed above all. Maimonides, an inheritor of Greek notions through Arabic translations, says in his Moreh Nevochim, i. 57, the Deity exists "non per existentiam," He lives "non per vitam," He is wise "non per scientiam," but all these attributes centre in one reality in which there is no multiplicity. Basilides carried this negational theory beyond the verge of endurance when he termed the Deity οὐκ ὄντα [Hippol. Philos. x. 14], i.e. non-existent according to any possible human mode of thought. In the Neo-Platonic theory Spirit is the correlative of Unity, and is the first Principle of all; the Creator the Demiurge, from whom the mundane soul receives those forms and ideas whose reflex image it represents in the world of sense. The soul of the universe interprets the mind of the Spirit, ordering the lower world after the plan of the higher. It is the ἴνδαλμα, or antitype of the Deity, from whom it flows forth, and animates the world, enduing it with a plastic power to form and generate its creatures in perpetual succession. This soul of the universe is the Demiurge in the Plotinian cosmogony; "the mundane soul (οὐρανία, that quickens the material heavens), and our own souls rank next in order to the Demiurge" [Plotin. Enn. II. i. 5]. Porphyry, who, if any one, understood the system of Plotinus, identifies Demiurge with the supra-mundane soul, or soul of the universe; the intellectual soul on which it acts, is τὸ αὐτοζῶον, the self-life, the antitypal counterpart of Demiurge [Proclus, in Tim. Plat. 93, 94]. The first Good or Unity is ἀνενέργητος, far exalted above all action on the world of matter; void of all work, ἀργὸν ἔργων ξυμπάντων, and Sovereign Ruler [Numenius, ap. Euseb. Pr. Ev. xi. 18].

The Gnostic, in his syncretic attempt to make all square between Alexandrian and Persian modes of thought, philosophy and magianism, interwove the Demiurgal idea into his theory. He thereby reunited systems that in their remote origin had very probably been one. Plato studied in Egypt, and Bardesanes traces back Egyptian and Chaldaic theosophy to a common source [Procl. in Tim. Plat.; Bardesanes in Spicil. Syr. a Cureton, 15]. Zoroaster imagined the universe to be co-present with the Deity as an eternal emanation from the Divine Substance. The primeval Intelligence that proceeded forth from the bosom of the Deity was as the Platonic Nûs; its sphere was that of the purest light, and it was a mean between the Supreme and inferior existence. It is the source of an infinite series of angelic and spiritual existence; the soul-quickening principle of stars and planets, the elements, the mineral and vegetable world, animals and man. In a word, all matter is considered to have an animal sentient existence.

These points of analogy between the Neo-Platonic and Oriental theories will shew how readily the one might adapt itself to the other. Gnosticism effected the junction; not by creating such a monster as that imagined by Horace; with human head and crest of horse, female torso and tail of fish; it was rather as a scion grafted on its kindred stock, as the peach bud worked upon the almond becomes the Amygdalus Persica. The Gnostic felt the same unwillingness as the philosopher and the mage to bring the Supreme Being into contact with gross matter. Successive emanations were imagined in which each development became further removed from the primary Gnosis of Bythus, until the Æon Achamoth, the Hebrew equivalent for Sophia, was evolved, and gave rise to Demiurge, the psychic principle in whom was nothing spiritual. As in the Persian theory, and as was the character of the first matter of Plato, his nature was of a fiery kind, and his "habitat," by another point of agreement with Platonic theory, was in the seven sidereal heavens created by him. The work of creation was declared to be his work by an orderly progress, in accordance with the pattern of pre-ordained ideas, that Demiurge accomplished, though unconscious that he was carrying into execution the purposes of a loftier intelligence than his own. Thus man was formed first of transcendental clay, the Adam Cadmon of the Jewish Cabbala, whose heavenly nature is described by saying that in stature he moved upon earth while his head was in heaven. In due course the psychic Adam of flesh and blood was created, and the two were united; but the descendants of the protoplast take one or other of the two natures; they are either a spiritual seed, destined for everlasting habitation in the pleroma; or being psychic, they are doomed to remain under the sway of Demiurge ἐν μεσότητι, i.e. in the midmost of the seven planetary Sephiroth, that of the earth, an earthly paradise. The Demiurge is thus the representative of an union between the systems of the East and of the West, and one main generic feature in every system of Gnosticism. [GNOSTICISM. CABBALA. Hippol. Philosoph.; Harvey, Introd. to Irenæus, Cambr. ed.; Matter; Neander; Baur.]

DEMONS: DEMONIACAL POSSESSION. The word "demon" is the Anglicized form of the Greek δαίμων, which, like the more common word δαιμόνιον, is in the English Bible rendered "devil." The former was used in early classical Greek interchangeably with θεός, afterwards both were applied more particularly to gods of lower rank, and to the deified souls of men. In the LXX. they are used of heathen gods and evil spirits, in Josephus of evil spirits only, and in Philo of angels both good and evil. By St. Paul the objects of Gentile worship are called δαιμόνια, but in the New Testament generally both the above words are used of evil spirits. They are clearly spoken of as having a distinct personality, and their nature appears to be akin to, or identical with, that of the holy angels. Indeed, there is no reason to doubt that they are the fallen angels, and our Lord sanctioned the Jewish belief that Beelzebub or Satan is the ruler of the demons. In common with the good angels, they possess knowledge and power, and as those do God service in heaven, and succour and defend us on earth, so these, for our trial and punishment, are permitted to do service to Satan in molesting and tormenting us. This they do in various ways. The devil and his angels are ever in will and deed opposed to the Divine will, and so they tempt men to sin, by persuading the will that it may be exercised contrary to the will of God, as in the typical cases of the temptation of our first parents and of our Blessed Lord. They are the "principalities" and "powers of the air," the "rulers of the darkness of this world" against whom we have to "wrestle," and to be armed with the whole "armour of God," that by our resistance they may be compelled to flee from us through the power of God that worketh in us. But, further, as we are told that the material universe is in a great measure under the disposition of good angels, so we have every reason to believe that here also the evil angels are permitted to exercise their malignity; that Satan and his army of demons are the authors of some at least of those disorders in the outward world which the Pantheist would deny to be evils, but which are commonly regarded as such by those who believe in the existence of evil at all. Satan was permitted to "put forth his hand" upon Job in the successive visitations of the sword, the lightning, and the hurricane, and afterwards to "touch his bone and his flesh," and to smite him with a loathsome disease. We read in the Gospel of a daughter of Israel whom Satan had bound with a spirit of infirmity eighteen years. The evil spirits went out of the "sick" (not demoniacs, but ἀσθενοῦντες) to whom handkerchiefs and aprons were borne from St. Paul's body. The incestuous Corinthian was delivered over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh. Our Lord "rebuked" the tempest and the fever, and it is probable that in so doing He really addressed His rebuke to personal powers of evil that in them were exercising their malice upon mankind. It must not, however, be supposed that all so called disorders of the universe or of the human frame are the work of evil spirits, for the latter are often salutary natural processes, and in the former we may have "fire and hail, snow and vapours, wind and storm" fulfilling God's word. It may be that so far as they are hurtful to God's creatures, the harm they do is the result of influence conceded to the powers of darkness. These "disharmonies," as Archbishop Trench calls them, may perhaps be compared to the discords in some of the grandest musical compositions, harsh and painful in themselves, but conducive to the perfection of the whole. In one sense, then, all sin and all disease, bodily or mental, would appear to be due to demoniacal possession, but it is certain that over and above these ordinary manifestations of the power that worketh death, there were in the time of our Lord and His Apostles others of an extraordinary nature. These are described by the word δαιμονίζομαι, to be possessed by demons, or, as they are called in the English Version, devils.

It is into the nature of this terrible condition we have now to inquire. And in the first place we may briefly dismiss the notion that the language of our Lord and the New Testament writers was a mere figure of speech, an adaptation of language to popular ideas, as we use the term "lunacy."

The descriptions of phenomena alone might perhaps be interpreted in this way, except that of the the devils entering into the herd of swine and making them rush into the sea, which leaves no room for doubting the objective and external reality of the possession, first in the case of the man, and then in that of the swine. And as Archbishop Trench truly observes, our Lord's words are so precise as to the personal existence and influences of the evil spirits that they leave no room for doubt unless we adopt the hypothesis that He was neither able nor desirous at all times to speak the truth. As Christians, we are forbidden "to suppose that He could have used the language which He did, being perfectly aware all the time that there was no corresponding reality on which the language was founded." Nothing can be more plainly declared than that demons obtained possession of man's soul and body, so as to assert their mastery, and that by our Lord and His agents they were miraculously driven out.

Christ gave to the Twelve power and authority over all demons, and charged them to cast them out. The Seventy found (apparently beyond their expectation) that the demons were subject unto them through His Name. There are some who will plead that in His Name they have cast out demons, to whom He will say, "I know you not." The manifestation of demoniacal power in the case of the Pythoness was of a different kind from that in the Gospel miracles, but the reality of the possession and expulsion are no less evident. The Jews possessed the power of casting out demons, either through Beelzebub, or in the Name of Jehovah, or sometimes in the Name of Jesus. This would appear from our Lord's question, "By whom do your sons cast them out?" from St. John's saying, "Master, we saw one casting out demons in Thy Name;" and from the mention of the "vagabond Jews, exorcists," in the Acts. This is confirmed by what Josephus says [Ant. viii. 2] of Solomon's powers, although the details mentioned by him sound very fabulous. Epiphanius [adv. Ebion. cap. 30] speaks of the Jews working marvels by pronouncing the Tetragrammaton, or sacred Name יהוה. Of the powers possessed by the early exorcists and their successors in the Christian Church we shall have to speak hereafter.

The symptoms of possession, as described in the Gospels, are those of some ordinary diseases, and we have one case which might be put down as confirmed epilepsy with suicidal mania. The sufferer in this case was deaf and dumb, although able to cry out in an inarticulate manner as such persons do. The father said that the child was "lunatic," but he distinctly attributed his condition to his being possessed by an evil spirit which had complete mastery over him. The disciples had tried in vain to exorcise the demon, but at the word of Jesus he went out, throwing the child into a fearful paroxysm which left him as one dead. Even the very approach of Jesus made the demon throw his victim down, and all that our Lord said and did confirmed the belief of the friends and neighbours that the disorder was much more than physical. In the case of the Gadarene demoniacs we have a less complicated form of mania, of which disorder the extraordinary muscular strength, and propensity to go without clothes, are common symptoms. Here many demons had entered into one person, and the reality of the possession, as shewn by the demons going into the herd of swine, has been referred to above. The case of the demoniac who frequented the synagogue at Capernaum was probably of a milder description, as we have no mention of any violent symptoms until the actual casting out took place. It may have been similar to that of the half-witted person to be found habitually at the daily service in so many of our cathedrals and churches, but that the mental derangement was due to the person being possessed by an evil spirit there can be no doubt from the terms of the narratives. This spirit, like the others of which we read, believed and trembled at the approach of Christ. The Ephesians who had evil spirits, and the Pythoness mentioned in the Acts, were probably in league with familiar spirits, and were not possessed against their will, as the demoniacs in the Gospels were. The violence shewn to the sons of Sceva is attributed to the man himself, not to the demon; and these cases would come under the head of sorcery or witchcraft rather than that of demoniacal possession, in which there is an evident yearning and struggling to be free from the power of the demon. It is probable that in such cases as those we have been reviewing, there was something indescribable which shewed that the phenomena were due to supernatural causes either wholly or in part. The Jews seem to have been in the habit of referring cases of madness not merely to demoniacal agency but to possession, as when they said of our Lord "He hath a devil, and is mad." In one place, however, "lunatics" are distinguished from those possessed. Here we may have an instance of an inspired writer shewing greater accuracy than others did. In the case of the demoniacs we have not merely great sufferers, not merely great sinners, but as Archbishop Trench says, "what strikes us most in them is the strange blending of the physical and the spiritual; the two regions are not kept separate; there is a breaking up of the harmony of the lower no less than of the higher life, the same disorder is manifest in both." Yet all this may be said of perhaps all the cases that crowd our lunatic asylums, of all cases of delirium and hysteria, among which, if we had enough "discernment of spirits," we might possibly recognise many cases of true "possession." So far as we can ascertain, the demoniacs were the subjects of the influence of evil angels in extraordinary degrees, but manifesting itself in the phenomena of ordinary diseases. That they were cases of true possession rather than of exterior malign influence (obsession) we gather from the words of Christ and the Evangelists rather than from anything peculiar in the symptoms described. That these should have been aggravated at the approach of the Divine Healer, and in the act of expulsion, is the most significant fact related, but even this might be accounted for by attributing it solely to natural physical excitement. If we turn from the accounts of particular miracles, we still find being "possessed of demons" spoken of as distinct from "sickness" and, as we have seen, even from "lunacy." No cases of sickness are distinctly attributed to possession, although some are to demoniacal influence, exercised probably from without. Nor is there any mention of "casting out" in cases of healing sickness. We shall probably be right in supposing that the relation of demoniacal possession to ordinary Satanic influences is analogous to that of inspiration or the power of working miracles to ordinary spiritual gifts, and that as in the latter case so in the former, no distinct line of demarcation can be drawn between what is ordinary and what is extraordinary.

We find very little additional light thrown upon demoniacal possession by tracing its history. The references to conditions more or less resembling it in the Old Testament and in classical writings do not point to anything necessarily distinct from ordinary mania, or strong excitement, or violence of temper. The influence of the evil spirit that was "upon" Saul [1 Sam. xviii.-xix.] appears to have come and gone like ordinary temptations rather than to have been a chronic "possession," and he appears moreover to have been quite "himself," although full of rage and enmity. It is remarkable, however, that while the evil spirit was upon him he "prophesied," as did Baal's prophets [1 Kings xviii. 29], and the Pythoness [Acts xvi. 16]; and it is quite possible that Satan and his angels may have been permitted to exercise supernatural powers through these persons, as in the case of Pharaoh's magicians [Exod. vii. 11]. The references to exorcism in Josephus shew no more than that the Jews attributed certain conditions to the influence of evil spirits, and not necessarily to "possession." On such a belief the apocryphal story of Asmodeus in the Book of Tobit appears to be founded.

The power given by Christ to His Apostles to cast out demons continued to be exercised in the Church, and was of two kinds, "ordinary," as in the Sacrament of Baptism, and "extraordinary," as in the case of persons supposed to be miraculously possessed. It is so difficult to distinguish between real cases of "possession" and those resembling them, that the scanty history of exorcism in the early Church throws no light upon the subject. Exorcism was the special function of the second of the seven orders which arose in later times and still exist in the Roman Church, though they have long ceased to form a distinct class of ministers. Every priest however must have received this as also the other minor orders. The principal ceremony in the ordination of an exorcist is the delivery of a little book of forms of exorcism, according to the seventh canon of the Fourth Council of Carthage [A.D. 397]. The old forms of ordination, several of which are given in Martene [Rit. Eccl. lib. i.], assume the actual possession by personal demons as in the Gospel narratives. But exorcism has doubtless been practised in hundreds of cases where there was no possession in the true sense. There is every reason to suppose that as the world has become Christian, the powers of evil have been controlled and rendered unable to gain such possession of men as they did in Judæa, &c., in the time of our Lord and the Apostles, and as they are said to do in some parts of the world now. It is believed moreover that when Christ was on earth the Devil put forth his utmost power, knowing that his time was short, and that he was then suffered to put forth a stronger hand than before or since, in order that the triumph of Christ might be more conspicuous. But there is no doubt that the "type" of physical constitution differs greatly at different periods: that diseases which are common at one time are unknown at another, and that the same disease requires entirely different modes of treatment. Mental diseases are no exceptions to this rule, as Hecker has fully shewn in his Epidemics of the Middle Ages. It is so too in God's dispensation of gifts of healing. As He sees best, these are at one time miraculous and at another scientific. And as there may be cases of true possession in our day, so He may vouchsafe to heal them by means of scientific treatment; that is to say, by such moral, religious, and physical agencies as are now brought to bear in the treatment of the insane.

DEPOSITION. Perpetual deprivation of an order or benefice, or of both; it is not a censure, but an ecclesiastical sentence more rigorous than suspension. The Church by her authority for ever takes away the power of ministration whilst unable to touch the indelible character of holy orders. This terrible punishment is not earlier than the sixth century, and has long given place to suspension, that is, deposition for a limited time. Its synonyms are degradation, exauctoratio, abjectio, damnatio, privatio, remotio, depositio, retractio, etc. Deposition can only occur in the case of an ecclesiastic, and could be made solely by a council of bishops; the right of patronage to the vacant benefice resides in the person whose privilege it is to institute, that is, the bishop. Mortal sins and crimes are punished by deposition. Twelve bishops at least are required to depose a bishop; six were necessary to depose a priest, and four to depose a deacon; but in France a single bishop is sufficient in the latter cases. In former times, the deposed were often sent to a monastery for life. Deposition might be recalled in cases of penitence, of grace, and of justice, if the sentence was proved to have been unjust. It strictly corresponds to verbal degradation. Dr. Leighton, in the year 1629, was degraded, set in the pillory, and whipped for publishing a seditious book.

By the Council of Agde [A.D. 506] and Tribur [A.D. 895] bishops, twelve in case of a bishop, six in that of a priest, and three in case of a deacon, were required in a case of verbal deposal. A bishop alone with his own clergy could depose those in minor orders: it was inflicted generally in cases of sin by ecclesiastics, for murder, for violation of a tomb or sanctuary, for neglect to baptize a child, for simony in obtaining orders in a church, for betrayal of confessions, for treason or usury, for haunting taverns, bearing arms, wearing a lay habit, for commission of mortal sin, for engaging in secular business, or for encroaching on monasteries. The Council of Trent now permits in cases of actual degradation [Sess. xiii. c. iv. de Reform.] the presence of mitred abbots in lieu of the bishops, required only in such cases; and in verbal deposal allows it to a single bishop or his vicar-general. The Council of Seville decreed that in deprivation of a priest or deacon of office and benefice, a bishop should proceed after conferring with his council. English canons enforced it in case of marriage, of refusal to proceed to a higher order, of usury, secular employment, of sitting as judges of blood, of officiating when under suspension, of non-residence, of demanding money for giving penance, of pluralists without dispensation, and upon priors for dilapidations, and abbots for conniving at monks holding property.

The object of deposal is to remove the scandal of unworthy ministers from the Church, and prevent the misappropriation of its revenues. If a deposed clerk, being sent to confinement in a monastery, did not correct his fault, he was excommunicated. Restoration is either of justice when the deposed is penitent, or of grace, where the papal dispensation is obtained. The restoration should reverse the ceremonial of deposal. Verbal deposal now is represented by suspension, and degradation is actual deposal. By the Council of Antioch [A.D. 341], if a bishop deposed by a synod, or a priest or deacon deposed by his bishop, exercised their ministry, they were forbidden hope of reconciliation, and all who communicated with them were excommunicated; if they appealed not to a council, but to the civil power, they were denied restoration.

Suspension "ab officio et beneficio" is temporal degradation. Suspension "ab officio," in the case of unbeneficed clergy, is temporary degradation. Where a statute exists declarative that the party shall be "ipso facto" deprived, no sentence is required in the Church of England, as in case of simony, or on a second conviction of refusing to use the Book of Common Prayer; preaching in depravation of it, or using any unprescribed rite or ceremony; or not publicly reading the Thirty-nine Articles in time of common prayer, with a declaration of conformity within two months after induction; or not saying the morning and evening prayer within the same time; or not subscribing and publicly reading a declaration of conformity within three months; in cases of illegal trading, or tenure of two benefices; or in cases of sequestration for two years, or any immoral conduct or offence against the laws ecclesiastical; perjury, felony, or dilapidations, &c. Suspension may be pronounced by three members of a diocese, deprivation by the bishop only or by the dean of the arches. In cases of deprivation, the bishop must give a solemn sentence, after hearing the merits of the cause and pleading of both sides. A bishop can be deprived, but not deposed. Archbishop Tenison, assisted by six bishops, deprived a bishop; and in 1823 an Irish bishop was deprived by the archbishop and bishops of the province.

DESCENT INTO HELL. The early Church taught that the Soul of our Lord after its separation from the Body, descended εἰς τόν Ἅιδην, in (or ad) inferna, ad inferos [Iren. cont. Hæres. v. 31; Clem. Alex. Strom. vi.; Tert. de Anim. lv.; Euseb. i. 13; Cyril, Catech. iv. 11, xiv. 19; Hilary, de Trinit. x. 65, and Ps. cxxx.; Ambros. de Incarn. 37, 42, and de Virgin, 128; August. Ep. clxiv. et mult. al.; Jerom. Ep. xxii. et mult. al.] The article "He descended into Hell" first appears in the Creed, however, about the middle of the fourth century, when it is found in three forms of the Arian Creed [Socrates, Hist. Ecc. ii. 37, 41; Theodor. Hist. Ecc. ii. 21] of the years 350 and 360; and in that put on record by Rufinus [A.D. 345-410]. It was probably inserted or brought more prominently forward about this time, on account of the APOLLINARIAN Heresy, which made it necessary to assert strongly the existence of our Lord's Soul as distinct from His Divine Nature. Since the fifth century, the article has been universally received by the Church in its present form "descendit ad inferna."

But there has been much controversy, especially during the last three centuries, as to the true sense in which the word Ἅιδην, inferna, inferos, or Hell is to be understood, the sense of this word affecting that of the whole article and doctrine. In Roman theology, Hades is a "Limbus" in which the souls of the righteous who had died before Christ's Advent were detained, and into which He descended that He might free them from the captivity in which they were there held. The Calvinist heresy is that the descent into Hell means the sufferings of the damned, the bearing of which formed part of Christ's satisfaction. Many Protestants understand Hell to mean the grave, and confound this article of the Creed with that respecting the burial of Christ's body. The opinion of Luther, and of many orthodox writers, makes the Descent of Christ into Hell His triumphant entry into the Kingdom of Satan, there to proclaim His work, to shew forth His victory over Death and Hell, and to lead the redeemed into freedom. This was also the general opinion of the Mediæval Church, in which the "Harrowing of Hell" was a popular poem, originally forming a supplement, apparently, to the Apocryphal "Gospel of Nicodemus:" and thought by some good critics to have been first written in the second century after Christ. The best theologians of the English Church believe that Hell is a comprehensive word for the place or places in which all departed souls await the Day of Judgment, some in happy foretaste of final bliss, and some in miserable foretaste of final woe: that thither the disembodied soul of Christ (still in Hypostatic Union with His Divinity) descended in the interval between His Death and Resurrection: that there He began the triumph of His Resurrection by proclaiming His victorious work, and by imparting Salvation and perfect freedom to all who had died in faith under the Old Testament Dispensation.[1]

The third of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion originally had another clause in these words: "For the Body lay in the Sepulchre until the Resurrection, but His Ghost departing from Him was with the ghosts that were in prison, or in Hell, and did preach to the same, as the place of St. Peter doth testify." [HELL. Thom. Aq. Opuscul. de Symb. App. lxviii; Bellarm. de Animâ Christi, iv. 14; Bp. Campbell's Middle State; Field on the Church, v. 19; Bp. Bilson's Survey of Christ's Sufferings; Bp. Pearson on the Creed.]

DEUTERO-CANONICAL. [CANON OF SCRIPTURE.]

DIATESSARON. Tatian, a writer of the latter half of the second century, first arranged the four Gospels, so as to make one continuous narrative, διὰ τεσσάρων, hence the name. Eusebius [H. E. iv.], who mentions this, says that Tatian tampered with the text of the Pauline Epistles to give them greater elegance. He probably was not more scrupulous in his digest of the Gospels; and Ambrose directly charges the Harmonists who preceded him with falsifying Scripture [Præf. in S. Luc.] to suit their whims. Theodoret suppressed more than two hundred copies of the Diatessaron that he found in his churches, and replaced them with the genuine "quadrijugæ" of the Gospels [Hær. F. i. 20]. Possibly, therefore, Tatian may have introduced something more than the confusion that has always been inseparable from the harmonist's work into the Gospel narrative. If the Bethesda miracle [John v.], and the account of the woman taken ἐπ' αὐτοφώρῳ [John viii.], be interpolations, they may have proceeded from no more likely source than Tatian's amalgam, in which the mythical seems to have been mixed up with the genuine; as they certainly are not of a later date than the second century. The Gospel of the Hebrews, identical with that of the Encratites, of which sect Tatian was the head, was probably the basis of his Diatessaron [Epiphan. H. xlvi. 1]. The suppression of our Lord's genealogy, and of all other evidence of his descent from David [Theodoret, H. E. i. 20], enables us to identify this Gospel with that of the Ebionites. This defective Gospel then having been taken as the groundwork, the narrative of our Lord's ministry was filled in by extracts from the true Gospels. Thus it was also known by the name of διὰ πέντε, the Hebrew original having been taken into the account. This Hebrew Gospel was scarcely heretical. Ignatius cites it [ad Smyrn. 3, see Jerom. Catal. Scr. Eccl. sec. 46] as an authentic account of Gospel fact, current in Syria in the post-Apostolic times. Irenæus also so frequently indicates in the Latin translation a Syriac rather than a Greek original, as to make it highly probable that he had a copy of this Gospel with him in Gaul. The text [Luc. xvi. 11] quoted towards the end of the second book [c. Hær.] was probably taken from it. Such seems to have been the basis of the Diatessaron of Tatian. But the work has not come down to us.

[1] "Potuit in spatio triduo, et minore, in utrumque locum proficisci; nec impediunt loci qui testentur eum concessisse ad Patrem, &c. Liber erat inter mortuos, ut quo vellet, posset ire sine suo incommodo: Et, ut merito in cruce, sic efficacia per præsentiam suam, sibi et suis infernum superare, et sibi gloriosam victoriam, ac nobis utilem et consolationis plenam comparare. Et multi scripturarum loci hoc sonant, et ita a patribus intelliguntur." [Bishop Overall, Prælectio de Anima Christi.]

Ammonius of Alexandria [mid. second century] did something of the same kind. Taking St. Matthew as the normal Gospel he divided it into sections; and arranged against it in parallel columns the corresponding portions of the other three Gospels. The numbers of these sections are often found as marginal references in the MSS. of the Greek Testament [Wordsworth]. In the next century, Eusebius of Cæsarea formed the canons named after him, upon these sections. Thus dividing the canons into ten heads, the first has all the matter that is common to the four Gospels. The narrative of St. Matthew is included under the heads 2-7; St. Mark = 2, 4, 6, 8; St. Luke = 2, 3, 5, 8, 9; St. John = 3, 4, 7, 9. The tenth head or section is formed of the various passages that are peculiar to the several Gospels individually. This conspectus shews that 1 exhibits the four Gospels in unison; 2, 3, 4, shew the harmony of three Gospels; 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, of two; and the 10th, the independent utterances of all. The application of this evangelical concordance is by no means easy; but reference to it has been simplified in the introduction to Wordsworth's Greek Testament. Jerome [Ep. ad Algas.] says that Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, executed a similar work; but he may have had in view the Diatessaron of Tatian [Vales. ad Eus. H. E. iv. 29].

The difficulty of constructing a satisfactory harmony of the four Gospels has always been considerable. It is said that the independence of each narrative has caused variations; that the genuineness of a Gospel fact is one thing, the time and order of its occurrence is another; and that the sacred writers appear to have considered it sufficient to declare, by the Holy Spirit that guided them, the verities of the Gospel, without paying any very particular regard to the order of narration. But the idea of such dislocation is scarcely consistent with reverence; and it is by no means certain that elements of the Gospel narrative that seem to be identical are really so in fact. Our Lord must have repeated the same words of instruction, as He did His miracles and significant acts; and the same words and facts may have been variously recorded as recurring elements of Gospel history. Thus our Lord cleared the temple of its buyers and sellers in the beginning [John ii. 15] and again at the close of His ministry [Matt. xxi. 12]; He fed multitudes twice [Matt. xvi. 9, 10] by a miracle. Harmonizers would perhaps have reduced these to a single act, if the express words of Scripture permitted them. Twice He manifested His power over the elements on the Lake Tiberias [Matt. viii. 26, xiv. 32]. We read of two miraculous draughts of fishes [Matt. v. 6; John xxi. 6]. He raised the dead under four conditions of gradually progressive awfulness: the recent dead; the corpse borne forth for burial; the four days' tenant of the grave; and Himself. Then may not our Lord have repeated His instruction in very much the same terms on more than one occasion? The Sermon upon the Mount that was vouchsafed in Galilee was equally needed in Judæa. If this be the case, harmonists have tortured themselves and their readers in vain in their endeavour to solidify accounts that are separate and diverse. [See the useful Synopsis of Archbp. Thomson in Smith's Dict. of Bible, GOSPEL; and the different synoptical treatises of Griesbach, De Wette, Lücke, Rödiger, Clausen, Greswell, Tischendorf. Also Macknight, White, Lightfoot, and the Diatessaron, Oxf. 1837. Augustin. de Cons. iv. Ev.]

DIOCESE [διοίκησις]. The administration of a house; as the dioiketes was master of the house, the emperor was ruler of his empire: hence his administration was called diocese, as Æschines and Plato employ the term for civic rule. Cicero explains that every Roman province embraced several dioceses; but under the empire a diocese included several provinces under the rule of a prefect. Like the earlier term of parish, it now signifies the see, territory, and dominion appertaining to a bishop. After the decease of the Apostles, who had gone through all countries preaching the Gospel, the Church, recognising the necessity for an undivided government by their successors, (who had been constituted in several principalities,) apportioned among them separate districts. For the sake of good order, each received a portion of the flock of Christ allotted to his charge within certain limits, which became the diocese within which a bishop was bound to limit the functions of his ministry and the exercise of his spiritual jurisdiction. This partition was originally co-extensive with the extent of the civil divisions of the Roman empire and the jurisdiction of the magistrates in the chief towns. A Nul diocese was a district not allotted to a particular bishop, and was caused by the exemptions which revolutionized the ecclesiastical hierarchy. The archdiocese was a term peculiar to Germany, as the designation of the diocese of an archbishop.

The early Roman diocese, or region, was simply a division of the town for parochial purposes, formed by Pope Dionysius, who directed the example to be followed at Cordova. But some authors regard Evaristus or Marcellus as the constitutors of such parishes. In the larger sense of the term, however, the tracts or dioceses were seven in number in the East, and six in the West, each with its provinces; the diocese of the East embraced 15; the Egyptian, 6; the Asian, 10; the Pontic, 10; the Thracian, 6. The Italian had 17; the African, 7; the Gallican, 17; the Spanish, 7; and the British, 5. Now, however, a diocese designates the jurisdiction of a single bishop. The English dioceses arose out of the original kingdoms; in Kent, Canterbury and Rochester; in Sussex, Selsey; in Wessex, Dorchester; in East Anglia, Dunwich; in Mercia, Lichfield; in Northumberland, York and Lindisfarne; the other sees growing out of translations or subdivisions. The Council of Africa [A.D. 418] confined the erection of new sees to the judgment of the primate, the diocesan, and a provincial council. In A.D. 673 the primate and bishops took counsel for enlarging the number of dioceses in England. At the Reformation, Wolsey prepared for the formation of twenty-one new sees, of which six only were created by the Crown. In the present century those of Manchester and Ripon have been founded by Act of Parliament. [André, Droit Canon. i. 978; Beyerlinck, s. v.]

DIPTYCHS. Diptychs were of two kinds, sacred and profane. The latter were properly registers in which were inscribed the names of consuls and other high magistrates; but the term was also applied to writing tablets, which were frequently made of ivory, and splendidly ornamented with gold. Diptychs of this kind were also called duplices. Christian diptychs were not only registers of the dead, but lists of living benefactors of the Church. The name is derived from the Greek δίς, and πτύσσω, to fold, and denotes a double tablet, as triptych denotes one of three leaves. δίπτυχος is used by Homer in the meaning of double or twofold [Odyss. 13, v. 224], δίπτυχον ἄμφ' ὤμοισιν ἔχουσ' εὐεργέα λώπην. Sacred diptyehs were of two kinds, one kind being described as καταλόγοι τῶν ἐν τῷ Κυρίῳ ἀναπαυσαμένων ἐπισκόπων. Such diptychs were in fact the catalogues of each church, in which were contained the names of all the orthodox bishops who had ruled it from the time of its foundation. Exclusion from such lists was one of the punishments of heresy. Another kind of diptychs were those in which the names of living or departed benefactors of the Church were inscribed. These names were read aloud to the people in the prayer before the consecration of the elements in the Eucharistic service. The liturgy of St. Basil directs, Ὁ διάκονος θυμιᾷ γορόθεν τὴν ἁγίαν τράπεξαν, καὶ τὰ δίπτυχα τῶν τε ζώντων καὶ τῶν κεκοιμημένων, ὧν βούλεται, μνημονεύει, and similar directions are given in the liturgy of St. Chrysostom. Later, Alcuin [de Celebratione Missæ], says, "Post illa verba, quibus dicitur in somno pacis, usus fuit antiquorum, sicut etiam hodie Romana agit ecclesia, ut statim recitarentur ea diptychis nomina defunctorum." The ancient diptychs were the groundwork of the Martyrologies, and, when made general instead of local, the original form of the Christian calendar.

DISCIPLINA ARCANI. The ancient name given in the Primitive Church to the practice of "reserve" respecting Christian mysteries. It is first actually referred to by Tertullian, who speaks of the silence which is kept concerning mysteries; [Tertul. Apol. vii.] and blames heretics for speaking openly about them to those who were not yet Christians [CATECHUMEN], and even to those who were not preparing to forsake heathenism for Christianity [Tertul. de Prescrip. Hær. xli.]. But Tertullian does not mention this practice of reserve as if it was at all a novelty: and, indeed, he quotes Matt. vii. 6, "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine," as if it was commonly understood to be founded on these words of our Lord. No doubt there must have been need of some such practice of reserve from the moment when Christianity began to be known as a new religion by the heathen: or curiosity and ignorance might have led to extreme irreverence, such as no Christian of early days could contemplate without horror. Nor would it be desirable at once to unfold the mysteries of the faith to heathen persons even when they were desirous of becoming Christians, as much and careful instruction was necessary before the doctrine of the Sacraments, or of the Holy Trinity, could be properly understood by those who had been brought up under systems of idolatry and fetichism. Thus the disciplina arcani became a systematic habit of the early Church. None were allowed, ordinarily, to witness the ceremonies of Baptism or of the Eucharist until they were themselves brought to the Baptistry to be made Christians, or to the Altar to become communicants: nor was it permitted for preachers to speak in unreserved language before mixed assemblies respecting Baptism, the Eucharist, Confirmation, or Ordination.

One consequence of this systematic reserve was that the heathen, educated and uneducated, received very false impressions respecting the principles and practices of Christians; and it seems very probable that persecutions often arose out of these mistakes, heathen rulers and others honestly believing (though content with too insufficient evidence) that the rites of Christianity were contrary to the natural laws of morality. Christian writers defended themselves against these charges [APOLOGISTS], but as they could not state the whole of their case, their apologies did not satisfy the heathen mind, and the accusations were repeated again and again. Thus the disciplina arcani, however necessary and right may have been its practice, was certainly a great provocative of those persecutions which Christians had to suffer from mistakes as to their principles.

Another curious result of this early reserve has been pointed out by Archdeacon Freeman [Princ. Div. Serv. ii. 386]. It is that a "dislocation" has taken place in the Primitive Liturgies: the Lord's Prayer (which was specially subject to the practice of reserve) and some other portions of the rite being removed from the earlier to the later portion of the Liturgy, so as to exclude them from the knowledge of the catechumens.

The missionaries of the Church are still practically obliged to maintain the disciplina arcani when among the heathen: and in a country which is nominally Christian no reverent teacher would speak unreservedly of the highest mysteries among a mob of blasphemers. But as a rule of the Church it has passed away, and belongs now to the domain of reverent prudence. [Bingham's Antiq. X. v.].

DISCIPLINE, ECCLESIASTICAL. Ecclesiastical discipline is the execution of the spiritual laws of the Church. For the Church it is the assertion of her character of holiness, and for those who are subjected to it, it is not only a punishment, but a means of repentance and restoration. Discipline has ever been necessary to the true life of the Church, and will continue to be so as long as the Church is passing through the period of her earthly probation, and standing in continual need of sanctification and purification. It was so in the times of the Apostles, who addressed frequent warnings and reproofs to their converts, as, for instance, to the Galatians, and to the seven Churches; and who, in case of need, pronounced sentence, and inflicted punishment on offenders. We learn from the New Testament the mode of discipline in the Apostolic Church. It was of three kinds: [1] private reproof; [2] public admonition; [3] excommunication, or separation from the body of the faithful. The earliest instances of discipline are the punishment of Ananias and Sapphira by St. Peter, and the sentence pronounced by St. Paul on the Corinthian offender.

After the time of the Apostles, the primitive Church was distinguished by a strict discipline, maintained, however, down to the time of Constantine, by spiritual sanctions alone. The character of converts was made the subject of a rigid inquiry before their admission to the privileges of the faithful, and the high morality of the whole Church was maintained by strict disciplinary regulations. All persons whom any great unworthiness of life or belief, such as adultery, murder, or denial of Christ, rendered unfit for the fellowship of the Church, were immediately excommunicated. The primitive discipline, however, did not constitute a system of espionage, for only crimes which had been the cause of public scandal, or sins confessed by the offenders themselves, were made the subjects of public censure.

Persons who had been excommunicated were allowed to attend only the worship of the catechumens. Before their restoration they were required to undergo the catechumenical probation; and, in addition, certain penances were imposed on them, such as fasting, almsgiving, more frequent prayers, and abstinence from innocent pleasures. The precise forms of penance were not in the second century regulated by any universal rule, but varied according to the circumstances of different places.

The readmission of fallen members of the Church was a subject of sharp contention in the second and third centuries. Tertullian enumerates as "peccata mortalia" "Homicidium, idolatria, fraus, negatio, blasphemia, utique et mœchia, et fornicatio, et si quis alia violatio templi Dei." These sins he pronounces "irremissibilia:" "horum ultra exorator non erit Christus" [de Pudic. c. 19]. The views of Tertullian were embraced and extended by Novatian of Rome, in the middle of the third century. Novatian, after opposing his bishop, Cornelius, on the subject of the readmission of the lapsed, as those who had denied Christ in times of persecution were called, was chosen bishop in opposition to Cornelius by those who shared his views. He refused to readmit the lapsed, or any persons guilty of deadly sin, to the communion of the Church, even in the hour of death, although he did not deny the possibility of their salvation. It was, however, the practice of the more moderate party, represented especially by the Church of Rome, to restore all persons in the hour of death to the peace of the Church, if their penitence was judged to be sincere.

In the latter part of the third century a fixed system of penance was established, which, however, was not long maintained. Penance was divided into four stages: [1] προσκλαυσις, fletus; [2] ἀκρόασις, auditus; [3] ὑπόπτωσις, prostratio; [4] σύστασις, consistentia; the three last stages being those through which catechumens were required to pass. When the time of penance, which was generally extended to three or four years, had been satisfactorily accomplished, the penitent, after a public confession of his offence, received absolution and benediction before the assembled congregation, and was thus solemnly reconciled to the Church. No person, however, who had thus done public penance was ever capable of receiving ordination. Cyprian [Ep. 68] says of such, "Cum jampridem nobiscum, et cum omnibus episcopis in toto mundo constitutis, etiam Cornelius, collega noster—decreverit, ejus modi homines ad pœnitentiam quidem agendam posse admitti, ab ordinatione autem cleri atque sacerdotali honore prohiberi." The 10th Canon of the Council of Nice decrees that if any person who had done penance should be ordained through ignorance of his fall, the ordination should be set aside.

Little more than a century elapsed from the time of the establishment of this system before it was found impossible for it to contend against the ever-increasing luxury which prevailed among the members of the Church. It was especially weakened by the readiness with which dispensations were granted. The system was made more minute and elaborate, but at the same time new means were found for relaxing its ancient severity.

The Germanic nations made a long and determined resistance to the establishment of Church discipline among them. It was not until the eighth century that it could be enforced, and even then the system introduced was constituted so as to be in harmony with the free spirit of the people. Synodal courts were established in every place of importance. The bishop or his archdeacon presided annually over each of these courts, but chosen men of each congregation deliberated and decided, after the manner of an English jury, on the merits of every case brought before the court. Not only spiritual offences, but many civil questions also, were brought before the synodal courts, which had the power of inflicting temporal punishments, such as imprisonment and scourging. Temporal punishments were in fact inflicted in most cases, and only offences voluntarily confessed to a priest were allowed to be atoned for by the payment of a fine.

The practice of auricular confession, viewed as a part of Church discipline, was differently esteemed by the East and by the West. In the East it fell into almost total disuse, in the West more and more stress was laid upon the benefits to be derived from it.

Excommunication at this period was a powerful weapon in the hands of the Church. It was not often resorted to, for so great was the dread of it that offenders were glad to make any submission by which they could escape from its terrors. It generally therefore remained as a last resource, when all other means had been tried without effect. A century or two later saw many changes in this system. The synodal courts gradually sank from their original high position, and allowed numerous offenders to escape on payment of a fine, who in former times would have been subjected to penalties less capable of abuse. In the eleventh century books of discipline were put forth, containing a systematically arranged scale of penances according to the gravity of each offence. Many compromises for the ancient rigour were allowed and encouraged, and men readily accepted such congenial forms of penance as a crusade or a pilgrimage presented, who would not willingly have submitted to the spiritual discipline of primitive times. The highest power of absolution on earth was supposed to rest in the Popes, who, by virtue of their powers, granted special privileges of absolution to certain religious seats, which accordingly became the resort of penitents from all quarters. The building of churches or convents afforded another method of obtaining absolution; but above all other means the crusades were acceptable to the warlike and chivalrous spirit of the time. The complete absolution which was given to crusaders was as highly valued as the military service by which it was obtained was congenial to the age, and the nations eagerly flocked to the standards on which the blessing of the Church rested. It is true that repentance and amendment of life were made conditions of the reception of benefit from crusades or pilgrimages, but the practical result was that importance was too often attached, not to the inward change, but to the mere outward act.

The Papal interdict became in this age an instrument of terrible power. No monarch, however great, could view with indifference a measure which carried its influence into the humblest homes of his kingdom, and which could even raise his subjects in revolt against his authority. But in proportion as the unselfish spirit which had characterized the greater Popes of earlier times, and which had endeared them to the people, whose champions they were, gave way to the worldliness and selfishness of later ages, the force of the spiritual censures of the Church became weaker, and in time was utterly destroyed. Men had trembled at the excommunications of Gregory VII., but when Sixtus IV., disappointed at the non-furtherance by the Venetians of his ambitious projects for his nephew Riario, excommunicated them for this, and for no offence against the laws of God, it was natural that awe and reverence should be altogether lost. Still more was the force of discipline weakened by the multitudes of unworthy agents who found their way to every town of Europe, for the purpose of distributing or selling INDULGENCES. The relaxation of the discipline of the Church was bought and sold, and in too many cases no regard was paid to that contrition and amendment which had in former times been an indispensable condition of pardon. The abuse of spiritual power has brought about a long continued disuse, and that godly discipline and restraint which the primitive Church exercised over the lives of her members is now practically laid aside. On the other hand, God's Providence has brought about a social restraint and a spirit of self-discipline which, in a greater or less degree, supplies its place.

DISPENSATION. A grace in respect of the person dispensing; an act of justice to the person dispensed; a relaxation of the rigour of the common law, made with knowledge of the cause by lawful authority. It is an act of jurisdiction by which a superior releases a person from the action of a general or special law. It does not extend beyond the case specified, and has the force and effect of a decree or sentence. In early times penance was relaxed in cases of extreme necessity; and somewhat later the Councils of Sardica and Carthage [IV.], and Pope Gelasius, permitted clergy to transport themselves into another diocese, and when the Church had peace, the synods of bishops, who were the law-makers, received to themselves the power of relaxing its conditions. The popes claimed to dispense with oaths, vows, leagues, marriages, and allegiance, and with the laws of God, man, or nature.

There are three kind of dispensations enumerated, [1] due, "debita;" [2] permissible, "permissa," or arbitrary; [3] forbidden, "prohibita." The first are granted from necessity of the case, the second on reasonable grounds, the third would injure the common good order, being contrary to just reason and right natural and divine. A dispensation for a term of years and not "ad bene placitum" was irrevocable.

Besides these the following classes have been enumerated: [1] voluntary; [2] reasonable in consideration of the merit of the person favoured; [3] lawful, when according to law; [4] of a man, when a superior awards it lawfully, and of a man when law permits the man to dispense with his own dispensation; [5] of justice; [6] of grace or favour; [7] mixed when partaking of both; [8] collative when prospective; [9] restitutive if retrospective, and according to St. Bernard's words [10] excusable because necessary; [11] commendable because advantageous to the Church; and [12] faithful because just; [13] express, or [14] tacit according as the defect of the recipient is or is not mentioned in words; [15] general when for the common good; and [16] particular when affecting only an order or individuals. Dispensations were given in cases of irregularity for orders; of affinity or hindrance in marriage; and of vows. A superior can dispense with laws made by those who hold a subordinate jurisdiction. A dispensation "in radice" renders valid a marriage previously null.

All kinds of dispensations take the form of letters, and they are to be distinguished from ordinary licenses or faculties, which refer to the execution or observance of some existing law, and give operation to it.

By Stat. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21 the Archbishop of Canterbury has the power of dispensing in any case wherein dispensations were formerly granted, so that it be not contrary to God's word; and he may grant such dispensations to the king and queen, but if the case be new the crown and council are to be consulted. The Archbishop can thus dispense with candidates to allow them to enter into deacon's orders before they be full twenty-three years of age. Formerly he could permit clerks to hold more benefices than one: the holding two benefices being abundantly tolerated, but their tenure without a dispensation being rigorously punished. The Statute of Henry VIII. regulated and in some degree checked the mischief, but the cases of dispensation were so numerous, and the construction of the act so broad, that there were few grounds on which it was not possible to evade restriction. The law was therefore entirely revised by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, which is the Statute in force on the subject. Besides the ordinary "license,"—a faculty for dispensing with the publication of banns, and granted by a bishop or such as have episcopal authority, vicars-general, commissary for faculties, guardians of spiritualities, or ordinaries exercising episcopal jurisdiction,—a special license, issued only by the Archbishop of Canterbury, is a larger dispensation, whereby marriage may be solemnized at any time, in any church or chapel, or other meet and convenient place. A special fiat is issued to the master of the faculties. This power to grant faculties, dispensations, and licenses, as had been done by the Pope before, was given to the Archbishop of Canterbury by the Statute of Henry VIII., confirmed by 4 George IV. c. 76, and has not been repealed.

Licenses or dispensations to eat meat on fasting days were also permitted by Statute 5 Eliz. c. 1; and a curious account of the various dispensations current at that time may be seen in Zurich Letters, 2nd ser. p. 360; Grindal's Remains, pp. 448-9. They permitted pluralities of benefices with a limitation of thirty miles between them; permission to a minor of sixteen years of age, if resident in the University, to hold a benefice; licenses of non-residence, of eating flesh-meat upon medical certificate; letters dimissory for ordination in another diocese than that wherein he was born; legitimization (arcta et arida dispensatio); the tenure of a bishopric with a commendam, &c.

Bishops now, under certain restrictions, dispense with a clerk by licensing him to reside outside the bounds of his parish or to hold two livings.

Archbishop Bramhall says, papal dispensations were commonly called "vulnera legum," and the Statute of Provisors [25 Edw. III. s. vi. sec. 2] brands them as "the rending and destruction of the common law of the land." The penitential canons and pre-Norman royal constitutions relaxed the rigour of ecclesiastical discipline in England, and the first reservation to the Pope is mentioned by Gervase as made by Alberic the legate in 1138. Dispensations made by the Church had to be confirmed by the crown in the reign of Henry I., and parliament declared a bull of Boniface VIII. null and void, when he exempted the University of Oxford from the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury. [André; Van Espen, Jus. Eccles. diss. de Dispensat.; Ayliffe, Parergon, 219.]

DISSENTERS. Those who maintain a religious position unconnected with the religion established by the State. The term does not necessarily imply schism, which is separation from the Catholic Church, for where the establishment is Presbyterian, as in Scotland, the orthodox, or "Episcopalians," are necessarily Dissenters. It is probably derived from the early word "dissidents," which originated in Poland about the end of the sixteenth century. In England the term began to supersede that of "Nonconformists" soon after the Revolution of 1688. In an Act of that year [1 G. & M. c. 18] "their Majesties' Protestant subjects dissenting from the Church of England" are named both in the title and body of the Act. [Schism. Toleration. Nonconformity. Dict. of Sects and Heresies.]

DIVINITY OF CHRIST. The doctrine that the Divine Nature of the Eternal Son of God is hypostatically united with the Human Nature of the Man Christ Jesus. This has been the continuous belief of the Church, was stated by Apostles and Evangelists, was predicted in the Old Testament, and was proved as well as asserted by our Lord Jesus Christ Himself.

[I.] Continuous Belief of the Church. The full evidence which might be gathered on this point would occupy a very large space; and, in proportion to its actual amount, can scarcely be more than indicated in a work like the present. Christian literature of every age abounds with such evidence, and the voice of the collective Church has gone upward to Heaven, and abroad upon earth, from generation to generation, declaring that Christ Jesus is God. This may be shewn, as far as it can be shewn in a small compass, by the formal statements of creeds, by the formal acts of worship offered to Christ, by the corporate action of the Church against those who denied His Divinity, and by the statements of venerated and generally received divines.

1] Formal statements of Creeds. The earliest definite record which has come down to us respecting the Creed of the sub-Apostolic age is that of Irenæus, in his work against heresies, written about A.D. 180. In this work he gives us what is plainly the Creed as it was then used in the Church of Lyons, and the second article of this is, "I believe in one Jesus Christ, the Son of God," εἰς ἕνα Κριστὸν Ἰησοῦν, τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ [Irenæus, contr. Hæres. i. 10, sec. 1]. In a later portion of the same work he expands the article into a form more nearly approaching that of later days, "And in the Son of God, Jesus Christ, our Lord, by Whom are all things" . . . τὸν Κύριον ἡμῶν, δι' οὗ τὰ πάντα [Ibid. iv. 33, sec. 7]. An almost similar form, indicating the Creed of Carthage, is given by Tertullian [A.D. 210] "Sermo ipsius, qui ex Ipso processerit, per quem omnia facta sunt" [Tertul. adv. Prax. ii.]. A few years later [A.D. 260] the Creed of Rome is indicated by its schismatical bishop Novatian in a work on the Trinity. After the first article, he goes on, "the same rule of truth teaches us to believe also, after the Father, in the Son of God, Christ Jesus, our Lord God, but the Son of God."

The fragmentary relics of the primitive Creed from which this evidence is taken, shew the form in which the Divinity of our Lord was stated in the two centuries which followed the Apostolic age: during a period, that is, when the doctrine had not been made the subject of any widely extended controversy, and when the Church could afford to rest on generalized and indefinite expressions. Yet the very title of "Son of God" was itself a declaration of our Lord's Divinity, as much as that of the "Son of Man" is of His Humanity, and so it is considered to have been always used, by the most learned writers [Bull, Judic. Eccles. Cathol. v. 10]. But when the heresy of Arius arose it became necessary to make this article of the Creed more explicit, and the Nicene formula [A.D. 325] declares, "We believe . . . in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, . . . God of God, . . . Very God of Very God, Θεὸν ἐκ Θεοῦ . . . Θεὸν ἀληθινὸν ἐκ Θεοῦ ἀληθινοῦ, with a reiteration peculiarly emphatic, and in a simplicity of form which places the meaning beyond dispute. When the collective testimony of so many bishops from all parts of the world had been thus given to the belief contained in the more condensed formula of earlier times—for such, and not the construction of a new dogma, was the purpose of the Nicene Council—it was generally received in that form by the Church of the fourth century, has been continuously used in that form in the Liturgy from the fifth century to the present time, and has been universally accepted in that form as the full and authoritative belief of the Catholic Church.

It may be added, under this head, that the ancient belief of the Church has been re-asserted in the Western Church at the Council of Trent [Sess. iii.], and in the second of the Thirty-nine Articles.

2] Acts of Worship. But the strongest expression of the Christian faith respecting the Divinity of the Man Christ Jesus has been in the unfailing round of adoration which has gone up to Him as God in Heaven, in all ages and from every country.

He had no sooner lifted His feet from the earth to ascend on high than they who witnessed that Ascension "worshipped Him, and returned to Jerusalem with great joy" [Luke xxiv. 52], called Him "The Lord Jesus" [Acts i. 21], and prayed to Him that He would once more complete the number of the Apostles whom He had chosen.[1] [Ibid. i. 24.]

The prayer of St. Stephen, the teaching of St. Paul, and the pattern worship of the Revelation, point to the unhesitating manner in which Divine honour was at once given to the risen Jesus, to the continued habit of the Church during the Apostolic age, and to the confirmation of that habit by a Divine revelation of the Heavenly Church adoring the "Lamb as it had been slain" [Rev. v. 6, 8]. And, as St. Stephen prayed to Him as the Incarnate Son of God [Acts. vii. 56, 59, 60], as St. Paul declares that "at the Name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth" [Philip. ii. 10], so the pattern worship of Heaven sets forth the Human Nature of Him "who has redeemed us to God by His Blood" [Rev. v. 9], as the Object of adoration in no less degree than the Divine Nature Itself.

The Apostolic age had scarcely passed away when we find an early notice of Christian habits from the pen of a heathen writer, the younger Pliny. In his famous letter to Trajan, he describes, as far as he knew and could understand it, the Divine worship of the Church in those troubled times of persecution; and a conspicuous feature in his description is that he speaks of the Christians "singing hymns to Christ as God," [carmenque Christo, quasi Deo, dicere secum invicem; Plinii lib. x. ep. 96], it being evident, even to a heathen spectator that Christ was the object of their adoration.[2] One of the most

[1] For proof that this prayer was offered to Christ, see Liddon's Bampton Lectures, p. 550, note C, 1st ed.

[2] See also Lucian, De Morte Peregrini, xi. "The Christians are still worshipping that great man who was gibbeted in Palestine." The profane stylograph found scratched upon the wall of a guardroom in the palace of the Emperors at Rome is another illustration of the famous of the martyrs who had lived in Apostolic times, St. Ignatius, desires the Roman Church to offer litanies to Christ on his behalf [λιτανεύσατε τὸν Χριστὸν] as he is on his road to the lions. Another of the same age took on his dying lips words which seem to be part of the Eucharistic hymn known as "Gloria in Excelsis," saying as he looked up from the stake "For all things, O God, do I praise Thee, and bless Thee, and glorify Thee, together with the Eternal and Heavenly Jesus Christ, Thy well-beloved Son, with whom, to Thee and the Holy Ghost, be glory, both now and for ever. Amen." [Euseb. Ecc. Hist. iv. 15.] The first words of the same hymn are found in the Liturgy of St. James, and another portion, "Thee we hymn, Thee we praise; to Thee we give thanks, O Lord, and pray to Thee, our God," in that of St. Chrysostom; a fact which shews that its substance was in liturgical use in the very earliest age of the Church, as it is found complete in the Alexandrine Codex about the fourth or fifth century [Gloria in Excelsis]. In that hymn the tone of the Apocalyptic pattern is strikingly adopted, and Christ is distinctly adored as God, and prayed to as God, in the words, "O Lord, the only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ; O Lord God, Lamb of God, Son of the Father, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us. . . . For Thou only art holy, Thou only art the Lord; Thou only, O Christ, with the Holy Ghost, art most high in the glory of God the Father." Of a similar character, and probably, too, used at one time in Divine Service, is the Hymn to Christ the Saviour with which St. Clement of Alexandria closes his book of the Pædagogus. Full of the titles of our Lord, it also addresses Him as "Almighty Word," "Lord of all time and space," "Eternal Light," "Fountain of Mercy," "The God of peace." Portions of the "Te Deum" are likewise of primitive antiquity; and still more ancient, perhaps is the Evening Hymn "Hail, gladdening Light," quoted by St. Basil in his work on the Holy Spirit [Routh, Reliq. Sacr. iii. 515; Lyra Apostolica, No. 63; Basil, De Spir. Sanct. 73].

Such illustrations, taken from the early hymns of the Church, corroborate the contemporaneous testimony of many Christian writers. They are also indicative of the spirit in which the Trisagion, the Ter-Sanctus, and such like praise to the Three Persons of the Blessed Trinity were offered in the primitive Liturgies; and shew that Christ's Divine Nature was continually recognised in the services of the Church, and the glorified Jesus worshipped with the Father and the Holy Ghost. Although, moreover, it is an essential feature of the Eucharistic Office that it embodies an oblation to the First Person of the Holy Trinity, even in it the principle is distinctly recognised that the oblation cannot be made to one Person without being made to the Three in One. And, beyond the general principle which thus recognises the worship of Christ as One Person of the Blessed Trinity, there are also prayers addressed separately to Him in several of the Liturgies (as the "Agnus Dei" in the Gregorian), while in the Mozarabic, the ancient rite of Western Europe, they are found in great number [Liddon's Bampt. Lect. 583, note C, 1st ed.].

Thus the ancient Divine Service of the Church contained much in the form of praise or prayer, which was direct worship of our Lord Jesus Christ; and, as such, the fullest and most direct recognition of His Divine Nature. It need hardly be added that the modern Church Catholic, in all its three great branches, the Eastern, the Roman, and the Anglican, follows in the steps of former ages; worshipping Christ both by act and word on every occasion when Divine service is offered to God. In illustration of this, the author last referred to has shewn, by an analysis of the Book of Common Prayer, that the use of all the services contained in it involves the use of about three hundred prayers, or ascriptions of praise, to our Lord, there being forty-seven in the Litany alone, and sixteen in the Te Deum. An examination of the Latin and Greek Offices would doubtless shew an equally frequent devotional recognition of Christ's Divinity.

3] Corporate action of the Church against contrary opinions. Although the doctrine before us was practically denied in the Apostolic age—so that, according to St. Jerome, the Gospel of St. John was written against its deniers, the Ebionites and the Cerinthians,—yet it was not until two hundred years afterwards that the denial reached such a climax as to make a declaration like that of Nicæa necessary. Theodotus, Artemon, and Paul of Samosata, formed a line of heresy out of which Arius and his sect arose; yet it was the latter alone who spread the heresy so widely abroad that the local episcopate was found insufficient for its confutation and suppression. But the manner in which the Arian heresy was met by those representatives of the Church all over the world who assembled at the Council of Nicæa, shews how universally the Divinity of our Lord Jesus had been acknowledged: and the corporate action of the Church on that occasion was so complete and effective as to make the Council a court of appeal on the subject for all subsequent ages. [Arianism. Councils.] The history of that Council shews that a vast majority of the bishops present declared, unhesitatingly, from their experience and personal knowledge, that the Church had hitherto believed in the Divinity of Christ: and since that time no corporate action of the Church has ever taken up any ground contradictory to, or otherwise than confirming, that of Nicæa. So far as such evidence goes it is complete and irrefutable: the corporate action of the Church in condemning those who denied our Lord's Divinity is in itself aspect presented by the habits of Christians. A rough soldier has drawn a caricature of a man with an ass's head stretched upon a cross; and has placed underneath, the words ΑΛΕΞΑΜΕΝΟΣ ΣΕΒΕΤΕ [αι] ΘΕΟΝ, "Alexamenos adores his God." A full account of this, with a fac-simile, is given in Deux Monuments des Premiers Siècles de l'Eglise Expliqués, par le P. Raphael Garucci, Rome, 1862. Also in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature, vol. ix. pp. 25-43.

a proof that the doctrine has been continuously recognised and maintained.

[4.] Early uninspired statements of the doctrine. Having thus shewn that its continuous belief in the Church is evidenced by public acts and documents, we may go on now to see how the doctrine is exhibited in the Christian literature of those centuries which preceded its final and decided statement in the Nicene Creed.

St. Ignatius and Justin Martyr both wrote in the generation immediately following the close of the Canon of Holy Scripture; and both have left a few forcible and definite words respecting our Lord's Divinity. St. Ignatius writes to the Ephesian Church: "Our God, Jesus Christ, was, according to the appointment of God, conceived in the womb of Mary, of the seed of David, but by the Holy Ghost" [Ignat. ad Ephes. xviii.]. Elsewhere he writes to them to "stir themselves up by the blood of God" [Ibid. i.]; and to the Roman Christians, "Suffer me to be an imitator of the sufferings of my God" [ad Rom. vi.]. Justin Martyr is equally explicit: "They who affirm that the Son is the Father are proved neither to have been acquainted with the Father nor to know that the Father of the universe hath a Son; who also, being the First-begotten Word of God, is even God" [καί θεὸς ὑπάρχει. Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 63]. He also writes against Trypho that if the latter had known who it was that had been spoken of under various titles in the Old Testament, "if you had known what has been written by the prophets, you would not have denied that He was God, Son of the only unbegotten, unutterable God" [Ibid. ad Tryph. cxxvi.]. Also that Abraham saw "Him who was according to the will of the Father, His Son, being God, and the Angel because He ministered to that will" [Ibid. cxxvii.].

Irenæus, a generation later, devotes a chapter of his work against heresies to the proof that Christ was Very God: shewing that both the Old and the New Testament declare this truth. "I have shewn from the Scriptures," he writes, "that no one of the sons of Adam is as to everything, and absolutely, called God or named Lord. But that He is Himself in His own right, beyond all men who ever lived, God, and Lord, and King Eternal, and the Incarnate Word, proclaimed by all the prophets, the Apostles, and by the Spirit Himself, may be seen by all who have attained to even a small portion of the truth; . . . that He is the Holy Lord, the Wonderful, the Counseller, the Beautiful in appearance, and the Mighty God, coming on the clouds as the Judge of all men; all these things did the Scriptures prophesy of Him." [Irenæus adv. Hæres. III. 19, iii.] About the same time also, St. Clement and Tertullian were instructing the Churches of Alexandria and Carthage to the same effect. Clement writing of Christ as "God, the Saviour" [Strom. ii. 9], and Tertullian declaring that He "is God and Lord over all" [Tertul. adv. Jud. vii.], "a crucified God" [Ibid. adv. Marc. ii. 27], "God who was dead, and yet is alive for evermore" [Ibid. ii. 16]. Origen carries on the chain of evidence to the middle of the third century, teaching the Divinity of our Lord in many passages of his work against Celsus and in his commentaries, and teaching in a tone which may be judged of by a single expression "the God Jesus," Θεὸν Ἰησοῦν [Orig. contr. Cels. v. 51; vi. 66].

Such a chain of evidence might be much extended, a volume of authorities having been collected by Burton in his Testimony of the Ante-Nicene Fathers to the Divinity of our Lord; but the above selection is enough to shew the nature of such evidence as it comes down to us from the second and third centuries. From the time of St. Athanasius and the Nicene Council, the doctrine appears commonly in all Christian writings of a dogmatic character, being brought into greater prominence by the heresy of Arius, the expanded definition of the Creed, and the world-agitating contests between Catholics and Arians.

II. Inspired Statements. Throughout both the Old and New Testaments a very general indication of the Messiah's Divine Nature is afforded by the frequent use of the title "Lord," either by itself or as a prefix to His other designations. It has, indeed, been allowed by Hebrew writers that the Jews always expected the Messiah to be the Son of God, and the fact is sufficiently evident from the sayings of Nathanael [John i. 49], St. Peter [John vi. 69], Martha [John xi. 27], the high priest [Matt. xxvi. 63], and St. John [John xx. 31]. That this was considered to be a title specially implying Divinity (at least in the case of One claiming to be the Messiah) is shewn by the accusation of the Jews that He blasphemed, because He said "I am the Son of God" [John x. 36]; and by the fact that they attempted to stone Him for blasphemy in thus making Himself God [John x. 33]. Such an expectation, and the opinion so strongly indicated by the Jews of our Lord's time, shews the interpretation which was then put upon the prophecies that spoke of the Messiah; far outweighing the later opinions of Jews who found it necessary to oppose the application of such prophecies to Jesus, or the prejudiced criticism of others whose object is avowedly to prove that Jesus is not God.

Thus the general application of the title "Lord" to the Messiah in Old Testament or New Testament Scriptures, and also of the designation "Son of God," does in truth attribute to Him the essential nature of God. But there are particular cases in which the title is given to Him in its most sacred form, that of the incommunicable Name "Jehovah." In Isaiah we read, "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of Jehovah, make straight in the desert a highway for our God" [Isa. xl. 3]. This prediction is expressly declared in Matt. iii. 3 and John i. 23 to have been fulfilled by the ministry of John the Baptist: and the context of the original prophecy will shew how the description of Him who was to feed His flock like a shepherd is intermingled with the name of Jehovah, as well as how closely that description agrees with the character of Him who revealed Himself to be the Christ.

Other evidence of the same kind is afforded by the THEOPHANIES of the Old Testament, and by the revelations of the Blessed Trinity which flowed out of Divine knowledge, and out of existing (though otherwise unknown) facts. In such Theophanies and by such revelations God shewed Himself to a greater or less extent "as He is," and spoke of Himself, or inspired others to speak of Him, as He knows Himself to be. And although it may have been no part of His purpose by such revelations to make known at that period the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, yet He thus gave to the world some irradiations of the Divine Truth, and taught Christian times to look back upon them with the humble conviction, "In Thy Light shall we see light." Such a principle is emphatically illustrated by the manner in which St. John applies to Jesus the vision of Isaiah. The prophet "saw Jehovah sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up," and heard the seraphim singing, "Holy, holy, holy, is Jehovah, God of Hosts, the whole earth is full of His glory" [Isa. vi. 1, 3]; and of this vision, and of words which accompany the record of it, St. John unhesitatingly writes, under the influence of inspiration, that the prophet spake these things when he saw the glory of Jesus, and spake prophetically of Him. [John xii. 37-41.]

If these were the only instances in which the incommunicable Name was revealed as belonging to our Lord Jesus Christ, they would be conclusive evidence to a mind relying on revelation, and receiving revelation's interpretation of itself. But they are far from standing alone, and the evidence is cumulative even beyond what might be expected, as if to provide a testimony against future doubt and heresy. Four more examples of it may be given from the Old Testament: "Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion, for lo I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith Jehovah, . . . and thou shalt know that the Lord of Hosts hath sent Me unto thee" [Zech. ii. 10, 11]. "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, ... and this is His Name whereby He shall be called, Jehovah our Righteousness" [Jer. xxiii. 5, 6]. "And Jehovah said unto me, cast it unto the potter; a goodly price that I was priced at of them" [Zech. xi. 13]. "The Lord said, I will have mercy on the house of Judah, and will save them by Jehovah their God" [Hos. i. 6, 7]. Respecting the first of these passages Bishop Barrow makes a remark which applies to many such prophecies: "It being here said that Jehovah, being sent by Jehovah, should come and dwell in the Church. . . . Who can that be but our Lord Christ, who dwelt among us [John i. 14], and was by God the Father sent to us?" The fact that Messiah is named thus in the prophetic writings is indeed so plain that the primitive sect of PATRIPASSIANS alleged it in support of their denial that Jesus was God; and maintained that it was God the Father who became Incarnate and suffered upon the Cross. Modern heretics [UNITARIANISM] have imagined that the sacred Name is used in an inferior sense when applied to the Messiah to that in which it is used when applied to the Supreme God; but such a petitio principii needs only to be mentioned for its own confutation. Nor is it necessary here to shew that Old Testament prophecies which speak of the Messiah speak of Him, our Lord Jesus Christ, whom Christians acknowledge as such.

The inspired statements of our Lord's Divinity contained in the New Testament begin with the narrative of His Birth, and end only with the last page of the book of Revelation. The naming Him by the Name of Jesus is said to be a fulfilment of the prophecy of Isaiah, "they shall call His Name Immanuel" [Isa. vii. 14]; and the prophetic Name is interpreted by the Evangelist as "God with us" [Matt. i. 23]. In a similar manner St. John's theological Gospel opens with a statement respecting the WORD, whom he afterwards identifies with Jesus, that "In the beginning was the WORD, and the WORD was with God, and the WORD was God" [John i. 1, cf. 14]. Many acts of adoration are recorded of those who came to Jesus [Matt. ii. 11, viii. 2, ix. 18, xiv. 32, &c.], and whether these always involve a recognition of His Divinity by those who offered them or not, they certainly do so on the part of those who recorded them, and who well knew that such worship could only be offered, without idolatry, to God. St. Peter's confession of faith was an act of adoration that was both received, approved, and rewarded by Christ [Matt. xvi. 16]. St. Thomas called Him in plain and unrebuked words "My Lord and my God" [John xx. 28], and the offering to Him of Divine worship was the first thought of all when they met Him, on various occasions, after His Resurrection [Matt. xxviii. 9, 17; Luke xxiv. 52]; the acts and the words of those who knew Him best coinciding in a declaration of His Godhead.

When, moreover, the Apostles wrote for the instruction of the Church in doctrine and in Christian practice, they kept this primary truth in view even more clearly than when writing historically of Christ. When St. Paul reminds Gentile Christians that Christ came of the Jews, he adds, "Who is over all, God blessed for ever" [Rom. ix. 5]; when he writes to Timothy respecting the "mystery of godliness" his condensed statement of it is "God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory" [1 Tim. iii. 16]. To the Colossian Church he writes that in Christ "dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" [Coloss. ii. 9]; to the Philippians, that He was "in the Form of God" [Phil. ii. 6], who was also in the likeness of man,—"very God," as well as "very man;" to the Hebrews he interprets of Him their ancient words of praise, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever" [Heb. i. 8]; and when writing to Titus of his Lord's Second Advent, he calls it "the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" [Tit. ii. 13;

cf. 2 Pet. i. 1; Eph. v. 5; 2 Thess. i. 12; 1 Tim. v. 21; Jude 4, in origin.].

Lastly, in the opening of the Apocalypse [Rev. i. 8, 11], Christ names Himself by the Divine title "Alpha and Omega" [q. v.]; later on He is declared to have "on His vesture and on His thigh a Name written, King of kings and Lord of lords" [Rev. xix. 13, 16; cf. Deut. x. 17]; at the close of the vision He once more assumes the Divine title, "I am Alpha and Omega," adding "He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be His God, and he shall be My son" [Rev. xxi. 6, 7]; and in the first words of the last chapter He is identified in power and glory with the Father by the words "the throne of God and of the Lamb" [Rev. xxii. 1].

So do the Scriptures of the Old and the New Testaments bear a continuous testimony to the Eternal Godhead of our Lord Jesus Christ, a testimony written indeed by men, but inspired by God the Holy Ghost; giving to us by words of prophecy, history, and didactic epistle, a consentient unity of statement on the subject, which shews that it is the witness of an Eternal Truth.

III. The Acts and Words of our Lord Himself. From the continuous belief of the Church, the inspired testimony of the Apostolic founders of the Church, and the equally inspired predictions of the ancient prophets, we may ascend to the historic witness of Christ's own Life and Acts; illustrating that witness by the teaching of His words.

The general circumstances of our Saviour's Life do indeed go far to prove that alongside of His Human Nature, and ever interpenetrating it, there was a superior and Divine Nature on which that which was human may be said to have been engrafted. For however His Acts may have been typified and His Life foreshadowed by the acts and life of others, there were features in the Reality which found no place in the type and the shadow, which make it stand conspicuously above them and supremely alone in a glory of its own. Isaac, for example, was born in a manner out of accordance with the usual course of nature, as in some degree also was Samuel. But the parthenogenesis by which the Human Nature of Christ received its existence was, as it remains, of an entirely unparalleled character, its initial stage, at least, being such as the course of nature has never been known to accomplish, and distinctly supernatural. [Incarnation.]

The miracles of Christ, again, had their types in the miracles of Moses, Elijah, and others, but they were distinguishable from them by the exercise of an original volition of Divine power instead of a manifestly instrumental agency. The death of Christ was a human death, but it was accompanied by circumstances of a superhuman kind that set it infinitely above all other deaths, though not destroying its analogy with them. His Resurrection found a certain precedent in the resurrections of some in ancient days, and some among His contemporaries, but there was no such spontaneity in the return of others to life as there was in His Resurrection who needed no touch of prophet's bones, no lifting by the hand, no "Come forth," but only the operation of His own will.

It may indeed be gathered from Christ's own words that His miracles were intended to be evidence of inherent or Almighty Power; and, therefore, of His Divine Nature. For, early in His ministry, when John the Baptist sent messengers to Him, asking "Art Thou He that should come, or look we for another?" Jesus answered the question by the testimony of His miracles [Luke vii. 21, 22]. Now, miracles were no new thing to the Jews, nor were Jews unaccustomed to the view which regards them as the evidence of a Divine Mission. A simple appeal to miracles was not, therefore, in itself, sufficient to prove that Christ was "He that should come," One far above Moses, Elijah, and all their ancient prophets. When our Lord adduced them as evidence that He was the Messiah, He did so because their peculiar nature and aspect were such as to shew that He was the Incarnate God to whom Messianic prophecies pointed.

The message, therefore, which He sent to John [Luke vii. 22] was formed out of prophetic words that were doubtless familiar to their ears, in which the blessed works that He had done in their sight were recognised as the works of God present before them. "Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not; behold your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompence, He will come and save you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped: then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing; . . . an highway shall be there; . . . the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein" [Isa. xxxv. 4-8]. There were, probably, circumstances about our Lord's miracles which at once carried a conviction to unresisting minds that the Worker of them was Divine; and it is certain that even the slight record we have of them furnishes us with conclusive evidence to that effect. The contrast between the mode in which they were wrought, and that in which the miracles of the prophets had been wrought, has been already glanced at, but may be noticed in more detail. We may observe, then, that the latter were not accomplished by the will of those who wrought them, acting as an independent power of causation, but either in obedience to a direct command of God, as was the case with Moses and the plagues of Egypt, or with prayer, as in the healing of Naaman and the restoration to life of the Shunamite's son. They were also, for the most part, accompanied by the use of inanimate instruments, the rod of Moses, the mantle of Elijah, the staff of Elisha, the cruse of salt to sweeten the bitter waters, the floating wood to raise the sunken axe-head to the surface. Nor did the workers of these miracles ever claim the power which wrought them as their own; but with a "Stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which He will shew you to-day" [Exod. xiv. 13], or a "Where is the Lord God of Elijah?" [2 Kings ii. 14; cf. Acts iii. 6, ix. 34] they of the Old Dispensation said in one way that which was said still more directly by the Apostles of the New Dispensation, "Why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk" [Acts iii. 12]. The manner of our Lord in working miracles was totally different. He wrought in His own Name, not as a servant; by His own will, not as an agent; and almost always without the intervention of any substance or instrument external to His own Person. To Lazarus in the grave He said "Come forth;" to the ruler's daughter, "Talitha cumi;" to the widow's son, "I say unto thee, Arise;" to the leper, "I will, be thou clean;" to the evil spirit, "I charge thee, come out of him;" to the raging winds and waters, "Peace, be still." In nearly every instance it is the simple will and word by which the miracle is achieved. There is no appeal to any higher power, not even when words of prayer accompany the act; nor was there ever any sign of effort that could detract from the manifest evidence of Omnipotence. Nor is it to be overlooked that Christ wrought miracles for the manifestation of His own glory [John ii. 11]; that He used them for the purpose of proving that He exercised the prerogative of God [Mark ii. 10, 11]; and that He communicated to others at His will the power of working similar miracles to His own.

In the miraculous acts of our Lord, then, culminating in the raising of Lazarus and His own Resurrection, there is a great store of evidence out of which may be drawn proofs of a Divine Power belonging to a Divine Nature. Even the half-informed mind was made to confess that "no man could do such miracles, except God had sent him," and the fully informed logical mind must confess further that no man could do them at all, but only God.

To the evidence thus afforded by the acts of our Lord we must add that given by His words. So abundant is this, that, passing by a multitude of sayings in which He presented His own Person before His disciples and the world as far exceeding in dignity the most honoured and illustrious of their kings and prophets; passing by also those in which He presented His Person as the Way, the Truth, the Life, the Light, the very Fountain of Salvation to mankind, only those will be adduced in which He presents His Person as possessing the authority which belongs to God alone, and as being equal with the Father. It will be enough to quote these as they stand in the New Testament, without further comment or illustration: "Thy sins are forgiven thee" [Matt. ix. 2]. "All power is given unto Me in Heaven and in earth" [Matt. xxviii. 18]. "The Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath day" [Matt. xii. 6]. "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as My Father hath appointed unto Me" [Luke xxii. 29]. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work. Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because He not only had broken the Sabbath, but said also that God was His Father, making Himself equal with God" [John v. 17]. "I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of Myself, but He sent Me" [John viii. 42]. "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son; that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father. He that honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father which hath sent Him" [John v. 22-23]. "As the Father hath life in Himself, so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself, and hath given Him authority to exercise judgment also, because He is the Son of Man" [John v. 26, 27]. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham was, I am" [John viii. 58]. "He that hateth Me, hateth My Father also" [John xv. 23]. "Ye believe in God, believe also in Me" [John xiv. 1]. "I and My Father are one; . . the Father is in Me, and I in Him. . . . The Jews answered Him, saying, For a good work we stone Thee not, but for blasphemy; and because that Thou, being a man, makest Thyself God" [John x. 30, 38, 33; cf. xiv. 8-11]. "As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you. And when He had said this, He breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained" [John xx. 21, 23]. "And Thomas answered and said unto Him, My Lord and my God. Jesus saith unto Him, Thomas, because thou hast seen Me thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" [John xx. 28, 29]. Such are some of the direct and inferential declarations of our Lord Jesus Christ respecting His Divine Nature, Authority, and Power.

IV. Results of the Doctrine. Having sketched out the evidence by which the doctrine of Christ's Divinity is supported, it remains to shew what are some of the principal consequences which flow from the fact that Christ is Divine. These have been made evident, in some degree, by the course of Scriptural proof which has been followed, and may be further seen in the article Incarnation and other articles relating to our Lord's Person and Work. It will be sufficient in this place, therefore, to point them out in a few words.

1] Our Lord Jesus Christ being God is entitled to be the Object of Adoration. This no person can be who comes short of actual Deity, even the most extreme form of veneration for the Blessed Virgin never claiming to be adoration in this highest sense. [Latria. Hyperdulia.] But, it must be observed that Christ claims the adoration of men in His entire Personality as One Christ: for His Manhood is inseparably united to His Godhead, and adoration is offered not to an ideal abstraction, but to God Incarnate as He really is, the Man Christ Jesus and the Second Person in the Blessed Trinity.

2] The Divine Nature of Jesus exalts and intensifies all His acts as Saviour. Those acts may be generalized under the several heads of His Humiliation, His Sufferings and Death, His Resurrection, His Ascension to, and continuance in Heaven. Every one of these derives its efficacy from the fact that it is the act not only of One who was Man but of One who was also God. The humiliation of Christ as Man was great, yet its most conspicuous feature is that it comprehended unjust suffering. It would not be too much to say that from this point of view alone there have been several conspicuous instances of human humiliation which make a near approach to that of the Holy Jesus. The true fulness of His humiliation was, that being God He became Man; that He with whom it was no robbery to claim equality with God, yet took upon Him the form of a servant, and was found in the likeness of sinful man, from whom by His Original and Eternal Nature He was so infinitely distant. It was this which marked the depth of Christ's Sufferings and Death, and this which gave them their power. If they had not been the sufferings and death of One who was God as well as Man, they would not have been efficacious for the work of salvation; nor would His Resurrection, Ascension, and Session in Heaven have had their universal prevailing power if they had been those of a Man only, though that Man had still been the holiest of all saints. When God says through the prophet Zechariah, "they shall look on Me whom they have pierced" [Zech. xii. 10], He declared beforehand that great truth which His preachers afterwards proclaimed to the world, as they taught concerning the "blood of God" which was shed for us [Acts xx. 28], "the Lord of glory" who was crucified for us [1 Cor. ii. 8], and "the Lord who bought us" [2 Pet. ii. 1]. So also the continued work of Christ in His Church by means of Sacraments is efficacious because they are not only memorials of a human Saviour, but because they convey the grace of a Saviour who is Divine.

3] Christ being God is altogether perfect in Wisdom. If there was a time when some things were veiled from the Human Nature of our Lord [Ignorance of Christ], that deficiency of knowledge was prevented from becoming error by the union of the human with the Divine Nature. Whatsoever words He spoke they were words proceeding from infallible knowledge, and representing absolute Truth: and if for a moment, or for any portion of His earthly sojourning, a veil hung between His human nature and His Omniscience as God, it was but like the veil which during part of His Passion hung between that Human Nature and the Divine Presence, a supreme and exceptional token of His Infinite humiliation. For "in Christ are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" [Coloss. ii. 3]. This Omniscience and infallible Wisdom of Christ bears upon all His moral teaching, His confirmatory quotations of preceding Scriptures, His revelations of the unseen, His declarations respecting His own Person and Work, and the injunctions which He laid upon His Church. There can be no possibility of any error or misapprehension on His part as to either the past or the future, and whatsoever proceeded from His lips was the infallible truth, spoken by God.

4] The Divinity of Christ makes His authority absolute. Thus the commandments which He gave to His Church have the same force as those given at Sinai to Moses and the people of Israel. Whether they were of a moral kind such as those in the sermon on the Mount, or of a liturgical kind as in the ordaining of the Lord's Prayer and the Sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist, they are absolutely binding on Christians because they are the commands of God. There is no right of human limitation to such commands if Christ Himself has given no such right, and Christians who willfully disobey them are in the same position as those who wilfully disobey any of the Ten Commandments.

V. It may be said, in conclusion, that the Doctrine of Christ's Divinity is, in truth, the keystone of Christianity. Every shade of heresy or misbelief is, in a stronger or a weaker degree, an attack upon it. And, on the other hand, every step in the acknowledgment of it marks some progress towards that confession which is spoken of by St. John when he says, "Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in Him, and he in God" [1 John iv. 15]. The strength of God's Church, therefore, whether for defence against error, or for warfare against sin, depends ultimately upon the practical faith with which the Divinity of the Head of the Church is acknowledged and acted up to. If any particular age of the Church, or any particular portion of it, is, or has been, characterized by want of spiritual vigour, or by inability to withstand the progress of heresy and schism, it will be found that this weakness has been contemporary with an attenuated faith in this fundamental truth or in some of its consequences, or else in the clouding of the truth by the undue exaltation of some doctrine or practice which has practically become a rival to it. When, on the other hand, there has been a faithful and unlimited acknowledgment of Christ's Divinity in Creeds, and a practical acting up to that faith in Sacraments, then the words which met St. Peter's confession of it have found a revived application and force, "Upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of Hell shall not prevail against it." [Arianism. Circumincession. Consubstantial. Incarnation. Sabellianism. Socinianism. Word.]

DIVORCE. [Lat. divortium.] A legal dissolution of the bond of marriage. The formal union of the sexes is in many countries connected more or less closely with the religious observances of the people; and amongst Christian nations this connection is of so intimate a character as to give a peculiar solemnity and binding force to the marriage contract. The spiritual union effected by marriage is indeed held to be of an absolutely indissoluble nature, the Scriptural authority for that opinion being a passage in St. Matthew, in which it is believed to have been so declared by our Lord Himself [Matt. xix. 3]. When asked by the Pharisees, who had put the question for the purpose of tempting Him, whether it was "lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause," He replied by a reference to the original object of the institution [Gen. ii. 24], and added, "What therefore God hath joined together let not man put asunder." When they urged in reply the Mosaic permission to a husband to give his wife a bill of divorce for various causes, Christ replied in language which clearly shews that the laxity of the Levitical law in this respect was to be corrected under His dispensation. He continued, "And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery; and whoso marrieth her that is put away doth commit adultery" [Matt. xix. 9]. Here, if the interpretation of πορνεία, as meaning ante-nuptial, and not post-nuptial unchastity (μοιχεία), be the correct one,[1] the result is that divorce proper—that is a dissolution of marriage for causes arising subsequent to union, as distinguished from a declaration of its nullity ab initio from causes antecedent to union—is expressly forbidden.

The indissoluble character of marriage thus insisted on by our Lord has accordingly become a doctrine of the Catholic Church. Previously to the Reformation, the rite by which it was solemnized had been universally considered, for many centuries, to be a sacrament, and as such its effect could not be avoided by any subsequent proceedings, whether of an ecclesiastical or civil nature. The Church indeed, both before and after the Reformation, reserved the right of declaring marriage void ab initio for certain reasons. That is to say, in cases in which the contracting parties themselves were incapable from certain causes—such, for instance, as being within the forbidden degrees of affinity—from entering into a contract by the Canon Law, the Church treats the sacrament as never having been duly administered, and decrees nullity of marriage. But no misconduct of the parties subsequent to such a contract being lawfully entered into would have enabled either of them in pre-Reformation times to obtain a dissolution of marriage. The divorce a mensâ et thoro, as it was called, or in other words a judicial separation of the married persons during their lifetime, without power to either of them to contract a second marriage, was the only species of divorce recognised by ecclesiastical law.

At the Reformation, however, the secular courts began to set their faces against the sacramental view of marriage, and declared it to be merely a civil contract, requiring at law certain religious ceremonies for its valid ratification. The consequence naturally followed that larger powers of rescission of these contracts were immediately called for. By the Act of 35 Hen. VIII. c. 16, commissioners were appointed for the reformation of the Canon Law, and the result of their labours in the matter of divorce tended considerably to extend the license of contracting parties in this direction.[2] They allowed a divorce a vinculo in all cases where adultery had been committed on both sides. Desertion, cruelty, &c., were also adjudged to constitute alone sufficient grounds for a complete dissolution of marriage. These provisions never acquired legislative authority, but they may be referred to as shewing the mind of Cranmer and of the other Reformers on the subject of extending liberty of divorce.[3] It seems that from this period a laxity of doctrine as to the indissolubility of marriage ensued both in the ecclesiastical courts and in the Church itself, for the 107th of the Canons of 1604 contains an enactment prohibiting re-marriage with others to all parties separated by decree of the Church tribunals. And in Foljambe's case, decided in the Star Chamber, Eliz. 44, it was solemnly adjudged that adultery was a cause of divorce a mensâ et thoro only, and not a vinculo.

From this time downwards the history of the subject is the history of a conflict between the secular part of the Legislature and the Church, the former striving to extend and the latter to restrict the freedom of divorce. In the De Roos case, in the Countess of Macclesfield's case, and again in the Duke of Norfolk's case, the House of Lords, by special enactment, decreed the dissolution of marriages which the ecclesiastical courts refused to dissolve. This direct interference of the Legislature thus became the accepted, as indeed it was the only, method of obtaining such divorces as would enable the divorced parties to marry again; and in 1798 Lord Loughborough introduced a measure systematizing this circuitous method of procedure. It was necessary for parties petitioning for a divorce to shew that they had obtained a divorce a mensâ et thoro from the ecclesiastical courts, and to put in a copy of the proceedings for the examination of the House, and on this being done, and the inquiry proving satisfactory, a divorce a vinculo was enacted.

Such was the state of the law until the passing of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857. The contest between Church and State on the subject of divorce was then extinguished by removing from the Church tribunals their ancient jurisdiction in matrimonial causes. A judicial separation, by the order of the newly-established Court of Divorce, was substituted for the divorce a mensâ et thoro of the ecclesiastical courts, and a divorce a vinculo, giving both parties liberty to marry again, can by this enactment be obtained from this court without the intervention of the Legislature. The passing of the Act was strenuously but unsuccessfully opposed by many of the clergy and laity; and a concession to the consciences of the clergy was made in the 57th section by giving power to a clergyman to refuse to solemnize the marriage of a man or woman who may have been divorced under this act. With this reservation, Parliament may be supposed to have finally declared that Christian marriage is not to be treated as an indissoluble union by the secular law of England. [MARRIAGE. DEGREES, FORBIDDEN.]

DOCETÆ. The earliest form of the heresy of Gnosticism, which was a denial of the reality of

[1] See Bible Commentary (Patrick, Lowth, Arnauld, Whitby, and Lowman, and è contra Parkhurst, on word πορνεία, Alford, &c.

[2] See Reformatio legum Anglicanarum.

[3] Mackintosh, Hist. Eng. pp. 275, 276.

our Lord's human body—from τὸ δοκειν, to seem, whence also they were called Phantasiastæ and Phantasiodocetæ. The Docetæ are usually traced to Simon Magus as their founder, and were becoming numerous at the close of the first century, when St. John's Gospel was written. They were divided into two parties, one asserting that the body of Christ was only an illusion or phantom, and another that Christ had a real and tangible body, which was formed of a celestial substance[1]—that is, not a human body at all. Docetism, by denying the Incarnation, or our Lord's assumption of man's nature, was subversive of the fundamental teaching of the Gospel. Hence St. John's emphatic terms of condemnation, "Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God: and this is that spirit of Antichrist whereof ye have heard that it should come; and even now already is it in the world" [1 John iv. 3]. The Apostle also speaks, in allusion to the same heresy, of "seeing" and "handling" the Word of Life [1 John i. 1], and mentions the water and the blood flowing from Christ's body on the cross [John xix. 34, 35], which was a proof of the reality of His human nature. [DICT. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

DOGMA, [Δόγμα, Doctrina, Doctrine]. A theological principle. The term belongs strictly to a positive statement of doctrine derived immediately or by deduction from Divine Revelation, and enunciated by the Church through a General Council. In a looser sense it is applied also to the special tenets of particular churches, or even of sects, if put forth by an authority recognised by them.

Dogma presupposes substantial proof, which is generally, and in the ordinary sense, of an historical or logical kind: but it must be remembered that we have reached the highest possible kind of evidence as to truth when it is proved that any particular statement has come from God. There can be no real opposition between dogma and history, or dogma and logic, so long as these principles are kept in view; but it must be again remembered that there are some subjects in theology, especially such as relate to God Himself, which are beyond the province of history or logic, and the dogmata respecting which must depend wholly upon His revelation of truth. [MYSTERY.]

DOGMATIC THEOLOGY. [THEOLOGY.]

DONATISM. The name of a great schism in the African Church which lasted from the beginning of the fourth to the end of the fifth century. It arose out of those strict principles respecting TRADITORES which were maintained by a large party in the Church of Carthage, and owed their origin in no small degree to St. Cyprian. In the year A.D. 311, a vacancy occurred in the see of Carthage by the death of Mensurius, and after some contention the Archdeacon Cæcilian was elected, who was afterwards consecrated by Felix, Bishop of Aptunga. A party opposed Cæcilian and secured the assembly of Numidian bishops to the number of seventy at Carthage, who declared the consecration to be void, because Felix had been a traditor, a charge subsequently disproved. A rival bishop, Majorinus, was consecrated, who died about A.D. 315, and was succeeded by Donatus,[2] from whom the sect eventually took its name. The Donatists soon became a large body, spreading over a great part of Africa and extending to Europe. They held a synod in A.D. 330, which was attended by two hundred and seventy bishops, and at one time they are said to have had as many as four hundred bishops; but the prosperity of the sect varied very much at different times.

The particular principles on which the Donatists maintained the necessity of separation were [1] the admission by the Church of heretical baptism, and [2] the want of austerity among the orthodox: and they considered that there was no salvation out of their own community. But their austerity was more theoretical than practical, and numbers of them degenerated into heresy after the rise of the Arians. In A.D. 411, a conference between two hundred and seventy-nine Donatists and two hundred and eighty-six Catholic bishops was held at Carthage, a commissioner of the Emperor Honorius being present. When defeated in argument the Donatists appealed to the Emperor, from whom, however, they received no encouragement. Penal edicts were issued against them, and the sect began gradually to decline. The principal accounts of them are to be found in the works of St. Augustine and Optatus. [DICT. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

DOUBT is an intellectual tendency to deny a proposition resting upon a limited quantity of evidence, on the ground that the evidence is no greater; and it is always accompanied by an opposite intellectual tendency to affirm the same on the ground that the evidence is no less. Doubt is thus the complement of belief. If a thing is known or certain, the evidence or reason for it must be complete, and it is impossible to doubt it. If, on the contrary, there is no evidence for it, or none known to us, we know that it is false, or are ignorant that it is true, and it is impossible to believe it. If, thirdly, there is a limited amount of evidence,—much or little—short of that required for certainty, we believe the proposition, because there is evidence for it, but doubt it, because the amount of evidence forthcoming is insufficient to satisfy the demand made by the mind as a condition of its arriving at certainty. This demand varies infinitely in different individuals, and in different sets of individuals under different circumstances. Thus, the preaching of an angel from heaven would be, to the majority of mankind, conclusive evidence of the truth of a doctrine; but for Christians, St. Paul says, this is not sufficient evidence, unless the doctrine be identical with that already received [Gal. i. 8]. Or again, what is sufficient evidence to produce certainty in an uninstructed, may be

[1] Burton's Bampton Lectures, vi., and Ecclesiastical History, lect. xv.

[2] This was the second Donatus mixed up with this schism, and there were several others of the name. The first was bishop of Casa Nigra.

insufficient to assure an instructed person. But apart from this variety in the demand actually made for evidence, there is ideally a certain amount of evidence in every case which is sufficient, and which is always taken for granted as a standard of certainty, however opinions may vary as to what or how much it is. Doubt then, like belief, presupposes [a] that a proposition is no longer received in childlike simplicity without question. "Absit," says St. Augustine, "ut ideo credamus ne rationem accipiamus sive quæramus." [b] "Doubting necessarily implies some degree of evidence for that of which we doubt" [Butler, Anal. ii. 5]; and as Archbishop Leighton has it, "when there is a great deal of smoke and no clear flame, it argues much moisture in the matter; yet it witnesseth certainly that there is fire within. And therefore dubious questioning is much better evidence than that senseless dulness which most take for believing. Men that know nothing in sciences have no doubts. He never truly believed who was not first made sensible and convinced of unbelief." Conversely, belief, as the acceptance of a proposition upon evidence less than the amount required for certainty, postulates a margin of doubt ("Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief"), which exactly corresponds to the difference between the amount of evidence on which I believe a thing and the amount of evidence on which I should be certain of it.

In common parlance, when the evidence for a thing preponderates over that against it, when the area, so to speak, of our belief in it is more extensive than the area of our doubt about it, we say we believe it, and omit to make record of our doubts about it. Similarly, when our doubts about it preponderate over our belief in it, we say in common speech, that we doubt it, and take no account of our belief in it. And this is all the more the case when, as in most instances, either doubt or belief predominate out of all proportion to their opposites. But if we would describe the whole state of the mind in the consideration of incomplete evidence, we must regard it as a double (du-bito, δι-στάζειν, zwei-feln), and not a single state; we must say that we both believe and doubt a proposition which, upon the evidence, is at once probable and improbable.

Doubt does not necessarily imply a state of indifference or suspension of judgment. On the contrary, this is only the case in those very few instances in which the evidence for and against a proposition is exactly equal, and our belief in and doubt about its truth are equal also.

Neither does doubt involve disbelief, except in the same sense as it involves belief; for disbelief is itself a kind of belief, the belief, namely, that a particular proposition is not true.

Belief, then, whether affirming or denying, is a positive, but it is a limited and imperfect, state of mind, as compared with faith and knowledge. And the limit or imperfection of belief, whether large or small, is doubt.

Apparent states of belief which exclude doubt. When the evidence for the truth of a proposition is complete, we are not said to believe it any longer, but to know it. And this is equally the case whether the evidence consist of an enumeration of the reasons, or rest upon the authority of an absolutely veracious person. The distinction, in truth, between believing in a fact and believing in a person will not bear close examination. When I believe in a fact, I assent to the proposition, expressing that the fact is real and is of a particular kind,—as true, on the strength of what appear to me to be adequate reasons; when I believe in a person, I assent to the proposition, expressing the fact that the person in question is trustworthy,—as true, on the strength of evidence, as in the former case. His trustworthiness thus ascertained, then becomes itself the evidence for the proposition for which he vouches.

But there are several other cases in which the words "implicit" and "steadfast" are applied to belief to signify the exclusion of doubt: [a] A belief is implicit or implied when it is not explicit or explained, i.e., when there is no reason or explanation "why I believe" to be given, but "that I believe" is taken for granted both by myself and others. This, just like implicit obedience, is the normal condition of the child, and the actual condition of the vast majority of the human race, in whom the mind is in a state of mere passive receptivity in relation to truth, and who are therefore not yet able to ask themselves "why they believe." [b] Belief is "steadfast" when the exclusion of doubt is not so much the result of natural conditions as of voluntary effort. "Steadfast" means, first, "permanent," or "unwavering," and, secondly, that this permanence is the work of the will, bringing the mind consciously under the sway of habit. Steadfast belief, then, supposes the emergence of doubt, and its intentional and habitual exclusion; not only the state of mind which says "I believe," but that which, after experience of the double condition of belief and doubt, says, "I will believe," "I mean to believe," and consciously forms the permanent habit or state of believing. [c] The result of this process is again a state of implicit belief, which resembles [a] in excluding any explanation or reason for believing, but differs from it in being not merely receptive but mechanical. The child is not yet—the habitual believer no longer—able to ask "why he believes;" because the attention of the child is not yet—that of the habitual believer no longer—attracted to the fact that he does believe.

To sum up: doubt can only be excluded from belief, either when the evidence for the truth of a proposition is complete, in which case belief itself vanishes in knowledge; or, as in the three cases last mentioned, by the interposition of some determinant external to the mental process of believing, as such, and due either [a] to natural condition, or [b] to voluntary effort, or [c] to the force of habit. In the first case, the completeness of the evidence, while it excludes doubt, excludes belief also; in the last three, the intervention of alien causes excludes, along with doubt, the conscious repose of belief upon evidence at all.

From this it follows that belief, if it rest upon any evidence whatever, must rest upon evidence that is not entirely complete; and, as itself (apart from the operation upon it of external causes) essentially an imperfect assent, it postulates the co-existence of doubt, as its limit.

Supposed states of doubt which exclude belief. The attempt to make doubt absolute and thorough-going is still more illogical than the exclusion of doubt from the condition of belief. If doubt be the imperfection of belief, it postulates the existence of that of which it is the imperfection; if it be the consciousness of the incompleteness of evidence, it supposes the existence of the evidence which is thus incomplete. It is the recognition of this limit to doubt which distinguishes rational doubt from scepticism. "We doubt," says Descartes, "in order to obtain a ground of absolute certitude." More correctly, we traverse the region of doubt in order to arrive at the belief which is its limit. The ancient followers of Pyrrho, however, in setting up doubt as an ultimate and final principle in thought, asserted that there was nothing on which the instructed intellect should allow itself to frame a definite judgment. Such a principle, were it possible to carry it out to its legitimate conclusions, puts an end to all action, as to all thought, and is as subversive of society as it is of religion and philosophy. The consistent Pyrrhonist has no right to eat or drink; if his house is on fire, there is no reason why he should attempt to escape. Why? Because, such an action presupposes a series of previous judgments, "I am in danger," "It is well to escape," "To escape, I must flee," &c., none of which he has any rational ground for framing. Fortunately, human instinct is better than philosophy in this case, and corrects the extravagance of theory. Fortunately, also, the theory itself, if thought out, annihilates itself. When the Pyrrhonist has doubted the reality of the world and of thought, he at length arrives at a point at which he has the choice of either doubting whether or no he doubts, in which case doubt itself vanishes, or of being sure that he doubts, in which case he has found a limit to his doubt in a definite belief. It was at such an impassable limit that Descartes arrived, and from which the whole of modern philosophy has been evolved. [See Descartes, Œuvres, tom. iii. pp. 63-68, ed. Cousin; and the French Encyclopédie of 1751, s. v. Doute.]

Doubt, then, and belief are the negative and positive poles of the same mental condition, a condition characteristic of the imperfection of human knowledge. They spring out of the same root, viz., the awakening of the mind to the necessity of basing belief on evidence.

The origin of doubt, like that of belief, is in the individual mind. Men never doubt in crowds, nor do communities ever believe on evidence. If we examine the early history of every nation, we find it generating unconsciously an organized system of common ideas, which, like its language or its polity, correspond to its collective character, and from which all marks of individual workmanship are absent. Religion and worship in primitive peoples are always of this gregarious kind, and it was through the medium of this collective consciousness that the Jews came into contact with the Divine revelation. God speaks through His Prophets, but He speaks to Israel at large; and conversely, it is not as a series of individuals, but as a people, that the Hebrews accept the Divine message, and are conscious of being collectively the subjects of the Divine favour [2 Chron. xxx. 12; Jer. xxxii. 39, &c.]. So in the Apostolic Church, the "multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul," and this absence of all individual and private feeling finds its natural expression in community of goods. In all these cases doubt is impossible, because there is no detachment of the individual from the general life of the community. Similarly, the "belief" of this early time is not what is here called belief, i.e. intellectual assent upon evidence, but an immediate apprehension of Christ, as a person, by the "heart," i.e. the whole being of the "believer." [Heart.] So too our Lord Himself discouraged the seeking for signs, and commonly declined to constrain intellectual belief by the evidence of miracles. To St. Thomas alone, who had detached himself for the moment from the common consciousness of the first disciples, and therefore was in the real position of an intellectual doubter, is vouchsafed the evidence requisite for producing individual and intellectual belief. Accordingly, doubt seems to have arisen more generally in the Church, when the original "unity of heart" was broken up by divisions and heresies, when Christianity had become matter of discussion, when "apologies" had begun to be written to produce belief on evidence, and when the saints, no longer finding rest in society, retired into the desert and the cloister. Doubt is thus to the organized authority of common opinion what the monastic impulse is to the organized authority of society, viz., a revolt of the individual from the intellectual and moral world in which he lives. This characteristic is noticeable in the more prominent instances of doubt which are on record. The late Mr. Robertson speaks of the "utter loneliness of spirit," the dreariness and cheerlessness of his life, while in doubt. The same is true of Abélard, who, perhaps more than any other, forms a solitary figure in the Middle Ages; and of Montaigne in his lonely tower at St. Michel.

The causes which lead the individual so to detach himself from the ordinary mental life around him and to demand evidence for the truth of received ideas, lie partly in the educational effect of those ideas themselves, and partly in the fact that they have worked themselves out and are giving place to a higher development. Plato has described this process under the image of a foster-child, who, after being carefully trained by his reputed parents, at length attains sufficient intelligence to discover that those whom he has hitherto regarded as his parents are not really so; and is led by the discovery to question every thing that he has been taught, to break away from all the influences of his youth, and to regard all moral distinctions as merely conventional. In this state of uncertainty he falls into the hands of flatterers and sophists and becomes a lawless and disputatious person [de Republicâ, p. 538]. Meanwhile the foster-parents are given up for the real parents. The impulse to demand the reason for traditionary ideas, the formation and emancipation of the individual mind, the capacity of doubt and belief, are the last results of the operation upon man of those common ideas and institutions of which he is the half-unconscious author. Their very pressure calls forth the resistance which is the germ of self-consciousness. Man becomes aware of himself as the source of ideas and of institutions, and of his indefeasible right, as a free being, against all that is established. The very reasonableness of tradition and custom have developed in him the faculty of seeking the reasons for them in himself. And the more reason he sees for the traditional and the customary, the less authority have they over him, for he perceives that he is himself, in the last resort, the author of both. The emergence in society of the self-conscious individual is, if we regard it from one side alone, a principle of anarchy; but regarded from the other side, the free activity which is thus called into being is itself a principle of reconstruction. The demand for reason and evidence, while it reveals the insufficiency of what has been hitherto unquestioned, discloses also the quantum of reasonableness without which it could never have been accepted at all. In referring all things to himself the individual refers them not only to a solvent but to an active principle. What he has made before he can again make. The insufficiency of that which he criticizes he discovers to be the result of the insufficiency in himself, its author. And conversely, the sufficiency of himself as the standard of ideas and institutions is the result of the action upon him of that which he criticizes. While he doubts therefore he also believes. As the "measure of all things" he creates a new order of thoughts and customs by which he will himself be judged.

The detachment of the doubter from the common consciousness in which all men live is thus the natural way in which ideas and societies correct themselves. If they were wholly adequate at any given time, they could not be criticized; if they were wholly inadequate, they could not have educated their critic. Doubt, therefore, as the characteristic of the individual mind, is at once destructive and constructive, and as the mean term between an old and a new order is essentially transitional. As transitional it partakes both of the old and the new, and finds its true complement in belief.

The history of the principal periods of doubt further confirms this view. They have all ushered in new developments in religion and philosophy. The period of the Sophists in ancient Greece represents the break-down of the old Polytheism, and introduces the spiritual Monotheism of Anaxagoras and Plato. The sceptical Epicurism of the Sadducees in Israel represents the break down of that "tradition" by which the "Word of God" had been made "of none effect." What the natural reconstruction might have been, we are left in great measure to conjecture, inasmuch as it was guided, dominated, and ultimately absorbed by, the new supernatural principle of Christianity. After the beginning of the second Christian century, the rise of patristic or argumentative, as distinguished from simply or mainly religious Christianity, points to a period of questioning which called forth the Apology of Justin Martyr, and the Stromata of Clement of Alexandria. It is characteristic of this period that Clement places the intellectual understanding of revelation (ἐπιστήμη) as the mean term between πίστις in which doubt has not yet arisen, and γνῶσις in which it has vanished in conscious certainty. A little later, the speculations of Origen and the growth of the Arian heresy indicate the continued prevalence of doubt, and the demand for reasons and evidence. In the twelfth century, again, the Sic et Non of Abélard indicates the transition from the patristic to the scholastic or metaphysical period of Christian thought. This work, the text of which was discovered and published for the first time by the late M. Cousin, is a discussion of the difficulties arising from Scripture and the writings of the Fathers, and a juxtaposition of the reasons for and against all the main truths of religion. The general point of view is thus stated: "Hæc quippe prima sapientiæ clavis definitur, assidue scilicet seu frequens interrogatio. Dubitando enim ad inquisitionem enimus; inquirendo veritatem percipimus" [Cousin's Fragm. de Philosophie, vol. ii. p. 220-234]. This book introduces the method of Enstasis and Solution characteristic of scholastic divinity, and which is seen in its perfection in the Summa of St. Thomas Aquinas. The doubt, once more, of the seventeenth century, as represented by Lord Bacon, Descartes, and Spinoza, is consciously entertained as a solvent of the scholastic modes of thought, and as, what it has proved to be, the germ of the whole modern intellectual movement [Bacon, N. O. passim; Descartes, l. c.; Spinoza, Princ. Phil. Cartes, Op. ed. Bruder, vol. i. 22-28]. Protestantism too, the contemporary religious development, as the assertion of the right of private judgment, is essentially a principle of doubt; and while undermining the dogmas of the later Middle Ages, has in our own times shewn unmistakeable signs of a tendency to destroy itself. For the mere private judgment of one person has no interest for any other; and its maintenance is subversive both of truth and society; whilst, on the other hand, by becoming illuminated and instructed, judgment ceases to be private, and becomes common.

The last and most thoroughgoing instance of philosophical scepticism which the world has seen, that of Hume and Kant, illustrates the same law. Whilst annihilating the English sensational school of Locke and Berkeley, on the one hand, it is the foundation, on the other, of the vast structure of modern German thought. Doubt is thus, like revolution, an anarchical principle; and its justification, like that of revolution, is its success, i.e. its capability of reconstructing the traditional and customary on a securer basis, "ex fumo dare lucem."

The consciousness of doubt in particular cases may arise from a variety of causes. [a] In the majority of minds which have arrived at the stage of demanding evidence for belief, although in reality they both believe and doubt, yet the attention is almost exclusively concentrated upon the fact that they believe. Belief is sustained by the influence of the unquestioning certainty of the world at large, by being more comfortable than doubt, and by the habit of continually asserting or assuming belief in ordinary life. Belief is thus artificially extended, and doubt narrowed almost to a vanishing point. It is most natural to forget that our belief is imperfect, as it is equally so to forget that our actions are imperfect. Belief being not only preponderant, but active, doubt becomes obscured. If, then, anything occurs to awaken examination of the grounds of belief, this residuum of doubt is brought to light, and doubt is likely to become active for a time, without being in reality different in amount, or in proportion to belief, from what it was before. These are cases in which belief is said to be "shaken," and the occasion seeming, and indeed being, inadequate to alter the relation of the mind to the evidence, moral perversion is taken for granted, or the inspiration of the Evil One, to account for the emergence of doubt. Whereas the fact is, that a latent condition of consciousness has been excited into activity, and while the excitement lasts,—which is not unfrequently prolonged and aggravated by the surprise of the doubter at the existence of doubt in his mind, by the protestation of friends, the social ostracism, the embarrassment of active duty, the misunderstandings and misstatements of enemies, or, again, by the encouragements of disbelievers, and the clamour on all sides for the supposed doubter to commit himself to definite statements,—the discovery of doubt loosens the moorings and throws an atmosphere of uncertainty over all beliefs. Doubt propagates itself, just as belief had done before, and belief diminishes, for the time, to a vanishing point. It is in cases like this that the advice is good to change the sphere of life and engage in active occupation, in order to allow the mind to settle down again.

[b] But the mind may become conscious of doubt, i.e. of the imperfection of belief, by an accession of evidence on the negative side of the scale, or by the discovery that a portion of the evidence on the positive side breaks down. Here again the area of doubt may be artificially extended by the novelty of the discovery and consequent exaggeration of its importance, by the self-congratulation of the doubter at his own acuteness in making it, &c., so as to encroach farther upon the area of belief than is actually warranted by the new evidence. On this kind of doubt the following passage of St. Augustine is valuable: "Dubitationem tuam non invitus accipio; significat enim animum minimè temerarium, quæ custodia tranquillitatis est maxima. Nam difficillimum est omninò non perturbari, cum ea quæ pronâ et proclivâ approbatione tenebamus contrariis disputationibus labefactantur, et quasi extorquentur e manibus. Quare ut æquum est bene consideratis perspectisque rationibus cedere, ita incognita pro cognitis habere periculosum. Metus enim est ne cum sæpe subruuntur quæ firmissimè statura et mensura præsumimus, in tantum odium vel timorem rationis incidamus, ut ne ipsi quidem perspicuæ veritati fides habenda videatur." [De Magistro, 31 AB. Bened, ed. vol. i. p. 558.] "The best way never to be a sceptic," says Meric Casaubon, speaking of the same state of mind, "is not to be too quick of belief, and to doubt of many things" [Credulity and Incredulity, p. 155]. The opposite and more insidious temptation is for the doubter to tamper with his mind, to endeavour to forget the new evidence, to disregard the law of intellectual honesty, and habituate himself to the profession of beliefs for the sake of their comfortableness or utility, until at length he forms a new habit of believing a thing to be true, even in the teeth of a preponderance of evidence to the contrary. The best remedy against either temptation, and against the continuance of this kind of doubt, is careful, impartial, and methodized inquiry. It is by method that a man arises out of the individual isolation of doubt, and comes into contact with the common thought of all time.

[c] Lastly, doubt may emerge into consciousness owing to the natural inclination of particular temperaments, just as many are inclined to believe simply because they shrink from the trouble of investigating evidence. Others take refuge in alleged uncertainty of evidence because they are afraid of pursuing a subject to unwelcome conclusions [see Eclipse of Faith]. The remedies for doubt of this order will be the same as those for indolence in the one case, and for timidity in the other.

Relation of doubt to action. Doubt is too often the paralysis of action; and commonly the necessity of action may induce a forcible suppression of doubt which leaves, for ever, a scar upon the character. Of this difficulty Bishop Jeremy Taylor gives the following solution. In the case of the unlearned, whose assurance may be destroyed by arguments which they cannot answer, he advises that "they stick to their conclusions, in despite of all objections, by a certainty of adhesion." But if the learned "be made to doubt in the understanding by the opposition of an adversary, they are not instantly to change their practice, but inquire further. . . . In these cases the practice is made sure by a collateral light, and the 'doubter' is defended from change by reputation and custom, by fear of scandal and the tie of laws, and by many other indirect instruments of determination; which although they cannot outwit the contrary arguments, yet they ought to outweigh the doubt and guide the will and rule the conscience in such cases. There is nothing but a weak man may doubt of, but if he be well, he must not change his foot, till it be made certain to him that he is deceived: let him consider what he please, and determine at leisure: let him be swift to hear but slow to speak, and slower yet in declaring by his action and changed course that his doubt hath prevailed upon him. . . . If the speculative doubting conscience should always prevail in practice, the ignorant might be abused and miserable in all things and the learned in most" [Ductor Dubitantium, p. 184, sqq.]. In the analogous forensic case of possession upon a title discovered to be uncertain, Taylor quotes the authority of all the principal jurists for his solution, that "whatsoever hath the first advantage of just and reasonable is always to be so presumed till the contrary be proved: a doubt therefore may make a man unquiet and tie him to inquire, but cannot interrupt possession . . . because possession is stronger than doubt, though it cannot prevail against demonstration" [Ib. l. c.; see the question discussed at the end of Strauss's Life of Jesus, Eng. tr., and in Browning's Bishop Blougram's Apology]. Robertson writes that he "never allowed his bewilderment to tell upon his conduct" [see his Life and Letters by Stopford Brooke, vol. i. p. 111-113], although he not only at one time doubted everything except that "it must be right to do right," but even speaks of the misery of a suspicion that even moral goodness and beauty was a dream. His temptations and doubts he sought to solve by working amongst the poor, by putting his aspirations into practice, and in keen sympathy with the sufferings of the masses. He adds [p. 203] that all questioning and doubt left him as he drew near the close of his career.

The relation of doubt to faith is a particular case of the relation of the individual to that spiritual community of which he forms a part. And this may be described as a relation, first, of opposition; secondly, of expansion; finally, of reunion; corresponding in the moral sphere to selfishness, rational self-love, and self-sacrifice, respectively. Faith is, as is knowledge, always of the True Object. But in us, who are in process of development, the true object may wear the appearance of the false. Still the true object is there as the condition of believing at all: we throw our own shadow upon it, by doubt which is the imperfection of belief. If there were no light and no object, we could not throw our shadow [cf. 2 Tim. ii. 13]. We see the truth "enigmatically and in a glass," as we see the sun through the medium of the window and the atmosphere; and this truth is our union, in Christ, with God. This is the true object of faith, and at the same time the reality and substance of faith itself. But in describing it, we obscure that which we would explain, because the oppositions of speech involve distinctions which are distinctly negative of that which they are meant to express. Faith is a relation, and in thinking of it we cannot but regard it from our side of the relation: we are compelled to think of ourselves as first; whereas in reality God is first, and we in Him. It is this inability of faith to take a true view of itself, which brings it down into the sphere of opinion, and into contact with the divided regions of belief and doubt, which are incidents of the individual life in its state of limitation and growth. And, conversely, it is only by a kind of mental self-denial that we can rise above the region of opinions, misgivings and prejudices, of the contradictions of thought and feeling, and of the opposition of moral and intellectual, which is the province of doubt, and from which we can only describe the truth amiss, and in terms, which, so soon as used, require correction. [Faith. On the distinction of "common faith" i.e. belief on evidence, and "true faith," i.e. a supernatural state of the soul, see Perkin's Exposition of the Creed, works, vol. i. p. 126, fol. 1608; on doubt as a preliminary to knowledge, see Hamilton's Lectures on Metaphysics, vol. i. p. 90, follg.; cf. also on the general subject, Carlyle's Sartor Resartus, bk. ii. 7-9, and Clough's Dipsychus.]

DOXOLOGY. [Gloria in Excelsis. Gloria Patri. Embolismus.]

DULIA [δουλεία]. A term used in Roman theology to designate the reverence due to any worthy creature of God, as distinguished from the Latria or Adoration which is due to God alone. It is used principally with reference to Angels and Saints. [Latria. Hyperdulia. Worship. Saints. Angels.]

DUALISM, the assumption of a contrariety, original, fundamental and ultimate, between the spiritual and material, whether regarded under the general form of God and the universe (theological or cosmological) or under the two special cases of soul and body (psychological) or good and evil (ethical).

I. Historical. Some form of theological or cosmological Dualism characterizes more or less all the varieties of natural religion amongst the Indo-Germanic family of nations. Amongst the nobler races, the Indian, the Greek, and the German, it is so subdued as to be scarcely discernible; amongst the rest, the Persian, Sclavonic, &c., it rises into greater distinctness, but manifests an inability to maintain itself. Thoroughgoing Dualism appears for the first time in Greek philosophy (Anaxagoras, Plato); and it is from a fusion of this with the Persian Zoroastrianism that some, or, perhaps indirectly, all the Dualistic heresies—the Gnostic, Manichæan, Priscillianist, Paulician, Catharist, Albigensian, &c.—have arisen within the Christian Church. In more modern times, the Cartesian, and a section of the Kantian school, have lapsed into a dualism which formed the philosophical basis of the Deism of the eighteenth century. We proceed to consider these in their order:—

[a] The religious dualism of the German and Norse races is traceable to a kind of rude classification of the useful or beneficent, and the hurtful or destructive, influences of the north European climate and scenery. Warmth, light, summer, are personified as gods; frost, storm, darkness, precipitous rocks, &c., as giants. And the course of nature, with the alternation of day and night, heat and cold, &c., thus came to be regarded as a continual and fluctuating conflict between powers which are the friends, with those which are the enemies, of man. When the lightning rends the rocks, Thor is splitting the skull of a giant. The relegation of the beneficent powers to a place in the upper air, whilst the malevolent remained upon the earth, gave rise to the idea of two separate kingdoms of good and evil spirits.

On this form of Dualism we may remark [1] that it is not properly a Dualism between God and the universe, but an opposition of contrary forces within nature itself; [2] that its maintenance is relative to the cultivation of man, and his ability to use, or at least adjust himself to, surrounding circumstances. Hence [3] in the happier climate of the Mediterranean Sea, and amid the more refined and intelligent population of Greece, we find the opposition of good and evil spirits much less strongly marked: and whilst the Dualism of earth and heaven appears in the battles of the Titans with the gods, in the myths of Prometheus, Zeus appears as the evil being, and Prometheus as the suffering benefactor of man. Similarly among the Germans, the two sides of the Dualism tend to merge and interchange. The same being has two aspects. Summer, e.g. so far as it is balmy and mild, is a god; as scorching and destructive, a giant. The giants are conquered by the gods, and then taken up into heaven. Gods and giants intermarry, and their offspring becomes a mean term of reconciliation.

Another kind of Dualism, more ethical than cosmological, also arose out of the difference between the warrior class and the rest of the community. Of these, the former, and all who die a violent death, go to Walhalla, whilst those who die by natural causes, go to Hel. This elementary idea of good and evil, reflecting the necessities of an age of violence, may be compared with the Homeric conception of goodness as physical pre-eminence. Here, too, the Dualism is erased as incipient civilization produces an intermediate class, who being neither warriors nor cowards, go after death to the Nebelhel, intermediate between Hel and Walhalla. [Waehter's article on Dualismus in Erseh. u. Gruber's Allgem. Encycl. and Grimm's Deutsche Mythologie, vol. ii. p. 936, sqq.]

[b] The Slavonic and Persian Dualistic ideas appear to have arisen from the super-position of the gods of a conquering upon those of a conquered race. The opposition of Perun and Wolos (Russia) and of Jasen and Quaehiz (Bohemia), or more generally of the black and white gods, Bjelbog and Czernibog, the magicians and councillors, seems to have been partly or wholly traceable to conquest. [v. ll. cc.] According to some, too, the German domestic deities, Kobolds, Poltergeister, &c., were changed from good to bad by the introduction of Christianity. "An die Stelle einer durchgötterten Natur trat eine durchteufelte." [Zur. Gesch. der Religion u. Philosophie in Deutschland, von. H. Heine. Wke. iii. p. 128.]

More definite results, however, have lately been obtained by the researches of Martin Haug into the nature and origin of the Persian Dualism. The general conclusion of his Essays on the sacred language, writings and religion of the Parsees [Poona 1862], is that there are five periods in the history of Persian Dualism:—

1. The period before Zoroaster, i.e. before circ. 1200 B.C. At the beginning of this period, the Iranian and Bramanic race lived together in the Punjab, partaking in the same Vedic worship of the powers of nature, and the same pastoral life [p. 225] with very slight admixture of agriculture [p. 249]. At a certain time the Iranian stock migrated northwards to the Baetrian highlands, where they settled down to the agricultural life, and became for many years the victims of continual inroads from the still nomadic Bramans. This opposition of the two races developed an opposition of religion: the Devas, the gods of the Bramans, became the devils and inferior spirits of the Iranians, while the Ahuras, the enemies of the Devas, became the gods of the Iranians [p. 225]. So far, we have merely the natural Dualism of the Punjab shepherds turned upside down. But the Ahura polytheism was gradually merged in the worship of one Supreme Being (Ahura-mazdao or Or-muzd), which made agriculture a religious duty, and stood in conscious negation of both the polytheism and pastoral life of the Deva-worshippers [pp. 250-253]. At this point came

2. The Reform of Zoroaster, who defined and established the monotheistic cultus of Or-muzd, and expelled polytheism. So far from being the founder of Persian Dualism, Zoroaster's reform is essentially monotheistic, by the extrusion of one term of the opposition [p. 255]. In the Gâthas or fragments attributed to Zoroaster himself, monotheism is said to arise from a primeval cause, called "existence," polytheism from "non-existence;" the material world to be due to the operation of "twin spirits," good and evil, "the one creating the real, the other the unreal" [pp. 141-3]. Here the form of Dualism is retained, but one term expressly declared to be unreal. Similarly the "good mind" and the "naught mind" are creations of Ormuzd, and in him "is the last cause of both" [p. 159].

In his theory of knowledge and psychology, however, Zoroaster maintains a thoroughgoing Dualism, by opposing "the original wisdom" which comes from heaven (intuition) to the "wisdom perceived by the ear" (experience). Contrariwise, the body is called "the prior life," the mind "the second life." Both these, however, are indistinct, and their meaning unexplained [p. 264-5]. Throughout the Gâtha fragments there is no doctrine of a separate spirit of evil. Although soon after Zoroaster's death a

3. Relapse into Dualism seems to have taken place, as the later Vendidad [circ. B.C. 400] attributes that doctrine to the early Zoroastrians [p. 257]. And in the Yasna, the second Scripture of the Parsees [circ. B.C. 800], the good and the naught mind become identified with the natural opposition of the beneficent and hurtful powers of nature, light, day, and night, noxious weeds,

Dualism

&c., respectively [p. 258]. On the other hand Ormuzd speaks of the two spirits as "my two spirits" [p. 224], so that even here the Dualism is not original or ultimate.

In the Vendidad [= "book against the Devas"] the dates of the different parts of which vary, according to Haug, between 1200 and 400 B.C., the old pre-Zoroastrian opposition reappears; and the special enmity of the Devas to agriculture takes the place of the general malevolence of the "naught mind" [p. 226]. Agreeably to this the Supreme Being becomes identified with one of the two spirits, each being surrounded by a council of six [p. 259]. This brings us back to the original opposition of the Ahura and Deva polytheisms.

4. Two attempts to eliminate this Dualism are found in the Yashts [450-350 B.C.], which represent the degeneracy of the Parsee religion, and its contact with Buddhism. The first introduces between the extreme terms an angelic mediator between God and man, who as the impersonation of tradition represents the approach of God to man, and as the impersonation of rites and sacrifices, the approach of man to God. He is the judge of the world at the last day [p. 262]. The second is an attempt to restore the purity of monotheism by the idea of "boundless time," which is not originally, as some have supposed, a higher Supreme Being from whom Ormuzd and Ahriman (the naught mind) spring, but a predicate of the former [p. 264]. Thus in the Vendidad, Ormuzd is said to make certain things "in the boundless time" [p. 215]. This notion is hypostatized by the modern fire-priests as the one God, and this interpretation reaches back to the fifth century B.C. [p. 264]. From this notion of time, it has been inferred that Zoroaster was an Atheist, and as such he is placed in Maréchal's Dictionnaire des Athées [1800], who interprets the passage: "Dieu a été créé par le temps avec le reste des astres." How the later Zoroastrians worked out the idea is not apparent.

5. Dualism reappears in the Bundehesh [A.D. 400], but it is regarded as an heretical view of the Zendiks or private judgment interpreters. It was probably this aspect of Zoroastrianism which propagated itself through Manichæism into the Christian Church.

Persian Dualism is thus, in its origin, an inversion of the natural Dualism of the beneficent and destructive forces in Nature, modified by the antagonism of two kindred races, one of which developed more rapidly than the other. It may be therefore attributed rather to the influence of historical circumstances than to any peculiar tendency in the Persian mind. Indeed, the latter was manifested both in the reform of Zoroaster and those of the fifth century B.C., as an effort towards the elimination of Dualism by absorbing its terms in a higher conception, or its reconciliation by the intervention of a mediator.

[c] Dualism of Greek Philosophy is connected mainly with the names of Anaxagoras and Plato. The terms of Anaxagorean Dualism are an original state of chaos, and a formative intellect, "which came to" the chaos and reduced it to order [πάντα χρήματα ἦν ὁμοῦ, εἶτα νοῦς ἐλθὼν αὐτὰ διεκόσμησε, see the fragments in Ritter and Preller's Hist. Philosophiæ Græc. et Latinæ, sec. 47-58.] This νοῦς is merely the negative of the chaos; it is ἀμιγής, whilst chaos is μίξις; one, while chaos is many; definite while chaos is indefinite; impassive while the chaos is passive, &c. As the negative of the chaos, it is limited by the chaos which it is not, and consequently, not the Creative and Infinite Mind, as we conceive it, but a finite intelligence, outside of, and excluded by, an impenetrable and co-eternal matter. This theory, we are told by Aristotle [Metaph. i. 3] arose out of a perception of the beauty and perfection of Nature, and the manifest impossibility of accounting for these by the previous theories of material causes, of chance or of fate. In short, it is conception of Nature under the correlative images—easily suggested in the age of Phidias—of the artist and his work. It also may be regarded as a reflection, under the forms of philosophical thinking, of the characteristic mental attitude of a critical and self-conscious age; which, detaching itself from the moral order represented by religion and the state, asks "whence? why? what shall it profit?" of all that exists; which seeks freedom by standing aloof from law, limited at the same time by the law which it forsakes, and by the thraldom of the natural passions [cf. Plato, de Republica, p. 587, &c.]; and which withdraws from the world of knowledge and belief, into a limited region of subjective and individual opinon, which it calls freedom of thought. The questions asked by a generation such as this only admit of a dualistic answer, because they themselves arise from the difficulties of a mind divided against itself. As the individual self, expressed in the passion and opinion of the moment, stands aloof from, and in contradiction to, that larger and better self which is the parent of law, and institutions, and the moral world; so it cannot but conceive of the reason which is manifested in the physical universe as a finite intelligence, standing over against, and itself the direct negation of Nature. The speculation of Anaxagoras was accused of Atheism by his contemporaries, as a denial of Polytheism. To us, it may appear, at first sight, as an effort after Monotheism, by substituting one mind for many as the ruling cause of the universe. But a deeper view must always regard as atheistic, an apotheosis of the finite and natural mind of man, which is inevitable so long as matter is regarded as co-eternal with the formative νοῦς. Such an apotheosis as it was the negation of the larger and better self, which, under the form of the religious consciousness, was the parent of Greek Polytheism; so it is equally negative of the larger and better self, to which under the form of the religious consciousness, the revelation of an Infinite Being, reconciling the world to Himself, has been made. The inability of Anaxagoras to explain anything by his assumption, and the fluctuating and mechanical use which he was compelled to make of it, is the complaint alike of Plato [Phædr. 97B—98B] and of Aristotle [Metaph. i. 4.]

The Dualism of Plato was partly the offspring of the same mental movement as that of Anaxagoras, a movement which was not spent till it received its most accurate expression and, at the same time, its quietus from the hands of Kant. Partly and mainly, it was the necessary consequence of his Theory of Ideas. [v. CONCEPTUALISM, I. a—c.] If the idea alone is real, and more real in proportion to its abstraction, and remoteness from the world of things which are seen and handled, it follows that the ultimate reality can be brought into no intelligible relation, as a cause, with the world of sense. Either then, this region of the sensible must be regarded as illusory, or else a cause, other than a rational one (i.e. an idea) must be assumed to account for it. Plato, admitting the quasi-existence of the sensible world, is compelled to choose the latter alternative; which accordingly appears in his system under the different names of "matter," "necessity," "space," &c. As the highest idea is the "idea of good," this rival cause must be evil; as the former is rational, the latter must be irrational; as the former is a cause of order, so the latter must be the source of change and disorder, and of all obstacles to order. Hence, in the account of creation, the divine operation comes into contact with an opposing force, which it modifies but never overcomes, and the world is the fulfilment of the divine purpose, "as far as it was possible for it to be so" [Plato, Tim., 46 c.: see the passages bearing on the whole question in Zeller's Philos. der Griechen, 2*te Th.*, pp. 457-490]. This ethico-cosmological Dualism reappears in man, as a thoroughgoing opposition of the soul, which is allied to the idea, and comes from above—to the body, which is cognate to matter, and comes from below. The body is thus the tomb and prison of the soul, which ἅτε οὐδὲν κοινωνοῦσα αὐτῷ ἐν τῷ βίῳ ἑκοῦσα εἶναι [Phædo., 80E, &c.], will live after, as it pre-existed before, its entrance into the body.

The practical deductions from Platonic dualism are [a] an ascetic theory of life; i.e. an elimination of sensation, desire, imagination, will, understanding, &c., in order to attain to perfection, being the counterpart in morals of the search for truth by abstraction from the concrete; and [b] the correlative of this, a justification of libertinism which, as merely a series of bodily acts, have no effect upon the soul, and are indifferent.

The Platonic theory lies at the root of the Epicurean doctrine of a deity, apart from, and indifferent to, the world; and, of the correlative of this, an ideal of human life as the selfish pursuit of pleasure. If God is out of any relation to man, it follows that man is out of any relation to, and has no duties towards, God.

For the influence of Plato upon the asceticism of Seneca and the later Stoics, see Zeller, Op. cit. 3*te Th.* 2*te Abth.* pp. 201, 202.

[d] The Dualism of Christian and semi-Christian heretics was due partly to a fusion of Oriental with Platonic speculations, and partly to the impression of novelty and sublimity made by Christianity, which led to the idea of an antithesis between the revelations of the Old Testament and the New Testament.

1. Indications in St. Paul's Epistles. Speaking of the contemporary philosophy, St. Paul calls it κενὴ ἀπάτη [Col. ii. 8], βέβηλοι κενοφωνίαι and ἀντιθέσεις τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως [1 Tim. vi. 20], which seems to point to the beginnings of Gnosticism, the word ἀντίθεσις being a technical dualistic phrase to express the relation of the God to the spirit of the world, and of the New Testament to the Old [cf. Marcion's book in the second century on the contrariety of the two Testaments, called Ἀντιθέσεις]. After his manner at Athens, too, St. Paul takes up and gives a new meaning to the dualistic ἐξουσία τοῦ σκότους and the βασιλεία τοῦ υἱοῦ τῆς ἀγάπης αὐτοῦ, and to the physical metaphors involved in such words as ἐρρύσατο, μετέστησεν, &c., [Col. i. 13, follg.; cf. 1 John ii. 8-12]. He condemns also the specious asceticism, abstinence from marriage and from meats, which are known to have been practised in later times by Saturninus, Marcion, &c. [Col. ii. 16, follg.; 1 Tim. iv. 3, 4; ib. ii. 15]; and the opposite extreme of licence and Antinomian communism preached by the adherents of Simon Magus. These errors seem to be aimed at in the expression "Christ is all and in all" [Col. iii. 11]; in the close juxtaposition of "mortify your members," &c., in the sense of uncleanness [ib. iii. 5], with the condemnation of ἀφείδια σώματος, &c. [ib. ii. 23], and in the commendations of the family and ordinary relations of life [ib. ii. 18-25; cf. 2 Pet. i. 13-17, iii. 1].

The Docetic view of the Person of Christ alluded to [1 John i. 1 and iv. 3] was also a natural deduction of the early heretics from the doctrine of the irreconcilable opposition of spirit and matter. [DOCETÆ. GNOSTICISM.]

2. Manichean Dualism represents the complete, as Gnosticism the partial, fusion of the Dualistic result of the Platonic speculation with Oriental Dualism. The Hyle, or Prince of Darkness, is no longer, as with the Platonists and Gnostics, a quasi-negative conception, but a positive power, ruling over a "terra pestifera," full of frightful animals, poisonous plants, darkness, fire, storm-wind, and thick smoke, and inhabited by a "gens tenebrarum;" the personification, in short, of the hurtful and destructive agencies of nature [cf. a]. Another view of it, as the region of generation and decay, of animal life, of mutual persecution and disorder, recals the chaos of Anaxagoras. This region trends southwards, as the region of good trends northwards; the former, however, pressing up, wedgelike, into the latter. Between the ruling principles of each region, say the Mysteries of Manes, there is no community, the good has no need of the bad, the bad knows not the good. Inconsistently with this total contrariety, the Hyle, in the conflict with the Principle of Good, approaching near to the region of light, becomes enamoured of it, rushes on the object of its desire, which, being in danger, surrenders a part of its "armour of light," viz., the soul, to the Hyle, "as a shepherd gives up one of his sheep to the wolf to save the rest." To redeem this lost part is the end of the world's history, and the soul in its captivity is the "Jesus patibilis" begotten by the Holy Spirit on the virgin bosom of the earth, who is born and dies daily, and hangs crucified on every tree [omni suspensus ex ligno]. The contrariety of principle in the "kosmos" at large is thus reproduced in small in the conflict of the nature of the individual man with itself; and his redemption consists in his awakening to a consciousness of the true relation of his luminous nature to the world, i.e. to the doctrine of Dualism. This double principle in man is spoken of, apparently inaccurately, by St. Augustine as "two souls" [de duabus animabus contra Manichæum, Op. vol. viii. Bened. Ed.], just as the two cosmical principles are wrongly called by Tertullian "two Gods" [adv. Marcion, i. c. 6], whereas the principle of evil is only "princeps immanis et dux . . . mens et origo" of the kingdom of darkness; whilst Manes called the principle of light alone "Deus pater" [see Aug. contra Ep. Manichæi quam vocant fundamenti, which contains several quotations from Manes, Op. vol. viii.].

Man, then, as the microcosm, in whom Nature arises to a consciousness of her captivity, concentrates in himself the isolated particles of light spread abroad in the universe; which light is again dispersed by the multiplication of the human species, the soul losing at each stage more and more of its power over the body. Hence work, the acquisition of property, and especially marriage, contribute to augment and sustain the kingdom of evil, and were abjured by the elect Manichean; and, as Tertullian records, only celibates and eunuchs were admitted to baptism; persons already married not being baptized till death or divorce [adv. Marcion, iv. 11; cf. i. 29]. Like the Gnostic, the Manichæan view of Christ is Docetic.

The characteristics of this development of Dualism may be summed up as [1] a positive view of evil "duas naturas atque substantias" [Aug. adv. Hæres. 46]; [2] a geographical view of good and evil as pervading two distinct regions; and [3] a sidereal conception of God as enthroned amid worlds of light, and of Christ as inhabiting the sun. All these peculiarities indicate a close connection with the later forms of the Parsee religion [v. supra, b, 5]; [2] especially recals the adjacent territories and hostile gods of the Bactrian agricultural settlers, and the pastoral tribes of the Punjab.

An historical connection with the doctrines of Epicurus (dominum inferens hebetem, i.e. an indifferent Deity), or with the later Stoics, as supposed by Tertullian [adv. Marcion, v. 19], seems improbable. So far as it was not a caricature of Christianity, Manichæism may be described as the Oriental (as Gnosticism was the Greek) phase of a conviction involved in all natural religions, of the contrariety of God and His Creation, and of the nature of the individual man within itself, expressing a kind of unconscious want of Christianity in the heathen mind. [See MANICHÆISM.]

3. The Priscillianists in Spain [fourth to end of fifth century A.D.], the Paulicians in Asia Minor [seventh to ninth century A.D.] and Thrace [tenth to thirteenth century A.D.], the Cathari, Bogomiles, Concorezensians in Bulgaria, Italy, France, Flanders, &c. [from uncertain date till they passed over to Mohammedanism, fifteenth century A.D., or were merged in Albigenses, Waldenses, &c.], agree in holding more or less strongly the main tenets of semi-Christian Dualism; viz. the co-eternal opposition of God and an inferior demon sprung from chaos and darkness, an analogous theory of soul and body, accompanied by ascetic practices. Some appear to have fallen into the opposite, but equally logical extreme of libertinism, some again into a Docetic view of Christ, some, lastly, to have based their system on an opinion of the contrariety of the Old and New Testaments—more than others. [See DICT. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

Dualism comes into contact with general history, as connected, through the Albigenses, with the institution of the Dominican order, and of the Inquisition. Some have supposed the Templars to have held Dualistic tenets.

[e] The Dualism of Descartes is the necessary consequence of the isolation of the individual mind, which is supposed in his theory of doubt, and to which the Nominalism of the later Mediæval speculation naturally led. If, in order to arrive at certainty, I am compelled to doubt, i.e. to exclude as possibly non-existent everything except the thinking self which doubts, it follows that the attainment of certainty involves an opposition, thoroughgoing and original, between thought which doubts and the world of things, including the bodily organism, of which it doubts [see DOUBT]. The essential character of mind and body thus consists in their mutual exclusion; and the only possible relation between the two in the nature of man, is the mechanical and external one, of one "substance" contained within the other; and as a sequence of this, the only way in which a relation between the thinking mind and the world can be conceived possible is through the intervention of the Deity Himself [Geulincx, Malebranche, &c.].

But, on the other hand, it followed from this theory of the divorce of the human mind from the world of matter, that a similarly abstract view should necessarily be taken of the relation of the infinite mind of God to the world. As the isolation of the individual mind from its work in the State, and the Moral Law [see above, c] led to the Epicurean view of God as pari analogiâ, outside of, and indifferent to, His creation; so the Cartesian isolation of the individual mind, as the condition of certainty, led to the Deistical view of God as an unknown Being who had never revealed Himself to man or interfered in his affairs [see DEISM], at the same time that it postulated, as the only condition of knowledge, the direct intervention of such a Being. This contradiction wrought the doctrine of Dualism into its final shape in which it appears in The Philosophy of Kant, and then disappears from history. If we are precluded by the very terms of Dualism from supposing the existence of a God who works in the world, and therefore from appealing to His intervention as a guarantee for the correspondence of the mind and the world which is implied in knowledge, it follows that the two factors, thought and things, stand over against one another, without any guarantee that the conclusions of the one correspond to reality in the other. All I know is what my thoughts about the world are, not what the facts of the world are in reality; in other words, things are only accessible to man as they appear to be, not as they really are. The "thing in itself," i.e. out of relation to the conscious mind, thus becomes the only reality, and is at once the criterion of the truth of the thing as it appears, and at the same time can never be brought within the reach of the mind, because, so soon as we suppose it to stand in any relation to the conscious mind, it ceases to be the thing as it is "in itself." It follows from this that any comparison between the thing, as known, with the thing as it is "in itself," is impossible. In other words, the mind pronounces all its own knowledge to be worthless, except upon condition of a comparison of the thing "as known" with the thing "as it is," which comparison the same mind declares can never take place. This self-condemnation of thought is an intellectual impossibility; so that the Dualism of mind and matter, and the philosophical Deism founded upon it, are seen, in the last resort, to be offsprings of a discord of the mind within itself, resulting in an ineffectual attempt itself to deny the validity of its own operations.

To sum up; the opinion of Dualism, or the ultimate contrariety of the spiritual and material, has arisen historically from the following causes:—

[a] A rough classification of the beneficent and hurtful influences of climate and surrounding nature. (Apparent more or less in all Polytheism.)

[b] The superposition of the Pantheon of one on that of another, hostile or subject, nation. (Persian, Slavonic, &c.)

[c] The reflection upon the Cosmos, of the mental detachment of the critical and self-conscious individual from the moral and religious world in which he lives. (Anaxagoras, and Greek Dualism generally.)

As a consequence of the confusion of thought lying at the root of the Platonic theory of ideas. (Plato and Epicurus.)

[d] The fusion of [c] with [b] and [a]. (Gnostic, Manichæan, Priscillianist, Paulician, Catharist.)

[e] From the attempt to arrive at certainty through a process of universal scepticism. (Descartes and his school, down to Kant.)

Of these [a], arising from a low degree of culture, vanishes with advancing civilization; [b] led to a series of reforms, and was at length stigmatized as a heresy; [c, d, e] disappear so soon as their origin can be explained, and their consequences shewn to be unthinkable.

It follows from this survey that Dualism is not a form of thought native to the mind, but one arising out of special circumstances, and which the mind manifests a continual tendency to expel.

II. Considerations in favour of Psychological Dualism. We are so accustomed to think of our life under the form of an opposition between body and soul, that the question seems almost nugatory —whence could such a form of thought have arisen? [1] From dreams, in which the body is at rest and yet the imagination active. The primitive observation of this fact led to the notion that the soul left the body in sleep; and that (from the apparent use of the limbs in the events of a dream), the soul was extended and corporeal. [2] From the juxtaposition and contrast of a series of objects vividly imagined in the memory, with another series presented outwardly to perception. [3] The connection of breath, as the unseen condition of life, with the invisible atmosphere, produced the very early image of the soul as mind or vapour [Ruach (Hebr.) and Atma (Sanskrit); ψυχή from ψύχω, πνεῦμα from πνέω; anima and animus; spiritus from spirare; Dutscha (Slavonic), from dutsch, to blow]. [4] The consciousness involved in the nature of man as a moral agent, of being at once the controller and the controlled, of being himself a sovereign and at the same time the subject of that sovereign, of using means to an end, and yet being himself, in part, the means so used [Plato]; or again, of being the subject of impressions which "motive" a certain action, and yet being able to resolve as an original and free agent; or, lastly, of the ability of standing aloof from and passing judgment upon our own conduct. [5] The consciousness of personal identity in the midst of a series of bodily renovations, extending throughout life; or again, of distinctness from morbid states of mind, especially in particular kinds of insanity; or again, of being able to see our body, but not ourselves, &c.; or, lastly, of the ability to surrender even life itself for an idea, and stand aloof from the instinct of self-preservation. [6] The observation that the beauty or strength of the body are not always accompanied by similar qualities, or even soundness, of mind; that the bodily and mental growth do not proceed pari passu; that in illness, body and mind do not suffer equally, but frequently, as in consumption, the prostration of the former is accompanied by elevation of the latter; or, conversely, as in catalepsy, the suspension of bodily functions is compatible with the continuation of consciousness; that some bodily functions, as digestion, are independent of consciousness; that after death thought and feeling cease, but the animal processes continue for a time. [7] The inability of physiological inquiry, by observation of the nerves and tissues, to give any satisfactory explanation of thought, imagination, feeling; or to connect the size of the brain with greater or less degrees of spiritual power; or, conversely, differences of genius and disposition with differences in the brain. [8] The psychological difficulty that unless the soul be different from the body, thought must be, as a function of the body, composite, that this would render the comparison of sensations, ideas, &c., impossible, such comparison being a condition of thought.

III. The difficulties of Dualism are, mainly, that it leads to a materialistic view of the soul and of God. Thus, if a thoroughgoing distinction between body and soul, which co-exist in human life, be maintained, they must be distinguished by a limit at which one leaves off and the other begins. But the limit of the body, which is material, must itself be material; therefore, conversely, the limit which distinguishes the soul from the body must be material; therefore the soul which is so limited must itself be material [see an analogous difficulty pointed out by St. Augustine, Contra Ep. Manich. quam vocant fundamenti, c. xx., on the juxtaposition of the regions of light and darkness]. Similarly, if we maintain a thoroughgoing distinction between God and the universe, we are compelled to take the heathen view of Him as a physical substance enthroned in some remote region of interplanetary space, instead of Him "in whom we live, and move, and are." On the other hand, if we identify God and Nature, or soul and body, we can only do so by denying the existence of the one or the other, i.e. by distinguishing the one as real from the other as unreal.

Another difficulty arises from the impossibility of relating adequately the two terms when once supposed distinct. This is generally done by the use of Metaphors.

[a] The soul is said to be the inward of which the body is the outward. This distinction is taken from physical substances, and is only applicable if the soul is such.

[b] The soul is said to use the body as its instrument. This is a metaphor taken from the handicrafts, which are relations subsisting between men (who are both souls and bodies) and physical substances.

[c] The same may be said of the forensic metaphor of property involved in such expressions as "my body."

Both metaphors may be formulated thus: If A be soul, B be body, and C physical substance: A is to B, as AB (whether multiplied or added or how related or distinguishable is the matter to be explained) is to C. Which is manifestly absurd.

[d] The soul is said to rule the body. This is a political metaphor taken from the relation between men (each of whom is both body and soul) on the one hand, and men or bodies of men (each unit of whom is both soul and body) on the other. That is, A is to B as AB × n is to AB × n: which explains nothing. Because the exact nature of the relation capable of subsisting between men or bodies of men, some of whom are subject to the rest, may, and indeed manifestly does, depend on the nature of the relation between body and soul in each, which is the matter to be explained.

A further difficulty arises from the fact that the spiritual and material are so interwoven in the world and in the life of man, that they cannot be even divided in thought. Because much of their peculiar character arises from the fact of their combination; and their essence is their correlativity. Any true account of either must include its relation to the other, i.e. so soon as we begin to think of them adequately as the terms of a Dualism, the fact immediately becomes apparent that they are not a Dualism. Thus we cannot think of soul and body without including in our conception that they are not two, but one life; nor of good and evil, without remembering that they make up together one moral order; nor of God and the world, without taking in the fact that they are one in Christ "Et ita," says Tertullian, "Deus tunc maximè magnus cum homini pusillus; et tunc maximè optimus, cum homini non bonus; et tunc maxime unus cùm homini dui aut plures" [adv. Marcion. ii. 2, 3].

IV. Verdict of Christianity on Dualism. So far from Christianity being Dualistic, as its enemies have affirmed [see Heine, Zur Gesch. der Religion u. Philosophie in Deutschland, Wke. bd. iii. p. 123, &c., where he puts it into the same category with Gnosticism and Manichæism], it has been a perpetual protest against the Duality latent in secular thought [see above, I. [d] 1.] In the Epistle to the Colossians, which seems aimed at once at the rising Dualism, and at the doctrine of Emanation, which was the heathen way of getting over its difficulties [Emanation], St. Paul, after disposing of the speculative error and its practical consequences, uses the strong metaphors διὰ τῶν ἁφῶν καὶ συνδέσμων ἐπιχορηγούμενον καὶ συμβιβαξόμενον, and speaks of the Church "increasing with the increase of God" [ii. 16-19], and of Christ as τὰ πάντα and ἐν πᾶσιν.

So, too, the early Church always condemned, and the Mediæval Church not only condemned, but persecuted most effectually, all the Dualistic heresies.

Christian doctrine moves between two ideas, that of creation out of nothing on the one hand, and the final subjection of all things to God, "that He may be all in all," on the other. Deny either of these, and the significance of Christianity, as a doctrine, falls to the ground. On the other hand, working as it does, in its manifestation to us, in that intermediate sphere in which the world has fallen away from its Maker, and the lower and spiritual parts of man are at variance, it sets them at one again. The true relation, whether of evil to good, or of body to soul, or of the world to God, is expressed in the doctrine of Atonement or Reconciliation. If they had not been originally and properly one, there would be no demand, were they not actually divorced, there would be no necessity, for reconciliation; were this variance not capable of being abolished, there would be no reality in reconciliation [cf. Docetic view of Dualists]. And the extinction of Dualism is found in the words: "As the reasonable soul and flesh is one man, so God and man is one Christ." [On Dualism as the basis of the modern mythical theory of the Gospel history, see Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, § 128, obs.]

E

EASTER, according to the Venerable Bede, is derived from Eostre, the name of a goddess worshipped of old in Britain. He lived sufficiently near to the time of idolatry to be able to speak with certainty, and no writer has given greater diligence to ensure accuracy. The word has nothing to do with orientation, as though the new creation coincided with the heliacal rising of the constellation in which the sun first went forth as a giant to run his course,—

> "Con quelle stelle
> Che eran con lui, quando l'amor divino > Mosse da prima quelle cose belle."
> Dante, Inf. i. t. 14.

Neither is the word a Saxon equivalent for the Resurrection, which is "ærist"; the difference between which and "Easter" is seen in the words of Ælfric, "Swa we eac cristene menn healdaþ cristes ærist to Easter tide þas scofon dagas" "We Christians also celebrate the Resurrection of Christ at Easter tide during these seven days."[1] Our Easter, therefore, may be considered to have displaced the British festival of Eostre, on the well-known principle of Christian antiquity, whereby the material structure of God's House was built upon the site, and often with the materials of idol temples, and popular festivals were adapted to the Christian calendar. Even pagan customs, so that they were innocent, were allowed to continue. The observance of Easter extended over the week preceding (πασχὰ σταυρώσιμον) and the week following (πασχὰ ἀναστάσιμον) Easter Day. The fast of the Holy Week was kept strictly, but that of Easter Eve was especially rigid. Tertullian says, with whimsical hyperbole, "Hodie jejunant etiam aviculæ in nemore" [Kirchen Lexic.]. From the time of Celestine, says Durandus [VI. d. vii. sec. 7], no introit has been used on Easter Eve, "for the introit is at the head of the Liturgy, and our Head is now laid in the tomb." Easter Week was also religiously observed till its termination on Low Sunday, or the Dominica in Albis, ἡ καινὴ κυριακή. It was a time of holy joy indeed, but of complete abstinence from the public amusements of the world. The public spectacles were forbidden at this time by the Theodosian Code [Lib. xv. Tit. de Spectac. Leg. 5]. The law courts also suspended their sittings [Cod. Theod. Lib. ii. Tit. viii. de Feriis Leg. 2]. Ælfric's words above shew that the entire week was solemnly kept by the Saxon Church. Hence, the paschal difference was most thoroughly schismatical, as throwing the most solemn period of the Christian year into hopeless confusion; the Quartodeciman party triumphantly celebrating the Lord's Resurrection, while the Body Catholic was still fasting in Lent [QUARTODECIMAN]. In the primitive Church, Easter began the ecclesiastical year. It was the Queen of Festivals, Βασίλισσα τῶν ἡμερῶν ἡμέρα [Greg. Naz. Or. xix.]. It was ushered in by the vigil service of Easter, and kept up through the night without thought of sleep in brilliantly illuminated churches. The Eastern Church has never suffered the custom to fall into desuetude; the midnight prayer for light, ad Duodecimam in the Gallican, ad initium noctis Paschæ in the Gothic Missal, shew that the practice was once Catholic. Twelve antiphons from the Prophets symbolized the truth that prophecy was sealed, the day of Christ was there. "The rich profusion of light" [Greg. Naz. Or. xix.] "shews that the darkness of sin is resolved," for, on "the Paschal vigil lights are lavished in public and private till the night is as bright as day" [Or. ii. 9]. Eusebius says that on this night the Emperor illuminated the whole city with columnar torches of wax, κιόνας κηρίνους, and made large charitable doles on Easter Day [V. Const. iv. 22]. There was a symbolical appropriateness in this display of light, for it was the time of spiritual illumination, φώτισμος, when the catechumens were admitted to the laver of regeneration. No solemnity can have been more imposing than this midnight service in the fifth century. The noble "Exultet jam Angelica turba"—peculiar to this service [Mabillon, Missal. Gall. Goth. Mozarab.]; —the joyful salutation "The Lord is risen indeed" passed from mouth to mouth; the neophytes in sacramental garments admitted to their first celebration,[2] for the Eucharist might be twice consecrated at Easter; the austerities of Lent resolved in the jubilant Alleluia and Agnus Dei of the morning of the Resurrection; the fragrance of flowers brought in from the country to deck with their profusion nave, chancel, and altar, as yet unmingled with the heavy odour of incense; made the midnight service of the Paschal Vigil a time never to be forgotten by the young member of Christ, and almost redeems from exaggeration the saying of the Apostle of Ireland, Patricius, "In nocte Paschæ qui non communicat fidelis non est" [op. 22].[3] Priests, laity, and neophytes, all communicated. They were sights and sounds also that still linger round our own service; and Easter Eve speaks to us in its Collect and Epistle of the ancient Order of Baptism then solemnly observed, and reproduced in the words of our Ritual. The consecration of the baptismal water [Ap. Const. vii. 43] may be compared with our own Office.

[1] Harvey's Vindex Catholicus, iii. 348.

[2] Ambros. ad Epp. Æm. [3] Galland. Biblioth. Patr. x.

Easter is connected with the ceremonies of the Jewish law as antitype with its type; it is the direct consequent of a symbolical antecedent, the final cause of all that was ordained for the service of the sanctuary of old. But there was one typical rite in the law more significant than the rest, designed to prefigure the historical event of Easter morning, and represented before the rent veil of the temple at the very time that the risen Lord appeared to His disciples, the wave sheaf of the second day of the Paschal week, i.e. on the first Lord's day, if the terrors of Calvary had caused no interruption in the stated services of the temple. Doubtless this coincidence suggested the words of St. Paul, "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruits of them that slept," words that seem to have been written at Easter tide [1 Cor. xv. 20; compare 1 Cor. xvi. 8, with 1 Cor. v. 7, 8; and see Harvey's History and Th. of the Three Creeds, 375]. The wave sheaf of the first-fruits of the harvest was offered in the temple on the day of our Lord's resurrection from the grave. For fifteen hundred years it had been a perpetual symbol of our Easter. Another particular of the Passover ritual may be mentioned. The Hallel Psalms, from cxiii. to cxviii. inclusive, were repeated four times on the first day, when the Passover was slain; three times while the blood of a lamb for every household was offered in the temple; and once at the solemn feast in the evening [Talmud; Tr. Pesach; Tosaphta; and see Buxtorf, Lex. v. הלל]. So with us the proper Psalms for Easter evensong commence with the two first of this series; and for no other reason apparently than that they formed a portion of the last service of praise offered by our Lord, when, ὑμνήσαντες, He and the disciples went forth to the garden of their resort. Our proper preface for Easter is from the ancient Gallican Missal.

Easter was appointed by several early councils as a time when the churches of every province should meet for deliberation; as the high court of appeal also for all who should be aggrieved by the decision of their own bishop; this became part of the general law of the church by the Council of Nice, can. v. Prisoners in confinement for minor offences were now liberated, and slaves were manumitted in fitting acts of grace to symbolize man's redemption from the captivity of sin by the power of the Resurrection. [Laws of Valentinian and Theodosius embodied in the code of Justinian, lib. i. tit. 4, de Episc. Leg. 3]. Every adult was required to communicate at this festival on pain of forfeiting church privilege during life, and of being deprived of Christian burial at death. Our 112th Canon still requires non-communicants at Easter above sixteen years of age to be presented. [Paschal Controversy.]

EBIONITES. Little is known respecting Ebion, the supposed author of this sect, and his existence has been doubted—some deriving the name from a Hebrew word signifying "poor," on account of their mean and unworthy opinions respecting our Lord; but more probably, as this name was adopted and boasted of by themselves, on account of their professed imitation of Apostolic poverty and community of goods. The Ebionites took their rise, according to St. Epiphanius,[1] soon after the destruction of Jerusalem: they engrafted Judaism on Christianity, thinking circumcision, an observance of the Sabbath, and obedience to the ceremonial law, necessary to salvation, and reviling St. Paul as corrupting the truth.[2] They generally believed that Christ was a mere man, the son of Joseph and Mary; though others, as St. Epiphanius says, admitted His supernatural origin, that He came down from heaven. Origen also speaks of two parties amongst the sect—one believing that Christ was born as other men, and another that He was born of a Virgin.[3] St. Jerome often alludes to the sect, calling it half Jewish and half Christian—professing to belong to both religions, whilst really not believing either of them.[4] [Dict. of Sects and Heresies.]

ECLECTICISM in philosophy took its rise in Alexandria. The most opposite systems there met together. The Greek philosophy of the Platonic and Peripatetic schools came in contact with Egyptian mysticism; and Polytheism with the Theosophy of the Mage and the venerable religion of the Jew. The unity of the Deity is a doctrine so entirely consonant with the teaching of human reason, that the religious idea of Judæa and Persia gradually prevailed. An attempt was then made at philosophic compromise, and the schools for the first time were compelled to form an alliance with religion. But the junction was effected in varying ratio. Where the religious or oriental element prevailed, Gnosticism was the result of the amalgam; where a philosophic contempt for specific religious belief still held out, eclecticism sprung up, so named because it selected from the different systems the more marked characters of each, and forged the various elements into one inharmonious whole. It is evident that no system formed upon such principles, or rather upon the absence of any one dominant principle, could have any consistency. The different constituent elements of organic substance were thrown together, but the organism was wanting that could alone sustain life. Premises without conclusions, and results at variance with axioms, could only make confusion worse confounded. When the first germ of Arian thought reached Alexandria, the opportunity for hybridization was not neglected, and the funda-

[1] Advers. Hæres. x. vel. xxx.
[2] Orig. Homil. in Jerem. xviii. sec. 12.
[3] Con. Celsum, lib. v. sec. 61.
[4] Epist. cxv. ad Augustinum, sec. 15.

mental truth of the Christian religion, the Incarnation of the Son of God, was either explained by heresy upon the principles of Pagan mythology, or it was declared to be based upon a Platonic Trinity modified by Christian teachers, but in its very essence involving a progressively descending subordination of the Three Divine Hypostases of which it was composed. Hence Arianism, a product of the dialectical character of the School of Antioch, owed its after-development to the Eclecticism of Alexandria, although in other respects it had little in common with the contemplative mysticism which this system had inherited from Egyptian and Eastern theosophy.

The formation of the Eclectic School of Alexandria is generally assigned to Ammonius Saccas (who like the Jewish Rabbin followed a humble occupation, and was a sack porter to the corn ships), at the close of the second century. But the germ of the system may be found in the writings of Philo, whose notions were a product of four several factors; Judaism, Magian Dualism, the Cabbalistic Emanative theory, and the incipient Eclecticism of Greek philosophy. From these materials his followers developed that discretive scheme of philosophic thought, which to a certain extent gave its tone also to Christian teaching. The well-known words of Clement of Alexandria, slightly earlier than Ammonius, shew how ready Christian teachers were to adopt the method of the schools, not foreseeing the disturbing force that it would most surely exercise upon sound faith. He says that each system of philosophy is to be referred to a divine original in proportion as it favours virtue, and "by philosophy, I mean not," he says, "Stoic, Platonic, Epicurean, or Peripatetic notions, but all sound teaching of the collective schools, all precepts of virtue in connection with religious knowledge. This Eclectic aggregate, πᾶν τὸ ἐκλεκτικόν, I call philosophy" [Strom. i. 7]. Thus the way was prepared when Ammonius by his eloquence and erudition collected around his chair all the rising intellect of the day; Origen, Plotinus, and Longinus, the tutor of Zenobia, being among his scholars. He was born of Christian parents, and it would seem that he continued within the Church when founding his school of Neo-Platonism. Like Clement, he held that Philosophy and Christianity both centred upon a common nucleus of Divine truth. His system had far less in it of Platonism than its name imports, but it superseded all other forms of philosophy, and became the fashion at court. In the chapel of Alexander Severus, busts of Abraham and Pythagoras, Orpheus and the Saviour, were placed on the same level. Aware of the lurking antagonism between Eclecticism and Christianity that must at one day shew itself outwardly, Ammonius exacted from his followers a vow of secresy, which was faithfully kept till his death, A.D. 242. His pupils then having become teachers, the system started into life simultaneously at all the great centres of learning [Brucker, Ph. I. i. 2, 4]; Plotinus being its enunciator at Rome. Eclecticism was to the Church of the third century what Deism was to ours in the eighteenth, and Rationalism is in the nineteenth. It reduced the most vital truths to allegory, as the modern Deists also termed Christianity nothing more than a result of Jewish allegory. It explained away the miracles, and denied the inspiration of prophecy; in which also it has been imitated by the Deist and Rationalist. The Christian Apologists, as exhibiting an Eclectic spirit, are often more valuable as the interpreters of ancient philosophic notions than as expositors of the faith of the Church. They seem to have considered it their mission to make good the claim of Christianity on the attention of heathens by reason of its points of analogy with the higher truths of pagan antiquity [Brucker, H. Phil. I. i. 2, 4; Newman's Arians, i. 4].

ECONOMY. Οἰκονομία, as a technical term in theology, means vicarious dispensation, as that of a household by a steward [Gen. xv. 2, xvi. 1, 3, 8; Isa. xxii. 19, 21]. It is used in this sense by St. Paul, οἰκονομίαν πεπιστεύμαι [Eph. i. 10]. The Church applied the term at an early date to signify the dispensation of Divine mercy administered by the Son, in connection with His Incarnation; His pre-existence in the mere glory of the Word being expressed by its correlative, Θεολογία. Thus Tertullian, thinking in Greek though writing in Latin, says "There is one God, but under this dispensation which we call the economy, there is the Son" [adv. Prax. 11], and Hippolytus c. Noet: "Who does not affirm that there is one God, yet so he does not annul the economy" [3]. "In whom is God but in Christ Jesus according to the mystery of the economy" [4]. "This Word was truly the mystery of the economy of Holy Spirit and Virgin begetting one Son of God" [16]. In a wider sense the word refers to the Trinity in Unity, as connected inseparably with the doctrine of the Incarnation. So the same writer: "As respects the Divine energy there is one God, but as respects the economy its manifestation is threefold" [c. Noet. 8]; and afterwards, having spoken of the Father and the Son, he adds: "And in the economy third in position is the grace of the Holy Spirit" [14]; and of the Trinity in Unity: "The economy of unison is resolved in one God, for God is One" [ib.]. A word of this kind was not likely to be left untouched by the Gnostics, and they gave to it a Platonic colouring. They were Realists in their theosophy, and with them the pre-existent ἰδέαι of things had a true substantial existence. The Æonic Soter of their system, invested by the Demiurge with a body having a psychic or animal nature, κατ' οἰκονομίαν, in due course appeared in the earthly counterpart of that body. Thus also Valentinus imagined that Christ had a spiritual body [Tert. de Carm. Chr. 15]; and in the Cabbalistic book Zohar of the Jews, the prototypal idea of Man pre-existed as the Adam Cadmon or אדם עליון; and in the sixth day of creation was formed according to that Divine idea from the dust of the earth [see Irenæus, Cambr. ed. i. 134, n. 2; 224, 1; and 232, n. 3; Neander, Genet. Entw. 15, quoted at 344, n. 1]. From the idea of this Soter, κατ' οἰκονομίαν, Apollinaris would seeem to have developed his particular form of heresy; the heresies of the fourth and subsequent centuries being little else than old heretical matter run into new moulds. There is another use of the term in patristical divinity very different from the preceding, where a thing said or done bears one meaning to the sense, while a further meaning is contained in it as the flower in the germ. It is closely allied to the DISCIPLINA ARCANI, whereby so much of the entire truth is communicated as the recipient is able to assimilate, more being reserved for after instruction. It is the way in which we deal with children, and a homely explanation is perhaps the best; we give a true answer to their simple questions, that so far as it reaches is quite to the point; but much is reserved κατ' οἰκονομίαν, that as the intellect expands will also be communicated, but for the present must be kept back. St. Paul gave milk to babes who could not digest stronger food; he was "all things to all men" [1 Cor. ix. 20]. To the Jews he was as a Jew that he might gain the Jews; to them that are without law, as without law; with the heathen he could so far shew a common interest as to take the ground of their mythological notions, and quote to them their poets. It was done κατ' οἰκονομίαν, that the dull eye might be inured gradually to bear the majestic glory of Christian truth. And it is the practice which every teacher is compelled to adopt. The preacher may be full of information upon abstruse points, that might be unfolded with advantage before learned hearers; but he must lay other food before his ordinary flock. An inversion of this order would only make him unintelligible to the latter, and cause inattentive hearers among the former. He must be guided therefore in the choice and handling of his subject κατ' οἰκονομίαν. In no other way was the proud spirit of heathen philosophy led by the great teachers of the day in the third century to bow itself in self-abasement before the Cross of Christ. [See Gataker, Marc. Anton. xi. 18, p. 331.; Newman's Arians, 72, 82.]

ECTENE. [LITANY.]

ELECTION. The Calvinistic doctrine of election has been already examined [CALVINISM]; we shall now state, according to the teaching of Holy Scripture and of the Fathers, the true doctrine which Calvinism has perverted. Passages may first be quoted in illustration of the general teaching of Holy Scripture. We read of God's "electing," of an "election," and of the "elect." Thus, "He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love" [Ephes. i. 4]. "We are bound to give thanks alway for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth" [2 Thess. ii. 13]. St. Peter addresses his first Epistle to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, "elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the Blood of Jesus Christ" [1 Epist. i. 1]. St. Paul also speaks of "the purpose of God according to election" as not being "of works, but of Him that calleth" [Rom. ix. 11], and of a "remnant according to the election of grace" [Rom. xi. 5]. And to the Thessalonians, "knowing brethren beloved your election of God, for our Gospel came to you not in word only, but also in power and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance" [1 Epist. i. 4]. And St. Peter speaks of the Church at Babylon as "elected together with you" [1 Pet. v. 13], and says, "make your calling and election sure" [2 Epist. i. 10]. The "elect" are also frequently named: "For the elect's sake, those days shall be shortened" [Matt. xxiv. 22]. "If it were possible they (false Christs) shall deceive even the elect" [Ibid. v. 24]. "Shall not God avenge His own elect?" [Luke xviii. 7.] "I endure all things for the elect's sake" [2 Tim. ii. 10]. "The faith of God's elect" [Tit. i. 1]. "Put on as the elect of God bowels and mercies" [Col. iii. 12]. "Ye are an elect race" [2 Pet. ii. 9]. We also read of individuals as being elect: St. Paul was an elect vessel [Acts ix. 15]; he speaks of Rufus as elect in the Lord [Rom. xvi. 13]. And St. John addresses his Second Epistle to the elect Cyria, and mentions her elect sister.[1]

Again, this election, as intimated in some of the passages quoted, is represented as being founded on God's foreknowledge and predestination—God foreknows, predestinates, calls, elects, justifies, glorifies. Thus St. Paul [Rom. viii. 28-30], whom God did foreknow, or, as he says in the previous verse, "the called according to purpose," He did predestinate. Mark also the connection of predestination with salvation. Thus St. Paul says, "a remnant shall be saved" [Rom. ix. 27]. God "hath saved us and called us with an holy calling" [2 Tim. i. 9]. "To us which are saved" [1 Cor. i. 18]. The Lord added the saved, σωζομένους, to the Church [Acts ii. 47]. "Ye are saved if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you" [1 Cor. xv. 2]. We are a sweet savour of Christ in the saved and in the lost [2 Cor. ii. 15]. "By grace ye were saved through faith" [Ephes. ii. 8]. "He hath saved us by the washing of regeneration" [Tit. iii. 5]. "Baptism doth now save us" [1 Pet. iii. 21].

Moreover, St. Paul in the Epistle to the Ephesians, speaking more definitely of the mystery of predestination, says: "God predestinated us to the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto Himself, . . . that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, He might gather together in one all things in Christ" [John x. 16; xi. 52. Ephes. iii. 4, 6], both which are in heaven and which are in earth [Ephes. iii. 15], "even in Him, in whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of [1] Called in the English Version "the elect lady." Κυρίᾳ is most probably a proper name.

His own will" [Ephes. i. 11]. And afterwards he thus defines this mystery of predestination, "which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men as it is now revealed unto His holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit; that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel" [Ephes. iii. 5, 6; see also Col. i. 26, 27].

Now, considering the passages quoted, without referring at present to the sovereignty of the decree of election, of which we shall afterwards speak, and which is here often intimated, we can only conclude that election is the attribute of the whole body of the baptized. Thus, such terms as "predestinated," "elect," or "saved," are applied indiscriminately to all the baptized, or to all members of the Churches to whom the Epistles were written. Such terms are not given to a few only amongst professing Christians, as might have been expected from the theory of an irrespective decree of salvation, but are equally applied to all. The Thessalonian Christians, e.g. are told to remember their election, not as if it had conferred special grace on a few only, which insured their salvation, but as being the privilege of all. However unworthy the lives of some of the baptized, as were those of the Corinthians, all are equally spoken of as being elect and chosen to salvation; as many as had been baptized into Christ had put on Christ; all equally had been sanctified and saved in the laver of baptism. Individuals are spoken of as elect to remind them of their privileges, that they had the means of grace and the hope of glory, and to urge them to make their calling and election sure; and not only so, but as a ground of comfort and confidence. If God be for us, if we are elected to salvation according to His purpose and grace, what can hinder the fulfilment of His will? what "can separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord?"

But in describing the whole body of the baptized as being "saved," we may be certain that the word could not be used in an absolute sense as intimating final salvation. All the baptized, as the Scriptures plainly declare or intimate, will not finally be saved. Hence we must consider another doctrine clearly revealed in Scripture, and especially brought before us in the Apostolic epistles, the possibility of those who are elect, baptized, or saved, finally falling from grace. This possibility is not only indirectly intimated, but also clearly and positively declared. It is intimated in the warnings with which the Epistles abound, addressed to the elect or baptized, that they will be saved if they hold the confidence and rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end. "Take heed, brethren," says the Apostle, "lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God, but exhort one another daily while it is called to-day, lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, for we are made partakers of Christ if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end" [Heb. iii. 6, 12-14; see also Gal. vi. 9; Col. i. 23; 1 Thess. iii. 8; Heb. x. 36; Rev. iii. 3].

The meaning of these passages is unmistakeable: they clearly imply that the final attainment of salvation is conditional, and depends upon our own earnestness and watchfulness in the spiritual warfare—our continuance in faith and obedience unto the end. But the Apostles not only intimate that the attainment of salvation is conditional, they imply, or rather assert, the possibility of a final fall from grace. There are some striking passages bearing on this point in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Thus in the 4th chapter [ver. 1]: "Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into His rest, it should appear that any of you failed of it"—or were shut out of heaven, as the disobedient Israelites out of the promised land. Again, "it is impossible for those who were once enlightened and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good Word of God, and the powers of the world to come, "to have fallen into apostasy" (καὶ παραπεσόντας) and renew them again unto repentance, . . . whose end is to be burned" [vi. 4-8]. "If we sin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries" [x. 26, 27]. "Now the just shall live by faith, but if he draw back, My soul shall have no pleasure in him: but we are not of them who draw back unto perdition" [x. 38, 39]. See Ezek. xviii. 24 (LXX.), where the righteous man (δίκαιος) is also spoken of as turning away from his righteousness, and dying in his iniquity: also 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21.

Not only, however, is the possibility of a final fall from grace clearly intimated, but in no instance do we read of Christians as being absolutely assured of salvation. St. Paul was one of the elect, and yet his language respecting himself always implies that his election as regards final salvation was only conditional. He counts not himself to have apprehended, or already gained the heavenly prize, but says, "I press towards the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" [Philip. iii. 12-14]. And again, with allusion to the same metaphor, "I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest by any means when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway."[1] When the end of his Apostolic course approached, then we hear words of subdued confidence: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness" [2 Tim. iv. 7, 8]. When speaking of the faithful at Philippi, of whose salvation he was most assured, he does not go beyond words of strong hope or confident expectation: "he is persuaded of this (has a confident hope or assured belief, but not an absolute certainty) that He who hath begun a good work in them will continue or bring it to an end (ἐπιτελέσει) until the day of Jesus Christ" [i. 6]. Again, some are spoken of in the same Epistle [iv. 3] whose names are written in the Book of Life,[1] which has been thought to imply a certainty of their final salvation—a supposition which cannot be admitted since the danger or possibility at least of being blotted out of the Book of Life is elsewhere clearly intimated, "he that overcometh, I will not blot his name out of the Book of Life" [Rev. iii. 5].

[1] Ἀδόκιμος, unfit for or unworthy of, and thus losing the prize. Dr. Burton (Greek Testament in loc.) refers in illustration of the meaning of this word to James i. 12, δόκιμος γενόμενος λήψεται τὸν στέφανον τῆς ζωῆς.

To sum up the teaching of Holy Scripture, which is brought before us in the quotation already given. Predestination is God's decree to bestow upon certain persons the blessings of the Gospel; this decree is assigned to God's sovereign purpose and grace, and is represented to shew that it is fixed and unalterable, as before the foundation of the world or from eternity: it is not to be attributed to man's foreseen merits, but only to God's sovereign will. Election is the carrying out of this decree of predestination by God's choice of individuals upon whom He bestows the blessings of redemption and salvation, and is carried into effect when they are admitted into the Church by baptism. Thus election is spoken of as regards collective bodies or churches, and also individuals: individuals are elect, and also the whole body of the baptized are God's elect people, predestinated to salvation. God had formerly an elect people—the Jews: foreseeing their rejection of the Gospel, He chose instead of them the Gentiles to share the privileges of His Church. This was the mystery hid from ages and generations, that "the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body"—should be admitted into the Church, by Christ's redemption renewed and glorified: or rather, that the Church—the partition wall being finally broken down — should gather together in one all nations, Jew and Gentile, united in Catholic communion: "even" us, says the Apostle, "whom He hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles."

But an objection has been made against the teaching of Holy Scripture, that the elect and the baptized are synonymous—that the elect are often spoken of as holy persons living in a state of favour and acceptance with God (as in some of the passages before quoted). Thus God works miracles for the sake of His elect: He hears their prayers "as they cry day and night to Him:" and St. Paul "endured all things for the elect's sake." Such statements, at first sight, may lead to the supposition that the elect, as such, are God's faithful and obedient servants. But such an inference, though plausible, is certainly without foundation. Men may be holy by profession, as certainly all the baptized are, though as regards many of them, the duties and obligations which that profession implies are forgotten and neglected. Should we find it difficult to reconcile with the declaration of Scripture, the nominal or professional holiness only of multitudes of the baptized, and think that its statements would thus be deceptive or unreal, let us consider the type of the Christian Church, or the Jewish election, and we shall clearly perceive that the objection is baseless, since holiness is affirmed in the most unreserved terms of the Jewish Church, though it is certain that such declarations can only be understood with considerable latitude or a vast number of exceptions. The Jews are spoken of as a holy nation, a peculiar people. Balaam, speaking by Divine inspiration, says, "God hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath He seen perverseness in Israel" [Numb. xxiii. 21]. Now, compare this with another account of the same people: "The Lord said unto Moses, I have seen this people, and behold it is a stiff-necked people" [Exod. xxxii. 9], or with the description given of them by their own lawgiver, "From the day that thou didst depart out of Egypt until ye came to this place ye have been rebellious against the Lord" [Deut. ix. 7]. Strange account to hear of a "holy" nation, in whom God "had seen no iniquity," a "peculiar people," a "kingdom of priests," consecrated to the Lord's service! It is at least unquestionable that men may in a certain sense be called holy as being such by profession (as were the Jews), and that the word does not necessarily imply real holiness. Yet let it not be supposed that the language of Scripture is in any degree delusive or can justly be charged with unreality. Israel was a holy nation: to them pertained "the adoption, the glory, the covenant, the giving of the law, the service of God and the promises," and amidst multitudes of rebels and idolaters, there were thousands who had not bowed the knee to the image of Baal"—holy persons, God's true and accepted servants: just as we read at a later period of their history of some "who departed not from the temple day and night, serving God with fasting and prayers."

The Christian Church, as Bishop Pearson says in his Exposition of the Creed [Art. IX.], may be spoken of as holy in four ways [1], by vocation [a holy calling, 2 Tim. i. 9]; [2] in reference to the offices appointed, and the powers exercised, which in their institution and operation are holy; [3] by profession and engagement [2 Tim. vii. 2, 19]; [4] in regard to the end or object of the Church, for the purchasing of a holy and precious people; for the begetting and increasing of holiness, that God may hereby bring men to the fruition of Himself. The Church, also, as Bishop Pearson afterwards says, "is really holy in this world in relation to all godly persons contained in it by a real infused sanctity." Thus, our profession of faith, acknowledging as we must, the ungodliness of multitudes in the mystical body, is neither unmeaning nor unreal, but simply and absolutely true: "I believe in one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church."

Such is the teaching of Holy Scripture on election, which is confirmed by the testimony of the Ancient Church. The Fathers generally, as Bingham says,[2] did not think that by elect was meant a few, but the whole body of Christians,

[1] A metaphor taken from the Old Testament: see Exod. xxxii. 32; Psa. lxix. 23; Dan. xii. 1.

[2] Antiquities, bk. i. c. 1.

"but all who by the waters of baptism had entered into the Church." Hence also, as might be expected, the Fathers expressly teach or imply that the elect or the baptized may finally perish. Thus St. Clement of Rome, in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, speaks of the whole "brotherhood of Christians being the elect people of God," bidding them "lift up holy and unpolluted hands to God, who hath made us a part of His election."[1] St. Ignatius, in his Epistle to the Trallians, addresses their church as elect; and speaks of the Church at Ephesus as "predestinated before the world began to an enduring and unchangeable glory." In the Shepherd of Hermas we read of the elect as synonymous with the baptized Church, and of the possibility of a final fall from grace. "He said unto me, Canst thou tell these things to the elect of God? the Lord hath sworn by His glory concerning the elect—that day being pre-determined—that if any man shall even now sin, he shall not be saved."[2] "Go, therefore, and relate these wonderful things [magnalia] to the elect of God. . . . Woe to the doubtful ones who hear these words and despise them; it had been better for them not to have been born."[3] St. Justin Martyr says of Christians: "We are not a despicable people, for God hath elected (ἐξελέξατο) us, and was manifested to those who asked not for Him. . . . Christ called him (Abraham) with His voice by the like calling, and commanded him to go out of the land in which he was dwelling. Yea, and He hath called us all by that voice, and we have now gone out of that way of life [πολιτείας] in which we were living like the other inhabitants of the world, in sin, and together with Abraham we shall possess the Holy Land, receiving our inheritance for endless ages, being the children of Abraham through a like faith."[4] St. Irenæus says: "The Church is the congregation [synagoga] of God, which God, that is the Son, hath collected through Himself."[5] And again, "the variegated sheep were Jacob's wages, and Christ's wages are men from various and diverse nations met together in one cohort of faith."[6]

It is unnecessary to add further quotations in proof of this view of election so clearly taught in Scripture and by the Fathers. We may go on to consider another theory which also rests upon Scriptural and patristic authority, and which at first sight may appear to differ essentially from the one already set forth, namely, the theory of predestination to life from God's foresight of the Christian's perseverance in faith and holiness [ex prævisis meritis]. It may be shewn first that this theory of predestination was generally held by the Fathers from the second century, though not to the exclusion of the view already given, with which it is not really inconsistent. Thus, in the words of St. Clement of Alexandria, "there is one ancient and Catholic Church which collects together those already ordained or fitly disposed [ἤδη κατατετάγμενους], whom God predestinated [πρόωρισε], having known before the foundation of the world that they would be righteous."[7] St. Jerome thus explains Rom. viii. 30-32: "To predestinate is the same as to foreknow; therefore, whom He foresaw would be conformed (to the image of His Son) in this world, He purposed (voluit) that they should be conformed to Him in glory; . . . whom He foresaw would believe, those He called, for calling collects the willing, not the unwilling"[8] (invitos). Theodoret also, in explaining the same passage, says: "He does not call merely, but calls those who have purpose [τοὺς πρόθεσιν ἐχόντας]. Those whose purpose [πρόθεσις] He foreknew He predestinated from the beginning (ἄνωθεν); and having predestinated He called; and having called He justified through baptism; and having justified He glorified, calling them sons, and bestowing upon them the grace of His Holy Spirit."[9] The commentary of St. Chrysostom on this passage is essentially the same. Thus he says: "It is not the calling alone, but the purpose of those called which works salvation." St. Ambrose also says, "Whom He predestinated those He foreknew. He did not predestinate before He foreknew, but whose merits He foreknew He predestinated them to reward."[10] And the pseudo-Ambrose: "He elected to receive the promised rewards those whom He foresaw would be devoted to Him."[11] And yet amongst the writers quoted, we find a recognition of the view that all the baptized are, in a certain sense, the elect, and that election is not to be assigned to man's foreseen merits, but to God's undeserved grace. Thus, St. Jerome, in his Commentary on the Ephesians [c. i.]: "For Paul and others like him were not chosen because they were unblameable, but are chosen and predestinated, that in after life, by good works (opera et virtutes), they may be holy and unblameable;"[12] where it cannot be doubted there is a recognition of the doctrine of baptismal election. However, the Fathers generally, from the second century, spoke of predestination as being from a foresight of good works, so that St. Prosper, in his attempted defence of the teaching of St. Augustine on predestination, is compelled to admit, on examining the teaching of the early Fathers, that almost all of them believed election to be from foreseen merits.[13]

But let us examine the two theories, and it will be found that they are not contradictory: one theory, it may be said, implicitly contains,

[1] Secs. 2, 29.
[2] Visio 2, secs. 1, 2.
[3] Lib. i. visio iv. sec. 2.
[4] Dial c. Trypho, sec. 119.
[5] Advers. Hæres. lib. iii. c. 6.
[6] Ibid. lib. iv. c. 38.
[7] Stromata, lib. vii. c. 17.
[8] St. Hieronymi Opera, tom. xi. [Migne ed.]
[9] Comment. in St. Paul's Epist. in loc.
[10] De Fide, lib. v. c. 6.
[11] Inter Ambrosii Oper. tom. ii. [Migne ed.]
[12] St. Hieronymi Opera, tom. vii. [Migne.]
[13] "Retractatis priorum de hac re opinionibus pœne omnium par invenitur et una sententia, qua præpositum et prædestinationem Dei secundum præscientiam receperunt; et ob hoc Deus alios vasa honoris, alios contumeliæ fecerit, quia finem uniuscujusque præviderit, et sub ipso gratiæ adjutorio in qua futurus esset voluntate et actione præsciverit." [St. Prosper, Epist. ad August. inter opera August. tom. ii. Epist. ccxxv.]

and almost necessarily leads to the other. The one theory may be called "predestination to grace" —the first step to the attainment of eternal life— which is to be attributed only to God's sovereign will and unmerited favour: the other view may be termed "predestination to glory," which is conditional, and depends upon our own improvement of the gifts of grace. Election, as we have seen, is always spoken of in Scripture as being, in a certain sense, connected with holiness and the final attainment of salvation; and as many of the baptized do not exhibit the fruits of holiness, and their profession is obviously nominal only, the Fathers were almost necessarily led to consider the subject from another point of view, for which we shall see the Scriptures afforded sufficient warrant; namely, as regards the persons in the visible Church to whom the word in its fullest and truest sense only belonged; who were not only predestinated to life, but conformed to the image of Jesus Christ—thus affording proof that, as the Head and members, they would be glorified together. All the baptized were adopted into the family of God, really made His sons; yet, as St. Paul intimates, there was another, a higher, more assured sonship—sonship in its most perfect sense; "for as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."

There is, as we shall shew, sufficient proof of "predestination to glory" in Holy Scripture. For, without citing the well-known passage of St. Paul in the Epistle to the Romans [viii. 30-32], the meaning of which is somewhat doubtful and uncertain,[1] we may turn to other passages. Our Lord says [Matt. xxv. 24-25], "Come ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was an hungred, and ye gave Me meat," &c. Here is predestination to glory, a kingdom prepared before the foundation of the world, the attainment of which is represented as being conditional, from a foresight of the Christian's good works or improvement of the means of grace. St. Paul, after saying "the Lord knoweth them that are His," adds, "that in a great house there are vessels, some to honour and some to dishonour, and that if any one shall have cleansed himself from these (the defilement of sin and sinners), he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified and meet for the master's use" [2 Tim. ii. 21]. "God," says St. James, "hath chosen (ἐξελέξατο) the poor in this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which He hath promised to them that love Him" [ii. 5].

Here we have predestination to glory founded on God's foreknowledge of our improvement of His gifts of grace, and perseverance in faith and obedience: a statement amply confirmed by what has been before proved of the conditionality of the promises of grace and salvation, and the possibility of the righteous finally falling from grace: in other words, of the oft-repeated teaching of Scripture that man has free-will in a regenerate state. The Calvinistic theory of irrespective predestination to glory is either founded on, or necessarily implies, a denial of this truth. A Calvinist asserts, indeed, that the elect have free-will, and yet maintains that the grace given to them is always effectual to its intended purpose, turning from sin to holiness, and assuredly preserving them from a final fall from grace. But this theory of necessarily effectual grace amounts to a denial of free-will. A will necessarily swayed from without, in whatever direction, is not free-will at all: the word becomes a "titulus sine re," without corresponding or intelligible meaning. It is absolutely certain, according to the Calvinistic theory, that the regenerate have not free-will. "Behold," says our Lord, "I stand at the door and knock, if any man open to Me, I will come in to him." Can we mistake the necessity here implied of man's voluntary co-operation with grace. Christ knocks: all do not heed the Saviour's call, and why does one rather than another open the door? Can we doubt that it is owing to himself, his faithful use or abuse of free-will? [see 2 Cor. v. 20, vi. 1, 2]. Rejecting the Pelagian and semi-Pelagian heresies condemned by the Second Council of Orange [II. Aurausicanum; A.D. 529], and fully maintaining that it is only through grace that we can believe and obey God's commandments, and that it is "in and through Him alone that all good works can be begun, continued and ended," it must also be asserted, according to express teaching of Scripture, that God has endowed man with free-will to accept or refuse the offers of grace, and that his salvation depends upon its faithful use.

Thus has been set forth the scriptural and Catholic teaching of predestination to grace and also of predestination to glory, founded on God's foreknowledge; Holy Scripture teaching, as we have fully proved, that predestination to grace is wholly unmerited on our part.[2] A few additional remarks are required, confirming and illustrating St. Paul's teaching, especially in the ninth chap-

[1] The interpretation of this passage mainly depends on the word προέγνω (foreknew), which may have different meanings. The Greek Fathers, generally, thought that it referred to the foreseen character of the predestinated, that is, that God predestinated those whom He foresaw would live and persevere in faith and obedience (predestination to glory). This word, however, will equally bear another sense: to "know" often means in Scripture, to "approve of" or "love." "God knows (γινώσκει) or loves the way of the righteous" [Psa. i. 6]; "Depart from Me, I never knew you" [Matt. vii. 23]; "The Lord knoweth them that are His" [2 Tim. ii. 19]. The word προέγνω is afterwards used by the Apostle in this Epistle in reference to predestination in the sense, most probable, of "loved:" "God hath not cast away His people whom He foreknew" [Rom. xi. 2], i.e. "loved" [comp. with Amos iii. 2, where "known" can only mean favoured or loved]. According to this more probable meaning of the word, the passage will have reference to "predestination to grace"—the "foreknown" or loved being those chosen from the rest of mankind who are the objects of God's undeserved favour and grace. It may be added that all the Greek Fathers interpreted "justified" and "glorified" in the passage before us of the gifts of baptismal grace.

[2] This is equally true of the type under the Old Dispensation. The following passages will shew that the Jewish election is assigned not to the merits of the chosen race, but only to God's sovereign purpose and undeserved mercy or grace, Deut. ix. 46, xxvi. 18; Psa. xxxiii. 12, cxv. 1; Ezek. xx. 5-11.

ter of the Romans, in which he silences the gainsayer, not by attempting to prove the justice of God's dealings, but simply by alleging His sovereign purpose and inscrutable will. The mysteriousness of the election of grace is evident from the fact, that to some nations only, and thus to certain individuals, has the Gospel been preached; others have been left in heathen darkness, "without hope and without God in the world." The Apostle St. Paul was forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia, and when he essayed to go into Bithynia was not suffered by the Spirit [Acts xvi. 6]. In a vision he saw a man of Macedonia, saying, "Come and help us," by which he gathered that the Lord had called him to preach the Gospel there. Our Lord also clearly intimates God's sovereignty in the bestowal of His good gifts, when He says that many widows were in Israel in the days of Elisha, but to none of them was he sent but to a widow of Sarepta [Luke xiv. 25-27], and that if the mighty works done in Chorazin and Bethsaida had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes [Matt. xi. 21]. Such is God's mysterious decree of predestination to grace (widely differing indeed from the Calvinistic theory of an irrespective decree of salvation, since it does not imply that all to whom the Gospel is not preached, whatever may be their state of darkness and ignorance, will be eternally lost), but still a mysterious decree, not to be fathomed by man's wisdom or reconciled to his notions of equity. "Nay, but O man who art thou that repliest against God? shall the thing formed say to Him that formed it, Why hast Thou made me thus?"

The Church of England recognises the doctrine of predestination in its twofold aspect. The doctrine of predestination to grace is implied in the Catechism, in which every baptized child is taught to "believe in God the Holy Ghost, who sanctifieth him and all the elect people of God," and in the Collect of All Saints' Day, where the elect are spoken of as knit together in one communion and fellowship in the mystical body of Christ, or in the Church, the elect unquestionably meaning all the baptized or members of the Church. In the 17th Article predestination to glory is affirmed; and according to the wording of the Article, no other interpretation appears tenable than that all the elect or the predestinate are there represented as being finally saved. "Predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God, . . . to deliver from curse and damnation those whom He hath chosen in Christ. Wherefore they which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God be called, and at length by God's mercy they attain to everlasting felicity."

We have before explained the doctrine of predestination to life from God's foreknowledge of perseverance in holiness, and shewn that this doctrine afterwards met with general acceptance. In the Middle Ages different opinions were held as to the cause of predestination, some, as St. Thomas Aquinas, attributing it to the mere will or good pleasure of God, and others to His foresight of holiness and perseverance; but all believed in the assured salvation of the elect or predestinated. Afterwards, in the controversy between Calvinists and Arminians, in the seventeenth century, both parties believed in the final salvation of the elect. They differed on the important point of the moving cause of God's election—whether from a foresight of the believer's holiness and perseverance in grace, or merely from His own sovereign will or good pleasure. Hence the compiler of the Article takes for granted what was admitted or believed by both parties, but leaves undecided or an open question the point of dispute between them. We do not read in the Article of "foreseen merits or obedience" (Arminianism) or of God's "mere will and pleasure" (Calvinism). That the point in dispute between the rival parties is intentionally left undecided, is obvious from a comparison of the Article itself with contemporaneous confessions of faith that are avowedly Calvinistic,[1] since in all of them the cause of predestination is clearly stated (God's mere will or pleasure), nor can any reason be given why a similar clause was not inserted in the 17th Article, had the Reformers intended an exclusively Calvinistic sense. An attempt was afterwards made by the LAMBETH ARTICLES[2] to engraft a definite or Calvinistic meaning on the Article which it did not previously bear. But this important point in dispute is left undecided by our Church, after the example of the Western Church in the Middle Ages; to which may be added that of the Roman Catholic Church since the Reformation.

ELEMENTS. [EUCHARIST.]

ELEMENTS, Divine and human, in Holy Scripture. The co-existence of these is the source of the difficulty which many feel in accepting the doctrine of the perfect Inspiration of the sacred writers. That there is a human as well as a Divine element in the composition of the Bible is a simple matter of fact. On the one hand, God has granted a Revelation; on the other, human language has been made the channel to convey it, and men have been chosen as the agents to record it. The same fact is apparent when we consider the varieties of diction which meet us as we examine the Hebrew or the Greek text, arising partly from the changes undergone by the Hebrew language during the lapse of centuries, partly from the natural genius and personal peculiarities of the writers of either Testament. This variety is also apparent, as we notice the differences in point of style between the prophetical and historical parts of Scripture, as well as between the different prophets and historians

[1] Thus, in the Scoticana Confessio: "Ex mera gratia elegit nos." In the Belgica Confessio, "pro mera et gratuita bonitate elegit." In Confessio Helvetica, "prædestinavit vel elegit libere et mera sua gratia, nullo hominum respectu." Niemyer, Confessionum Collectio, 1840.

[2] As in the Second Article: "The moving or efficient cause of predestination to life is not the foresight of faith, or perseverance, or good works, or anything which is inherent in persons predestinated, but the sole will of God's good pleasure."

themselves. St. Paul has expressed this fact succinctly: "We are labourers together with God" [1 Cor. iii. 9].

To shew how this union of elements so widely separate can be effected, and how their combination secures the infallible authority of the Bible, is the object of the Dynamical theory of INSPIRATION, by which it is meant that the Divine influence acted upon the faculties of each sacred writer in accordance with their natural laws—e.g. God alone was the source of such or such a communication; human agency was but the condition under which that communication, through the channel of Holy Scripture, became known to mankind.

And here it may be well to examine, in order to point out its defectiveness, an illustration adduced by many as explanatory of the co-existence of the Divine and human elements in the Bible, viz. the union of the Divine and human Natures in the Person of Christ. Were we, indeed, to regard human language as an abstract entity when we speak of Holy Scripture,—just as human nature is regarded when we speak of the mystery of the Incarnation,—it might, perhaps, be legitimate to say that the Holy Ghost is manifest in the Old and New Testament, as the Eternal Word was "manifest in the flesh." In this sense, however, we deal with a vague generality which affords no aid whatever in explaining the nature of Inspiration, for we speak of language irrespectively of tongue, or dialect, or the particular person who writes; whether the language be Hebrew or Greek, or the writer the author of the earliest or of the latest book of the Bible. But on the other hand, when the consideration of the different sacred writers is included,—and on this the importance ascribed to the illustration altogether rests—language is regarded from an entirely different point of view. It is now no longer an abstraction, but the actual expression of different types of human thought and human intellect. We now deal with the language of Ezekiel or of St. Paul—language which, as it meets us in the Bible, is exalted and moulded by Inspiration; but which, without that Divine influence, must ever have retained the alloy of human imperfection. In a word, many would gladly find in that fallen humanity in which the sacred penmen confessedly share, some foundation for the alleged imperfections which they profess to discover in the pages of Scripture. It is here that the fallacy lies which lurks under the plausibility of this illustration. In order to render the illustration of the Incarnation in any degree applicable, a parallel must be instituted between the first members of the two combinations of the human and the Divine which are assumed to be analogous;—in other words, between the human nature which is included in our Lord's Person, and those human characteristics of the writers of Scripture of which language is but the symbol and the exponent. But this is a parallel which cannot be drawn. There can be no comparison between the spotless nature taken upon Him by the Divine Word, and that nature weakened, and sin-defiled, and subject to all the influences of passion and prejudice, which is inherited by the sons of men.

ELEVATION. The lifting up of the Eucharistic elements towards heaven after their consecration. [I.] In the ancient Liturgies it is directed that the priest shall elevate the Holy Bread, saying, τὰ ἅγια τοῖς ἁγίοις, or "Sancta sanctis." This has been ordinarily interpreted, "Holy things to holy persons;" and with reference to the Communion which shortly followed. But Archdeacon Freeman has given reasons for concluding that the true interpretation is "Holy things to holy places," and that the rite was intended to symbolize the association of the sacred elements with the "Holy Place" [Heb. ix. 12], where Christ is offering His perpetual sacrifice before the throne of His Father. "The idea is, that the Body and Blood of Christ, mysteriously exhibited here on earth may, by contact with the heavenly altar on which Christ Himself is ever presented—Himself as Victim offered by Himself as Priest—be fulfilled with celestial efficacy; may partake of the virtue and glory of that sacrifice, not only as it was offered at the first, but as it is in heaven, having received celestial ratification by being carried up into the Holy of Holies" [Freeman's Princ. Div. Serv. Introd. to part ii. p. 176]. The rite is generally supposed by Ritualists to have been derived from the Jewish heave-offering. [II.] Another elevation was introduced into the Roman Liturgy in the twelfth century, and into the Mozarabic in the sixteenth (by Cardinal Ximenes), which immediately follows the words of Institution. In the Mozarabic Liturgy this elevation of both elements is followed (at a later part of the service) by the ancient and primitive elevation of the one element as already described; but the latter is not now recognised in the Roman Liturgy. The object of this more modern rite was to bring out strongly the idea of adoration, a rubric being introduced by Gregory X., about A.D. 1271, enjoining the celebrant and people to kneel and adore. But it is observable that no such rubric was ever introduced into the Anglican Liturgy, in which the direction was, "Post hæc verba" [the words of Institution], "inclinet se sacerdos ad hostiam et postea elevet eam supra frontem ut possit a populo videri;" and for the Cup, "Hic elevet sacerdos parumper calicem . . . Hic elevet calicem usque ad pectus vel ultra caput, dicens Hæc quoticscunque feceritis, in Mei memoriam facietis." In the Roman rubric the words are—"Prolatis verbis consecrationis statim hostiam genuflexus adorat."

ELOHIM, a noun plural, is the name which, in the Hebrew Scriptures, stands for GOD. When used to signify the true God, it is commonly used with a singular verb, or adjective. Being the abstract name for God, it is applied also to false gods and idols, and even in the case of false gods this plural substantive is sometimes used when only one is intended. The plural noun, however, is never used with the singular verb in the case of false gods. Thus, while it expresses the universal idea of God in the abstract, it seems also by its form to be intended to signify the Triune character of the true God, who was personally revealed to the Hebrews under a name which is never given to any but Himself, the sacred name JEHOVAH. It will be more suitable to treat of the distinction between these two names under that heading. Let it suffice in the present place to notice the fact that the two names, though both applied to the Divine Being, have an entirely different purpose. Elohim expresses the abstract idea of godhead, whether the god thus spoken of be the true God or a false one. Jehovah is the personal name of the Covenant God of Israel, and His special revelation of Himself and covenanted relationship with the chosen race are always implied when this name is used. A school of critics has chosen arbitrarily to break up the books of the Old Testament into Elohistic and Jehovistic sections, attributing them to different writers. The attempt, however, has been a glaring failure, each section requiring to be further subdivided, for in fact it was found that the supposed Elohist sometimes used also the name Jehovah, and vice versa. The use of the two names arises not from any difference of theological language between various writers, but from the difference of idea which had to be expressed. This criticism—like many false criticisms—has proved to be of service in bringing out the special significance of many passages in which the name Jehovah occurs. The beautiful meaning of such passages would often have been missed, had not controversial criticism made it necessary to shew how inappropriate the mere general name Elohim would have been in the same place.

A few passages will suffice to exhibit the use of this word.

[1.] God in general. The object of worship. "Thou shalt have no other ELOHIM but Me" [Exod. xx. 3]. "Jehovah, He is the Elohim, Jehovah, He is the Elohim" [1 Kings xviii. 39]. "They are no Elohim, but the work of men's hands" [2 Kings xix. 18].

[2.] A god, a false god. "Against all the Elohim of Egypt" [Exod. xii. 12]. "Baalzebub the Elohim of Ekron" [2 Kings i. 2]. "Ashtoreth the Elohim of the Zidonians" (a female object of worship) [1 Kings xi. 5].

[3.] A representation of God, an idol. "Make us Elohim to go before us" [Exod. xxxii. 1].

These uses of the word are naturally derived from its primary use as designating the true object of worship, the God of Israel. It need not surprise us that the word should be transferred in its plural integrity to these false objects of worship. However, in its true application, it might indicate the plurality of persons in Jehovah, the true, the Triune God, yet it would naturally be applied to those beings who were falsely erected into the position of God, with consideration for the relationship only, not with any thought of the internal essential character of the being to whom the worship was paid.

The word EL, and ELOAH, the singular form of this word, is of rare occurrence except in poetical books. "Neither shall he regard the Elohim of his fathers, nor The Desire of women, nor regard Eloah" [Dan. xi. 37]. "My El, My El, Why hast Thou forsaken Me?" [Psa. xxii. 1].

The primary meaning of the word (God, in general) necessarily caused its principal use to be in designation of the true God. He is continually spoken of by this name. Sometimes the article is prefixed, in order to give additional emphasis. More often it is left out. "Elohim, Thou art My El" [Psa. lxiii. 1]. "This is none other but the house of Elohim, and this is the gate of heaven" [Gen. xxviii. 17]. "Enoch walked with the Elohim" [Gen. v. 22].

The word is used in this sense in passages far too numerous to be quoted.

The word Elohim is moreover applied in a subordinate and derived sense to those whom God has invested with His own majesty in any degree. Thus we may add two more significations, although it belongs rather to the lexicon to explain them.

[4.] Representatives of God, angels. "Thou hast made him a little lower than Elohim" [Psa. viii. 6]. "Worship Him all ye Elohim" [Psa. xcvii. 7].

[5.] Representatives of God, judges, kings, &c. "His master shall bring him to the Elohim" [Exod. xxi. 6].

[6.] Sons of God, the covenanted people as called to partake of the Divine Nature. "I said ye are Elohim, and all of you the sons of the Most High" [Psa. lxxxii. 6].

Our Lord explains this as being said of those "to whom the Word of God came," and implies that it is a mystery, a hard saying, for He adds that however difficult this may seem to be, yet the Scriptures must be taken in their true meaning, for they "cannot be broken" [John x. 35]. He then proceeds to vindicate His own claim to be the Son of God, apparently intending to lead them to recognise His own Divinity as the means of their deification. The covenanted people were to become partakers of the Divine Nature by union with Him who was truly God Incarnate.

It is plain that all these meanings except the first are only subordinate or transferred meanings. The idol receives the name Elohim because there is no other name that would express the honour falsely given to that idol. The word Elohim belongs properly and solely to Him who alone is God. The singular form remained in use only in poetical or philosophical language, unless its more abstract character were made manifest by some adjective or other addition. The plural form expressed that plurality of persons which was somewhat vaguely recognised by the Jewish mind as constituting the true idea of the true God. "Jehovah Elohim said, Lo, the man has become as one of us" [Gen. iii. 22].

In their strict watchfulness to guard the truth of the Divine Unity, the language of the Jewish writers surrendered its grammatical demands to the theological necessity, and the Name in its plural form was treated as a singular noun when it referred to the one, the only God, the God of Israel, Jehovah.

EMANATION [e from, and manare to flow]. The name given by the Latin writers to a theory of Creation which arose at Alexandria out of a fusion of the Persian worship of light and the Platonic theory of ideas. According to the doctrine of the former, the Divine operation was symbolized under the image of the rays of light issuing from the sun, which were most intense when nearest to the luminous substance of that body of which they were part, decreasing in intensity as they receded from their source, until at last they disappeared altogether in darkness. So the spiritual effulgence of the Supreme Mind formed a world of spirit, the intensity of which varied inversely with its distance from its source, until at length it vanished in matter. Plato, on the other hand, beginning from the opposite pole, regarded the world of reality as a series of ideal existences, ascending from the limit of matter and sensation, becoming more abstract and at the same time more real at every step, until they culminated in the Supreme Existence, who was at once absolutely real and had suffered abstraction of every attribute by which it could be named or described save that of existence. [CONCEPTUALISM.] These two views, thus, although not identical in outward form, exactly cover each other; and if we conceive the Platonic metaphysics clothed in the new metaphor of light, and the Persian symbol of expanding rays, integrated into a series of stages corresponding with the Platonic ideas, we shall arrive at a just analysis of the origin and nature of the theory of Emanations.

According to that theory, God (like the Supreme Idea) is the Unspeakable, the Unutterable, the Unknown Father, βύθος or Abyss of Being: and the world consists of a chain of ever-expanding Æons, "copulata habet sibi beata et gloriosa sæcula neque numero neque prolixitate æstimanda" [Aug. contr. Man. Ep. quam vocant fundamenti], which are increasing attenuations of His substance, and the sum of which constitute His "fulness," πλήρωμα, i.e. a perfect or complete revelation of His hidden Being. Outside of and beyond the πλήρωμα is the κένωμα, or empty void of matter, into which σόφια, the last of the Æons falls away, in the attempt to attain to the complete knowledge of the βύθος. This relapse into matter produces the visible world, the work of a Demiurge sprung from σόφια. The perturbation in the πλήρωμα produced by this relapse was, according to some, adjusted before the world came into being by the two co-ordinate Æons, Christ and the Holy Spirit; according to others, the process takes place in time.

On the value of this theory of the world it may be remarked, [1] that although the series of Æons is said to return to its source in some way, there seems to be no reason in the theory itself why it should do so, God being regarded as an inexhaustible source, and the process of Divine operation merely in a line away from Him, as the stream from the spring. Emanation, therefore, does not properly involve any view of redemption or reconciliation. [2] On the other hand it must be confessed to proceed from a very vivid sense of the reality of the spiritual world; and [3] to be valuable as one of the earliest anticipations of the modern doctrine of evolution and of continuity between the Spiritual and Material, by which the Dualism of ordinary thought is sought to be bridged over.

Relation to Christianity. We may infer from the frequent occurrence of words and arguments apparently connected with this theory, that some form of it was known at the time the Epistles to the Philippians, Ephesians, Colossians, and 1 Timothy were written.

In 1 Tim. i. 4 it is difficult to understand what the γενεαλόγιαι ἀπέραντοι are, unless the procession of the different stages of the Æons [so Tertullian, Irenæus, and others]; and the same thing seems to be meant by the θρόνοι, κυριότητες, ἀρχαὶ, ἐξουσίαι spoken of in Col. i. 16. Here, as elsewhere, in dealing with adversaries, St. Paul does not deny the existence of the Æons, nor of the πλήρωμα or sum of them; but insists that Christ is not merely one of them, as some of the Gnosticizing teachers asserted, but before them all, and that they are all δι' ἀυτοῦ and εἰς ἀυτὸν, and coexist in Him. So also He is said by His perfect sacrifice to have spoiled them (ἀπεκδυσάμενος), and to have displayed them (ἐδειγμάτισεν) as in a triumph, as included in Himself (θριαμβεύσας αὐτοὺς ἐν αὐτῷ). And the whole of the πλήρωμα is said to reside in Him (ἐν αὐτῷ κατοικεῖ πᾶν τὸ πλήρὼμα τῆς θεότητος σωματικῶς), and we to partake of it in Him (καὶ ἐστὲ ἐν αὐτῷ πεπληρωμένοι (Col. i. ii.). The expressions ἐκένωσεν ἑαυτὸν and οὐχ ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο [Phil. ii. 7] seem also to be associated with the same theory, as also "Prince of Darkness," perhaps ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης [Heb. i. 3], and "Light of light" in the Nicene Creed. [GNOSTICS. ÆON. ETERNITY.]

EMBOLISMUS. The liturgical name of an intercalation [ἐμβολισμός] inserted between the last petition of the Lord's Prayer and the Doxology in the primitive liturgies. It is always in the form of a paraphrase upon the petition, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," and varies in length, that in the Liturgy of St. James being about the length of a short collect, while in the Mozarabic Liturgy it is more than twice the length of the Lord's Prayer itself. The Embolismus was said secretly by the priest, but after saying it he repeated the Doxology aloud, and the people responded with "Amen." The Lord's Prayer having been said by the people, the Embolismus comes in thus in the Liturgy of St. James, which may be taken as a type of the others—

"And lead us not into temptation, Lord God of Hosts, who knowest our infirmities, but deliver us from the Evil One, and his works, and all his insults and devices, for Thy holy Name's sake, by which our humility is called."

Aloud. "For Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, now and ever."

People. "Amen."

As a rule the Embolismus referred to spiritual evils, but some forms of it exist in which the prayer is turned against temporal enemies; at a time, apparently, when the particular churches in which it was so used were suffering special afflictions or persecutions.

It has been supposed by some critics that the doxology of the Lord's Prayer, as it stands in St. Matthew's Gospel, was derived from the Embolismus of the Liturgy. This is a question of criticism for which reference may be made to Scrivener's Supplement to the Authorized English Version of the New Testament, Hug's Introduction to the New Testament, and to the critical commentators in general. It is sufficient here to say that the clause is omitted in only eight or nine of more than eight hundred Greek MSS., that it is rarely if ever omitted from the Versions, that it exists in the Alexandrine Codex (though absent from ℵ, B, and D), and that it is commented upon as if it were part of the Prayer itself by several of the Greek Fathers, including St. Chrysostom. [Neale's Introd. Hist. Eastern Church, 513, 626.]

ENCRATITES [Continentes]. A sect of heretics of the second century, who are said by Theodoret to have been followers of Tatian, a disciple of Justin Martyr. They were evidently a branch of the Gnostics or Ebionites, practising austerity from false principles respecting the evil origin of matter, believing in Æons, and agreeing with the Docetæ in denying the reality of our Lord's Human Nature.

ENCYCLICAL. A circular letter sent by the Pope to patriarchs, primates, archbishops, or bishops in general, or to bishops of a particular Church. It includes rescripts, bulls, briefs, and constitutions. A rescript is an apostolical letter, granting a favour from Rome to an individual who has asked for it; and receiving that name "quasi recte scripta ad observantiam juris," or "bis scripta," as containing the papal reply on paper. A bull is a letter from the Papal chancery sealed with lead (bulla), and usually containing a provision or dispensation. A brief is a shorter form issuing from the chancery or grand penitentiary without preface or preamble. A constitution is a decision and regulation made by a pope, a written law, and canonical rule. There are four kinds of rescripts; [1] of justice, where it tends to the ministration of justice, for the decisive adjustment of some legal process: in this case the Pope nominates a court of delegates, who give sentence in the matter; [2] of grace, where the Pope grants and accords aught of his sole liberality, as in dispensations, privileges, indulgences, exemptions, graces, or benedictions; [3] the mixed, where neither justice or grace are properly concerned, but both are implied, as in dispensations for marriage, the annulment of vows, &c., where a judicial procedure supplements the free act of the Pope; [4] common, where the Pope is the grantor in matters spiritual, and the sovereign in temporals towards an ecclesiastic, as in the legitimatizing of bastards, and the restoration of a criminal or infamous person.

In the early Church encyclicals were not confined to the Bishops of Rome, but were used by other bishops and churches whenever occasion required, and were of various kinds; [1] denunciatory, to abolish heresy; [2] indicative, to narrate the acts of martyrs, like that of the Church of Smyrna, touching the death of St. Polycarp; and [3] declarative, or definitive in matters of controversy, as St. Cyprian wrote de Lapsis. Owing to the rich use of Holy Scripture and Patristic authorities made in them they were called Tractatus, or Catholicæ. The Epistles of St. Peter, St. James, and St. John are encyclics.

ENERGUMENS. The name given in the primitive Church to those who were possessed. They were also called Δαιμονιζόμενοι. They were placed under the care of exorcists, and not permitted to come farther within the Church than the porch, or place of the lowest class of penitents, the flentes. Demoniacs who had been catechumens were only permitted to receive baptism at the approach of death. But if they recovered from the mysterious affliction, those who had been catechumens were baptized, and those who had already become Christians were placed among the audientes for a time until perfect recovery permitted their approach to the Holy Eucharist. [Demoniacal Possession.]

ENTHUSIASM. The word "enthusiasm," considered with reference to its etymology (ἐνθουσιασμὸς, ἔνθεος-ἔνθους), signifies the condition of a human mind directly acted upon by some Divine impulse. With the Greeks it was employed to express an intense possession of the soul, from the impulses of ordinary human passion up to what received from heathens the epithet of Divine, the Pythian or the Bacchic inspiration. But according to the meaning which has attached to it during the centuries of the Christian era, the word was used to denote a particular manifestation of the religious sentiment, differing from its ordinary manifestations rather in degree than in kind. According to this view, as religion or the religious sentiment has its foundation in a belief in the unseen, and varies in amount with the different degrees of intensity with which this belief is present to the mind; so enthusiasm is simply the condition becoming a mind in which this conviction is felt with a peculiar and abnormal intensity.

The strong sense of the personal existence of God and of His nearness to His creatures, which is the condition of all deep religious feeling, becomes intensified in some minds into a belief in a special intercommunion between themselves and their God. It is a necessary incident, however, of this intercommunion that it should be of a purely subjective character—that, in other words, the enthusiast, in so far as he is an enthusiast, should be a mystic. The Divine conversation to which he is admitted must be shared by no others,—the Divine utterances must be heard by no ear but his own. In the days, not only of the Apostles, but of the Apostolic Fathers, all the phenomena as well as all the results of enthusiasm were present amongst the Christians; but we do not call their devotion by the name of "enthusiasm." There is felt to be an unfitness in applying such a term to the zeal for their beloved Master of those who lived with Him in the flesh, or even to the ardour of their immediate successors who went in and out and conversed with men "whose hands had handled of the Word of Life." We shall see that it was not till a later date, and under very different conditions of spiritual life, that enthusiasm arose in the Church, and gave birth to those religious societies which, however mistaken in their inception, or corrupt in their decline, we may yet believe to have been God's instruments for the revival of true religion amongst His people.

The causes which led to their rise may readily be traced. The strength and activity of religious sentiment, always, humanly speaking, liable to decrease in the Church, as years rolled on and the life of Christ receded further and further into the past, was yet invigorated through the earlier ages of Christianity by the stimulus of Pagan persecutions. But when this was removed, and the Church began to feel the deadening influence of temporal prosperity, from thenceforth its spiritual life began to languish and decay. The increasing political power of the head of the Western Church, and, as a necessary consequence, the increasing worldliness and arrogance of the priestly body, had their effect upon the religious sentiment of the general mass of believers: and the enthusiastic movements of the Middle Ages represent their noble revolts against the growing irreligion arround them. To give a detailed account of these movements, and of those which at other periods of its history agitated the Church, would be foreign to the purpose of this work; but it may not be out of place to glance briefly at the history of one of them, typifying, as it does in many important features, the general character of the others.

In the thirteenth century, the temporal power of Rome stood perhaps at its greatest height; and in the presence of its inordinate earthly splendour the minds of men were becoming more and more estranged from its spiritual rule. The universal discontent which prevailed is evidenced by the numerous religious associations which, whether distinguished from each other as Flagellants, Josephins, Publicani, Waldenses, or grouped together under the general name of Albigenses, protested against the pride and luxury of their spiritual lords. It was in this crisis, and in the year A.D. 1210, that a young man of some eight-and-twenty years, the son of a merchant of Assisi, in Umbria, journeyed to Rome to obtain the sanction of the Pope to the rule of life which he had just promulgated among his newly-assembled disciples. Innocent III., as politic as he was cruel, had not been blind to the signs which manifested themselves in the life of the Church; and he recognised in the strange youth who had surrendered fair prospects of temporal wellbeing to devote himself to a life of singular austerity, the spokesman of a general religious movement which would rend the worldly power of the Papacy in twain, unless, by placing himself at the head of this movement, he could contrive to guide it to his own ends. Accordingly he confirmed with his verbal approbation the rule instituted by this young man—known to posterity as St. Francis of Assisi—and the order of Franciscans was formally established. Its rule was of the most rigorous character. To the vows of chastity and obedience common to all the monastic orders, St. Francis had added a vow yet more stringent than theirs. The brethren were to labour with their hands, and were to be maintained by alms. Such was the ideal life held out to Europe in an age which had already begun to learn luxury with increasing wealth: and in ten years' time five thousand Franciscan mendicants assembled at Assisi to celebrate the first chapter of their order. During this interval, Dominic of Castille had obtained the approval of Honorius to the establishment of his order; and thus added the second of these two famous societies which were destined to divide between them the spiritual dominion of the Catholic world. Succeeding history shews how the missionary zeal and devotion of the mendicant orders proved more than a match for the worldly influence of the secular clergy; and how the spirit which the founders of these orders had awakened gradually overspread and leavened the whole Western Church. Their attempts to share the function of preaching with the secular priests (resisted at first by pontiffs[1] who had begun to mistrust the power they had called into existence) ultimately bore down all opposition; and on the 12th October 1409, a bill of Alexander V. conferred on several of the mendicant orders full and uncontrolled powers of ministry in every part of Christendom.[2]

The vast power which has been wielded by enthusiasm, when guided and controlled by sagacious rulers, has been exemplified even in the most corrupt periods of Church History. Even in the very throes of the Reformation, when if ever the minds of men must have been the most thoroughly estranged from the Roman hierarchy, the ardour of a repentant military profligate could in a moment call thousands to the support of the Church. Ignatius Loyola, under the guidance of Paul III., founded in 1540 that famous order whose name has now become a byword for duplicity, but whose services not only to the Papal power but to mankind are great and unquestioned. [JESUITS.] Nor has the Reformed Church been without its enthusiast movements; nor without its lapses into that state which calls such movements into being. The worldliness and spiritual torpor of Anglicanism in the eighteenth century found its St. Francis of Assisi in the person of John Wesley. Unfortunately, however, the English Church had no Innocent III. to guide that self-restorative effort in the right direction. The spiritual rulers of the day preferred that Wesley should revive the religious sentiment of the country from a standpoint beyond the pale of that Church which itself so much needed a fresh infusion of religious life.

[1] Innocent IV.; see Milman's Lat. Christ. v. 45.
[2] Milman, vi. 76.

The foregoing is a brief sketch of religious enthusiasm and of the work which it has done in the Church. And whatever may be the opinion which is held with regard to enthusiasm, considered in its subjective aspect, whatever may be thought of the temper of mind which fosters and is fostered by it, the great results which it has produced must perforce enter into and modify such considerations. The periodic recurrence of enthusiastic movements in the Church—the suddenness of their rise—the width and rapidity of their spread—puzzle even sceptics who seek to account for these phenomena on purely rational hypotheses. One thing is certain that no community save that against which "the gates of hell shall not prevail" has shewn so wondrous a power of self-repair from within, of renewing by the spontaneous ardour of its own members the vigour of a religious sentiment which has been tending to dissolution. Most religions have sprung from an enthusiast and a band of disciples: no religion save Christianity has been revived from time to time by a succession of enthusiasts. The history of Mohammedanism and of the purest of the creeds of India has been the history of uniform decay. And when we consider the great and undeniable services which these enthusiast movements have rendered to true religion we shall be slow to condemn unreservedly the enthusiast spirit. When we see that the light which enthusiasm has kindled in men's minds, however fitful and delusive, has yet cast its rays to the darkest corners of the world—that its fervour, however morbid and unreal, has often given a healthy glow to the chilled heart of Christendom, we ought to conclude that it too comes from the Father of Lights: and that we should attempt wisely to direct, rather than sternly to resist, its manifestations, "lest haply we be found to fight against God."

EPIPHANY. The Epiphany, from ἐπιφαίνω, to make manifest, with a co-ordinate idea of "suddenness," expresses those several manifestations of Christ to His people which, however preordained and declared by the sure word of prophecy, have always come upon them suddenly and unexpectedly. The different senses in which the word ἐπιφανεία is used in the New Testament are reducible to "manifestation." In 2 Thess. ii. 8 it means that manifestation of the Second Advent of Christ in the unclouded majesty of truth that shall annihilate every Antichristian error. The Syriac here has "by the manifestation of His coming." In 1 Tim. vi. 14 and 2 Tim. iv. 1, 5 it means clearly the Second Advent; in 2 Tim. i. 10 the First Advent; "the Incarnation," says Theodoret; "the fleshly 'economia' of our Saviour Jesus Christ," as Phavorinus explains the word. But as a theological term it is restricted to the manifestation of Christ; whether to the Jews at His baptism, or to the Gentiles by the leading of a star. The Eastern Church of old commemorated our Lord's Nativity and that of His Baptism by the selfsame celebration on the Feast of the Epiphany, as representing the first or natural birth of our Lord, and that which is figurative of our own second birth, our Lord's Baptism in the river Jordan. The Egyptian and Armenian Churches [Leo Allatius, de Dom. et Hebd. Gr. c. 32] observed the same practice [CHRISTMAS]. A very early tradition has connected this festival with the commemoration of our Lord's Baptism. So the Apostolical Constitutions [viii. 33] say, "Keep holy the Feast of the Epiphany, for then the Godhead of Christ was made manifest; the Father gave testimony to Him in Baptism, and the Paraclete descended in the form of a dove upon Him of whom this testimony was affirmed." Hence this feast was also termed the Day of Lights, and in the Eastern Church was one of the three solemn seasons at which the sacrament of baptism was administered. Such, however, was never the practice of Churches in the Latin communion.

In the Western Church the festival has always commemorated the guiding of the Magi to Christ by the miraculous appearance of a star in the heavens. The eight homilies of Leo I. on the Epiphany assign no other rationale for its observance. Other circumstances of our Lord's early ministry have been connected with the Epiphany; such as the miracle at Cana, whence the feast was also called Bethphania, and the miracle of feeding the five thousand, which obtained for it the name of Phagiphania. The tradition, however, that connects these events with this day is of no particular value.

The miraculous star of guidance can only be accepted as the plain statement of which Scripture has presented to us the record. What it was we know not; whether it yet exists we know not; whether it will return with a periodicity connected with man's spiritual hopes we know not. The occurrence of such a marvel can hardly be called a difficulty, when the whole of our religion has been established by events that are altogether beyond the ordinary powers of nature to bring about. We can only accept the account with reverence. A notable attempt has been made to explain the phenomenon on purely natural data, which is in truth full of interest. Kepler, in his work De Jesu Christi vero Natalitio, advanced the theory founded upon astronomical calculation, that the ἀστὴρ was a conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn in the constellation Pisces. But the Greek term ἀστὴρ can hardly admit of a collective force as ἄστρον or the Latin "sidus." Suidas says, ἀστὴρ ἄστρου διαφέρει, ὁ μὲν ἀστὴρ ἕν τι ἐστί, τὸ δὲ ἄστρον ἐκ πολλῶν συνέστηκε. Moreover, the year of this conjunction does not agree with any possible year that can be assigned for our Lord's birth, and the astronomical data are rigid and unyielding. Kepler says, then, that the two planets having been in conjunction in the month of May [B.C. 7], when on the point of entering Aries they gradually receded from each other until the month of July, when their movement relative to the earth's progression becoming retrograde they again stood in conjunction in the month of September; Saturn dull indeed and distant, but Jupiter a magnificent object, as being at his nearest point to the sun and to the earth also. In a Syrian atmosphere even his satellites under such circumstances may have been visible to the naked eye. After remaining in an unaltered position for a few days, their course was resumed in the same direction, but with slackened speed, to a halt, when direct movement as at first was resumed, and for a third time the planets entered into conjunction in the month of December. As viewed from Jerusalem, they would have been on the meridian line shortly after sunset, standing as it were over Bethlehem. It is an ingenious theory; and the elements having been recalculated with care by Encke and by the secretary to the Royal Astronomical Society, C. Pritchard [Mem. of R. A. S. vol. xxv.], and so far as the December position is concerned, by the Astronomer Royal, the phenomenon may be considered to have been thoroughly well verified. But King Herod had [B.C. 7] more than eight years of life still left; and the account of St. Matthew is wholly inconsistent with the notion of any astronomical phenomenon, however beautiful and unusual in character. The star, προῆγεν, led the way, and stood over and above, ἐπάνω, where the young child lay. Astronomy, therefore, does not help us to resolve this miraculous appearance into any regular planetary combination. Ignatius, who lived with the Apostles, speaks of the star as excelling in brilliancy every other star; and says that its novelty caused universal astonishment; that the sun and moon and other heavenly bodies were as a band of satellites around it [Eph. 19]. Chrysostom says that the star appeared to the wise men some months before the Saviour's birth, as they must of necessity have taken some time to find their way to Jerusalem; and the inquiry of Herod [Matt. xi. 7] supports his notion. The wise men, Magi of Chaldæa, may have heard of the prophecy of the Mesopotamian prophet, "There shall come a Star out of Jacob" [Numb. xxiv. 17], and in that case they would have connected at once the appearance of a strange star of unusual glory with the land of Jacob. The gifts that they offered have always been held to be figurative of our Lord as God and Man, King of Kings and Lord of Lords. The gold represented His kingly authority; the frankincense the worship due to Him as God; the myrrh the precious spices of His burial as Man. [CHRISTMAS. THEOPHANY. Bingham, Ant. XX. iv. sec. 6; Coteler, Const. Apost. v. 13; Suicer, in voc. and p. 1196; Smith's Dict. of Bible, Art. STAR; Guericke, Lehrb. der Chr. Archäol.; Freeman and Procter on Lit.; Blunt's Annot. B. C. Pr.]

EPISCOPACY. An Apostolical institution, approved by Christ Himself in the Revelation, and ordained in the infancy of Christianity as a remedy against heresy and schism. It is, in a further sense, of Divine institution, as comprehended in the Apostolic office, and universally established and received, as appears from Scripture and tradition, in the Christian world at all times from the very beginning. It is the dignity of a bishop, the highest degree, the fulness of the priesthood. "All orders are in a bishop, because he is the first priest, that is, prince of priests, prophet and evangelist, and the rest, to fulfil the offices of the Church in the ministry to the faithful" [St. Hilary in Epist. ad Ephes. c. iv.]. As Thomassin says, the Incarnate Word possessed on earth the plenitude of the priesthood, and when about to depart into heaven, He communicated it to the Apostles to transmit it to their successors, and preserve it in the Church for evermore. The Apostolate or Episcopate instituted by the Son of God is the plenitude of priesthood, and comprises in an eminent degree all degrees, orders, and perfections. "All prelates," said St. Cyprian [Epist. ix. l. i.], "are successors of the Apostles in vicarious administration." And so St. Jerome, "wherever Episcopacy exists, at Rome, Eugubium, Constantinople, or Rhegium, its merit and priesthood are always one. Power of riches or the low estate of poverty make a bishop neither greater nor less than another; for all are successors of the Apostles." The collective body of bishops assembled in a general council is the head of the Church Catholic upon earth. Bishops have received succession to the entire power of the Apostles, and are called no longer priests or deacons; they are sovereign priests. They alone have the power of administering confirmation and orders, by which the plenitude of the Holy Spirit is specially conveyed; they empower priests to administer the sacraments to the people; they require a see and diocese as a king must have a capital and kingdom; they are as essential to the Church as the soul is to the body. Episcopacy has an indelible character, and possesses a threefold power of order, in the consecration and ministration of sacraments; interior jurisdiction, in the rule of Christians in the interior court of conscience; and exterior jurisdiction, in their rule in the exterior court of the Church. The benefice of a bishop, consisting in temporal accidents (enthronization, the restitution of temporalities and homage), proceeds from the sovereign, who gives him power and liberty to exercise his jurisdiction. His office held from Christ, essentially distinct and belonging to the "key" of order, being spiritual, is transmitted by episcopal consecration. Episcopacy, says St. Cyprian, is one, diffused in the harmonious multitude of many bishops, whereof every bishop has an entire part [Ep. lii. al. lv.]. The borders and bounds of bishopries were enlarged, and adventitious grandeur, with more eminent degrees of honour and a larger part in the government of the Church, was given in matters of cure and order to certain prelates as metropolitans or archbishops, primates and patriarchs, by ancient custom, by the canons of the Fathers and Councils, and by the edicts of Christian princes. [BISHOP. Du Maillane, du Droit Canonique, ii. 525; Thomassin, de Disc. Eccles. pt. i. lib. i.]

ERASTIANISM. A term formed from the name Erastus, assumed by a physician of Baden as the classic form of Lieber, his true name. He lived in the Reformation period [A.D. 1524-1583], but his name and principles were brought into prominence in England during the time of the Great Rebellion. Those principles were enunciated by Erastus in a number of Theses, after the manner of the times, which were levelled against the rigid system of discipline established by the Calvinists. This system dealt out excommunication with a lavish hand, such as threw the mediæval system into the shade, and assumed a power over the civil government such as the most extreme Ultramontanists had never attempted. Erastus formed his "Theses" into a Book on Excommunication, in which he opposed the Calvinistic system of discipline with great energy; but in doing so he minimized religion into a mere system of individualism, and left no authority over it and its professors except the State. These principles were taken up by the Independents against the Presbyterians in A.D. 1643, especially by Selden, by Thomas Coleman, vicar of Blyton, in Lincolnshire, and by the learned Dr. Lightfoot. In their case, as in that of Erastus, such principles seem to have been adopted as a refuge from the extreme tyranny of a dominant sect, and the recoil from this tyranny naturally led to an opposite extreme. After the Great Rebellion there was [1] a strong current of religious individualism among Englishmen; [2] a tendency to resist all ecclesiastical authority; and [3] an exaggerated opinion of the supreme authority of Parliament. Hence "Erastianism" has taken the modern form of a politico-religious system, in which the Church as a body is assumed to be co-extensive with the people, and its administration a department of the State; while practical religion is considered to be a matter of individual opinion and inclination, in which intellect gives the only light and conscience the only law. These principles are found in all branches of the Church in Europe, whether Eastern or Western, and also among the sects; and they have influenced legislation to a very important extent during the nineteenth century. The natural terminus of them is the ground assumed by Hobbes, who considered that Christianity is not obligatory on any one unless made so by Act of Parliament or other competent secular authority [Hobbes' Leviathan, iii. 42].

ESCHATOLOGY. That branch of theology which treats of the "last things." These have been frequently classified as "the four last things," viz., DEATH, JUDGMENT, HEAVEN, and HELL: but additional subjects must also be included in the term, and will be found treated of in this work under the words ADVENT, ANTICHRIST, CHILIASM, INTERMEDIATE STATE, PURGATORY, RESURRECTION, and under some others referred to in these articles.

ETERNAL GENERATION. Our Lord as being God must be co-eternal with the Father; eternal existence being an attribute of Godhead as distinguished from all created or finite beings. Our Lord not only has an eternal existence as God, but is the Son of the Father, and thus must have been begotten by an eternal generation.

Some of the early Fathers appear to speak of Christ as if He were merely λόγος ἐνδιάθετος, the Divine Word or Reason, immanent in the Father, but not from eternity a distinct Person of the Godhead, and that when the world was created His Personality began, being sent forth by the Father for that office. He was then λόγος προφορικὸς—the Word manifested as a distinct Person. But Bishop Bull, in his Defence of the Nicene Creed, has vindicated the teaching of the Fathers alluded to—St. Athenagoras, Tatian, St. Theophilus, and Hippolytus, and Novatian,—and has proved that their language, though requiring a candid interpretation, is really orthodox, and that the charge of Arianism made against them by Petavius is unfounded[1] [Petavii Dogmata de Trinitat. lib. i. c. 3, 4; Bull, Defensio Fid. Nicæan. lib. iii. c. 5-8].

The scriptural proof of the doctrine may be thus given. Our Lord, the Wisdom of God, is spoken of [Prov. viii. 25, LXX.] as begotten before the mountains and hills were made (πρὸ τοῦ ὄρη ἑδρασθῆναι, πρὸ δὲ τῶν πάντων βουνῶν, γεννᾷ με), an expression which means from eternity, as we find from Psa. xc. 2, LXX., where the everlasting existence of the Creator is described in similar terms (πρὸ τοῦ ὄρη γεννεθῆναι σὺ εἶ). See also Psalm cix. 3, LXX., "Before the Morning Star I have begotten Thee" (ἐκ γαστρὸς ἐγεννήσά σε), i.e. before the works of creation, or from eternity: hence in the next verse the Son is called an everlasting Priest (ἱερεὺς εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα). Our Lord, in His last prayer [John xvii.], speaks of His eternal existence with the Father in the same manner, "Glorify Me with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was." Hence, in the Nicene Creed, where it was the especial object of the council to set forth most clearly the everlasting existence of the Son of God, He is said to have been "begotten by the Father before all worlds."

Again, St. John says, "In the beginning (ἐν ἀρχῇ) was the Word, and the Word was with God (and therefore a distinct Person), and the Word was God." In the beginning means from eternity, as may be proved from the next verse, where the Evangelist says that all things were made by the Word, and therefore He must have existed before all things were created, or in accordance with the scriptural meaning of the phrase—from eternity. [See also Prov. viii. 23, LXX., where ἐν ἀρχῇ has the same meaning—"in the beginning before

[1] It is undoubtedly true that on account of our Lord's προέλευσις, or going forth to create the world, He might in a certain sense be called the Son of God, or the Firstborn; and that such language was used after the Nicene Council, and by St. Athanasius and other orthodox Fathers; but the real difficulty as regards the ante-Nicene Fathers is, that they only mention this figurative or metaphorical generation, or "going forth," without expressly stating our Lord's eternal generation from the Father as His true and only Son. Thus they give some grounds for the supposition that they only believed that our Lord's Sonship was figurative or metaphorical. Bishop Bull endeavours to prove that they must implicitly at least have held the doctrine of our Lord's true and real Sonship [see his remarks on St. Athenagoras, Defensio Fid. Nicæan. book iii. c. 5, sec. 1]; but surely we might fairly have expected that it would have been expressly stated. Acquitting the ante-Nicene Fathers of the charges of Arianism or Sabellianism, it can hardly be doubted that their language and ideas on the subject were only imperfect and inadequate: they wrote, as St. Augustine says, on another subject, "antequam hæc questio bene tractaretur in Ecclesia."

Eternity

the earth was made."] In the beginning (ἐν ἀρχῇ) has a twofold sense in Scripture, referring to time and to eternity—to time, as in the natural creation, which was in the beginning [Gen. i. 1], and to eternity, as in reference to the generation of our Lord, who, "in the beginning," was the only-begotten Son, who was in the bosom of the Father, and whom St. John speaks of as that "Eternal Life" which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us; and as being the true God and Eternal Life[1] [1 John v. 20].

ETERNITY. "Eternal" is a word of very various application in Holy Scripture and elsewhere. We shall endeavour to arrive at a conclusion as to its true meaning, by considering [1] the meaning of the words expressing it in different languages; [2] the opinions of various writers as to the conception itself.

[I.] The word eternal is represented in Sanskrit by Aditi and Nitiya; in Hebrew by olam, dor v' dor, kadmuth; in Greek by αἰὼν and αἰώνιος. To take these in their order:—

[a] Sanskrit, "Aditi," = not tied, free, boundless; unbroken, entire, unimpaired, happy, pious; freedom, security, safety; boundlessness, immensity; inexhaustible abundance; unimpaired condition; perfection; creative power (derived from a priv. and root dā or do = "divide"). Aditī (dual) = in the Vedas heaven and earth; the gods are called Adityas, or offspring of Aditi. [See the Petersburg Lexicon, s. v. and an article on Aditi by Mure, in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1866.]

The characteristic of the conception of eternity here indicated is that it stands for the sum of all things, heaven and earth, regarded as a spiritual whole. It thus = "the Absolute," of which the Vedic deities were regarded as special forms. The ideas of duration, or of the negation of duration, which enter into our conceptions of eternity, seem to be entirely absent: or to be represented by the image of boundless space.

Nitya and Nityata are exclusively durational.

[b] Hebrew "Olam," commonly derived from alom, "to hide," = "hidden," i.e. distant time; but according to Ewald it = "lasting," and is connected with the Æthiopic élat, = "time," which is from a root, = "to last." The word would thus correspond to two other Semitic words for eternity, Hebrew ad (from adah, to pass), and Arabic huld, in Koran = "eternity," but in Hebrew under the form heled, = "time." The latter word would thus = "duration," either short (Hebrew) or long (Arabic; v. Koran, Sura ii. line 23, where it = "eternity" in the sense of unbounded duration).

The use of olam or its cognates in Holy Scripture fluctuates between the three meanings of eternity, a cycle or age, and the world. In Dan. xii. 2, everlasting life = literally, "life of olam;" everlasting contempt, "contempt of olam." "He that liveth for ever," = that liveth "of olam" [ib. 7]; so in Tit. iii. 7, the Æthiopic has the cognate form "alem," "eternal." That this eternity = unlimited duration, is shewn by the parallelism in Dan. iv. 3, 34: "His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom (olam), and His dominion from generation to generation" (dor v' dor) [cf. Isa. li. 8]. In the sense of a long cycle or age [Psa. xc. 2], "from olam to olam Thou art God;" a past age [Ezra iv. 15], "of old time;" the present, ἐν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ [2 Cor. viii. 13]; Æthiopic has alem: especially the age or duration of the world [Eccles. i. 4], "one generation (dor from dûr, to move round) passeth away, and another cometh, but the earth abideth for ever" (l'olam). So the expression, "O king, live for ever" [Dan. iii. 9], the Chaldee has "almin," = Hebrew olamim, plural of olam, and apparently means no more than we mean by "Long live the king." From the signification of the duration of the world, olam had come, in the time of the Christian era, to mean "world" (κόσμος), in which sense it appears in the Mishna [B.C. 32—A.D. 180]. Thus, olam haba is the world to come, as opposed to olam hazeh, this world; and again [Aboth. v. 1], "The world (olam) was created in ten words, why could it not have been created in one?" Accordingly in Matt. iv. 8 and John i. 10, κόσμος is rendered in the Æthiopic by the cognate alem. In later Hebrew this sense had so entirely supplanted that of eternity, that Jehuda Halevi [twelfth century] asks whether the world (olam) is eternal or not: and makes use of a new word to express eternity (kadmuth), the root of which occurs in the Old Testament mainly in the sense of "early" [Psa. cxix. 147; xvii. 13, "my eyes prevent the night watches"]. Kadmuth thus = antiquity or eternity a parte ante. [v. Cosri, ed. Buxtorf, p. 362, and Gesenius, s. vv.].

The general results of this investigation would seem to be, first, that the conception of eternity in the Semitic languages is that of a long duration or series of ages; secondly, that this idea passes gradually into that of κόσμος, whilst a new idea of eternity in the sense of mere antiquity takes its place. Agreeably to this it is worth noting that the sacred writers, when they speak of eternity in any other than these senses, make use of a periphrasis: "to whom a thousand years are as one day, and one day as a thousand years."

[c] Greek αἰὼν (αἰὲν ὤν, Aristotle, more probably ἄω, to breathe: Stephan. Thes.).

1] τὸ μέτρον τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης ζωῆς [Apollon. Lex.]: so in Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, the Tragedians, Herodotus, Xenophon.

2] The soul or life: ἀπέπνευσεν αἰῶνα, Eurip Phil. Fragm. 14 = ψυχήν, Hesych.

3] The name of a God.: Αἰὼν κρόνου παῖς, Eurip. Heracl. 895; cf. Arist. de Mundo, c. 7; Varro, ap. Aug. de C. D. vii. 19; Plutarch, de I. et O. p. 363; Lactantius, de Falsa Relig. i. 12; Macrobius, i. 8, 22. Jupiter calls him father in Nonnus Dion. vii. 23, 73, ed. Musgrave. See Buttmann's Mythologus, vol. ii. p. 31, n.

4] Eternity: Æsch. Eum. 553; Soph. El. 1013; Plato, Tim. 37D (where time is regarded as εἰκονα κινητὴν τινὰ αἰῶνος), 38B; Demosth. de Cor. 257, in the ψήφισμα (where it may = "all his life long"); Plutarch, de Suav. quid Viv. 1104E, ib quæst. 1007D; de Ei Delph. 393A, &c., where it is opposed to χρόνος; Arist. de Cœlo, i. [ii.], s. q. pp. 25, 22; Philo, de Mundo, 1158, 1 a, p. 609, l. 7, ἐν αἰῶνι δὲ οὔτε παρελήλυθεν οὐδὲν, οὔτε μέλλει ἄλλα μόνον ὑφεστήκε; Plotinus, Enn. 328D, where it is thus defined: ἡ οὖν τοῦ ὄντος παντελὴς οὐσία καὶ ὅλη, οὐχ ἡ ἐν τοῖς μέρεσι μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἡ ἐν τῷ μηδ' ἂν ἔτι ἐλλείψειν, καὶ τῷ μηδὲν ἂν μὴ ὂν αὐτῇ προσγενέσθαι· οὐ γὰρ μόνα τὰ ὄντα πάντα δεῖ παρεῖναι τῷ πάντι καὶ ὅλῳ, ἀλλὰ καὶ μηδὲν τοῦ ποτὲ μὴ ὄντος· αὕτη ἡ διάθεσις αὐτοῦ καὶ φύσις εἴη ἂν αἰών· αἰὼν γὰρ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀεὶ ὄντος. Proclus, Inst., p. 82, ed. Creuzer, &c. In this sense with διὰ, ἐξ, εἰς, ἀπὸ, with or without article; but, ἀσχημονεῖν πρὸς τὸν αἰῶνα, male audire apud posteros [Longinus]. In plural, εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, and εἰς πάσας τὰς γενέας τοῦ αἰῶνος τῶν αἰώνων (New Testament), where however the whole expression appears to have the meaning of eternity, whilst αἰὼν falls back into its original signification of age or generation. A curious definition of αἰὼν is given in Zonaras, i. 64, σύστημα φυσικὸν ἐκ σωμάτων ποικίλων, λογικὰ διάφορα περιέχον, τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ γνώσεως ἕνεκα. [See Tittmann's note; also John Damascen. i. p. 153C.; Greg. Naz. Or. 38, p. 616C; Etymol. Magnum, xli. 9.] In these writers, then, the ideas of mere length of duration, or mere spatial illimitability, rise up to, and are lost in, the higher idea of eternity, as a spiritual whole in itself, independent of these determinations.

[1] See St. Athanasius' Defence of the Nicene Definition, c. iii. Oxford transl

αἰώνιος. 1. Prolonged; μεθὺ αἰώνιος, Plato; v. Stephan. Thes. 2. In the sense of "eternal," αἰώνιος ζωὴ, αἰσχύνη [Dan. xii. 2], where also the just are said to shine "like the stars," εἰς αἰῶνας καὶ ἔτι. Cf. 2 Macc. vii. 9, where αἰώνιος ἀναβίωσις is connected with the idea of resurrection.

A more accurate idea of its meaning may be obtained from an observation of its use [1] in the Synoptical Gospels, [2] in St. Paul, and [3] in St. John's Gospel and Epistles.

[1] In the Synoptics, ζωὴ αἰώνιος occurs in the question of the lawyer [Luke x. 28], where in the parallel passages [Matt. xix. 21 and Luke xviii. 18] the question is resumed, εἰ θέλεις τέλειος εἶναι: in all the cases it is answered by the injunction to perform the ordinary duties of life, in one, the duty of loving God, in two, that of selling all and giving to the poor. But the ζωὴ αἰώνιος is the reward or "treasure" in heaven, "in the regeneration," and in "the world to come," where it is the opposite of τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον, and of κόλασις αἰώνιος [Matt. xx. 46]. It may be remarked on these passages that there is no distinct indication of infinite duration in any of these passages, the only common mark of all being that of futurity. The instance of κρίσις αἰώνιος [Mark iii. 29] is also against the sense of everlasting, and in favour of the sense of "future." The passage in the parable of the unjust steward [Luke xvi. 9] in which τὰς αἰωνίους σκηνάς occurs, is too obscure itself to throw any light on the meaning of the word.

The same predominant sense of futurity is also to be compared in Acts, xiii. 48; 2 Pet. i. 11; Jude 7 and 21.

[2] In St. Paul, ζωὴ αἰώνιος occurs in the sense of futurity in 1 Tim. vi. 19, (v. l. ὄντως) connected with laying up a good foundation εἰς τὸ μέλλον, by the right use of riches; Tit. iii. 7, where it is an inheritance in expectation; 2 Cor. iv. 17, where αἰώνιος βάρος δόξης is opposed to τὸ παραύτικα ἔλαφρον τῆς θλίψεως; cf. 2 Thess. i. 9; 2. Tim. ii. 10. In two passages αἰώνιος is joined with χρόνος to signify the infinite duration ex parte ante, during which the revelation of Christ has been withheld; but is now revealed, κατ' ἐπιταγὴν τοῦ αἰωνίου θεοῦ [Rom. xvi. 25, 26]; so 2 Tim. i. 9.

The most common use of the word in St. Paul, however, seems to be in the sense of the higher spiritual or Divine life in man, without any direct reference to past or future, to the period before or after death; thus, Timothy is told to lay hold on ζωὴ αἰώνιος to which he had been called [1 Tim. vi. 12]; and which is the aim or result of faith, πιστεύειν εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον [ib. i. 16]; the harvest of sowing to the Spirit [Gal. vi. 8], the end or object of freedom from sin, serving God, and having fruit εἰς ἁγιασμὸν [Rom. vi. 22]; the gift of God, χάρισμα [ibid.]. So Christianity is called παράκλησις αἰώνιος [2 Thess. ii. 16]. Similarly, in the general sense of "unseen," τὰ μὴ βλεπόμενα αἰώνια [2 Cor. iv. 18]; of "spiritual," in the ascription of τιμὴ καὶ κράτος αἰώνιος to God [1 Tim. vi. 16], and of the "permanent" side of ordinary life: "if our earthly tabernacle be dissolved, we have in heaven a building of God . . . not made with hands," αἰώνιον [2 Cor. v. 1].

In the Epistle to the Hebrews, with the exception of two passages [vi. 3 and ix. 15] in which αἰώνιος = future, the word αἰώνιος is exclusively applied to the objective work of Christ in redemption. Thus Christ offered Himself . . . διὰ πνεύματος αἰωνίου [ix. 14], ἐν αἵματι διαθήκης αἰωνίου [xiii. 20], and being perfected (τελειωθεὶς, as opposed to ἔπαθε) He became to the believer the cause σωτηρίας αἰωνίου [v. 9], having brought to light αἰωνίαν λύτρωσιν [ix. 12].

[3] In the Johannine writings, the word αἰώνιος occurs exclusively as an attribute of ζωὴ, in the three senses of [a] the subjective state of the Christian, [b] the life of Christ with the Father, and [c] the life of Christ in man; the notions of futurity, duration, &c., being almost, if not entirely, absent.

Thus [a] ζωὴ αἰώνιος is the result of the Divine Love to the world, mediated through belief in Christ; he that believeth hath ζωὴ αἰώνιος," [John iii. 36]; the spiritual worship of God is called a fountain of water within the soul springing up unto ζωὴ αἰώνιος [ib. iv. 14]; "he that heareth . . . and believeth 'hath ζωὴ αἰώνιος,' and hath passed from death unto life" [ib. v. 24; vi. 47]; similarly as a result or gift of Christ accruing to those who follow Him and who are in virtue thereof said to be "in His Father's hand," and to be imperishable εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα [ib. x. 28; cf. xvii 2]; to those who come to Him [v. 39]. So the testimony of the Scripture to Christ is εἰ ζωὴ αἰώνιος [iv. 16]; the missionary (ὁ θερίζων) gathers fruit, of which he did not sow the seed, εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον [iv. 36]. The practiee of self-sacrifiee, ealled "hating the soul," leads to ζωὴ αἰώνιος [xii. 25], a permanent state (μενούσαν), which is manifested and evideneed by love to the brethren [1 John iii. 15]. In all these eases, the predominant idea is that of present possession, as [ibid. v. 13] the believers are reminded of their spiritual state, ἵνα εἰδῆτε ὅτι ζωὴν ἔχετε αἰώνιον.

In the sense [b] of the Life of Christ with the Father [ibid. i. 2]. We shew to you that ζωὴ αἰώνιος, whieh was with the Father, and was manifested to us; so the eommandment of the Father to Christ is itself ζωὴ αἰώνιος [John xii. 49]; and in 1 John v. 20, the parallelism would seem to require us to identify ἡ ζωὴ αἰώνιος with Christ: "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding that we may know τὸν ἀληθινόν," > καὶ ἐσμὲν ἐν τῷ ἀληθινῷ, ἐν τῷ υἱῷ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ οὗτος ἐστὶν ὁ ἀληθινὸς Θεὸς, καὶ ἡ ζωὴ αἰώνιος.

In the sense [c] of the Life of Christ in man. The proof that God has given His Son to the world, is that He gave us ζωὴ αἰώνιος [1 John v. 11], that the believer abides (μένει) in Christ and Christ in him, that "as I live through the Father so He . . . should live through Me" [Gosp. vi. 57]. So every one who beholds the Son and believes on Him has ζωὴ αἰώνιος [ib. vi. 40], whieh eonsists in the knowledge of God and Christ [ib. xvii. 2], in the abiding in the Son and in the Father [1 John ii. 24]. Christ is the "Bread of Life," "the meat which endureth to ζωὴ αἰώνιος" [John vi. 27], he that eateth which, "hath ζωὴ αἰώνιος" [ibid. 53, sqq.].

In the Book of Revelation, an angel flies in mid air, holding εὐαγγέλιον αἰώνιον (without article), and saying, "Fear God, and give Him glory, for the hour of judgment is come: worship Him who made heaven and earth, the sea and the springs" [xiv. 6]. What we translate, therefore, "the everlasting Gospel" should perhaps be rendered "a message from the spiritual world." Cf. however 1 John ii. 24, where the Gospel, or Christian revelation, is summed up in one phrase: "This is that Gospel which He preaehed unto us, viz. eternal life."

The words αἰὼν and αἰώνιος, then, manifest a progressive and enlarging import from the simple ideas of breath (cf. the analogous case of spiritus), through the negative and meehanieal notions of un-seen, un-ending, past, future, &e. Up to a kind of climax, in which they express positively some of the most complex facts of the Divine operation in itself and in man, without, however, throwing off the more primitive meanings. [On the mixture of the ideas of space and time, and for transfer of αἰὼν into meaning of κόσμος: ef. Trench, Synon. of New Testament, p. 34 f., who instances the word "world," which originally = generation of men (weralt)].

II. We now proeeed to examine some of the conceptions of eternity, whieh have been formed by writers of different ages, nations, and shades of opinion: and of these,

[1] St. Augustine. "Non enim aliud anni Dei et aliud Ipse; sed anni Dei æternitas Dei est: æternitas ipsa Dei substantia est quæ nihil habet mutabile; ibi nihil est præteritum, quasi non sit; nihil est futurum quasi nondum sit; sed quicquid ibi est, nonnisi est."

[2] Aquinas. "Æternitas est interminabilis vitæ tota simul et perfecta possessio. Potest definiri per temporale in obliquo, non autem in recto. Est mensura omnis durationis. Exeludit principium durationis, non autem originis: ideo, aliquid quod est ab alio potest esse æternum. Significatur pluralitas, quia partieipatur in multis, propter mensuram inferiorem et propter tempus. Est ingenitum, incorruptibile, antiquum et totum tempus. Æternitas et ævum (= αἰὼν) sunt mensuræ indivisibiles: ideo sunt unitas permanentiæ actûs. Æternitas est tota simul, quia est mensura permanentis; non autem tempus, quia est mensura motûs. Nunc æternitatis est causa ejus sceundum rationem, non autem secundum rem. Nunc temporis et tempus differunt re et sueeessive: nunc ævi et ævum differunt tantum re; nunc vero æternitatis et æternitas differunt secundum rationem tantum. Deus non est actor nec eausa suæ æternitatis: Deus est æternitas. Æternitas manet eadem et subjeeto et ratione: ideo non est idem quod nunc temporis. Tempus non differt ab æternitate per habere prineipium et finem, nisi per aeeidens vel ex parte mensurati. Æternitas et tempus non sunt mensura unins generis. In tempore aliud est indivisibile seu instans, et aliud durans seu tempus; sed in æternitate est idem indivisibile et semper stans. Ævum excludit omnem mutationem in actu, sed æternitas exeludit eam etiam in potentiâ. Æternitas vere et proprie eonvenit soli Deo, sed partieipative convenit diversis diversimode."

[3] The Trent Catechism [de 12mo symb. art.] has the following on the eonstituents of eternal life: "Beatitudinem ex iis duobus constare; tum quod Deum intuebimur qualis in naturâ suâ ac substantiâ est, tum quod veluti Dii efficiemur. Nam qui Illo fruuntur, quamvis propriam substantiam retineant, admirabilem tamen quandam et prope divinam formam induunt, ut Dii potius quam homines videantur" [§ 7], which is thus illustrated: "quemadmodum ferrum admotum igni, ignem coneipit, et quamvis ejus substantia non mutetur, fit tamen, ut diversum quippiam, nimirum ignis, esse videatur: eodem modo qui," &e. [§ 10].

[4] Spinoza distinguishes eternity as the infinite existence of God, from the finite existenee of created beings. The latter is derivative, the former self-originated. The latter "fruitur existentiâ," but God cannot be said "frui existentiâ;" His existenee is Himself, i.e. of His essence. But this not being the case with the creature, its present existence is no guarantee for its future; and is different from its future existenee, which is not yet, as from its past, which is no longer. Its characteristic is, therefore, to pass from moment to moment, by virtue of its dependence upon God, from whom its existence is derived; in Spinoza's language, "duratione frui;" but it is impossible to conceive that the existence upon which this durational existence depends should also be durational, for that would imply that God derived His existence from some higher source, and so on ad infinitum. Eternity with Spinoza therefore = necessary existence, as opposed to contingent; which, as he says, would never be eternal, though it might last from everlasting to everlasting.

An illustration will make this clear: the equality of the radii of a circle is an "eternal" truth, not because it has been true an infinitely long time, but because it is of the essence of a circle to have equal radii. In the same way the existence of God is "eternal," because it is of the essence of the Divine Being to exist; that of man, apart from God, is durational and not eternal, because it is not of the essence of the human being to exist, and therefore his existence this moment is not identical with his existence the next moment. It is important to observe that in this view eternity is not merely a negation of time, but time is the defect or negation of eternity.

[5] Martensen has the following lucid passage on the subject: "As having life in Himself God is eternal. The Eternal is the I AM, who is Himself the origin of His own being, the Unchangeable. But His immutability is not a dead immutability, for it consists in producing Himself with infinite fruitfulness from Himself. His eternity is therefore not like that of the 'eternal hills,' . . . but a living eternity, blooming with unwithering youth. But His self-production is not the fragmentary growth we witness in time. The creature has time outside of itself, because it has its fulness outside of itself. The Eternal lives in a present of undivided powers and fulness, in the rhythm of a perfect life. His life is unchangeably the same, and yet He never ceases to live as new."

Eternity or eternal life, then, is the Divine life [a] in itself, as it is "before the foundation of the world" in the fulness of absolute existence, and [b] as it is manifested through Christ in man. In the latter case, as seen by us, it is a process taking place in time, and admitting of degrees, "the blade, the ear, the grain," and is manifest outwardly in the individual by love to the brethren [1 John iii. 14]. But this process, as known to God as His own life in man, is present at every step in its consummation; He sees the beginning and the end in one. Hence it is that whilst eternity is in itself really exclusive of time, it is nevertheless conceived by us as an endless progress (sempiternity), i.e. under the form of duration of which it is really the condition.

In conclusion we must not omit to mention a now almost forgotten controversy as to the meaning of "eternal" in its application to punishment. [The word "Eternal" and the Punishment of the Wicked, a letter &c., by F. D. Maurice; Macmillan, 1853: and Grounds for laying before the Council of King's College, London, certain statements in the Theological Essays of the Rev. F. D. Maurice, by R. W. Jelf; Parker, 1853.] It will appear from what has been said that recourse must be had to other passages and expressions in Holy Scripture to illustrate the doctrine of the interminability of the punishment of the wicked. The word "eternal" as properly excluding duration seems not to be decisive either way; for if eternal punishment cannot be said to end, neither can it be said to last for ever; both ending and lasting being attributes of duration. In short, "eternal" "describes rather the quality than the quantity of a state." [See Everlasting Punishment.]

[Consult Augustine, Confess. xi. 13, Enarr. in Psa. cii., Serm. xi. vol. iv. p. 830; Tabula Aurea in omn. Opp. D. Thomæ Aquin., by Peter de Bergamo, Venet. 1593, s. v. for a digest of all the passages; Catechismus ex Decreto Conc. Trident. ad Parochos, Romæ, 1858, cap. xiii.; Spinoza, Cogit. Metaph. ii. 1, 4, ed. Bruder; Martensen (Lutheran), Christian Dogmatics, sec. 48; see also Hooker, E. P. bk. V. lxix. 1, 2; More's Notes on Glanville's Letter to him on Drollery and Atheism, 1682, p. 32.]

EUCHARIST [lit. "thanksgiving"]. The name given to the sacrament which Christ instituted before His Passion, primarily derived from εὐχαριστέω, the word probably used by our Lord in consecrating the elements of bread and wine. It signifies that the sacrament is especially one of thanksgiving as commemorating the redemption of the world by the death and passion of our Lord, and as being the appointed means of conveying to our souls the heavenly gift of His most precious Body and Blood, the spiritual nourishment of our souls and the pledge of eternal life. This name was usually given to the sacrament from the earliest period in the Eastern and Western Churches,[1] and from the Apostolic age "thanksgiving" formed a very prominent portion of the Eucharistic service.

There are many types and predictions of the Holy Eucharist in the Old Testament, of which the chief are these following.

First of all, undoubtedly, was the Passover. Our Lord, after celebrating the last Passover with His disciples [Matt. xxvi. 17-20], instituted the sacrament of His Body and Blood: the type was followed by the Antitype which it had very strikingly foreshadowed. The Jewish Passover was a rite of thanksgiving, commemorating the redemption of Israel from Egyptian bondage, just as the Eucharistic sacrament is a commemoration of the deliverance of the world from the slavery of sin; the one was instituted the night before the ransom of Israel, the other the night before the redemption of mankind. In the Jewish Passover, the paschal lamb, before it was eaten in the house, was offered in sacrifice in the Temple, a type of the Eucharistic oblation of the Lamb of God and of the sacramental eating of His Body and Blood. In one house the paschal lamb was to be eaten, the flesh was not "to be carried abroad out of the house" [Exod. xii.]—a type that the true Paschal Lamb can be eaten only in the one Church of God.[1] So intimate was the connexion between type and antitype that St. Paul says, in allusion to Eucharistic celebration, "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us, therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" [1 Cor. v. 7, 8]. Here Christ is not only called the Passover or the Paschal Lamb, but the Jewish unleavened bread is represented as typifying purity of heart and life, which are indispensable for a beneficial partaking of the Eucharistic feast.

[1] See Suicer, Thes. Eccl. in loc. The Eucharist was also called εὐλογία, as by St. Cyril of Alexandria (μυστικὴ εὐλογία), the word probably derived from 1 Cor. x. 16, "The cup of blessing" (τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας ὃ εὐλογοῦμεν). The Eucharist was also called συνάξις or union—the sacrament by which we are united to Christ and to each other.

Another type was the offering of Melchisedec [Gen. xiv. 11-18]. Meeting Abraham after the slaughter of the kings, Melchisedec "brought bread and wine, and (or for) he was the priest of the Most High God." Thus not only the Eucharistic elements of bread and wine were foreshadowed, but there was also, as we shall find, a manifest type of the Eucharistic offering.

The Manna, as our Lord, who speaks of type and antitype [John vi. 49-51], and St. Paul [1 Cor. x. 3] declare, also presignified Eucharistic food. When the children of Israel had passed through the Red Sea, Pharaoh and his hosts being destroyed, they were miraculously fed with manna on their journey through the wilderness to the land of Canaan, typifying the pilgrimage of the baptized Christian, who, saved from his spiritual enemies by the laver of regeneration, has still to pass through the wilderness of this world, supported by the Living Bread which comes down from heaven, till he reaches the Canaan of heavenly rest.

Again, the Shew-bread[2] offered before the Lord on the Sabbath in the Tabernacle and Temple [Exod. xxv. 30; Lev. xxiv. 5-9] was a type of the Eucharist, and also the "fine flour" which was to be offered for the cure of leprosy.[3]

The prophets had predicted that God should be sacrificially worshipped by Gentiles no less than by His ancient people [Isa. xix. 19; lxvi. 21; Jer. xxxiii. 15-18]; or rather we may say that there should be a new sacrifice, of which the former one was only an imperfect emblem. "In every place," says Malachi [i. 11], "incense shall be offered to God and the pure oblation," or the mincha of fine flour; which not only implies the typical nature of Jewish sacrifice (shall be offered), but the unblemished sanctity of the Christian sacrifice, "a pure offering," in contrast with the earthly or carnal oblations of Judaism.

In illustrating the teaching of Holy Scripture and of the Church on the Holy Eucharist, we shall [I.] speak of the Matter, or outward signs; [II.] of the Form; [III.] of the inward or spiritual Grace of the sacrament.

I. The Matter of the Eucharist. This is bread and wine, according to the institution of our Blessed Lord, wheaten bread and wine from the grape [Matt. xxvi. 26-29]. There were many heresies as regards the matter of the sacrament in the early Church. St. Cyprian mentions some who offered water only in the cup of the Lord.[4] St. Epiphanius says that the Ebionites celebrated their mysteries with unleavened bread and water only,[5] and that the Artotyritæ offered bread and cheese in the Mysteries,[6] imitating, says St. Augustine, in his account of the same heretics, the first oblations of the fruits of the earth [Gen. iv. 3]. St. Augustine also mentions the Aquarii, so called as offering water only in the Eucharistic Cup,[7] and not that which the whole Church offers.[8] St. Chrysostom likewise refers to some who used water only in the Mysteries.[9] In the Apostolical Canons, "If any bishop or presbyter offer anything at the altar but what the Lord commanded (i.e. bread and wine) let him be deposed."[10] The offering of milk and of grapes instead of wine was forbidden by a council in the seventh century [Concil. Bracarens. III. or IV. can. 2, A.D. 675].

The Matter, according to our Lord's institution, must then be wheaten bread and wine from the grape. It has been asserted that bread made of bran, barley, or maize, in case wheaten bread cannot be procured, will suffice; but this at best is doubtful, as being a change of the Matter which was divinely instituted; nor can any other liquid be used but wine from the grape, or most probably the sacrament would be invalid.[11] It has been for many ages a subject of dispute between the Eastern and Western Churches, whether the sacramental bread should be leavened or unleavened; the Eastern Church making use of leavened, and the Latin Church from an early period of un-

[1] "Loquitur Deus dicens, 'In domo una comedetur, non ejicietis e domo carnem foras.' Caro Christi et sanctum Domini ejici foras non potest, nec alia ulla credentibus præter unam Ecclesiam domus est." St. Cyprian, De Unitate.

[2] Called ἄρτοι ἐνώπιοι [Exod. xxv. 30], ἄρτοι τῆς προσφορᾶς [1 Kings vii. 48], ἄρτοι τῆς προθέσεως [Matt. xii. 4]. St. Jerome says there was as much difference between the shew-bread (panis propositionis) and the Body of Christ as between the shadow and the body, the representation and the reality, the types of future things and those things prefigured by the types [Comment. on the Epistle to Titus i. 8, 9]. Thus also St. Cyril of Jerusalem: "Even under the Old Testament there was shew-bread, but this, as it belonged to the Old Testament, came to an end; but in the New Testament there is the bread of heaven and the cup of salvation sanctifying soul and body" [Lect. xxii. Oxf. transl.].

[3] St. Justin calls it a "type of the bread of the Eucharist" [Dial. c. Tryph. § 41].

[4] Epist. 191.

[5] Hæreses, 10 sive 20.

[6] Ibid. 29 sive 49.

[7] De Hæres. 64.

[8] That is wine and water. There can be no doubt that it was the usage of the early Church to mix water with wine in the Eucharistic cup, typifying the water and the blood which flowed from the Redeemer's side, as we know from the Fathers, and from councils and liturgies; but the "mixture" (κρᾶμα), as St. Justin terms it, is not essential to valid consecration. Bona, after proving the usage of the primitive Church, adds, "Refert Bernardus [Epist. 69] quorundam opinionem existimantium aquæ mixtionem necessariam esse ad sacramenti integritatem; sed certa est theologorum sententia, omissa aqua, validam esse consecrationem, quamvis omittens graviter peccet" [Rerum Liturg. lib. ii. c. 9].

[9] Homil. 82, on St. Matt. xxvi. 29.

[10] Canon 3.

[11] See Aquin. Sum. tertia pars, quæst. 74, art. 3, 5.

leavened bread, all theologians admitting that the consecration in either case is equally valid. Whether the Greek or the Latin Church first innovated upon the usage of our Lord cannot with certainty be ascertained. Cardinal Bona says[1] that the Eastern Church always used leavened bread, and the Latins leavened or unleavened bread indifferently till the tenth century, and that afterwards it became the custom of the Latin Church to consecrate with unleavened bread only; but this opinion is at the best doubtful, and has been controverted by other learned writers.[2] We can only say that probably in the Apostolic age, and immediately afterwards, the question had not been raised, or the subject in dispute would have been considered immaterial; that bread which could readily be procured, whether leavened or not, being consecrated. Such would certainly be the obvious inference from the celebrations recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, where the bread was apparently the ordinary bread in use [see ii. 40; xix. 11]. It need only be further remarked, that there can be little doubt as to our Lord consecrating with unleavened bread. The Jews, in obedience to God's command, put away all leaven from their houses before they prepared the Passover [Exod. xiii. 3]. At the Last Supper of our Lord, no leavened bread could have been procured; nor can it be supposed, without any evidence, that our Lord, when eating the Passover, violated the express command of the Divine Law.

II. The Form of the Eucharist. The form of words by which the Sacrament is consecrated is given by the synoptic Evangelists and St. Paul: "This is My Body. This is My Blood of the New Testament which is shed for many" [Matt. xxvi. 26-29, Mark xiv. 22-25, Luke xxii. 19, 20, 1 Cor. xi. 23-25]. The priest speaks in the Person of Christ:[3] "This is My Body. This is My Blood." The Divine Words uttered at the first institution, being effective throughout all ages of the Church, changing ineffably the creatures of bread and wine into the heavenly food of Christ's most precious Body and Blood.

The Fathers expressly and uniformly teach that consecration is actually effected by the words of Institution. Thus St. Justin Martyr: "The food blessed by the prayer of the Word which proceeded from Him (Christ) is the Flesh and Blood of that Jesus who was made flesh;"[4] and St. Irenæus, that Christ "took bread which is of His creation," and said, "This is My Body, and likewise the Cup. . . . He confessed to be His Blood."[5] "Let us hear," says St. Jerome, "that bread which the Lord brake and gave to His disciples is the Body of the Lord our Saviour [Domini Salvatoris], He saying to them, 'Take, eat, this is My Body.'"[6] "Since then," says St. Cyril, "He Himself has declared and said of the bread, 'This is My Body,' who shall dare to doubt it any longer? and since, He has affirmed and said: 'This is My Blood,' who shall ever hesitate, saying that it is not His Blood?"[7] Prayers and thanksgivings are indeed an integral part of the Eucharistic service, but strictly speaking are not essential: the words of Institution being alone needed for valid consecration. Another opinion, however, has, from an early period, been held by the Eastern Church, that after the words of Institution a prayer must be added for the descent of the Holy Spirit, to complete the consecration. [Invocation of Holy Spirit in Eucharist.]

III. The Grace of the Eucharist. We have now to consider the inward or spiritual grace of the Holy Eucharist—"This is My Body. This is My Blood." That these words are to be understood in their literal sense; or that the Bread and Wine become by consecration really and sacramentally (though in an inconceivable manner which cannot be explained by earthly similitudes or illustrations), the Body and Blood of our Lord, is clear from the obvious meaning of the Words of Institution, which the Fathers, as we have seen, understood literally. A figurative sense does not seem even to have occurred to them: nor has any reason ever been given why, if our Lord had intended His words to be understood figuratively, He did not say "This is a sign or figure of My Body."[8]

Let us first consider our Lord's teaching in the sixth chapter of St. John. He distinctly asserts the necessity of receiving His Flesh and Blood, or Himself, as the nourishment of the soul. It had been the custom of our Lord, before announcing sacred mysteries, to prepare the minds of His disciples to receive and believe them by previous teaching.[9] Thus, in this chapter, after feeding five thousand with five barley loaves and two small fishes, He takes occasion, after this miraculous supply of earthly food, to announce the more wonderful mystery of feeding His disciples with the spiritual food of His own Body and Blood. Some have supposed that our Lord, in this chapter, alludes only to spiritual "eating" by faith; and undoubtedly at the beginning of His discourse He especially dwells on the necessity of salvation

[1] Rer. Liturg. lib. i. c. 23.

[2] A full account of this controversy is given in Dr. Neale's Introduction to the History of the Eastern Church, pp. 1056-76 [1850].

[3] Thus also St. Paul [2 Cor. ii. 10] speaks of forgiving a sinner "in the Person of Christ" [ἐν προσώπῳ Χριστοῦ].

[4] Apol. i. sec. 66. [5] Adv. Hæres. lib. iv. c. 17.

[6] Ad. Hedibiam, cxx.

[7] Leet. xxii. sec. 1 [Oxf. transl.].

[8] The various interpretations which have been devised to evade the literal meaning of our Lord's words are examined and ably refuted by Maldonatus [Comment. Matt. xxvi. 26]. Had our Lord's words been merely a figure, there would have been, as Paschasius Radbertus truly remarks, a repetition of two types having the same meaning:—the Paschal lamb and the Eucharistic Bread and Wine—each equally and in the same sense a memorial of Christ's death: "Quod si nihil habet hoc mysterium præter figuram corporis et sanguinis Christi et non hoc est quod Ipse dixit; quid necesse fuit iterare in facto, quia hoc totum præfiguratum erat in Agno!" Epist. ad Frudegardum.

[9] Thus the disciples were prepared beforehand for the institution of baptism by our Lord's conversation with Nicodemus [John iii.], for His sufferings and crucifixion Matt. xx. 19], for His ascension [John xvi. 16], and the gift of the Holy Spirit [John xiv. 16].

by faith, but at ver. 51 He announces a new mystery, for which His previous teaching had been intended to prepare His hearers—that of eating His Flesh and drinking His Blood. Why, before announcing the Eucharistic mystery, He dwelt on the essential importance of faith is obvious for two reasons. The Eucharist is especially the sacrament of faith. Ere our Lord's words could be received, His hearers needed faith in the highest degree—an implicit, unwavering reliance upon God's power and word. Besides, for another reason our Lord prominently urged the necessity of faith: it is through faith only that His blessed Body and Blood can be beneficially received: faith must open our eyes to behold Him, and draw us to Him in loving affection, thus inclining us to obey Him, and preparing us to receive Him as the nourishment of our souls.

Our Lord having thus shewn the necessity of faith, goes on to announce the Eucharistic mystery, which has been ever termed by the Church "mysterium fidei." That there was no exclusive reference to "faith" in this chapter is clear from the oft-repeated expressions of "eating Christ's Flesh and drinking His Blood," which are not found elsewhere in Scripture as synonymous with "faith," and can only acquire this meaning by supposing that the Redeemer used a strange and unprecedented form of language, a form which would lead into error. Besides, His words will not permit us to suppose that He referred to faith only. He says, "the Bread which I will give" [ver. 51] "is My Flesh"—had He referred to spiritual eating by faith, He would have said, "the Bread which I have given"—since of the Jews some even then believed on Him, and by faith had eaten of the living Bread. But He speaks of something afterwards to be given—"the Bread which I will give [δώσω] is My Flesh."

Again, that this chapter refers to the Eucharist is manifest from comparing it with the words of Institution. Our Lord in the passage just quoted, says "the bread which I will give:" if this promise was not fulfilled in the Holy Eucharist, so far as we know from the Evangelists it was not fulfilled at all. But can we mistake the time and mode of the fulfilment of our Lord's promise? If we compare the expressions in the sixth chapter with the words of Institution, we shall find an almost verbal identity: "he that eateth My flesh and drinketh My blood hath eternal life"—"take eat, this is My Body which is given for you. This is My Blood which is shed for many for the remission of sins."

Again, from this chapter we may understand the meaning of Christ's giving His Flesh and Blood; for He uses another form of expression which is unmistakably identical, saying, "He that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me" [ver. 57]; by His Flesh and Blood, therefore He means Himself God and Man. "Flesh and blood," and sometimes "flesh" only, are used in Scripture as synonymous with "man:" thus our Lord says to St. Peter, "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee" [Matt. xvi. 17]. St. Paul conferred not with flesh and blood [Gal. i. 16], that is, as he explains, he did not take counsel with men. St. John says, "the Word became flesh (i.e. assumed human nature in its entirety), and dwelt among us" [i. 14]. St. Paul [Rom. iii. 20] that no flesh (i.e. no man) shall be justified before God (οὐ δικαιωθήσεται πᾶσα σὰρξ). The Psalmist [cxlv. 21] says "let all flesh (i.e. men) praise His holy name (εὐλογείτω πᾶσα σὰρξ).

Let us also consider our Lord's prayer in the seventeenth chapter of St. John. The Evangelist does not relate the Institution of the Holy Eucharist which had been recorded by the other evangelists, but adds to their account our Lord's prayer after giving the Apostles His blessed Body and Blood; of which we read at the close of this chapter, that after our Lord had spoken to them He went over the brook Cedron [xviii. 1]. Now with what frequency in this chapter, with what marked reiteration, is the Eucharistic Presence of our Lord implied, i.e. that the words of Institution just spoken were literally true. Our Lord had said in the sixth chapter "He that eateth My Flesh and drinketh My Blood dwelleth in Me and I in him." And when the heavenly gift had just been bestowed, He reiterates forcibly the blessed truth of His being united to the Apostles, and of their union with the Father and with each other in Him, praying "that they all may be one as Thou Father art in Me and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us. . . . The glory which Thou gavest Me I have given them, that they may be one, even as We are one; I in them and Thou in Me, that they may be made perfect in one. . . . I have declared unto them Thy love, and will declare it, that the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them and I in them."

Reference to the teaching of St. Paul seems to place beyond doubt the sense in which he understood the words of Institution. He says: "The Cup of blessing which we bless is it not the communion of the Blood of Christ, and the Bread which we break is it not the communion of the Body of Christ? For we being many are one Bread, and one Body, for we are all partakers of that one Bread" [1 Cor. x. 16, 17]. In the original the word here rendered "communion" is κοινωνία, which implies "real union with Christ." "Wherefore," according to St. Chrysostom's Commentary, "saith he not the 'participation,' because He intended to express something more, and to point out how close was the union, in that we communicate, not only by participating and partaking, but also by being united. For as that Body is united to Christ, so also are we united to Him by this Bread. . . Further, because he said the communion of the Body, and that which communicates is another thing from that whereof it communicates, even this which seemeth but a small thing he took away. For having said the communion of the Body, he sought again to express something nearer. Wherefore he added [ver. 17], For we being many are one Bread, one Body. For why speak I of communion, saith he, we are that selfsame body. For what is the Bread?—the Body of Christ And what do they become who partake of it? The Body of Christ, not many bodies, but one Body."[1]

Again, St. Paul says: "Whosoever shall eat this Bread, or drink this cup of the Blood unworthily, shall be guilty of the Body and Blood of the Lord; but let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that Bread and drink of that Cup, for he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, not discerning the Lord's Body: for this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep" or die [1 Cor. xi. 27-30]. Knox, the friend of Bishop Jebb, after quoting the above passage, adds: "There is a kind of physiognomy in language by which we seem to see as well as understand the mind of the writer. Thus, in the passage now transcribed, we not only receive the instruction intended to be conveyed, but in the precision of the terms, the strictness with which they are adhered to, and the energy with which they are applied, we have the very stamp and signature as it were of St. Paul's own mind and heart. Not only from first to last does he keep the Eucharistic elements in his view, but he says nothing which does not expressly refer to them. Thus, as the crime is eating and drinking unworthily, so the punishment is the eating and drinking of judgment (that is, of bodily infliction), as if the very receiving of those holy things into the human person when defiled by polluting contact, or desecrated by actual irreverence produced, of itself (like the Ark of the Covenant when profanely treated) the calamity or destruction of the offender. Again, the desecrating irreverence is stated to arise from not discerning the Lord's Body: that is, from approaching the sacramental symbols without due discrimination of their transcendent quality." The writer then adds, that the Apostle strengthens what he had said, by referring to the judgments inflicted on the Corinthians, and that this awful explanation would lead them to compare their crime and punishment with those signal cases of a like nature recorded in Holy Scripture (he refers to Nadab and Abihu, the Philistines when bringing the Ark into the house of Dagon, and Uzzah, who died on touching the Ark), "Since every reason that could be conceived for fencing the symbols of Divine presence and power under the Old Testament must hold good for an equal fencing of similar symbols under the New Testament. It could not for one moment be imagined that either the Ark or the Altar of the Lord should be guarded with more terrible majesty than that which on equally Divine authority was to be "discerned" as the "Lord's Body."[2]

The illustrations which have been given from Holy Scripture of the meaning of the words of Institution are confirmed by the teaching of the Fathers, and the early monuments of the Church in the Catacombs. Thus in the chamber of St. Calixtus, the Eucharistic presence is denoted by a three-legged table with two loaves and a fish placed upon it; which, presenting the appearance of a common repast to the heathen, would be a memorial to Christians of the heavenly Bread, the mysterious 'ΙΧΘΥΣ[3] received in the Holy Eucharist. Hence in the inscription at Autun [A.D. 170], first published by Dr. Rock,[4] we read, "—— eat, drink, having 'Ιχθὺς in the palms of thy hands."

Let us now consider the testimony of Apostolic and early Fathers. St. Ignatius calls the Eucharist "the Flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ which suffered for our sins—the gift of God."[5] "The Bread of God which is the Flesh of Jesus Christ,[6] and bids the Philadelphians partake of the same Eucharist, for there is but one Flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, and one Cup in the unity of His Blood."[7] St. Justin terms the Eucharist "the Flesh and Blood of Jesus who is incarnate."[8] St. Clement of Alexandria says that our Lord gives His Flesh and pours out Blood as the [1] Comment. in loc. [Oxf. transl.].

[2] On the use and import of the Eucharistic symbols [Remains, vol. ii. pp. 198-200, 1834]. Knox generally throughout the treatise speaks of the Body and Blood of Christ as being present in "spirit and efficacy," but realizing as he goes on, how imperfect and inadequate was this view of a "virtual Presence," he rises near the conclusion to the full expression of Catholic truth. "Let not, therefore, the simplicity of what is visible to our bodily sight, veil from our mental eyes those invisible realities which are to us so consolatory and in themselves so glorious. On the contrary, let us recognise the same spirit of meek majesty which veiled its transcendent brightness in the mystery of the Incarnation, as still continuing the same gracious condescension in the mystery of the Eucharist; and let us joyfully and reverently approach to do homage to our King, who in this His own peculiar institution comes to diffuse benediction in His mystical Zion, with the same apparent lowliness as when in conformity with the Divine prediction, He entered His literal Jerusalem 'sitting on an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass'" [Ibid. p. 221, 222].

[3] Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτὴρ (Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour). The initial letters of those titles make up the Greek word ΙΧΘΥΣ, or fish, and accordingly in every story of sacred writ connected with a fish the early Church recognised some figure of our Lord. "He is our fish," says Tertullian, "who by His descent, when we call upon Him, into the baptismal font, causes that which before was water to be now called 'piscina.'" So St. Optatus, "a pisce piscina." "He is the fish," says St. Jerome, "in whose mouth is found the tax or tribute money to be paid to those who demand it, whereby alone Peter and all other sinners can be redeemed." Finally, "He is that fish," says St. Optatus again, "whom Tobias seized in the river Tigris, whose flesh was good for food, whose liver drove away the devil from his wife Sara, and whose gall restored sight to his aged father." "Even so we," say St. Prosper and St. Augustine, "are daily fed and illuminated by Jesus Christ." Accordingly it was with especial reference to the Christian's privilege of feeding upon his Lord in the Holy Eucharist that this symbol of the fish is most frequently used both by Christian writers and artists. A Greek sepulchral inscription (quoted in the text) of the greatest antiquity, bids us receive the sweet food of the Saviour of the saints, taking into our hands the fish. St. Austin in his Confessions describes the Eucharistic feast as that solemnity in which that fish is set before us, which, drawn forth from the deep, becomes the food of pious mortals; and the "piscis assus," or the broiled fish of the Gospels, wherewith our Lord fed seven of His Apostles by the sea of Tiberias [John xxi. 13] is always by the Fathers held to be mystically significant of "Christus passus." [Northcote on the Catacombs, p. 65, 66, ed. 1859].

[4] Hierurgia, p. 171 [1851]. [5] Ad Smyrn. secs. 7, 8.

[6] Ad Rom. sec. 7. [7] Sec. 4. [8] Apol. i. sec. 66.

nourishment of His children, that we may have the Saviour within our breasts[1] (τον Σωτῆρα ἐνστερνισᾶσθαι). And St. Irenæus, that "when the mixed Cup and the created (γέγονως) Bread receive the Word of God, the Eucharist becomes Christ's Body."[2] "The flesh," says Tertullian, "is fed with the Body and Blood of Christ that the soul may be fattened of God."[3]

The Liturgies may also be referred to, which, though not committed to writing till the fourth century, are unquestionably of Apostolic origin, and shew the belief of the Church from the earliest age.[4] In all Liturgies which are extant, the sacramental Presence of our Lord is asserted and clearly implied. In the liturgical form given in the Apostolical Constitutions, the priest, on giving the Eucharist, says to the communicant, "the Body of Christ," who answers, "Amen;" and the deacon, on giving the Cup, says, "the Blood of Christ, the Cup of Life," the communicant answering, "Amen."[5] A few passages may be added from one of the earliest Liturgies, that of St. James. "The priest breaks the Bread and puts a piece into the Cup," and says, "the union of the most Holy Body and precious Blood of our Lord God and Saviour Jesus Christ," and afterwards, "taste and see how gracious the Lord is, who is broken and not divided; is given to the faithful and not consumed; for the remission of sins and for everlasting life, now and ever, to eternal ages." The priest, before communicating, says, "O Lord our God, the Bread that came down from heaven is the Life of the world. I have sinned against heaven and before Thee, and am not worthy to partake of the immaculate mysteries. But, O merciful God, do Thou make me worthy by Thy grace, that I may receive Thy Holy Body and precious Blood, not to my condemnation, but for the remission of sins and eternal life."[6]

Again, the Liturgies exhibit another proof of the reality of the sacramental Presence. We learn from them that after consecration worship was paid to our Lord as really present.[7] Thus in St. Chrysostom's Liturgy, "they have not bowed down to flesh and blood, but to thee, a terrible God"[8] [see Keble on Eucharistic Adoration, where the subject is fully treated, with quotations from the Liturgies and the Fathers.]

The Eucharistic Sacrifice must next come under our consideration. This aspect of the Holy Eucharist is clearly exhibited in Scripture and by the records of the primitive Church. Thus our Lord says, in the Institution of the Eucharist, "do this in remembrance of Me," which, as Johnson and others have shewn, should be rendered "offer this as a memorial sacrifice;"[9] an interpretation, moreover, confirmed by the Fathers[10] and early Liturgies.[11] St. Paul also uses liturgical forms of expression; speaking of himself as a minister (λειτουργόν) of Christ to the Gentiles, ministering as a priest (ἱερουργοῦντα), and offering an oblation (προσφορὰ) sanctified by the Holy Ghost.[12] He also says that we have an altar [Heb. xiii. 10], and that his words are to be understood in their ordinary sense is clear from the fact that from the earliest period this term was applied to the Holy Table. Thus St. Ignatius, "that except a man be within the altar, he is deprived of the Bread of God."[13] "There is one Altar."[14] In the Catholic Epistle of St. Barnabas the altar is mentioned,[15] and also in the Shepherd of Hermas.[16] In a work attributed to St. Andrew the Apostle, though its genuineness has been disputed, the Christian altar and sacrifice are

[1] Pædag. lib i. c. 6. [2] Ad Hæres. lib. v. 2.
[3] De Resurrectione Carnis, sec. 8.
[4] Palmer's Antiquities of the English Ritual, vol. i. c. 1 [1839].
[5] Book viii. sec. 13.
[6] Brett's Collection of Liturgies [1720].
[7] "In Liturgiis Græcis quæ adjunctas sacramentalis disciplinæ regulas habent, vulgo rubricas, ut sunt omnes ferme quæ ab annis octogentis aut amplius descriptæ sunt, paulo ante communionem dum inclamatur Sancta Sanctis elevatur Eucharistia et hic ritus vocatur "Ἁγια ὕψωσις, sancta elevatio: omnes in genua procumbant adorantque sacramentum; neque ad testandam fidem suam dicunt credere se corpus Christi datum fuisse pro salute sua et sanguinem ejus effusum; verum ad eum tanquam vere præsentem preces suas dirigunt, eam præsertim quam latro in cruce pendens fudit, Memento mei Domine cum veneris in regnum tuum: scilicet ut explicant Orientales Theologi, quemadmodum latro in cruce, turpi scilicet et ignobili supplicio omnibus malis oppressum Christum Deum agnovit, ita et Christiani Eum in pane agnoscunt." [Renandot. Orientalium Liturg. Collectio Dissertatio, lix. 1847].
[8] Brett's Collection.
[9] Schleusner gives to "sacrifice" as one the meanings of ποιεῖν,[1] and brings forward as examples from the LXX. 1 Kings xi. 33, ἐποίησε scil. θυσίαν τῇ Ἀστάρτῃ, sacrificavit Astarte; Isa. xix. 21; Levit. ix. 7, xvi. 9; Luke ii. 27, ποιῆσαι, sacrificium offerre. Liddell and Scott [Lexicon] also say, "In Alexandrian Greek ποιέω means 'to sacrifice,' like the Latin 'facere,' ποιεῖν μόσχον like ῥέζειν ἑκατόμβας, LXX." The word translated "remembrance," ἀνάμνησις, is also, as Johnson says, "a sacrificial word, and is by the LXX. translators applied to the offering of the shew-bread, which was a most plain type of the Christian sacrifice [Levit. xxii. 6, 7]." [On the Unbloody Sacrifice, p. 171, Oxf. ed.].
[10] St. Justin, Dial. c. Tryph. § 117. St. Iren. cont. Hæres. lib. iv. c. 17, § 5.
[11] "Qui sacrificandam novam legem sacerdos Dei verus instituit hostiam se tibi placitam et Ipse obtulit et a nobis jussit offerri, Christus Dominus ac redemptor æternus." [In secun. Dom. post oct. Epiphaniæ, Missale Mozarab.]. "Qui (Jesus Christus) formam sacrificii perennis instituens, hostiam se Tibi (Patri) primus obtulit et primus docuit offerri" [Missa Domin., Gothico-Gallicanum Missale].
[12] The terms here used by the Apostle have a technical meaning, and were so understood by the Fathers from the Apostolic age. For this meaning of λειτουργία and λειτουργὸς, see Deut. x. 8, xvii. 12; Num. viii. 22; Joel i. 9: and Canons Apostol. 14, 27, 37. ἱερουργοῦντα (offering sacrifice, e.g. θύω, Schleusner in voc. and Rose in voc. Parkhurst, Lex.); προσφορὰ (a sacrificial oblation), τὰς δὲ προσφορὰς καὶ λειτουργίας ἐπιτελεῖσθαι, St. Clement, Epist. i. 40; Εὐχαριστίας καὶ προσφορὰς οὐκ ἄπο δεχόνται, St. Ignatius, ad Smyr. § 7; καιρῷ τῆς ἁγίας προσφορᾶς, Canon Apost. 3.
[13] Ad Ephes. § 5.
[14] Ad Magn. § 7.
[15] Accedere ad aram illius, § 1.
[16] Ego illos super aram probabo, lib. iii. simil. viii § 2.

[1] See on the sacrificial use of the verb ποιεῖν in the LXX. the list of passages given in Bishop Hamilton's Charge, 1867, Appendix.

expressly taught;[1] also in an apocryphal work called the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs,[2] probably written at the close of the first century.[3] Again, altars are found in the catacombs, which it has been proved are of the earliest or of Apostolic date;[4] and in an inscription of the second century we have an account of a martyr who was put to death when about "to offer sacrifice."[5]

The Fathers also unanimously believed that the Eucharistic sacrifice was predicted and typically represented by the offering of Melchisedec;[6] and if we consider what is related of him, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion. Let us first consider the Psalmist's words, "the Lord hath sworn and will not repent, Thou (Christ) art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec" [Ps. cx. 4]; and then St. Paul's language to the Jews respecting him. The Apostle says [Heb. v. 11-13] that the doctrine which he intends to bring forward for the instruction of the Hebrews, Judaizing Christians as they may be called, was hard to be explained or of difficult interpretation (δυσερμήνευτος), since they were slow of hearing, and had need of milk rather than strong meat. He then states with emphatic reiteration—no less than five times—that Christ was a priest after the order of Melchisedec. Now, as nothing is related of Melchisedec but his blessing Abraham and offering bread and wine, "and" (or for) "he was a priest of the Most High God," it is impossible to understand how Christ could be a priest after the order of Melchisedec, unless His oblation and that of the priesthood of His Church was also offered under the same outward and visible elements. The Apostle unmistakeably thus intimates or implies the doctrine of the Eucharistic sacrifice without openly stating it; and his meaning (whilst obscure to unbelievers, or to Christians too ignorant or prejudiced to receive it), would be immediately recognised by the well-instructed faithful. The Apostolical Fathers have been already quoted: the writer who follows, St. Justin Martyr, often refers to the Eucharistic sacrifice. Thus he speaks of the sacrifices (θυσιῶν) offered in every place by us Gentiles, that is, of the bread of the Eucharist and likewise of the cup of the Eucharist,"[7] and that "God receives sacrifices from no one, but through His priests"[8] (διὰ τῶν ἱερῶν Αὐτοῦ). St. Athenagoras says it is "needful to offer (προσφέρειν) the unbloody sacrifice and to bring in (προσάγειν) the spiritual worship."[9] St. Theophilus relates of Melchisedec that he was the first priest of the Most High God: from him priests originated (εὑρεθήσαν καὶ ἱερεῖς γένομενοι) over the whole earth."[10] St. Irenæus says "the oblation (oblatio) of the Church which the Word hath taught to be offered throughout the whole world, is accounted a pure sacrifice and is acceptable to Him."[11] "And this pure oblation the Church alone offers to the Creator, offering to Him of His creature, with thanksgiving. But the Jews do not offer, for their hands are filled with blood, for they have not received the Word which is offered to God."[12] Further extracts are needless; we shall only add Tertullian, who mentions the altar,[13] offering oblations,[14] and sacrificing.[15]

But we may again refer to the ancient Liturgies, as best illustrating the true nature of the Eucharistic sacrifice. We learn from the Apostolical Constitutions, or the Clementine Liturgy, that the bread and wine were first offered by the bishop or priest,[16] then followed the Anaphora or

[1] When examined by the proconsul Ægeas, or Ægeates, the blessed Andrew said, "To the Omnipotent and only true God, I daily offer a victim, not the smoke of frankincense, not the flesh of bellowing bulls, not the blood of goats, but I daily sacrifice a spotless Lamb upon the altar of the cross, whose body afterwards the whole multitude of believers eat, and drink its blood; the Lamb which was sacrificed remains whole and living. It is therefore really (ἀληθῶς) sacrificed, and its body is really (ἀληθῶς) eaten by the people; yet, as I said, it remains whole, and spotless, and living."

[2] See Testament of Levi.

[3] Gallandii Proœmialis Dissertatio, § 2.

[4] Thus the author of Fabiola [1855] says, sometimes "at the closing of a grave the relatives or friends, to mark it, would press into its wet plaster, or leave there, a coin or cameo, or an engraved gem. The coin is sometimes of Domitian [A.D. 81-96] or other early emperors" [pp. 144, 145]. Another writer mentions an inscription in the catacombs of an earlier date, during the reign of Vespasian [A.D. 69-79]. Another inscription refers to the consulship of Surra and Seneeio, which took place in the year 107 [Hierurgia, Appendix, iv.]. Or, to refer again to Fabiola, "Although inscriptions with dates are rare, yet out of ten thousand collected and about to be published by the learned and sagacious Cavalier de Rossi, about three hundred are found bearing consular dates from the early emperors (that is during the first century) to the middle of the fourth century" [p. 146]. Thus there is no doubt that the catacombs were coeval with the Apostolic age; and as we find in their oratories altars of various kinds, the sanction thus given to the doctrine of the Eucharistic sacrifice must be Apostolic or Divine. Dr. Rock, in Hierurgia, gives a description of altars in the catacombs [pp. 493, 494]. In 1848 catacombs were discovered at Chiusi, the ancient capital of Etruria; the writer from whom we borrow the account gives reasons for concluding that they were formed in the very earliest period of the Church, or at least in the time of the persecutions under Domitian and Trajan, and so reached to the first preaching of the Gospel in Etruria. And, after much interesting description, he adds, "Let us, however, return for a few moments to the great chamber, the chapel or oratory, where the faithful assembled in times of persecution. In the midst yet remains the altar, and at its right, that is on the Gospel side, is the episcopal chair. The altar is a slab of marble, supported as on a base by a mass of travertine (a species of limestone)" [Union, Feb. 12, 1858].

[5] Alexander mortuus non est sed vivit super astra, et corpus in hoc tumulo quieseit; vitam explevit cum Antonino Imp. Qui eum multum beneficii antevenire prævideret pro gratia odium reddit: genua enim flectens vero Deo sacrificaturus ad supplicia ducitur [Maitland on the Catacombs, pp. 31, 32, 1846].

[6] As, e.g., St. Justin, Clemens Alexandrinus, St. Cyprian, St. Athanasius, St. Epiphanius, and St. Augustine. The following passages may be quoted from the Liturgies:—"Melchisedec exhibuit et Jesus implevit" [Missale Mozarab]. "Panem et vinum quæ Melchisedec in præfigurationem futuri mysterii sacerdos obtulerat" [Vetus Missale Gallicanum]. Τὸν Μελχισεδὲκ ἀρχιερεα λατοείας προχειρισάμενος [Constit. Apostol. lib. viii. sec. 12].

[7] Dial. cum Tryp. sec. 41.

[8] Ibid. sec. 116.

[9] Legatio pro Christ. sec 13.

[10] Lib. xi. sec. 31.

[11] Lib. iv. c. 18, sec. 1.

[12] Ibid. sec. 4.

[13] Nonne solemnior erit statio tua si ad aram Dei steteris. De oratione xix.

[14] Pro qua oblationes reddis. De exhort. cast. c. xi.

[15] Ad Scapulam, c. 2.

[16] Constit. Apostol. lib. viii. sec. 12. There were long Eucharistic prayer, concluding with the words of institution, and afterwards a prayer for the descent of the Holy Spirit to complete the consecration; then followed the Oblation, "the tremendous and unbloody sacrifice," as it was termed, with prayer for the Holy Church throughout the world: for the living and those departed in the faith. [Prayer for the Dead.]

The Liturgies may be further illustrated from the teaching of the Fathers. Thus St. Chrysostom says in his commentary on the tenth chapter of the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians:—"And in the Old Covenant, because they were in an unperfect state, the blood which they used to offer to idols He Himself submitted to receive, that He might separate them from those idols, which very thing again was a proof of His unspeakable affection; but here (in the Eucharist) He hath transferred the sacred office to that which is far more awful and glorious, changing the very sacrifice itself, and instead of the slaughter of irrational animals, commanding to offer up Himself."[1] St. Cyril of Jerusalem thus speaks of the Eucharist after consecration—"Then after the spiritual sacrifice is perfected, the bloodless service upon that sacrifice of propitiation, we entreat God for the common peace of the Church, for the tranquillity of the world; for kings, for soldiers, and allies; for the sick, for the afflicted; and, in a word, for all who stand in need of succour, we all supplicate and offer this sacrifice. Then we commemorate also those who have fallen asleep before us; first, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, that at their prayers and intervention God would receive our petition. Afterwards, also, on behalf of the holy fathers and bishops who have fallen asleep before us; and, in a word, of all who in past years have fallen asleep among us; believing that it will be a very great advantage to the souls for whom the supplication is put up, while the holy and most awful Sacrifice is presented."[2] St. Augustine says "there was formerly the sacrifice of the Jews according to Aaron, with slain beasts and in a mystery; there was not the sacrifice of the Body and Blood of Christ which the faithful understand, and they who have read the Gospel, which sacrifice is now spread throughout the world. . . The sacrifice of Aaron is taken away, and the sacrifice begins which is according to Melchisedec."[3] Instead of those (Jewish) sacrifices and oblations, His Body is offered and ministered to the receivers;[4] or, as St. Ambrose says, "formerly a calf was offered, now Christ is offered."[5]

Such is the teaching of the Fathers and Liturgies. The Nonjurors, as Brett, Hickes, and Johnson maintained, indeed, that the Eucharistic offering was bread and wine sanctified by the descent of the Holy Ghost. This error partly arose from mistaking the meaning of a prayer in the ancient Liturgies (after the words of Institution), for the descent of the Holy Ghost to perfect the consecration; the object of this prayer was not to change the bread and wine into a new body of Christ, distinct and differing from the natural one, but to transmute the elements sacramentally by the power of the Holy Ghost into Christ's true and only Body and Blood. It cannot be supposed that our Lord has any other body than that in which He sits at the right hand of God. Besides, this novel theory is plainly contrary to the declaration of Scripture, so often repeated, that Christ "was once offered, and by one offering hath perfected for ever the sanctified." [Heb. x. 12-14.] If an Eucharistical body be offered, totally differing from the natural body, once offered for the remission of sins, we cannot truly say that there is only one oblation.

The offering of Christ is only one, He is the priest consecrated,[6] for evermore [Heb. vii. 28] pleading in visible presence in heaven His atoning sacrifice upon the cross, and as the eternal Priest after the order of Melchisedec, offering the same sacrifice, through His priesthood upon earth —His priesthood offering ministerially, but in the properly, as Hickes says, two oblations in the Eucharist; one before the consecration, when the elements of Bread and Wine were presented to God upon the Altar as the first-fruits of His creatures to acknowledge Him as our Sovereign Lord and Benefactor; and the other oblation after consecration, when they had become sacramentally the Body and Blood of Christ. It is to the latter offering, the oblation so called (the Bread and Wine presented on the Altar being its commencement), that the expressions of the Fathers and Liturgies belong—"tremendous and unbloody sacrifice" [St. James' Liturgy]; "heavenly and tremendous mysteries" [St. Chrysostom's Liturgy]. Christian Priesthood Asserted, p. 119 [1711].

[1] Commentary in loc. [Oxf. transl.].

[2] Lect. xxiii. [Oxf. transl.].

[3] Com. in Psalm. xxxiii. sec. 5, 6.

[4] Ibid. De Civitate, lib. xvii. c. 20, sec. 2.

[5] De Officiis, c. 48, sec. 248.

[6] εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, τετελειωμένον, consecrated as a priest and ever-offering sacrifice. St. Justin, after relating the institution of the Christian sacrifice [Apol. i. sec. 66], says, "The same thing in the Mysteries of Mithra also the evil demons imitated and commanded to be done; for bread and a cup of water are placed in the mystic rites for one who is to be initiated (ἐν ταῖς τοῦ μυουμενου τελεταῖς), with the addition of certain words as you know or may learn." Hickes, after quoting this passage, adds, that we have here a parallel between the two mysteries (of Christ and Mithra), implying "that the oblation of the Eucharistical bread and wine was τελετή, a solemn material sacrifice in the opinion of the Christians, as the oblation of the other diabolical bread and water was in the mysteries of Mithra, and that by consequence their bishops and presbyters, who were ministers of Baptism and the Holy Eucharist, were τελεστάς, as Pollux calls priests, even as proper priests, as the priests of Mithra, or the sun, were esteemed by his worshippers to be." Hence, as the writer afterwards adds, "The degrees or introduction to any religion were three, κάθαρσις, purgation, μύησις, initiation, and τελείωσις, consummation, which was by sacrifice, and, therefore, sacrifice was called τελετή, because it was the consummation and perfection of all the rites, by which men were initiated into the worship or religion of any god; and also because it was the last rite, by which excommunicates were reconciled to their gods upon their repentance. Hence the sacrifices of the Holy Eucharist came to be called Τέλειον, perfection, as that which finisheth the initiation of a Christian and the reconciliation of a Christian penitent. It is so called in six several Canons [4, 5, 6, 9, 22, 23] of the Council of Ancyra, relating to the re-admission of penitents, lapsers, adulterers, and murderers, to the peace and perfect communion of the Church." [Christian Priesthood, vol. i. p. 100-1. 1711.] Suidas: Τελετή—θυσία μυστηριώδης, ἥ μέγιστη, ἥ τιμιώτερα. Telete—Sacrificium mysteriorum, plenum, maximum, honoratissimum [Hickes, note].

fullest and most perfect sense, being really present under the sacramental veils, He is Himself the offerer and the oblation, the priest and sacrifice, ὁ προσφέρων καὶ ὁ προσφερόμενος. The Church in Eucharistic worship bears witness to the sacrificial presence of her Lord, atoning and interceding for His people. "Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi miserere nobis."

An interesting and important inquiry remains bearing on our subject, to ascertain so far as possible the earliest or apostolic form of Eucharistic celebration. It is manifest from the New Testament that the Eucharist was regarded as the great act of Christian worship: when the disciples met together it was to "break bread:" they broke bread from house to house: when Paul preached till midnight then followed the Eucharistic feast [Acts xx. 11]. There are in his epistles allusions to the Eucharistic offering. Thus, in the fourteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, "When thou shalt bless in spirit, how shall he who occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest?" [ver. 16.] St. Chrysostom interprets this passage of the Anaphora, or long thanksgiving, in the Eucharist, the conclusion of which was "for ever and ever," to which, if said in an unknown tongue, the unlearned (or laymen) not understanding, could not respond Amen. That the Apostle does refer to the Eucharist is highly probable, for giving of thanks would scarcely otherwise be mentioned rather than any other act of worship, while "thanksgiving" was the prominent feature in the apostolic Eucharist and that of the following age. Other terms in the passage quoted lead to the same conclusion. It may be thus rendered and explained. "When thou blessest [εὐλογήσῃς or εὐλόγῃς Lachmann] in the spirit, or celebratest the Eucharist (εὐλογία or blessing being, as was remarked, a common name for the Eucharist) with the presence and aid of the Holy Spirit"—the mysterious sacramental change being always in the early Church attributed to the presence and working of the Spirit of God—"how shall he who occupieth," &c.

Again, in his first epistle to Timothy, St. Paul says, "I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men"[1] [ii. 1]—a passage which St. Augustine understands of the prayers which formed the Eucharistic service, and he shews that in the Roman Liturgy they followed in the sequence here indicated by the Apostle.

In the apostolic celebration of the Eucharist, a long prayer of thanksgiving formed a principal portion of the service, at first, it would appear, extempore and of a length suited to the time and occasion. St. Justin, who follows the apostolic age, says, "We offer up our prayers, and when we have concluded our prayer, bread is brought, and wine and water, and the president likewise offers up prayers and thanksgivings with all his strength or ability (ὅση δύναμις αὐτῷ), and the people giving their assent by saying Amen." There is no reason to think, at that early period, there was an appointed form of thanksgiving everywhere used. A form is given in the Clementine Liturgy of great length, which alone would have precluded its general use in times of danger and persecution. The primary form of celebration is supposed to have been a thanksgiving prayer varying in length according to circumstances, then the words of institution and probably also the Lord's Prayer.[2] The dress of the bishop or priest who celebrated is called in the Apostolical Constitutions a "shining garment."[3] St. Paul mentions a "cloak" (φαιλόνη or rather φελόνη, the true reading) that he left with Carpus [2 Tim. iv. 13], which could not have been ordinary clothing or dress then worn, since there is no proof that the word ever had such a meaning: it can only be supposed that it was an Eucharistic vestment, probably of value, a supposition confirmed by the fact that the same name is now given in the Eastern Church to the Eucharistic vestment. Dr. Rock, in Hierurgia,[4] gives an engraving of a Greek priest, robed in the φελόνιον, which he describes as "a large round mantle enveloping the whole figure;" a chasuble it may be called, but not open in front, like the chasuble of the Western Church. It resembled and was probably used in imitation of the "robe of the ephod" worn by the Jewish high priest [Exod. xxviii. 31, 32].

An account is given of the controversies in the early and mediæval Church, on the Eucharistic Presence, and of the history of Eucharistic doctrine, in another article. [Real Presence. Transubstantiation.]

EUCHELAION. [Unction, Extreme.]

EUCHOLOGION. A liturgical volume containing the prayers, rites, and ceremonies of the Greek Church, and answering to the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England. It is sometimes divided into two parts, the one containing what would be called the Missal and Pontifical in the Western Church, and the other

[1] "Obsecro itaque primum omnium fieri obsecrationes, orationes, interpellationes, gratiarum actiones" [1 Tim. ii. 1]. "Eligo in his verbis hoc intelligere quod omnis vel pæne omnis frequentat Ecclesia, ut precationes accipiamus dictas, quas facimus in celebratione sacramentorum antequam illud quod est in Domini mensa incipiat benedici: orationes cum benedicitur et sanctificatur et ad distribuendum comminuitur; quam totam petitionem fere omnis Ecclesia dominica oratione concludit . . . interpellationes autem, sive ut nostri codices habent, postulationes, fiunt cum populus benedicitur. . . . Quibus peractis et participato tanto sacramento gratiarum actio cuncta concludit, quam in his etiam verbis ultimam commendavit Apostolus." [Epist. ad Paulin. 149, ab. 59, sec. 16.]

[2] Krazer says, after quoting the passage already given from St. Justin, "Arbitramur tamen cum Card. Bona, Apostolos brevem et prolixam diversis temporibus adhibuisse formulam. Brevem cum temporis angustia et persequentium metu premerentur; prolixam vero cum id per tempus et occupationes liceret." [See Eruditi Cardinalis, lib. i.; Rer. Liturg. c. v. [vi.] sec. 4.; De Apostolicis Eccl. Orientalis Liturgiis, p. 6, note. 1786].

[3] λαμπρὰν ἐσθῆτα μετενδύς, lib. viii. c. 12.

[4] P. 437, &c.

containing the Occasional Offices, the Hours, and the Epistles and Gospels. The great work on this subject is Goar's Euchologion, sive Rituale Græcorum, first published in 1647, and again in 1730 at Venice.

EULOGIA. [ANTIDORON.]

EUNOMIANS. A sect of Arian heretics, so called from their leader Eunomius, Bishop of Cyzicus in A.D. 360, and previously secretary to Aëtius. Their tenets were strongly opposed by St. Basil, St. Gregory of Nyssa, and St. Gregory Nazianzen. [AËTIANS. ANOMŒANS. DICT. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

EUTYCHIANISM. A heresy originated in the middle of the fifth century by Eutyches, abbot of a monastery near Constantinople. The distinctive characteristic of Eutychianism was an opinion that the Godhead and the Humanity of Christ were fused into one Nature. Hence the followers of Eutyches were called by themselves and others "Monophysites" (μόνη φύσις). This heretical opinion was distinctively opposed to the Catholic doctine that Christ has two Natures hypostatically united (καθ' ὑπόστασιν) in one Person.

Eutychianism was a recoil from NESTORIANISM, which imagined two Persons as well as two Natures in Christ. The statements of its originator apparently were that the Human Nature existed in the first instance without any union between it and the Divine Nature, and that when the latter united itself to the former, the two were amalgamated into one composite nature. But if the Divine Nature of the Son is consubstantial with that of the Father (which Eutyches maintained that he held as strongly as the orthodox held it), there could not be any mingling or amalgamation with it of any human or created substance, the substance of the Father being wholly Divine. The Eutychian theory, therefore, makes it necessary to believe either that [1] the Human Nature of Christ was annihilated by union with His Divine Nature, or that [2] it was, as the Docetæ alleged, a mere phantasm.

After one of the most violent periods of controversy on record, Eutychianism was finally condemned by the Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451], the following being the summary of the decree given by the assembled bishops. "We, then, following the Holy Fathers, all with one consent, teach men to confess one and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ; the same perfect in Godhead and also perfect in Manhood; truly God and truly Man, of a reasonable soul and body; consubstantial with the Father according to the Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to the Manhood; in all things like unto us without sin; begotten before all ages of the Father according to the Godhead, and in these latter days, for us and for our salvation, born of Mary, the Virgin Mother of God, according to the Manhood; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, to be acknowledged in two natures, inconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably, the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one Person and one subsistence, not parted or divided into two Persons, but one and the same Son, and Only-begotten, God the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ, as the Prophets from the beginning have declared concerning Him, and the Lord Jesus Christ Himself has taught us, and the creed of the Holy Fathers has delivered to us."

A vague theory like that of the Monophysites enters largely into modern misbelief respecting the Person of Christ and His work in the Church; many sympathizing with the views of Arius as to our Lord's Human Nature while he dwelt on earth, and with Eutyches as to His present Person in heaven. [HYPOSTASIS. COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM. DICT. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

EVANGELICAL. By this epithet is distinguished a school in the English Church, which, with a very partial grasp of Christian truth, and with an erroneous belief regarding the Holy Sacraments, has yet, through its zeal and through its advocacy of certain truths which had fallen into the background, been one of the principal means, during the last hundred years, of rousing the energies of the Church.

I. History of the Evangelical School. From the time of the Synod of Dort [A.D. 1619], doctrinal Calvinism in the Church of England began to decline. After the restoration of Charles II. it was generally abandoned. There is a curious testimony to the change in a letter to Boyle from one of his most constant correspondents, J. Beale, dated 1666: "When I first entered Cambridge the Ramists were in such great esteem that we gave very high rates for such of them as began to be out of print; but within three or four years they fell so low in credit that we might buy them at the rate of tainted fish. Soon after the same fate befell Calvinism in both our universities, and yet that claimed the title of holy oracles, the uncontroulable mystery. . . . This new doctrine deserted the throne and chairs of the universities upon the restoration of better antiquities, and hid itself in the smoke and smother of plebeian pulpits" [Boyle's Works, vi. p. 411].

This extract is given because it takes us to Cambridge, the headquarters of that remarkable set of divines, the LATITUDINARIANS. The historical importance of these divines is that in their school were bred the men to whom the Church of England was committed at the Revolution. A fuller account of them will be given hereafter, and at present it will be sufficient to notice that in the troubled times of the Rebellion and Commonwealth they had learned moderation (to give the quality its mildest name) and a love of liberty, that they regarded forms of Church government with comparative indifference, that they discarded Calvinism, that they were deep students of Greek philosophy, Plato and Plotinus being their favourite authors. They held the Creed honestly, the Thirty-nine Articles they regarded as articles of peace, and do not appear to have troubled their heads much about them. The defect in their theology was that while they dwelt much and worthily on the spiritual life of the renewed man, and insisted on purity of heart and holiness of life, they did not add to this, or rather did not lay as its foundation, the full sacramental doctrine and practice by which the renewed life is to be sustained. Now the doctrines flowing from the Incarnation of the Son of God, around which all theology gathers, can only be rightly maintained when they are not merely received as articles of faith, but are made living powers by the mysteries which make us partakers of the death and resurrection of our Lord. This the Latitudinarian school neglected, and consequently, as their doctrine of the Eucharist degenerated from that of Cudworth to that of Hoadly, so did their teaching of righteousness degenerate from the high tone of "evangelical righteousness" to lifeless expostulations touching the inexpediency of sin.

On the other hand, the truer sons of the Church of England, represented at the Restoration by Barrow, were much weakened by the loss of the Non-jurors, weakened not so much in learning as in their tone of piety. They much missed Ken and Kettlewell. In common with the other school also, they were injured in their theological tone by the necessities of the controversies with the Deists of George I.'s reign and their successors. This controversy was a perpetual defence of the outworks of the Christian faith, a putting of the Apostles and Evangelists, as it were, on their trial, instead of receiving from them the words of life. There was a coldness, a want of unction, among the best of the clergy, and a want of zeal among the clergy in general. The profligacy of the nation during the first half of the eighteenth century is matter of history: immorality and irreligion were rampant in England.

Such was the state of the Church and nation when Wesley and Whitfield began their career. Other men of less power were roused by similar causes, but it was principally zeal caught from Wesley and Whitfield that gave rise to the Evangelical school. [Methodism.]

Of the doctrine of this school it may be said, in general, that regarding redemption and the natural state of fallen man, they held the tenets common to Luther, Calvin, and Zwingli. Luther's doctrine of justification by faith was put foremost. It became again the test of a standing or falling Church. The doctrine of free grace was much insisted on. The necessity of an experience of religion was taught, by which was meant that men were to judge themselves not by the testimony of a good conscience, but by their feelings and an inner sense of God's love and favour. In this was made to reside the proof of conversion to God, and a sense of sudden conversion as from a state of utter irreligion to an assurance of forgiveness was very commonly required. Calvin's doctrine of election and predestination was received, an Augustinian phase of belief looked coldly on. Regarding the Holy Sacraments, the doctrines of Luther and Calvin were certainly not followed. Neither Luther nor Calvin so depreciated baptism; both Luther and Calvin condemned Zwingli regarding the Lord's Supper. Baptismal regeneration was held in abhorrence, and with justification baptism was held to have nothing at all to do. The statement of the doctrine of the Holy Eucharist could not be distinguished from Hoadly's, but practically the far greater devoutness of the Evangelicals invested this sacrament with greater sacredness than did their doctrine. As to the constitution and order of the Church, the Evangelicals were Episcopalians by habit, and so far as Episcopacy consented to be subservient to their view of the Gospel. The Liturgy was little more than tolerated. It was a current opinion that Dissenters from the Church of England were the salt of the land.

But it will be well to give a summary of the Evangelical creed in the words of a distinguished member of the school regarding one of the greatest and best of the school. Daniel Wilson, in a funeral sermon, spoke thus of Thomas Scott: "He was thus taught the apostolical doctrines of the deep fall and apostacy of man, of his impotency to any thing spiritually good, the proper atonement and satisfaction of Christ, the tri-unity of Persons in the Godhead, regeneration and progressive sanctification by the Holy Spirit, justification by faith only, and salvation by grace. These great principles he perceived to be indissolubly connected with repentance unto life, separation from the sinful customs and spirit of the world, self-denial and the bearing of reproach for Christ's sake, holy love to God and man, and activity in every good word and work. Further, he learned to unite both these series of truths with dependence upon Christ for the supply of needful grace, humble trust in His promises for final victory, and an unreserved ascription of all blessings to the Divine grace. Lastly, and after some interval, he embraced the doctrines relating to the secret and merciful will of God in our election in Christ Jesus; although he did not think a belief in these mysterious doctrines to be indispensable to salvation, nor consider the evidence for them, satisfactory as he deemed it, to carry with it that irresistible conviction which had attended his inquiries with respect to those essential and vital truths of religion before enumerated" [Life of Scott, p. 582].

This doctrine is connected with the Latitudinarian theology by the link of Leighton, whose works were again and again reprinted at the rise of Evangelicalism. It was, thus, the zeal of Whitfield and Wesley that, reanimating the remains of the foreign reformed theology, and assimilating with it the better teaching of the Latitudinarians, formed the Evangelical school. In neither of these sources was true sacramental doctrine to be found. In Leighton's works, e.g. there is scarcely a sentence of sacramental teaching.

In the foregoing extract from Daniel Wilson's sermon, the strength of the system is fairly brought out, and a comparison with primitive and apostolic Christianity will soon shew how partial, and in some respects erroneous, a system it is. Its great weakness is the same as that observed as the weakness of the Latitudinarians. The strength of the system, that which it had of truth, has been absorbed into the teaching and practice of the Church. Evangelicalism did a good work, and the memories of Scott and Newton and Venn, with not a few others, will ever be cherished by the Church as the memories of men of high and sterling piety, who contributed in no small measure to the restoration of religion, and who, in their day, held up the cross of Christ to the eyes of the world.

EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT. The Scriptures expressly declare, and the Church in all ages has taught, that the future punishment of the wicked will be everlasting. This statement is first distinctly found in the Prophets Isaiah and Daniel, and was believed in the later Jewish Church before the coming of our Lord, though like other important doctrines, e.g. the resurrection of the body, it was not clearly revealed at the beginning of the Mosaic dispensation. The passage principally bearing on the subject will be found in the last chapter of Isaiah [ver. 24], the expressions of which are often repeated by our Lord and His Apostles, and formed, it may be said, the foundation of their teaching—"For their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched" [ὁ γὰρ σκώληξ αὐτῶν οὐ τελευτήσει καὶ τὸ πῦρ αυτῶν οὐ σβεσθήσεται]. The Prophet Daniel [xii. 2] also teaches that some shall rise to everlasting life and others to everlasting shame [ζωὴν αἰώνιον—αἰσχύνην αἰώνιον]. In proof of the teaching of the later Jewish Church, we find the eternal punishment of the fire and worm denounced against the wicked in the Book of Judith [xvi. 17] (δοῦναι πῦρ καὶ σκώληκας εἰς σάρκας αὐτῶν καὶ κλαύσονται ἐν αἰσθήσει ἕως αἰῶνος), and in the Wisdom of Sirach [vii. 19] the fire and worm are said to be the punishment of the wicked. In the Book of Maccabees the seven brothers tortured by Antiochus, threaten him with the never-ending punishment reserved for the wicked—they speak of "eternal torment by fire," "interminable torments," "intense and eternal fire and torments which will not cease for ever."[1] In the Book of Enoch, an ecclesiastical work quoted by St. Jude, and probably written about the time of Herod,[2] the eternal punishment of fallen angels and of the wicked is expressly taught. Thus the writer speaks of the prison of the fallen angels in which they are kept for ever, and of wicked men "whose souls are punished and bound there (in prison) for ever."[3]

Such was the teaching of Judaism before and at the coming of our Lord; and we must remember that His object was not to destroy, but to purify and amend the existing system, which was originally of Divine institution. A large portion of Jewish or Rabbinical teaching was incorporated into His discourses and parables,[4] and though He sometimes denounces the corrupt glosses on the Divine law by the Scribes and Pharisees, yet, generally, He affirms the truth and orthodoxy of their teaching: "they sit in Moses' seat, therefore what they say unto you observe and do" [Matt. xxiii. 2, 3]. Now let us bear this in mind in considering the teaching of our Lord—had the doctrine of eternal punishment then taught by the Jewish Church been erroneous, we may infer, that such erroneous teaching would have been exposed and censured; but, on the contrary, our Lord always affirms this doctrine in the same terms and under the same symbolic representations and figures in use in the Old Testament and by writers of the later Jewish Church. The identity of teaching on this subject in the Old and New Dispensation could hardly have been more clearly exhibited.

On referring to our Lord's teaching in the New Testament, we shall first quote His express declaration, "that the righteous shall go into everlasting [αἰώνιον] life, and the wicked into everlasting [αἰώνιον] punishment" [Matt. xxv. 26]. Now, that the word here used, αἰώνιος, sometimes indicates a temporary, as well as an everlasting duration, is admitted,[5] but this does not set aside the proper meaning of the word as regards the punishment of the wicked; which may be inferred from the use of the same word, when describing the happiness of the righteous. If αἰώνιος means temporary in one case, we can only suppose that it must mean temporary in the other. It would be most arbitrary and unwarrantable to understand the same word in one member of the sentence as "temporary," and the other as "eternal," meanings widely and totally differing; nor, let it be remarked, would there be any other reason for doing so than to bring the passage into accordance with certain preconceived opinions and prejudices, a worthless kind of criticism unworthy of the name.

But the proof of this doctrine does not rest merely on the meaning of the word αἰώνιος, for there are other passages of Scripture in which the same doctrine is clearly taught, as in the ninth chapter of St. Mark, where our Lord, quoting the passage from Isaiah, declares with threefold reiteration the perpetuity of future punishment—"where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not

[1] Cotton's Translation of the Five Books of Maccabees, book iv. c. 12 [1832].

[2] "Upon the whole we may be assured that the book was written before the rise of Christianity, most probably at an early period of the reign of Herod."—Archbishop Laurence's Dissertation prefixed to his translation of the Book of Enoch, xliv.

[3] Ibid. c. xxi. 22 [1838].

[4] See Lightfoot's works [A.D. 1684], and Schoettgen's Horæ Hebraicæ [A.D. 1733]. The latter writer shows that large portions of the Sermon on the Mount and the petitions in the Lord's Prayer were taken from Rabbinical writings; also as regards other portions of our Lord's teaching the coincidence is sometimes very striking.

[5] Schleusner, Lex. in loc. He quotes from the LXX. as instances of the word meaning "temporary," πίλαι αἰώνιοι, ὄρη αἰώνια, ἔτη αἰώνια. He explains the word αἰὼν, "de quocumque temporis spatio ita dicitur, ut quale sit, judicari debet in singulis locis, in orationis serie et mente scriptoris, rebus adeo et personis de quibus sermo est," and interprets the word in the passage before us as meaning "eternal" (omne quod est finis expers), quoting the passages where αἰώνιος occur as having this meaning in reference to future happiness or misery:—Matt. xviii. 8, xix. 16, xxv. 41, 46; Mark iii. 29; Rom. ii. 7; 2 Tim. ii. 10; Heb. v. 9; 2 Cor. iv. 17; Luke xvi. 9 Heb. ix. 15; 2 Pet. i. 11.

quenched"[1] [vers. 44, 46, 48]. A great gulf or chasm is represented as fixed in the future state between the righteous and the wicked which is impassable [Luke xvi. 26]; the punishment of the wicked is called the "second death" [Rev. xxi. 8], which cannot, as appears from the passages quoted, mean annihilation or extinction of being, but final and hopeless woe.[2] An objection has been made, derived from passages quoted—the fire, it is argued, is said to be unquenchable, but the wicked who are cast into it may cease to exist—but why was the fire kindled but for the punishment of the wicked? besides, the wicked, as our Lord says, "go into everlasting punishment" (κόλασιν).

The next thing is to inquire how the teaching of Scripture on this subject was understood by the early Church. "Thou threatenest me," says St. Polycarp to the proconsul, "with fire which burns for an hour and so is extinguished, but knowest not the fire of the future judgment, and of that eternal punishment which is reserved for the ungodly."[3] St. Justin says that the devil will be sent into fire with his host, and the men that are his followers, there to be tormented to an endless eternity[4] (κολασθήσομενους εἰς ἀπέραντον αἰῶνα). In the account of the martyrdom of St. Felicitas and her seven sons [A.D. 150], one of them threatens eternal fire to the worshippers of demons (adorantes autem dæmonia cum ipsis in interitu erunt et in incendio sempiterno), another denounces eternal destruction to heathen gods and their worshippers (Dei autem tui cum cultoribus suis erunt in interitu sempiterno), and another, that all who do not confess Christ to be true God shall be cast into eternal fire[5] (in ignem æternum mittentur). Minucius Felix says of the future punishment of the wicked, "There shall be neither bound nor end to their torments."[6] St. Theophilus also speaks of the eternal punishment reserved for the ungodly[7] (αἰώνιοις τιμωρίαις, —αἰώνιους κόλασεις,—πῦρ αἰώνιον). St. Irenæus shews that the eternal punishment of the reprobate, and the eternal rewards of the elect, are given according to a man's deserving[8] (præparans utrisque quæ sunt apta . . . utrosque in aptum mittens locum). Tertullian—"the wicked shall suffer the punishment of eternal fire, receiving from the very nature of that fire, being as it were divine, the supply of their own incorruption."[9] St. Cyprian warns us of "the prison eternal, the ceaseless flame, the everlasting penalty."[10] Arnobius has been represented as denying this doctrine, but the fact is very doubtful, and as his work, Adversus Gentiles, was written before he was a Christian, it is of very little authority.[11]

Origen was the first who argumentatively opposed the received doctrine respecting the future punishment of sin. His denial probably originated from other strange uncatholic theories which he held. The reader will find in another article [CREATIONISM] his theory on the soul and its transmigration: he also held that all, both angels and men, were in a state of probation, that punishment either now or hereafter was only corrective or emendatory, and that all evil would finally be destroyed (even the perverse will of the devil being turned to God), which would be followed by a general "apocatastasis" or restoration of all things according to his interpretation of 1 Cor. xv. 24-28.[12]

St. Gregory Nyssen, and one or two others as Pseudo-Ambrose, probably held some of the opinions of Origen either on the termination of future punishment, or a general restoration of all things, a subject which will afterwards be considered.[13] [UNIVERSALISM.]

Strange as it may seem, Origen himself, in some of his works, clearly intimates the everlasting character of future punishment: his denial was a mere theory contrary to the general belief and tradition of the Church, which sometimes unthinkingly, and as it were in spite of himself, he follows. "Hear," he says, respecting sinners and those who love this present world, "what is the declaration of the prophet, 'their worm,' he says, 'shall not die' and their fire shall not be

[1] This passage is verbally quoted by our Lord: in the Alexandrian MS. of the LXX. we do not read, as in the Vatican MS. οὐ τελευτήσει, but οὐ τελευτᾷ—the words of our Lord as given by the Evangelist.

[2] Bishop Ellicot says [Charge, 1864]: "Whilst lastly he (the thoughtful Christian) would bless and praise God for the universality of several forms of expression in the Book of Revelation [Rev. vii. 9], he would nevertheless say that entrance into the heavenly city of at least some classes of sinners was denied in the most emphatic form that the flexible language of the original could supply [Rev. xxi. 27—lit. shall not, not enter]—and further, that one sin there was which, if words are to have any meaning at all, was to be accounted for ever irremissible" [Matt. xii. 32; Mark iii. 28; Luke xii. 10]. [P. 110.]

[3] Martyrium, sec. 11.

[4] Apol. i. sec. 28. See also Apol. i. sec. 45; Apol. ii. sec. 8; Dial. c. Tryp. sees. 117, 120.

[5] Ruinart, Acta Martyr. tom. i. p. 54 [1802].

[6] C. 35. [7] Lib. i. ad Autolycum ad finem.

[8] Adv. Hæres. lib. iv. c. 40.

[9] Apol. c. 48 [Oxf. transl.]. [10] Treatise viii.

[11] Vid. Nourry's Dissertation c. 9, art. 4 [Migne].

[12] Satis ex superioribus, etiam me sileute colligitur, damnatorum pœnis modum aliquando et finem ex decreto Origenis impositum iri; eum enim futurum ratus sit, ut quemeumque teneant statum animæ, peceare possint, et reipsa persæpe peccent, ac pro peccatis vel meritis perpetuo circuitu ab imis ad summa, a summis ad ima revolvantur, ipsiusque diaboli aversa a Deo voluntas olim conterenda sit, et Deo Patri regnum Christus sit traditurus, tumque existimaverit plenam omnium ἀποκατάστασιν ac perfectam felicitatem futuram, cum Deus erit omnia in omnibus; consequitur illinc necessario desitura damnatorum supplicia, eaque noxarum duntaxat expurgandi causa a Deo hominibus infligi. [Hueti Origenian. lib. ii. c. 2, quæst. xi. sec. 16.]

[13] Petavius shews that St. Gregory Nyssen probably held the opinion of Origen on the future punishment of sinners; and also the author of the Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, published under the name of St. Ambrose: he also quotes passages from St. Gregory Nazianzum, who sometimes appeared to doubt the truth of the orthodox doctrine. Some of the Fathers, as St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine, held that the sufferings of the lost, though never finally to be terminated, might be relieved by the prayers of the Church: an opinion, which, though never formally condemned, and apparently sanctioned by a few Missals in which such prayers occur, is without scriptural warrant, and wholly opposed to the general belief and tradition of the Church. [Theol. Dogm. de Angelis. lib. iii. c. 7, 8.]

quenched,' these are the worms which avarice breeds," &c.[1]

It will be, strictly speaking, unnecessary to add to the quotations already given from the Fathers of the first three centuries: for all, with the exception of Origen and a few followers, held the doctrine of future suffering. We shall, however, in further illustration, refer to two other great Doctors of the Eastern and Western Church, St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine, not merely as proving identity of teaching with writers previously quoted, but because the latter has entered upon the subject at considerable length and with especial reference to objections against its truth. Thus St. Chrysostom, after describing the miseries of the avaricious in this world, adds, "Such are their circumstances in this world, but those in the next what discourse shall exhibit?—the intolerable furnaces, the rivers burning with fire, the gnashing of teeth, the chains never to be loosed, the envenomed worm, the rayless gloom, the never-ending miseries."[2] See also his awful teaching on this subject in his Commentary on 1st Thessalonians, Hom. viii., and in the thirteenth Homily on the Epistle to the Philippians.

St. Augustine, in one of his latest works De Civitate Dei, has fully treated the subject;[3] thus he inquires whether the fire and the worm of torment are to be literally understood, whether the fire be corporeal or material (which is the usual belief of the Church). He refutes the opinion of those who think that the torments of hell are only purgatorial, and thus of limited duration, and that all who die in the unity of the Church, however sinful their lives, will finally be saved. He shows that the errors of Origen had been condemned by the Church,[4] and points out from the passage quoted from St. Matthew [xxv. 46] the "absurdity" of supposing that the happiness of the righteous could be eternal, and the punishment of the wicked only temporary.[5]

The evidence of many more writers might be adduced to shew that the Catholic Church, with the exception of Origen and a few followers or imitators, whose opinions have been condemned, held in early ages, and afterwards to the present day, the belief that future punishment will be everlasting.[6]

1 Homil. vi. in Exodum, sec. 6.

2 Comment. in 1 Cor. x. [Oxf. transl.].

3 Lib. 21, c. 9, et seqq.

4 Origenis errores ab Anastasio papa fuisse damnatos testatur Hieronymus Apologia adversus Ruffinum et Epist. 78 ad Pammachium; item a Theophilo in Synodo Alexandrina. Post Augustinum etiam Vigilio Papa et Justiniano imperatore, Synodus quinta œcumenica multis anathematismis impia et absurda damnavit Origenis dogmata, quæ extant apud Nicephorum Callistum, lib. 17, c. 27, 28, et in ejus Concilii actione, 4, c. 11. Coquœus. Augustini Op., note in loc. [Migne ed.].

5 "Par pari enim relata sunt, hinc supplicium æternum, inde vita æterna. Dicere enim hoc uno eodem, que sensu, Vita æterna sine fine erit, supplicium æternum finem habebit, multum absurdum est. Unde quia vita æterna Sanctorum sine fine erit, supplicium quoque æternum quibus erit, finem procul dubio non habebit." De Civitate, lib. xxi. c. 23.

6 The teaching of the Eastern Church is given in Confessio Orthodoxa, quæst. 63, 68 [Kimmel's Libri Symb. Orient. Eccles.]; of the Roman Catholic Church in the Catechism of the Council of Trent on the Fifth Article of the Creed. In the Forty-two Articles of the Anglican Church there was a declaration of the eternity of future punishment, afterwards withdrawn: it was directed against the errors of the Anabaptists, but omitted when the sect was extinct or its numbers too few to call for any notice or censure of their opinions. The emphatic language of the Reformatio Legum, which passed both Houses of Convocation, leaves no doubt of the opinions of the Reformation Divines: "Nec minor est illorum amentia, qui periculosam Origenis hæresim in hac ætate nostra rursus excitant: nimirum omnes homines (quantumcumque sceleribus se contaminaverint) salutem ad extremum consecuturos cum definito tempore a justitia divina pœnas de admissis flagitiis lucrint. Sed sacra Scriptura damnatos sæpe pronunciat in perpetuos cruciatus et æternas flammas præcipitari [c. xi. Cardwell, ed. 1851].

The objections against this doctrine have next to be considered. Probably the chief of them is that founded on its supposed contrariety to the love and justice of God: to His love, by the condemnation of His creatures to everlasting punishment; to His justice, since sins which men now commit cannot, it is supposed, really deserve endless retribution. Punishment, it is often taken for granted, according to the opinion of Origen, can only be intended for the correction and amendment of the sinner; but, as Butler has proved,[7] we have no reason to think, from our present knowledge of the government of God, that punishment is exclusively intended for such a purpose; e.g. men by profligacy often bring diseases upon themselves which, notwithstanding their unfeigned repentance, lead to inevitable death. Certain crimes also, according to human legislation, incur the sentence of death, the offender not being punished for the sake of his reformation, which is thus rendered impossible, but as a penalty for his crime and a warning and example to others. How then shall we presume to assert, in the face of Scripture and in contradiction to our present knowledge and experience of God's dealings, and even to our own universal belief and practice (e.g. in punishing the crime of murder with the penalty of death), that future punishment can only be intended for the correction and reformation of the sinner? Moreover, those who venture to assert that the wicked will be cast into hell for their reformation, do not sufficiently consider whether, in such a place and and with such associates, repentance and amendment would be even possible. In the present world, if we intended the reformation of a criminal, should we commit him to a prison where the worst, most hardened malefactors only, would be his companions? All will admit that with such associates his depravity would be increased, and his repentance and amendment, morally speaking, rendered impossible. What hope, then, can there be for the repentance of the reprobate, associated in torment with devils, and with the vilest evildoers who have ever lived upon earth, God's grace, which can only lead to repentance, withdrawn, and sin, by its own certain effect and penalty, leading to increased impenitence and guilt? The place of torment, we may be assured, at least cannot be a school of discipline, in which sinners are to be reformed and brought to newness of life.

7 Analogy—on the government of God, part i. c. 2.

But the inquiry before us, as a little consideration will shew, really depends upon this, "What is the real nature and guilt of sin in the sight of God?" There is much danger of self-deception on this point warping the judgment. Being sinners ourselves, we are thus ready and willing to make excuse for sin either in our own case or in that of others, forgetting that sin remaining the same, has one unchangeable character in the sight of Almighty God. Now, what is sin, what its guilt and heinousness in the sight of God? To know its real nature and guilt, we must consider the price which was required for its pardon. St. Augustine and others have supposed that God, without the satisfaction on the Cross, could have pardoned sin;[1] but this is a mere speculation of certain writers respecting a subject upon which Holy Scripture gives no information. All we know is that God's ways are the wisest and the best, and may perhaps be in this case the only means by which the desired end could be attained. Leaving mere theories, let us simply attend to the teaching of Holy Scripture. "God," says St. Paul, "spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all" [Rom. viii. 32]. If we would realize God's hatred of sin, its real guilt and heinousness in His sight, let us behold the sacrifice offered on Calvary, God giving up His own Son to torments and death for man's redemption. This unfathomable mystery of Divine love we cannot understand, but it proves the awful nature and guilt of sin, and shews that our own notions on the subject are miserably imperfect and erroneous. We cannot therefore justly argue against the doctrine of eternal punishment from our own opinion of the guilt of sin, or of what we may think that God's justice requires for its pardon.[2] The subject is not only beyond our comprehension, but probably has a bearing on other matters of which we have no knowledge whatever. St. Paul speaks of the wisdom of God in redemption being made known by the Church to "the principalities and powers in heavenly places" [Ephes. iii. 10], that is, according to Scriptural usage, to the principalities and powers either of light or darkness [Ephes. i. 21, vi. 12]. Thus the doctrine of the Atonement has a connection, of whatever kind, with other worlds or orders of beings besides our own; may we not then suppose that the eternal punishment of the wicked (the two doctrines being inseparably connected, and equally shewing the heinousness and guilt of sin in the sight of God; the crucifixion of His eternal Son being required for its pardon, and an eternity of woe its penalty if unpardoned) may have a bearing of an as yet unknown character on other worlds or orders of creation, as a vindication of God's justice in the sight of the universe, and an everlasting spectacle of the guilt and punishment of sin? The prophet Isaiah and St. John seem to intimate that the doom of the impenitent will thus be a spectacle of triumph to the righteous,[3] as the merited penalty of rebellion against God and disobedience

[1] He speaks of "innumerabilibus modis quibus ad nos liberandos uti posset Omnipotens" [De Trinitate, lib. xiii. c. 16, sec. 21].

[2] That the reprobate in the place of torment are beyond the possibility of repentance, is to be believed, not only for reasons already given; but especially on this account, that the will, after the separation of soul and body, is incapable of essential change, being unalterably fixed in its bias towards good or evil. Our present life is always represented in Scripture as one of probation, in which not only the duty, but the efficacy, of repentance (a change from evil to good) is constantly set forth. We read that "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave" [Eccles. ix. 10], in which are "the days of darkness" [Ibid. xi. 8]. "The night cometh," says our Lord, "when no man can work" [John ix. 4]. "The Holy Ghost saith To-day if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts" [Heb. iii. 7, 8]. "Now is the accepted time, behold now is the day of salvation" [2 Cor. vi. 2]. It is impossible, after reading such passages, to suppose that man has equally the power beyond the grave as in the present life, of changing from sin to holiness; for they would then lose their chief force and meaning. The declaration in the Apocalypse [xxii. 11] is therefore founded on unchangeable necessity, it cannot be reversed, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; he that is righteous, let him be righteous still."

St. Augustine, writing to Deogratias [Epist. cii.] endeavours, in explanation of Matt. vii. 2, to shew that everlasting punishment is founded on justice. He speaks of a will averse from God, as if containing in itself a perpetuity of guilt, necessarily and always putting forth fresh acts of sin "quia æternum voluit habere peccati perfructionem (al. perfruitionem), æternam vindictæ inveniat severitatem." The will to commit sin does not become extinct, nor does the penalty cease.

Some writers have asserted that sins committed against an eternal Being deserve on the score of justice an eternity of punishment. However unable we may be to speak with certainty on this point, it is at least quite clear that the greatness and majesty of the Being offended must in some proportion aggravate the guilt of the offender; a sin against God, we shall all admit, must widely differ in degree of guilt from a sin against a fellow being. Besides, the guilt of sin is increased in proportion to the advantages and privileges of the sinner. Thus the sins of Christians are not as those of the heathen, but are greatly aggravated, being the sins of the regenerate, who are members of Christ, God's children by adoption and grace. The prophet Amos [iii. 2] says of the Israelites, "you only have I known of all the families of the earth, therefore will I punish you for all your iniquities." Whatever be my dealings towards others, you whom I have especially favoured cannot expect to escape punishment.

If we cannot now fully understand the justice of eternal punishment, let us bear in mind, as was observed, that our knowledge on the subject is limited, and that we are not qualified to decide on the question until in all its bearings it is fully brought before us. Our present duty is to rely implicitly on the teaching of God's Word and Church, though on this and other subjects our knowledge may be imperfect and inadequate, and we can only, in the Apostle's words, "see through a glass darkly."

[3] It may appear strange and revolting to mere human feelings to represent the righteous as in any sense exulting over the doom of the reprobate; yet undoubtedly the song of the redeemed before the throne will be a song of triumph over God's enemies. They sing the song of Moses the servant of God [Exod. xv. 1-21] and of the Lamb [Rev. xv. 3]. The righteous, let us remember, will then fully know the real evil and guilt of sin in the sight of God, and view it with the most intense abhorrence; their will being entirely conformed to, and absorbed in, His will, they will love those whom He loves, and hate His enemies [see Ps. cxxxix. 21, 22], with an entire acquiescence in His acts of retributive justice. "Just and true are Thy ways, O thou King of Saints."

to His laws. Isaiah says in the passage before quoted, "And they shall go forth (from the holy city, Jerusalem) to look on the carcases of the men that have transgressed against Me, for their worm shall not die," &c., and St. John [Rev. xiv. 10] also speaks of the wicked being tormented "in the presence of (ἐνώπιον) the holy angels and the Lamb."

A few remarks may be added respecting the danger of rejecting this doctrine on account of certain à priori opinions or objections of our own. We are thus undermining the foundation which supports many other essential or fundamental portions of Divine revelation. If doctrines, which, like this, are unquestionably contained in God's Word, are to be given up because we think them unreasonable and untenable, the same criterion may fairly be applied to other doctrines which have the same authority and sanction; and thus we may reject, and on this principle many have rejected, what Christians generally consider the fundamental or essential doctrines of the faith, as the doctrines of the Holy Trinity, the Atonement, and the resurrection of the body. If we profess to believe that the Bible is really God's revealed Word, we are bound by our very admission to receive it in its entirety, and cannot without manifest inconsistency either admit or reject any portion merely in accordance with our own private opinion or judgment. It is also to be remembered that Holy Scripture only brings this doctrine before us in its practical aspect. No attempt is made to reconcile it with God's attributes, or to shew its accordance (which cannot be doubted) with His justice and His love. It is revealed in all its awfulness, that having before us the terrible penalties of sin, we may know, and unfeignedly believe to our soul's health, that "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the Living God." "From Thy wrath and from everlasting damnation, Good Lord, deliver us."

EVIL. "Unde malum et quare,"[1] was the question that of old met the Church at every turn. Her answer was that evil is our allotted element of trial; it is as the fire that purges out the dross, where it is endured in a fitting spirit; and is always the standing proof that man's will is free. Evil was considered by heresy to have a being of its own, distinct from everything else, and co-existing from all eternity collaterally with the principle of good. This theory was the active principle of Gnostic and Manichæan error. [Gnosticism. Manichæism. Dualism.] The Greek philosophy, developed from germs and growing points of deeper truth (obtained either through Phœnician sources from Zion, or preserved through the Deluge as traditions of Paradise), held nobler, though still distorted views. Thus the Pythagorean Empedocles taught that the one Divine principle (τὸ ἕν) contained nothing in itself that was discordant, but as soon as unity became by creation the author of subordinate being, confusion and discord ensued. Unity was φιλία, the universe was a widespread antagonism, δῆρις καὶ νεῖκος, for the imperfection of the creature introduced variance with the Good that is Supreme. Evil and corruption were derived from this νεῖκος, which itself came in with the creation of the universe.[2] And this may help us at the present day to account for the origin of evil. Scripture declares of the creature, that evil is inseparable from it, even in its purest forms. The Creator alone is absolute Holiness and Purity and Truth; the angels "He chargeth with folly," and "the heavens are not clean in His sight." Glorious in their purity indeed they are, as compared with the impurities of earth; even as the tarnished condition of man's life on earth is holiness, as compared with the degeneration of those lost spirits whose enmity has lowered the life of man to its present ruined state.

Imperfection, then, is inseparable from created substance, and imperfection is evil in varying degree.[3] It is difficult to account for evil in any other way. The Creator can never have been the cause of it by the creative Word; neither can it be imagined that the Spirit of Evil unknown to the Creator should have poured poison into the world of His creation by a secret art of malice. The Tempter bade our First Parents remedy the imperfection of which they were conscious by an act of disobedience. Pure and happy and good as they were, they still knew that their knowledge was limited; darkness closed in their moral perception on every side, and the Tempter flattered their vanity with the promise that disobedience should raise them to a level with the Omniscient: "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." They disobeyed and fell. But before they had disobeyed, the imperfection of their nature made itself felt as evil. There was the wish for forbidden knowledge, which in itself was sin. The Fall was scarcely a simple act of unsuspecting rashness. The Tempter made his assault as he makes it now, step by step. Appetite and imagination and ambition were successively tried, and the fruit of the tree was coveted as "good for food, and pleasant to the eye, and to be desired to make wise," and the vitium of imperfection led straight to sin; Eve took of the fruit and ate thereof: but minor shades of frailty had already preceded the last fatal act of disobedience, as the will gradually yielded to evil.

The origin of evil may be traced to this natural imperfection of all created being. It is not by positive creation, nor by unforeseen intercalation; but it is the natural, inseparable attribute of every thing but the Uncreate. That evil should be inseparable from our existence on earth is less wonderful perhaps than that the created imperfection of angelic being should be separate from all shades of positive evil. In the angels that stand round God's throne, there is a falling short of absolute perfection, but no nearer approach to evil; and this imperfection is possibly aggravated

[1] Tert. de Præscr. Hær. 7.

[2] Τίθησι μὲν γὰρ (Ἐμπεδοκλῆς) ἀρχήν τινα τῆς φθορᾶς τὸ νεῖκος· δόξειε δ' ἂν οὐδὲν ἧττον καὶ τοῦτο γεννᾶν ἐξ αὐτοῦ τοῦ Ἑνός. [Aristot. Metaph. iii. 4.]

[3] Archbishop King, Orig. of Evil, c. iii. Of the Evil of Defect.

into concrete forms of evil by slow degrees in its transmission through many intermediate worlds that link our fallen nature with angelic excellence; also from this sullied nature of ours it descends possibly, step by step, to those fallen angels that kept not their first estate. Our earth was the paradise in which the powers of heaven conversed with our First Parents, but it is bridged in an opposite direction by sin and death, whereby

> "The spirits perverse
> With easy intercourse pass to and fro
> To tempt or punish mortals, except whom > God and good angels guard with special grace."[1]

The further question why evil should be permitted to exist admits of many answers; the drift of which only can be given. First, man can only be a free agent,[2] and make that choice between good and evil which is his discipline for a more perfect state, by being himself a being of imperfection, an heir of corruption. Freedom of will can only be exercised in connection with the power of sinning; when man's will is purified by the light of Heaven, and moves spontaneously in lines that are parallel with the teaching of God's Law, he has attained the highest perfection of which he is capable upon earth; and that which is seen in God's people should be sufficient to convince any one that such divinely inspired obedience is possible. It is God's way of overruling evil with good. To have a chastened will is better than to have it fettered;[3] evil is our element of trial, and this would in itself be a sufficient answer to the question why evil should be permitted, even though it were not the natural accident of imperfection. Then many things that men deem evil are only so in imagination. Many, if we could only see them in all their bearings, are positive blessings. God, as we have every reason to believe, governs the world by general laws; hence in the administration of those laws, as in the natural world, we must expect to see something like uneven action, one law controlling the operation of another. Some may seem to have every earthly blessing heaped upon them, but these may only be blessings in appearance; and the artisan in his lowly home, surrounded by his children, will often be a far happier man than the possessor of lordly revenues, to whose hearth such blessings have been denied, and whose very position has isolated him in great measure from intimate relations with his brother man. His lot is cast by the operation of the general laws whereby God governs the world, and of the two cases instanced he has the most reason to wish that the course of the world could have been ordained otherwise; the poorer man has the truest cause to use the prayer of Agur: "Give me neither poverty nor riches, feed me with food convenient for me." [Prov. xxx. 8.] Moreover, uneven though the apparent action of such laws may be, it is but for a moment that they have force, for life is but a moment as compared with eternity, ῥιπὴ ὀφθαλμοῦ. If the memory of earth accompanies us into the life of the world to come, we shall wonder at the importance that we have attached to position, and power, and prosperity in life: all such things will then seem to us to be lighter than vanity itself.

Again, physical suffering is an evil, of which the chastening effect is easily visible. The house of suffering is a school of virtue, and more especially the house of mourning. There is a wholesome medicine in the thought of death; and the lengthened illnesses that lead to man's dissolution have a beneficial effect both on the sufferer and on those who witness his mortal anguish. In the case of the sufferer, "Tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope" that "maketh not ashamed" [Rom. v. 3]; and if the bodily ill be taken in a proper spirit, it has its sure issue in the faith that looks through the sorrows of earth to the glories of Heaven, and feels most truly that "the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed"[4] in spirits schooled in adversity. Death, in such a case, is no real evil, but rest to the weary; and the anticipation of it causes almost less moral disturbance to the soul than preparation for an important journey in full health; the sufferer in such a case has long foretasted, and by rumination digested, whatever bitterness there is in death. It is a wholesome discipline also for others to witness. It helps to open their eyes to the vanity of life, and to think more seriously of the deep purpose of God in placing us under trial, that "this is the will of God, even our sanctification." Death is indeed the penalty of sin. But it is the minister of good to man. It is the handmaid of life; while it removes us one by one as we become unsuited for the active duties of our being, it hands over those same duties to younger and more vigorous hands. The main trunk is preserved in vigour by the pruning away of decayed and withered branches.[5]

Other bodily evils there are that do not shorten man's life, calamitous indeed to think of, but less grievous perhaps in endurance than in imagination. Use is here a channel of mercy, and it is a spectacle of moral beauty to behold the cheerful resignation with which such privation, for instance, as the loss of sight or hearing can be endured by the afflicted. When one sense is destroyed, others are observed to become more acute, and he who is cut off from one channel of intercourse with the world of outer sense, may have the inward sense made proportionately keen and penetrating, causing him to make "melody in his heart" for the rich inward ray that cheers him;—

[1] Milton, P. L. b. ii.

[2] Archbishop King on Evil, v. 5, subs. 2, xi.

[3] "Of evil, the best condition is not to will, the second not to can." [Bacon, Essays Civil and Moral, xi.]

[4] Rom. viii. 18.

[5] Even the heathen moralist could see the beneficial effects of suffering—"Nihil infelicius mihi videtur eo, cui nihil unquam evenit adversi. Non licuit enim illi se experiri, ut ex voto illi fluxerint omnia, ut ante votum; male tamen de illo Dii judicaverunt. Indignus visus est a quo vinceretur fortuna. [Seneca, de Prov. iii.]

"As the wakeful bird
Sings darkling, and in shadiest coverts hid Tunes her nocturnal note."

In such instances as these, then, and they might be varied infinitely, we can see clearly that the so-called evils of life are not unmitigated evils; in a more perfect state of being we shall see that they were no evils at all, but lay at the root of blessings that are eternal.

One evil however there is, absolute, unqualified, and inveterate, yet to a certain extent under man's control, the evil of heathenism. The working of general laws that subserve the purposes of the Creator in the world of nature, and by which His moral government of the world of souls is conducted, also spreads the knowledge of His ways throughout the earth, as the undulations of thin ether convey the rays of light to the eye, or the vibrations of air awaken within the ear the sense of sound. But as man is able, in a certain degree, to make those physical laws subservient to his purposes, and as in the moral world he may by his perverseness thwart, or by an intelligent co-operation further, the counsels of Divine wisdom, so, as regards the progress of Gospel principles, the death-blow of heathenism can only be struck by the exhibition of Christian holiness. Example is the general law, precept the particular application; and religion in its objective phase, as carried into practice in the daily work of life, is that which must win souls to Christ, whether among the rude uncivilized tribes of the earth, as the progress of civilization carries us onward, or among the dense masses of our population that are in fact as dead to God's teaching as the most benighted savages of Africa. Without the teaching of Christian example, embodying the active charities of our calling, the missionary's labour is in vain, whether here or at the antipodes. The law is general, and every individual man has his own proper work in helping to resolve the antagonism of good and evil principles, that the νεῖκος of human sin and infirmity may be absorbed in the φιλία that is Divine. "Thy kingdom come" is the spirit of our daily prayer; it should be the spirit also of our daily practice. [SIN. Archbishop King on the Origin of Evil; Brown's Philosophy of Human Mind, lect. 93-95.]

EXCOMMUNICATION. The Church of Christ being a true and proper society, distinct from civil society, and administered by her own laws and governors, has the power of admitting worthy and fit persons, and of ejecting, that is, of excommunicating or putting out of her communion, persons unworthy, wicked, and obstinate.

The Apostles themselves exercised this power; St. Paul [1 Cor. v. 2-6] put away the incestuous Corinthian as a grievous sinner, cast him out of the Church, and "delivered him to Satan," in order that by means of this severe discipline he might return to a better life; that the Church might suffer no damage, and that the sounder part might not be infected by corrupt example. The same power is still necessary to the Church, whether exercised in rejecting unworthy candidates from Holy Baptism, or depriving those who are baptized of participation in the other sacrament of Christ.

Our Lord committed this power of denying admission to sacraments to His Apostles, and it did not expire with them [Matt. xvi. 19; John xx. 22, 23; Isa. xxii. 22]. The keys, and the power of opening and shutting, designate the whole power of government.

The Catholic Church has always claimed this authority as the ground of her Founder's commission, as appears from [1] the express testimonies of the Fathers, [2] the penitential canons made by councils general and particular, and [3] the schisms which in ancient time arose out of its exercise.

The whole Christian world submitted cheerfully and willingly to this sound and wholesome discipline and pious mortification for the comfort and salvation of souls: and those who denied it were branded with heresy, as countervening the institution of our Lord, made in express words and founded by God Himself, who delegated it to those that watch over the flock which He bought with His own Blood.

Excommunication is defined to be expulsion from the communion and society of the faithful, by virtue of the power bestowed by Christ on His Church, and inflicted by bishops and priests only [Matt. xviii. 17; 1 Cor. v. 11, 12; 2 Thess. iii. 6; 1 Tim. i. 20; Titus i. 10, iii. 10; 2 John 10]. There are two kinds, [1] remedial, penitential, or medicinal, in the case of those who on conviction, or by voluntary confession are proved to be guilty of some grievous sin, and mourned and lamented their fall: such being removed from the communion of the faithful, both as an example and with the design of amending them; [2] punitive or mortal, as in the instance of those who continue rebellious and impenitent and refuse to acknowledge their guilt. Anciently, the bishops and clergy condemned; and no other bishop could receive the offender into communion until restored by the judgment of a provincial synod; or if it was a question of an article of faith, then only by a general council. The person accused was judged by his own diocesan, and the case could not be tried in the first instance even by a patriarch or metropolitan: the latter in case of negligence could issue a monition to his suffragan; and if his warning was not respected, then the suffragan and accused were cited before the provincial synod. If the synod pronounced sentence, bishops were forbidden to offer to the offender communion by the Councils of Nicæa [c. xviii.], Elvira [c. liii.], and I. Arles [c. xvi.], and an easy guarantee for the maintenance of this discipline lay in the grant of commendatory or circular letters with which Christians when travelling were furnished.

Separation and exclusion from the communion of the faithful [Matt. xviii. 17] is called the Greater, denial of sacraments the Lesser excommunication.

The Greater Excommunication cuts off the offender from the body of the Church, deprives him of ecclesiastical communion, so that he can neither receive nor administer the sacraments; neither attend divine worship nor take part therein. The Lesser Excommunication deprives a person from receiving the sacraments or being presented to a benefice, but does not render him incapable of administering sacraments or presenting another to a benefice, as defined by Pope Gregory XI. The popular term for the greater excommunication was "by bell, book and candle."

"Ipso facto" excommunication was pronounced on all who violated the liberty of the Church; the greater excommunication was incurred by those who [1] maliciously deprived churches of their rights, [2] who disturbed the peace of the Church or state, [3] who gave or procured false witness, [4] who laid unjust information against others, [5] who maliciously offered impediments to marriage, [6] who interrupted patrons in their right of collation, or [7] who from motives of gain, favour, or ill will despised the royal mandate for excommunication.

In fulminating an anathema, twelve priests assisted the bishop, holding candles in their hands; these they cast upon the ground whilst the sentence was pronounced, and bells were tolled during the ceremonial. The minor excommunication was pronounced by the bishop with the consent of his clergy, and lasted only for a time; the penalty being a deprivation of church privileges.

In the rubric to the office for Burial of the Dead, Christian interment is denied to the excommunicate, that is (as appears from the sixty-eighth canon) to such as are denounced excommunicate "majori excommunicatione" for some grievous and notorious crime, no person being able to testify of their repentance. Both before and after the Reformation, upon evidence of repentance being given to the bishop, he has granted commissions not only to bury but to absolve the dead in order to Christian burial. Thus "ipso facto" excommunications appear no longer to be recognised.

The sentences of excommunication given by an ecclesiastical judge or ordinary are to be read out after the Nicene Creed. In the year 1695, Archbishop Tenison required his suffragans to "see that none be instrumental in pronouncing sentences of excommunication and absolution without such solemnity as that great and weighty matter requires." Archbishop Williams called excommunication "that rusty sword of the Church," but in 1681 it was directed against "Popish recusants," and in the following year against Nonconformists.

Sentence of excommunication cannot be given until after three admonitions have been made to the offender, under pain of suspension of the judge from entry of a church for one month, unless the excess be manifest. But if there is a law to the point and used as the authority, it is itself constituted a monition, and no written sentence is required. [ANATHEMA. Ferraris; André; Beyerlinck; Gibson; Ayliffe, Parergon, 259, 263; Lyndwood; Grindal's Remains, 451.]

EXEMPTION. A privilege exempting from the claims or obligations of common law; in ecclesiastical language, a privilege which withdraws a church, or religion, or secular community from episcopal jurisdiction. It took its rise in the monasteries, when bishops never interfered in their discipline, except to confirm or give benediction to an abbot elect; and the Second Council of Limoges, A.D. 1031, in order to exhibit the confidence of the Synod in the conduct of the monasteries, subjected them solely to their abbots, as the Council of Arles long before had adjusted the relations of Lerins to its diocesan the Bishop of Frejus. Bishops, however, in many instances, sought to recover their lost or impaired powers, and in consequence the monasteries appealed for protection to popes and sovereigns, seeking to restrict the episcopal power to the benediction of an abbot chosen by the monks, and to the correction of offences of which abbots neglected to take cognizance. They also sought to prohibit bishops from demanding money for the consecration of altars or for giving Orders, from interfering in their temporal concerns, and frequent visitation. Great formality was observed before these concessions were made, the acquiescence of the bishop and the consent of the metropolitan in synod being made indispensable, and granted only upon allegations of usefulness and necessity. The authority of the sovereign was also required. Until the tenth century, these preliminaries were carefully guarded, but in the eleventh century, the bishops fostered the growth of exemptions. The great abbeys of Clugny, Citeaux, and Monte Cassino, with the mendicant orders (privileged to hear confessions and preach without any license but that of the pope), obtained such privileges, that at length intending founders exacted from the diocesans a grant of exemption and independence as a previous condition of carrying out their design. Another evil sprung up, the creation of extra-diocesan places, that is, of churches dependent only on some great church to which they were appropriated by the pope, he being regarded as the sole superior, and appointing a representative with episcopal rights, known as "quasi-episcopal." Such "Peculiars" in England have been recently abolished by statute and restored to the jurisdiction of the diocesans.

Beneficed parish priests are said to be exempt, simply with regard to their inherent privilege of preaching and administering Sacraments within their several churches without license from the bishops, and of prohibiting any others from intruding upon their function without their consent.

EXEGESIS. The exposition of Holy Scripture. It is a comprehensive word which properly takes in all that is connected with full interpretation of the Bible: but it is often restricted to the meaning of literary interpretation, or the determination of the sense which the text bears when viewed in the same manner as the texts of an uninspired work. Thus used, the word is often minutely subdivided, and the grammatical, the historical, the philological exegesis are spoken of as branches of Biblical exposition.

EXOMOLOGESIS. [CONFESSION.]

EXORCISM. The adjuration of evil spirits in the Name of God to depart from persons or places of whom or of which they are holding possession. This was extended, for many ages, to salt and to water which were to be used in Divine Service, the ceremony of exorcism immediately preceding that of benediction.

The exorcism of persons about to be baptized is a ceremony contemporary with the earliest detailed accounts of baptism that have come down to our times from the Primitive Church, and was founded on a keen appreciation of the power of Satan over fallen man in an unregenerated condition. It is still continued in the Eastern and Roman Churches, and was used under the first English Prayer Book [A.D. 1549-1552], but the form disappeared from the latter after its revision. The words of the Benedictio Aquæ, now incorporated with the Baptismal Office, represent, however, in some degree, the ancient principle, though the actual words of exorcism are no longer there.

Respecting the exorcism of persons possessed, see the article DEMONS, DEMONIACAL POSSESSION. The seventy-second Canon of the Church of England forbids any clergyman from attempting exorcism without special license from his bishop.

EXPIATION. This word does not occur in the Bible otherwise than as a marginal gloss [Num. xxxv. 33], where the Hebrew word is "jekuppar," the passive form of "kipper," to make atonement for. The term "expiation" has as its correlative "propitiation;" the former referring to the purgation of sin, the latter to that altered condition with respect to Divine favour that is expressed by RECONCILIATION. The two words conjointly make up the complex idea involved in ATONEMENT, SATISFACTION, to which words the reader is referred. [SACRIFICE.]

F

FAITH. A supernatural mental quality, bestowed by God, whereby truth is apprehended without the evidence of experience or of argumentative proof. It is partly of the understanding and partly of the will. As far as it is of the understanding it is [1] the knowledge of its object (i.e. of the proposition which is to be believed); and [2] a rational conviction as to the competency of the authority by which the proposition to be believed is communicated. So far as it is of the will it is an assent to what is thus presented by competent authority, as to truth.

These three component parts of faith may be illustrated by the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity.

UNDERSTANDING.	1. Knowledge of the proposition: that there exist three Persons in one God.
	2. Conviction as to the authority: that this mystery is revealed by God Himself.
WILL.	3. Assent. I BELIEVE that there are three Persons in one God, because God Himself has revealed that proposition.

To these three component parts may also be added a fourth as belonging to a well-developed, or "living faith," viz.:—

AFFECTIONS. 4. Love actuating the conduct.

The scriptural character of the definition thus given may be shewn by a few out of many passages in the New Testament. [1] "By grace are ye saved through Faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God" [Eph. ii. 8]. "Lord, increase our Faith" [Luke xxii. 5]. Hence it is rightly called the "grace of faith." [2] "Faith is the substance (ὑπόστασις) of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen" [Heb. xi. 1]: the ground on which it is accounted evidence being stated thus, [3] "Faith cometh by hearing (ἐξ ἀκοῆς) and hearing by the Word of God (διὰ ῥήματος Θεοῦ)," where it is clear that the "report" or "hearing" means hearsay knowledge, and "the Word of God" means information in any way received from God. [4] "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but Faith, which worketh by love" [Gal. v. 6]. "Unto you, therefore, which believe, He is precious" [1 Pet. ii. 7].

The practical power of faith is in proportion to the perfection of its integrity; that is, in proportion to the degree in which love actuates it and co-operates with it. Hence its efficacy in making persons receptive of miraculous operations, as in the case of those to whom our Lord said, "Thy faith hath saved thee;" and also in enabling persons to exercise miraculous powers or gifts, as in the case of those to whom our Lord said, "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you" [Matt. xvii. 20].

The sense in which faith is often used as meaning trust is sufficiently evident: for living faith, whether as an evidence or as a power, must always involve the idea of dependence on God, the evidence and the power coming solely and entirely from Him. Hence, living faith involves trust in God's Word, in His wisdom, in His power, in His truth, in His justice, in His providence, in His promises, and in His love.

Finally, it may be added that there are many ARTICLES OF FAITH for which there is inferior corroborative evidence as well as the direct Word of God; and that in such cases such evidence is by no means to be disregarded, since that also is provided for our conviction by His Divine Wisdom. [JUSTIFICATION. DOUBT.]

FAITHFUL, THE. The word πιστοὶ, fideles, faithful, is used in ancient liturgies and canons to distinguish the baptized members of the Church, who were in full communion, from the catechumens and penitents. Eusebius, St. Jerome, and Origen, refer it to the laity alone; the Church being divided by the first-named into ἡγούμενοι, πιστοὶ, and κατηχοῦμενοι. The faithful were distinguished from the catechumens by many privileges, of which the chief were: [1] Admittance to the Eucharist, called λειτουργία τῶν πιστῶν, missa fidelium, in contradistinction to the λειτουργία τῶν κατηχουμένων, missa catechumenorum, which consisted of the reading of the Scriptures, prayers, and hymns. [2] Permission to join in all the prayers of the Church, especially the Lord's Prayer, which St. Chrysostom calls εὐχὴ πιστῶν and St. Augustine "oratio fidelium." [3] Admittance to discourses on the profounder doctrines of Christianity, whereas the catechumens were only allowed to hear discourses on morals and daily life. Tertullian makes the non-observance of these distinctions a ground of reproach against heretics. "Quis catechumenus, quis fidelis, incertum est. Pariter adeunt pariter orant" [de Præscrip. Hær. c. 41]. The faithful were also called φωτιζόμενοι, illuminati, the third Canon of the Council of Laodicea styling the newly baptized προσφάτως φωτισθέντες, a term which the words of Justin Martyr explain, καλεῖται δὲ τοῦτο τὸ λοῦτρον φωτισμὸς, ὡς φωτιζομένων τὴν διάνοιαν τῶν ταῦτα μανθανόντων. Other names for the faithful were οἱ μεμυημένοι, μύηται, initiati, often used by St. Chrysostom in the phrase ἴσασιν οἱ μεμυημένοι; the catechumens, on the other hand, being termed ἄμυστοι or ἀμύητοι; and τελείοι the perfect, in reference to their Eucharistic privileges, the perfection and crown of Christian worship. [CATECHUMENS. FLENTES, &c.]

FALL OF MAN. The conscious and wilful disobedience of our first parents to a positive command of God resulted in [1] a change of man's relation to God; [2] the loss of certain special gifts originally belonging to his nature; and [3] an impetus of degeneration by which his nature grew more and more corrupt, and therefore more and more alienated from God. These three are conveniently summed up in the expressive phrase which stands at the head of this article. For its effects in more detail see ORIGINAL SIN; BODY, NATURAL; SPIRIT, and such articles as treat of our Lord's work in the restoration of the creature.

FANATICISM. Fanatic, a word derived from "fanum," a temple, in its primary meaning denotes the religious votary; but in time it became restricted to the frenzied priest wild with inspiration, India perhaps having supplied the model to Greece. Such were the self-mutilated Corybantes, priests of Cybele [Juv. S. ii. 112], the Salii, a "saltando" [Virg. Æn. viii. 663] priests of Mars, the Bacchanalian rout, and the priests of Bellona, who after the manner of Baal-worshippers gashed themselves with knives and lancets, and poured out libations of their own blood to the goddess of war [Juv. S. iv. 123; Lactant. i. 21]. Subsequently the term was applied to any form of madness. In its modern acceptation fanaticism may be defined as an overwrought faney, working by passion and not by reason; a master-thought that becomes a monomania, narrow-minded, blind, and cruel. Its barbarity can be hideously grotesque, as when Pizarro, having plundered the victim of treachery, doomed him to the stake, but in consideration of his conversion allowed him the privilege of previous strangulation; or as when the persecutor put to the sword a mixed multitude of victims in the towns and villages of the Albigenses, saying, "The Lord will know his own." The "Te Deum" solemnly celebrated by Gregory XIV. after the horrors of St. Bartholomew's night [A.D. 1572], and the ovation in Spain for the triumph of the Church militant on the same occasion, are instances of such fanaticism [Fleury, H. E. clxxiii. 40]. Fanaticism, however, is not coupled of necessity with the perversion of religious principle. The atheistic fanaticism of France during the Reign of Terror shews that in its irreligious aspect it can cause a truly terrible amount of evil; irreligion in its fanaticism can be downright demoniacal, doing evil for the sole sake of evil. Fanaticism may exist under any form of partizanship—politics in all its phases, trades' unions, clanship, nationality; in the present article it must be confined to the one subject of religious fanaticism.

Fanaticism must be clearly distinguished from enthusiasm. The latter may be animated by the pure love of God and man; whereas the former is fired with the worst passions; and with an object in a certain sense good, the means of attaining that object may be hateful. Its hand is against everything that does not run along the narrow groove of its own thoughts. The madman may reason rightly from wrong premises, and in a converse way the fanatic may seek a right object, but by means that are morally wrong. A righteous cause, followed out by righteous means, however warmly, never can fall under the category of fanaticism. Conversion by missionary effort is one thing, by "autos da fé" something widely different. So Saul was the unreasoning fanatic; Paul the administrator of a reasonable service. Fanaticism may spend its energy upon itself as well as on other victims. The cutting self-reproach of the Corinthian penitents [2 Cor. vii. 11] has been literally followed out; "yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge" has the fanatic been found to practise upon himself. The most conspicuous instance, perhaps, is the sect of the "Flagellantes" of Germany, in the middle of the fourteenth century. During the sweeping pestilence of 1347-49, they imagined that the Divine wrath might be satisfied with the self-inflicted torture of penance; and during a march of thirty-three days (to correspond with the years of our Lord's human life), they scourged themselves publicly with whips rough with knots and points of iron, which lacerated the flesh with every stroke. They were numbered by thousands, of either sex and of every rank and every age [Milman, Lat. Chr. ii. 11; Fleury, xcv. 49]. Clement VII., attacking fanaticism with a counter manifestation, convicted the party of heresy [Fleury, xcv. 49], and sent against them an array of Teutonic knights, who in a single day massacred eight thousand [Isaac Taylor's Fanaticism, 148].

Monasticism, in its origin, aimed at a high ideal of perfection, and the light of the Gospel streamed over pagan Europe from the monasteries. But they became nurseries of fanaticism. The self-mortifying austerities of the cloister produced a callous disregard of suffering, and those who had little pity on themselves in process of time had less upon others. The fanaticism of persecution was the natural offspring of the fanaticism of self-discipline. A Dominic and a Torquemada were animated by different characteristics of the same spirit, and the merciless arrests of the Inquisition were prepared by the hair shirts and scourgings, and the harsh "zona pellicia" eating into the flesh of the "savage heroes of the Romish Calendar." "Cogite intrare" was the command of Spain to her American adventurers; "hæreticos de vita" was the cry at home in the day of her power. The wild Americans deemed the Spaniards to be gods, such gods as they had made for themselves in their ignorance, the spirit of the whirlwind and of the storm, the dreaded authors of the earthquake, the instigators of bloodshed and rapine in the more terrible sweep of savage passion.

Fanaticism enters largely into the religious history of our race. The persecution of Christians in the earliest ages at the instigation of the heathen priesthood, was followed by outbursts of fanatical passion within the Church that drove such men as Athanasius, Ambrose, and Cyprian into banishment, and packed fanatical councils, as the "Synodus Latronum." The paschal difference was sufficient to inflame the bitterest hate, of which twelve hundred monks at Bangor were the victims when first the Western rule was introduced [Bede, H. E. ii. 2]. The feuds, so often bloody, between the rival Rabbinical schools of Hillel and Shammai [Jost, Gesch. d. Jud. ii. 13], were more than rivalled by the fanaticism with which the battle of the schools was fought between the Nominalist and Realist factions; which in fact became a cause of national embitterment, Louis of Bavaria siding with Ockham and the Nominalists, and Louis XI. of France patronizing the Realist cause; and in those days when kings condescended to philosophize, war was sure to be the "ultima ratio." The Crusades owed their origin to an outpouring of religious enthusiasm. But enthusiasm easily passes over into fanaticism, under which heroism evaporates. Fanatical hordes found their way across Europe, and tortures inflicted upon Jews along the line of march shewed the spirit of the followers of Baldwin and Godfrey, Tancred and Cœur de Lion. It is the character of fanaticism to attract to its banner those who have no other interest in its objects than a hope of gain or a love of mischief. This swelled the ranks of the Crusaders with all the turbulent spirits of the age. At a later date also the horrors of St. Bartholomew's night were not entirely chargeable to religious frenzy; but in many cases, to be wealthy, or to hold a desirable office, or to have a needy heir, was to be doomed as a Huguenot. Similar crimes accompanied the revocation [A.D. 1685] of the Edict of Nantes, whereby the toleration accorded to those of the Calvinist sect in France was annulled, and the attempt was made of literally dragooning heresy back into orthodoxy. In a few months fifty thousand families had emigrated from the country [Macaulay, H. Eng.], the representatives of the manufacturing industry and intelligence of France; when, as part of that emigration, a colony of French weavers set up their looms in Spitalfields. In France fanaticism produced its like once more, and the Camisards, or "smock-frocks," of Languedoc, worked up by the ecstatic visions of their women, raised the standard of revolt; and met with sufficient success to be admitted to an honourable capitulation. One of their regiments, incorporated at first in the French army, transferred its allegiance to the British flag and fought at Almanza [A.D. 1707]. Its commandant, J. Cavalier, afterwards died governor of Jersey.

The history of the Anabaptists in Germany in the sixteenth century is a dreary account of the reciprocal action and reaction of fanaticism. Their spirit was inherited by the Covenanters and Puritans of our own history, and the regicidal crime in which it culminated might never have been perpetrated had it not been for the reckless turbulence of the generations that preceded. The libertinism of John of Leyden is only equalled by the Mormonite of the present day; he too had his army of fanatical followers.

During the Reformation fanaticism has at times been the outward expression of religious fervour in the dominant party; and every banner has had its band of zealots, who have pushed their chieftain's principles to excesses that he himself never contemplated. The unsuccessful attempt on the life of Henry IV. by Châtel, and his murder by Ravaillac, were the logical results of Loyola's constitution as developed by Mariana and Suarez. As fanaticism is very distinct from enthusiasm, so it is easy to see its points of incompatibility with heroism. The self-devotion of Gustavus Adolphus was heroic, because a necessary war was humanized by him; but its horrors were intensified by Tilly and Pappenheim in such scenes as the sacking of Magdeburg; human fanaticism had passed on into the fiery hate of demons. It was heroism rather than the impulse of fanaticism which impelled the Jews before the taking of Jerusalem to slay first their women and children, and then themselves, lest they should fall into the hands of the Romans, and witness the defilement of all that they held sacred and dear; and a like tragic deed was repeated by the Jews of the Rhenish provinces rather than submit to the licentiousness of Crusaders on their march. But was it heroism or vengeance when Charlotte Corday took the vile life of the "buveur du sang," Marat, the cause of so much misery to her country and of so irreparable a loss to herself? Fanaticism became a principle in the Moslem, as soon as the Prophet had declared the sword to be the implement of converting the impenitent; repentance in the language of the Korân always meaning the renunciation of idolatry. The Christian and the Jew acknowledged one God, and were generally left free to pursue their own path of perversity. Fanatical as the Almohad dynasty was in Spain, it was satisfied with outward compliance, and so that the unbeliever attended the service of the mosque no very close scrutiny of his religious principles was made. Thus Maimonides was a Jew in his heart, though he conformed outwardly to the rites of Islam. Something of the same kind took place at a later date, though the obligation was more strict as proceeding from a more thoroughgoing fanaticism, when fear of the Inquisition compelled the Jews in Spain to adopt the outward semblance of Christianity, which they reviled in the inmost heart of their Judaism, and were known as "nuevos Cristianos." The Indian mutiny, that caused such deep national sorrow, was ascribed at first to Hindû fanaticism, and religious reluctance to use cartridges smeared with animal grease; but Mohammedan ambition was the mainspring of action, to which native superstitions were made subservient. [Isaac Taylor's Fanaticism; Balmez, Prot. y Catt. c. 7, 8; Herzog, Real Encycl.; Wetzer u. Welte, Kirch. Lex. art. Fanatismus.]

FASTING is of four kinds, spiritual, moral, natural, and ecclesiastical. Spiritual fasting is the abstinence from all unholy pleasure, and without this all fasting is valueless. Moral fasting is the habitual regulation of one's food in accordance with right reason within the limits of necessity. Natural fasting, or fasting in its true or proper sense, is the abstinence from all food.

Scriptural illustrations of fasting. It is a devotional practice common to all religions, and based upon the instincts of our common nature. Amongst the Jews it was regulated by special laws, fixed days being appointed in the Mosaic law and by subsequent enactments. The great public fast-day of the Mosaic law was the Day of Atonement. "Whosoever failed to observe this day with fasting and rest from labour was to be cut off from among his people" [Lev. xxiii. 29]. Fasting was recognised also as an act undertaken by individuals in accordance with a vow. Persons making such a vow and failing to fulfil it would be cut off; as also would a husband or father who might interfere with the vowed fast of a wife or daughter, unless objections were made immediately upon hearing of it [Numb. xxx. 2, 13, 14]. In the Old Testament we have many instances recorded of individuals and communities observing fasts with great strictness in seasons of penitential sorrow and special prayer. So the children of Israel in the conflict with rebellious Benjamin, upon occasion of the defeat, fasted before going up again against Gibeah [Judges xxx. 26]. The fasting of Moses, David, Elijah, and Daniel, as also of Ezra with his companions at the river Ahava, and of the Jews for Esther when she ventured her life for their deliverance, will occur at once to every one. Joshua and the elders of Israel fasted after the defeat at Ai [Josh. vii. 6]. Samuel gathered all Israel to a fast at Mizpeh, when the people humbled themselves for their sin in worshipping Baalim and Ashtaroth [1 Sam. vii. 6], preparatory to receiving back amongst themselves the ark, and covenanted presence of God. All Judah gathered themselves together to ask help of the Lord, even out of all the cities of Judah they came to observe the fast proclaimed by Jehoshaphat in his fear of Moab and Ammon [2 Chron. xx. 3].

The solemn call of Joel to fasting, reiterated as it is in our Commination Service, cannot be forgotten. We find fasts appointed for various months in the Prophet Zechariah [vii. 1, 7; viii. 19], but the exact occasion of them is uncertain. Anna the Prophetess was constant in fasting during her long life, and was thus found worthy to be amongst those who welcomed the Lord when He came into His temple. The Pharisees, in our Lord's time, kept two fast-days in the week. These were Monday and Thursday, and these two days are said to have been fixed in memory of Moses being supposed to have ascended the mountain on Thursday and returned on Monday. Our Lord rebukes them, indeed, for disfiguring their faces in order that they might seem to fast, but if His disciples differed from those of John the Baptist in having no set fast-days, it was only a temporary difference. After He had been taken away from them, fasting would become an essential element of their religion, as it had been of the Jews previously, and accordingly He left rules for fasting as well as for almsgiving and prayer. The observance of fasting in the Christian Church will be mentioned hereafter, but we must recall to mind, that it was no special feature of Judaism, although thus familiar to all ages of Jewish worship. It is the natural expression of sorrow. Deep sorrow takes away the very desire of food. Pleasant food is but a mockery in the house of mourning. Fulness of bread, therefore, indicates absence of contrition. The devout penitent cannot help, in the language of the Pentateuch, setting himself "to afflict his soul."

That fasting is pleasing to God, as the expression of penitence, is evident from the history of Ahab, and from that of Nineveh. It was a great event when a whole nation humbled itself at the call of Jonah and the bidding of their sovereign. Jonah had prophesied the overthrow of that vast city. It was laid prostrate, but in penitence, not in devastation. Its pride fell, and its glory remained. But that was no mere pretence of fasting. Even the brute creation was forced to take part in it. "Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste anything; let them not feed nor drink water" [Jon. iii. 7].

Objections to the practice. The objections of those modern religionists who would set fasting entirely aside, are plainly opposed to the law of nature and of revelation. They are based upon the grounds of formalism and self-righteousness, as if fasting must tend to these results, and must consequently be at variance with the spirit of Christianity. It will at once be seen that fasting is no more a formality than prayer. All acts must be regulated and formal if they are to be habitual and real. Our sense of contrition demands a form of expression as much as our sense of need. Confession is not enough, since the acts for which we have to repent are acts involving our whole body. The body must humble itself for its sin, and the repudiation of fasting is indeed a denial of the great truth that our body is a part of ourselves. If the body is here an instrument of sin, and is to be a partaker of the joy of the soul in the glory of the resurrection, it is plainly necessary that the body should be united with the soul in the humiliation of penitence. [Asceticism.] The charge of self-righteousness, moreover, holds good only against the abuse of fasting. Those who recognise it as a necessary act of obedience to Christ and His Church, and who feel that its neglect is indeed a violation of the fundamental principles of our nature, cannot be likely to be self-righteous because of its observance. Self-righteousness would have been as great an evil in Jewish days as in the present day, but we do not find that Daniel, or Anna, or St. John Baptist fell into self-righteousness by the greatness of their fasts. On the other hand, those who desire to become holy like them will naturally take the same means which they used. Again, the more persons strive to fast the more they will be dissatisfied with themselves that they can do so little. If God were to enable any one to fast in an extraordinary manner, as Moses and Elijah did, He would give the grace of humility to preserve such a person from self-righteousness, and without that special help we can only realize the more fully, as we walk in the footsteps of the saints, how far we come short of their gifts and their holiness.

Effects of Fasting on the Health. It is not unusual for persons to suppose that fasting must be injurious to the bodily health; but in all probability the observance of this duty would tend to the improvement of health, in ordinary cases, much rather than the reverse. Many fall into various diseases, and die, through habitual repletion, to whom probably the regular observance of the Church's weekly fast-day would be the means of recovering the balance of the bodily system. A bygone generation used to practice bleeding in the spring and fall. Some physicians prescribe medicine as desirable at those seasons, in consequence of the bodily system needing to be somewhat lowered. The proper observance of Lent and Advent would probably effect this natural result for good, in addition to the spiritual good attendant upon obedience to the Church in this respect.

It does indeed seem that people of the present day are not able to fast to the same extent which our forefathers used to do. But, in all probability, the great reason of this, although not the only reason, is that they are not habituated to the practice. The possibility of prolonged fasting, although in a great degree dependent upon natural constitution, and very much influenced by climate, is also to a very considerable extent the result of training. Persons who accustom themselves to defer their meal until a late hour of the day, soon get to do so without difficulty; but if they have been accustomed to eat it at an early hour soon after rising, they ought to let the hour of breakfast gradually become later, and not attempt a long fast at once. So also with prolonged seasons of fasting. The Church has shewn her practical wisdom, and it comes out in remarkable harmony with the physical law of God's Providence, in appointing the short penitential season subsequent to Septuagesima before the fasting time of Lent. The world changing this carnival into a time of feasting and merriment incapacitates itself physically as well as morally for the due observance of the great fast. On physiological grounds, there is reason to think that most persons might fast much more strictly than they do; and on theological and religious grounds, there is no doubt that God will help with special grace those who seek to do a religious act in a religious spirit.

Probably the luxuriousness of modern times is one great reason why the constitution of men seems to be less equal to fasting than it formerly was. This luxury shews itself in the substitution of unwholesome, unnourishing food for the simple meat diet of our ancestors. A system of diet which manages the stomach and pampers the appetite with continual corrections, instead of leaving labour to supply the sauce which makes solid food acceptable, must be injurious to the constitution. When we require a succession of courses in order to be able to go on eating with comfort, it shews that the bounds of a true natural moderation are past, and the artificial hunger which is stimulated takes in not healthy food for the sustenance of an exhausted frame, but superfluous material to clog the functions of nature, and so to impede their healthy action.

Probably the exaggerated nervous excitement of the present day is another great reason why so much difficulty is experienced in fasting. They who would fast for the love of God, must learn to rest in the love of God. Eagerness and anxiety eat out the enduring powers of nature, whereas reliance upon God in tranquil devotion has a natural tendency, in addition to its spiritual power, to give permanent healthy action to the vital organs. Eastern Christendom still observes fasts to an extent which appears incredible in the West. In all probability this is owing to the greater absence of political fermentation and social struggle in Eastern countries. Our rapid locomotion, the constant interchange of thought through the medium of the press, the zest with which all classes claim their share in political power, the loss of God's blessed ordinance of manual labour by the adaptation of machinery to all sorts of production, the undue strain of the intelligence necessitated in consequence, the artificial wants which our overhasty productiveness occasions, the exaggerated attention to merely intellectual development in the education of children; these may be suggested as causes why the human being of modern Western Europe should be less able to fast than were our forefathers, or than contemporary Christians, and even Mohammedans, in the East. It is well to bear this in mind, for it will help to make individuals realize the great necessity of joining habits of prayer and inward tranquil devotion to all their attempts at fasting.

Exemptions from Fasting. Christian prudence requires that none should fast who cannot do so free from physical injury; and the causes which excuse from fasting are generally given as four, namely, Age, Impotence, Labour, and Piety.

[1.] Young persons are excused by reason of their age. This exemption, however, does not extend to abstinence. The age of twenty-one is fixed as the limit. Old persons, in like manner, are exempted, according to some authorities, from the age of sixty, but in reality this limit must be determined morally by the power of the individual, as many persons can fast with strictness, and without any detriment to health, to a much later period of life.

[2.] Impotence excuses sick and very delicate persons, women in time of maternity, and the very poor who have not ordinarily what is necessary for their sustenance, and are, therefore, permitted to take what may be given them even at times set apart for fasting.

[3.] Labour excuses all persons engaged in hard work of whatsoever kind, if it makes fasting to be a serious inconvenience to the duties of their calling. At the same time, persons are bound to see if they cannot arrange their time so as to be able to fast. Parish priests, for instance, can arrange to do upon Fridays such works as may be most compatible with their due observance of that day. Care must be taken faithfully to fulfil the work of the day, if the work is made the reason for not fasting. Labour, in order to excuse, must be of such a kind as to demand solid nourishment. Thus diggers, carpenters, masons, smiths, could be excused; but there are light occupations which do not demand a full diet. Those who are occupied in severe study, judges, lawyers, and the like, can scarcely plead entire, though they may partial exemptions. Clergy engaged in daily preaching, or schoolmasters occupied during a large part of the day in teaching, would be exempted, but the mere preaching of a simple sermon would not generally excuse a clergyman.

[4.] Piety exempts from fasting, when the want of food stands in the way of the perfect fulfilment of any duties of devotion, for we must never allow that which is a means to an end to become an impediment instead of an assistance to the end desired.

In all cases, it should be added, exemption must be taken with great caution. In cases of doubt, persons should have recourse to their superior, the parish priest, or bishop, or individual director. The practice of giving written dispensations continued in England long after the Reformation. Such dispensations for eating meat in Lent are to be found with Hammond's name attached; and a few even after the Restoration.

Fasting before Communion has been practised from the time of the Apostles in all countries. St. Augustine says, "It is plain that when the disciples first received the Body and Blood of the Lord, they received it not fasting. Does any one then, on this account, blame the universal Church because it is always received fasting? Nay, for it has pleased the Holy Ghost that, in honour of so great a Sacrament, the Body of the Lord should enter the mouth of the Christian before any other food, for it is the custom observed throughout the whole world. For neither does the Lord's having given it after food, make it a duty for the heathen to dine and sup before coming together for that sacrament, nor to do as those whom the Apostle blames and corrects because they mingled the Lord's Supper with their own repast. For the Saviour, in order more forcibly to commend the greatness of that mystery, wished to leave this as the last and deepest impression on the heart and memory of the disciples, when He was about to leave them and go to His Passion. But He abstained from ordering in what manner it should be received, in order that this might be reserved for His Apostles to do by whom He was about to arrange His Church. For if He had enjoined that this should always be taken after other food, I believe that no one would have altered that custom. But when the Apostle says, speaking of this Sacrament, 'Wherefore, brethren, when ye come together to eat, tarry one for another; and if any man hunger, let him eat at home, that ye come not together to condemnation;' He immediately subjoins, 'The rest will I set in order when I come' [1 Cor. xi. 34]. Inasmuch, therefore, as it would have taken more than could be comprised in a letter if he had laid down all that order of procedure which the Church universal throughout the world observes, it is given us to be understood that by him was arranged that which is done without any variation of custom everywhere. . . . Some, however, have been led by a probable reason to allow of the Body and Blood of the Lord being offered and received after food on one certain day of the year, that, namely, on which the Lord gave the original Supper, as if to commemorate it more specially. But I think it is better to observe the hour, and to remain fasting until after the refection, which takes place at three o'clock, before coming to the Oblation. Therefore we do not require any one to dine before that Lord's Supper, but also we do not forbid it. However, I think this was only instituted because most persons (and almost all, in many places), are on that day accustomed to bathe. And because some keep the fast, the offering is made in the morning to Christ, because of those who dine, because they cannot have their fasts and their bath together; but towards evening the Oblation is made for them who are fasting." [St. Aug. Ep. cxviii. ad Januar. 6.]

St. Chrysostom uses strong asseverations against his supposed guilt of giving the Holy Communion to those who were not fasting.

There are also various decrees of councils upon this subject. As, e.g.:—

Council of Carthage, III. c. 29. The Sacrament of the Altar shall be celebrated only by those who are fasting, except on the one anniversary when the Supper of the Lord is commemorated.

Council of Braga, II. c. 10. If any presbyter shall be found in this madness after this our edict, so as to consecrate the oblation not fasting, but after having taken any food, let him be immediately deprived of his office and deposed by his own bishop.

Council of Macon, II. c. 6. No presbyter with a full stomach, or having indulged in wine, shall touch the sacrifices, or presume to celebrate mass on private or festive days, for it is unjust that bodily food should take precedence of spiritual; but if any continue to do so, let him lose his dignity.

Council of Auxerre, c. 19. No presbyter, deacon, or subdeacon shall touch the mass after taking meat or drink.

Council of Toledo, VII. c. 2. Lest what has been advised by reason of the languor of nature should be turned into a dangerous presumption, let it be understood that no one shall celebrate mass after taking any, even the least, meat or drink.

Council of Trullo, c. xxix. After quoting the Canon of Carthage with reference to Maundy Thursday, it is said, "Although for some local reasons profitable to the Church those divine Fathers made such a regulation, yet since there is no inducement for us to abandon the strict line, we determine, in accordance with the apostolical traditions of our fathers, that in the last week of Lent the fifth day must not be broken, for it is a dishonouring of the whole Lent."

Council of Mayence [A. D. 1549] c. xxxiii. "We seriously enjoin all parish priests and ministers of churches not to give the Eucharist to any except those who are fasting and have made confession, unless it be in cases of infirmity and necessity."

Persons about to die have always been allowed to receive the Blessed Sacrament, even though they may not be fasting: and there are some (even among Roman theologians) who hold that this dispensation must be extended to the Paschal Communion for those who could not otherwise communicate without serious injury to health. It is argued that since communicating is of Divine obligation, and the preparatory fasting is only of ecclesiastical precept, therefore fasting must be given up rather than so necessary a duty as communion be omitted. So, again, the same argument may be carried on beyond the one annual communion, and weakly persons may be communicated not fasting, as often as shall seem desirable, provided it is not done too frequently.

The present authoritative practice of the Roman Church is, however, opposed to these relaxations, and admits to unfasting communion only when the Eucharist is received as the viaticum.

The rules of the Eastern Church as to fasting before Communion are still more rigid than those of the Western.

The observance of fasting before Communion has continued on in some places in England amidst all the lax habits of the last century, and persons now living [A. D. 1869] remember their mothers omitting breakfast on Sacrament Sundays. But in the present day, the importance and value of this duty is still more appreciated, and it is becoming a general practice to communicate earlier in the day than formerly.

It may be as well to add, by way of caution, that the early canons need not be considered as prohibiting such small quantities of food and drink as may be necessary to enable persons to go through their duties without exhaustion. Those who cannot do so fasting, should take a little simple sustenance as long a time before communicating as they can, and thus act up to the spirit of the rule, though the literal observance of it may be beyond their power.

Ecclesiastical Fasting is abstinence from flesh meat and certain other kinds of food, one meal being only taken in the day, which is not taken till after a given hour. The custom of the Church does indeed allow, besides the one meal, a slight collation to be taken towards evening in consideration of bodily infirmity, and the further relaxation was established in the time of St. Thomas Aquinas [A.D. 1270], that Vespers should be said before the mid-day meal in Lent, and Nones before it on other fast-days.

Fasting has a special promise from Almighty God; for our Lord says that some kinds of evil spirits cannot be cast out save by prayer and fasting. The Church of the present day would therefore be very culpable if she were to attempt to carry out her work in the world without using this important weapon. Probably the decay of missionary power is more to be attributed to the neglect of fasting than to any other cause. However much the relaxation of ecclesiastical custom may exempt individuals from the external obligation of strict fasts, yet it is certain that those relaxations cannot make strict fasting less necessary for any who wish to carry out their mission against Satan and accomplish the work of God. Fasting is one of those spiritual weapons of our warfare which are mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds. Its profit, therefore, is first of all as a means of self-discipline and penitential sanctification; and, secondly, as an instrument of power for the overthrow of Satan's kingdom. The more we practise detachment from the world by mortification of our earthly members, the more shall we find that God will make manifest within us the powers of the new life. But we must remember that if this is the case, fasting must always be accompanied by prayer and almsgiving. If we would die to ourselves aright, we must live in love to God, which is prayer, and in love to man by giving of alms. "Is not this the fast which I have chosen, saith the Lord, to deal thy bread to the hungry?" Fasting must expand the soul with the largehearted happiness of beneficent charity. It must be instrumental to our becoming the more like to God, or it will not bring us to any closer union with Him. We must expect fasting times to be seasons of special temptation, for Satan came to tempt our Blessed Lord in the wilderness. But it is a time of temptation, because it is a time of grace. Satan is eager to rob us of that grace, and we must put the grace to good account by using it to resist the temptation.

FAST-DAYS. The habit of fasting as a religious discipline is probably coeval with the presence of sin in our nature, but a system of days for its regular and methodical practice belongs to a highly organized form of ecclesiastical polity. By the Mosaic Law only one day in the year was thus appointed for a Fast-day, the Day of Atonement which foreshadowed the day of our Lord's sacrifice on the cross. This was observed with the greatest possible strictness, by abstinence from food, drink, washing, anointing, and labour. At a later age of Jewish history four other annual fast-days were added, commemorating sorrowful events connected with the captivity, viz.: [1] The fast of the 17th of the fourth month, for the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; [2] the fast of the 9th of the fifth month, for the destruction of the temple; [3] the fast of the 3d of the seventh month for the final destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar after Gedaliah's assassination; and [4] the fast of the 10th of the tenth month, instituted when the captives in Babylon heard of the final ruin of Jerusalem.

In the early Church, Christians soon began to keep every Wednesday and every Friday as a fast-day, the one in memory of our Lord's betrayal, the other of His crucifixion. They also kept Lent very strictly. "There are those," writes St. Chrysostom, "who rival one another in fasting, and shew a marvellous emulation in it. Some, indeed, who spend two whole days without food; and others, who reject from their tables the use of wine, oil, and every delicacy, and, taking only bread and water, persevere in this practice during the whole of Lent." The Eastern Church has also always kept a fast before Christmas, answering to our season of Advent.

In the Book of Common Prayer we have a tabular list of the "Fasts and Days of Abstinence to be observed in the Year." They are divided into five classes:—

1. The forty days of Lent.
2. The Ember Days.
3. The Rogation Days.
4. All Fridays except Christmas Day.
5. The Evens or Vigils before certain festivals.

It will be convenient to take these in order.

[1.] Lent. A fast before Easter is of primitive antiquity, though the length of it varied at different times and places. One of the earliest questions which arose in the Church was on what day this fast should end, and the Easter festival be celebrated. Origen speaks of a forty days' fast before Easter [Hom. x. in Levit.], and at the Council of Nicæa this was taken for granted as having been long in use. There was, however, much difference in the way of reckoning these forty days—in some cases they were extended over eight or nine weeks, and Lent thus began at Sexagesima. It was St. Gregory the Great, at the end of the sixth century, who fixed Lent precisely as it is now observed, viz., commencing on Ash-Wednesday (the ancient "caput jejunii"), and extending to and including Easter even, omitting the Sundays only.

In the East the μεγάλη νηστεία begins on the Monday after Quinquagesima, and the rule of fasting is extremely strict. On Sundays and Saturdays there is some, but not entire relaxation from the rule. The last "Great" or Holy Week is kept with most rigid strictness. On Easter even (called the Great Sabbath), the fast was anciently kept till midnight. This was, in the early Church, the chief day for baptizing the catechumens who had been prepared during Lent.

The object of Lent is to commemorate the sorrows of the Lord Jesus, to follow the example of His forty days' fast, and, especially, to keep in vivid remembrance His most Blessed Passion and Death. Thus Lent becomes a most precious season of spiritual discipline, and a fitting preparation for the joy of Eastertide.

[2.] The Ember Days. These are days of special fasting and prayer on behalf of those who are to be ordained to the ministry of Christ's Holy Word and Sacraments. They are the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after	The First Sunday in Lent.

	Whitsunday.
	September 14th (Holy Cross Day).
	December 13th (St. Lucy).

The weeks in which these days occur are called Ember weeks, and a special prayer is appointed for use each day. The name is most probably an abbreviation of quatuor tempora,[1] corrupted into Quatember and Ember. The particular days, according to the best authorities, were fixed by the Council of Placentia [A.D. 1095]. But in appointing these holy seasons the Church is most closely following apostolic custom [Acts xiii. 2, 3, and xiv. 23]—a custom which it cannot be doubted has been observed by the faithful in all ages since the day of Pentecost. [JEJUNIA QUATUOR TEMPORUM.]

[3.] The Rogation Days. These are so called from the Latin verb "rogare," to ask or beseech. They are the three days preceding Holy Thursday or Ascension Day; and in ancient times it was usual to make special supplication to Almighty God at this season to preserve for us the kindly fruits of the earth, and to defend us from war and pestilence. The custom of "beating the bounds" was thus plainly connected with religious worship and intercession. A homily is appointed to be used on the occasion, and Queen Elizabeth's Injunctions [A.D. 1559] directed the 103rd and 104th Psalms to be said.

St. Gregory of Tours, about the end of the sixth century, ascribes the origin of the observance of these days to Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne [A.D. 452]. The diocese of this prelate had been devastated by earthquakes, fire, and incursions of wild beasts, and he appointed a three days' fast, accompanied by processional litanies, to intreat God's mercy. His example was frequently followed in other places, and in the beginning of the sixth century the first Council of Orleans enjoined these days to be yearly observed. The first two are days of abstinence, the third, being the Vigil of the Ascension, is a strict fast. [ROGATIONS.]

[4.] Fridays. These are observed as days of abstinence in memory of Him who on this day was crucified for us. As from Easter all Sundays derive their joy, so does the shadow of Good Friday fall upon all Fridays of the year. The only exception to this rule is when the Feast of our Lord's Nativity falls on Friday, and then the day of abstinence is merged in the festival. The observance of this day is of the greatest antiquity—St. Epiphanius, says Cave, refers it to the Apostles. Tertullian mentions it as one of the stations (alluding to the customs of the army), and says that the fast usually lasted until three o'clock in the afternoon.

Good Friday was also called Holy Friday, παρασκευή—ἡμερα τοῦ σταυροῦ—dies dominicæ

[1] The committee for the revision of the Ordinal [A.D. 1661] resolved: "Quod nullæ ordinationes clericorum per aliquos episcopos fierent nisi intra quatuor tempora pro ordinatione assignata."

passionis, &c. This fast must be kept with greater strictness than all others. It has not been the custom of the Church to consecrate on this day the Blessed Sacrament. Before the Reformation there was what was called the Mass of the Presanctified, the Reserved Sacrament alone being used. This is the practice also of the Greek Church for the whole of Lent, except Saturdays and Sundays, and the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin.

[5.] The Evens or Vigils. The name Vigil is derived directly from the Latin Vigiliæ or "watches." The custom of the primitive Church was to spend a great part, or even the whole, of the night preceding certain holy days in devotion in the house of God. But when in course of time the practice was found to give rise to scandal, it was abolished [A.D. 420].[1] All festivals, including Sundays, have eves, but only some have Vigils also. Those which occur in Christmas or Eastertide or Whitsuntide have none because of the joyful character of the season. There is none appointed for St. Michael or St. Luke; the first, because the angels passed through no state of trial, the second, either because the Feast of St. Etheldreda (the day before) superseded the fast, or because it is uncertain whether the holy Evangelist suffered martyrdom. The festivals, the Eves of which are to be kept as strict fasts, or Vigils, are as follows:—

The Nativity of our Lord.
The Purification of the B. V. M.
The Annunciation.
Easter Day.
Ascension Day.
Pentecost.
St. Matthias.
The Nativity of St. John Baptist.
St. Peter.
St. James.
St. Bartholomew.
St. Matthew.
St. Simon and St. Jude.
St. Andrew.
St. Thomas.
All Saints.

If any of these feast days fall on a Monday, then the Vigil is to kept on the Saturday, as Sunday is never, even when an Eve, to be a day of fasting. [VIGILS.]

According to the ancient use of Sarum, the Te Deum was never sung on Vigils or Ember Days, or in Lent or Advent, a short Anthem being substituted.

FATALISM. Fatalism, a belief in the irresistible operation of necessity, is derived from "fatum," utterance that is irrevocable; the equivalent of which is εἱμαρμένη, "allotted," and μοῖρα, "the awarded lot;" raised to the rank of deities in the heathen mythology, and having an ascendency over Jupiter himself [Herod. i. 91], although in a certain sense Fate was subject to the Supreme [Hom. Od. iii. 236, Il. xii. 402], as being his offspring; "scripsit quidem fata sed sequitur, semper paret semel jussit" [Seneca, de Prov.] is the more prosaic statement. The Homeric αἶσα [Gladstone, Hom. Ol. iv.] derived by Aristotle from ἀεὶ οὖσα, as αἰὼν from ἀεὶ ὤν, implies the eternity of the decree; unless indeed the word represents ἄνισα, and refers to the unequal dispensations of fate in different individuals. The tragic fate was generally a Nemesis that tracked down ancestral sin in a devoted line. A blind fate was the philosophic creed at a very early date [Cudw. Int. Syst. I. i.], and was the notion of Heraclitus, Empedocles, and Aristotle [Cic. de Fato]. In the atomic theory of Democritus and Epicurus, a flux or movement in the atoms which are the ultimate elements of all things produces the phenomena of nature; it was essentially atheistic, and man's condition depended upon the haphazard movement of these particles. Lucretius, wishing to claim for man a certain degree of liberty of action, imagined a suitable movement of these atoms, which is no more intelligible than any other part of the atomic theory. He says:—

> Sed ne mens ipsa necessum
> Intestinum habeat, cunctis in rebus agendis,
> Et devicta quasi cogatur ferre patique,
> Id facit exiguum clinamen principiorum. [ii. 289.]

But freedom of will was no part of the atheistic theory; "optat, non disputat," says Cicero [de Fato]: the question was begged, not reasoned out.

Chrysippus the Stoic softened down the harsh fatalism of the sect, and drew a distinction between necessity and fate [Cic. ib.]; "necessity" implying an absolute primary causation, "causæ perfectæ et principales;" and "fate" working by secondary causes, "adjuvantes et proximæ," such as the law of nature; and to the operation of these secondary causes he referred the course of human affairs. The secondary causes, however, were with him as the "extended deity," the Divine soul of Nature; marking the introduction of the Pantheism of the East into the philosophy of the West. Seneca, in terms more nearly Christian, says of such secondary causes, that they are the "placita" of the Deity, to whom nothing can be pleasing but that which in its kind is excellent. Yet to work by such causes does not make the Deity less powerful or less free, though He be bound by His own law, "Ipse est necessitas sui" [Senec. Præf. Qu. Nat.]. The astrological fate of Chaldæa accredited by Plato, Tim. 40 D], and mentioned by Cicero [de Fato], and Juvenal [S. vi. 552], supplied another contingent to heresy [Hippolyt. Philos. iv.; Leo, c. Priscill. Ep. 15 (93), ad Turrib.; Origen, Jer. iii.; Eus. Præp. Evang. VI. xi.], and gave considerable trouble to the Church until a belief in judicial astrology was suppressed under severe penalties by Sixtus V. in the bull "Cœli et terræ" [A.D. 1586], as a law of the Emperor Honorius [A.D. 409] had made it penal in more primitive times [Beausobre, H. Manich. VII. i. 6, ff.]. The apparently thorough faith that Wallenstein placed in the influence of the stars would form a strange incident in man's intellectual history if it were not referable to warrior-craft; for Napoleon also fostered the belief of predestination in his men, and of the impossibility of avoiding the decrees of fate, "ducunt volentem fata, nolentem trahunt." The course of nature was with the Stoic the very Deity, who thus revealed Himself; with the Christian it is the ordinance of Him who constituted it, and made all things subject to the prescribed law [Butler's Anal. I. ii.].

[1] See Durand, vi. 7.

Man cannot claim an absolute freedom of action. His life has little in it that is original except its being. His character is formed by the operation of general laws that have been binding on the race from the beginning. In youth his character is moulded insensibly by association with others, whether for evil, or if swayed by better guides, to become in his turn a light to others; possibly also a master spirit in his generation. But neither good nor bad has been decreed by an "ineluctabile fatum," but has been determined by those general laws and final causes in which God's fatherly voice has or has not been obeyed. Thus each man is a centre of influence extending over others; principles of one kind or another, like vibrations of sound or rays of light, speed forth to affect others as he has himself been modified in his character by influences acting upon him from without; and "known unto God are all things from the beginning of the world." He foresees the ultimate result of man's trial, and of his action upon others; but this foreknowledge does not necessitate the data upon which it is based. To suppose otherwise were to make all human exertion useless, and to render vain the offering of prayer; for man would be no more than a dumb puppet in the hand of a higher power. A long series of historical events takes place, and we may trace them back to human passion and human ambition in so many instances, as to be certain that all may be referred to secondary causes, and that the originating wisdom of God, and man's freedom of action, whereby the purposes of that wisdom are worked out, are no incompatible ideas in the sequence of events. Imagine those occurrences to be dramatized as in Schiller's Trilogy, and we have the fatalist's theory; the parts are cast, the dialogue is framed to suit the various characters, the incidents are worked up to their final issue, and when all is predetermined and arranged, the human actors appear, and give a life and reality to the story; each takes up his cue and expresses faithfully the poet's foreordained conceptions.

It need scarcely be asked which is most worthy of the Divine Wisdom; to dispose the affairs of human life by the reason of man formed after the Divine image, or by the blind action of arbitrary decrees? by the foresight and kindliness of an intelligent humanity, or by the stiffened attitudes of lay figures?

Fatalism has no place in the doctrines of the Church, though it may seem to enter into the idea of predestination, which, however, does not apply to individuals, but to the Body of Christ. That alone is predestined to glory, while the future condition of every separate member of the Church, and individual human being, is foreseen in the Divine Wisdom. Predestination expresses the general law whereby on certain conditions salvation is offered to all those who are called to the foreordained means of grace. The Bible nowhere speaks of individual predestination. But different sects have run wild, and developed from it a fatalism that is more repugnant to our sense of Divine goodness than the most extreme notion of heathen philosophy of old. It is very uncertain whether a distinct heresy of predestinarians ever existed before the Reformation [Mosheim, cent. V. v. 25; Fleury, H. E. X. xlix. 50]; but the expressions of St. Paul, imperfectly understood by some, and certain peculiar doctrinal statements of Augustine, carried out to their full logical consequences by others, have caused a variation of doctrine upon this deep subject even within the Church. Lucidus, shortly after the time of Augustine [A.D. 475], was condemned for his notions on an absolute individual predestination; but the question did not attract much notice, as pertaining entirely to the hidden things of God, until the fatalism of the Moslem conqueror brought the subject prominently forward. "A peine le prophète etoit mort qu'une dispute s'eleva entre les theologiens sur le dogme de prédestination" [Dr. A. Schmölder's Essai]. In the ninth century, Gotteschalc, known also as Fulgentius, declared that "God from all eternity had predestined some of the human race to life, others to death;" and the statement was synodically condemned [A.D. 860] as heretical. Luther's teaching in his work De Servo Arbitrio is very much to the same effect, though he afterwards modified it; and the extent to which the doctrine of Augustine was logically carried out by Calvin is well known [Calv. Inst. III. xx. 21-24, and Comment. in Rom. ix. 18]. As the graces of Christian life were held by Zuingli to be by the determinate decree of God, so also were the sins of the reprobate. But Augustine, however he may have expressed himself with regard to individual predestination, was careful to assert the entire free agency of man. That free agency is a portion of the secondary causation whereby God directs the course of the world; and by following our own free-will, we give effect to the principles of his government [Aug. Civ. D. V. ix. 3]. But it is not in the same wide spirit that he carries on his reasoning on predestination. The foreknowledge of God with him meant an individual foreknowledge and election; whereas it applies like every other link in the chain of election [Rom. viii. 29, 30] to the Body of Christ the Church; and as of old God said to His people by His Prophet, "You only have I known of all the families of the earth" [Amos. iii. 2], and He "knoweth them that trust in Him" [Nah. i. 7], so in the New Testament the foreknowledge of God is asserted not of individuals, however surely they may be foreknown, but with a purely practical reference to the Body of Christ, the "first-born among many brethren."

Fatalism, ignored by theology, has however found a refuge in the schools of modern philosophy. It is a necessary element of Spinozism. All personal freedom of action is absorbed here in the Universal One. We only think and act as the extended Deity, the mundane soul, thinks and acts by us. In ourselves we are free to do nothing. [SPINOZISM.] Hegel's system is a logical development of Spinoza's Pantheism. With him the Absolute is very freedom, and the Finite is only free so far as it is determined in its objectivity by the Absolute. Leibnitz wrote his Theodicee in opposition to the notion of Spinoza; but his "pre-established harmony" is as fatalistic as pantheism. It supposes such an harmonious interadaptation of the soul and body to each other, the motions and affections of either having been eternally foreordained, as to result in perfect unity of action [Theod. i. 62]. It was his way of evading the difficulty of the action of matter upon mind, which he judged to be simply impossible. But body and soul only had to act the part assigned to them, and the predetermined thoughts and purposes of the one coinciding accurately with the actions and accidents of the other, produced unity of action, but to the entire destruction of all free agency.

Predestination is the creed of Islam. "Ye cannot will, except the Lord willeth" [Korân, Sur. lxxxi.]. The doctrine was developed by the Prophet after the disastrous field of Ohod, when Mahomet revealed the law that every man had his appointed time, whether in bed or on the field of battle. Everything is "kismet," fated. This notion intoxicated the victorious Moslem with a resistless fanaticism; but it has had an enervating effect ever since; and the listlessness with which the Mahometan will allow his house to be laid in ashes, because it is "kismet," is a type of the political and moral enervation of the whole race. Uneducated ignorance among ourselves easily falls into the same error; fortunately it does not reason, or such principles would subvert not only the entire work of the Gospel, but the plainest duties of morality. Education in its higher and better sense is manifestly the remedy. God framed the laws of the moral and of the material world; the freedom of man's will is a part of those laws, and in proportion as he obeys the Gospel law of right, his mind gains its heavenward direction, and more and more of freedom; the light thus daily gained is the earnest to him of final acceptance, and of the complete fulfilment hereafter of the assurance, "if the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed" [John viii. 36]. [Cic. de Divin. de Fato. de Nat. D.; Augustine, Civ. Dei, v.; Grotius, Philosophor. Sent. de Fato. Gladstone's Homer, Olympus iv.; Cudworth, Intell. Syst. I. i.; Laurent. Alticot. Præf. in p. vi. Summæ Augustinianæ; Milman, Lat. Chr. VIII. v.]

FATHERS, APOSTOLIC. The name of Apostolic Fathers is used to distinguish those disciples and contemporaries of the Apostles whose writings have been handed down to us; namely, Clemens Romanus, Polycarp, Barnabas, Ignatius, the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, Hermas, and Papias.

Their works are of no great extent, but are most valuable for the clear insight they give into the habits of thought, and the high spiritual-mindedness of the early Christians, and for the practical teachings they convey concerning Christian life and conversation. Many passages in them, especially in the epistles of Clement and Polycarp, are not wanting in beauty or dignity, although, in common with the writings of the Apostles themselves, the simple statement of Divine truth is their chief aim, rather than the elegance which distinguishes contemporary heathen literature. The writings of the Apostolic Fathers extend over a wide field of subjects—God, Christ, the Trinity, the nature and office of angels, the government of the Church, unity, peace, heresy, schism, martyrdom, the resurrection, sin, and its punishment, the sacraments, marriage, almsgiving, fasting, Christian life and conversation.

Clemens Romanus is in all probability the Clement styled "fellow-labourer" by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Philippians [Phil. iv. 3]. Two epistles are ascribed to him. The authority of Eusebius [Hist. Eccles. iii. 38] is often given for regarding the second epistle as spurious, although, as Cotelerius observes, Eusebius does not rank it among spurious writings, but only says that it was very little known, and not quoted by the ancients. The first Epistle which is addressed to the Corinthians, is styled by Eusebius ἐπιστόλη μεγάλη τε καὶ θαυμασία, and it is quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, and others. Its date is a subject of some uncertainty. In the opening salutation, Clement speaks of "sudden and calamitous events" which had happened to the Church at Rome, referring probably to the Domitian persecution [A.D. 97], and not to that under Nero [A.D. 68], which broke out twenty-five years before Clement became Bishop of Rome. The epistle bears much resemblance to the Epistle to the Hebrews, the translation of which into Greek was sometimes ascribed by the early Church to Clement. It was written to reprove the same schismatical spirit in the Corinthian Church which St. Paul had reproved before.

The sharp rebukes of the Apostle seem for a time to have produced much effect on the Church at Corinth, and of this change Clement speaks in terms of high praise. But the evil spirit of strife and division had crept in again, and Clement, mourning it, exhorts the Corinthians to humility and peace, and urges upon them the example of the worthies of old time, Abraham, David, and many others, great in their humility. He bids them look to Christ Himself, "for Christ is of those who are humble-minded, not of those who exalt themselves." In a passage of great beauty, he shews how all the works of God, the heavens, the day and the night, "the fruitful earth, the vast immeasurable sea, are all subject in peace." He exhorts the Corinthians to good works, in hope of that resurrection of which nature itself is a continual emblem. These works cannot justify us, for "we are not justified by ourselves, nor by our own wisdom, or understanding or godliness, or works which we have wrought in holiness of heart, but by that faith through which from the beginning Almighty God has justified all men."

And yet, Clement exclaims, "God forbid that we should be slothful in good works, for the Lord cometh, and His reward is with Him, to give unto every man according as his work shall be." The epistle is especially remarkable for its exaltation of Christ. By Him all blessings are given to us. He is our Leader, and we His soldiers. And as obedience is the virtue of armies, so should obedience be the virtue of Christians, who are the soldiers of Christ. The subject of church government seems to have been the cause of the sedition and dissension in the Corinthian Church, and Clement declares that obedience to appointed ministers is the duty of Christians. Succession from the Apostles is that which above all gives authority and claim to obedience, because the Apostles were commissioned by Christ. "Christ was sent forth by God, and the Apostles by Christ. Having therefore received their orders, the Apostles went forth, proclaiming that the kingdom of God was at hand. And thus preaching through cities and countries, they appointed the first-fruits of their labours to be bishops and deacons of those who should afterwards believe." Clement concludes with exhortations to reconciliation, brotherly love, and submission to lawful authority. "Ye therefore who laid the foundation of this sedition submit yourselves to the presbyters, and receive correction, bending the knees of your hearts" [lvii.].

The Second Epistle of Clement bears no title. Eusebius says of it, "There is a second epistle, ascribed to Clement, but we know not that this is as highly approved as the former, and know not that it has been in use with the ancients" [Eccl. Hist. iii. 38]. It opens with the sentence, "It is fitting that you should think of Christ as of God, as the judge of the living and the dead." As in the first epistle, the glory of Christ is kept in view throughout, and the Christians are urged to confess Him by doing what He says, and honouring Him not with the lips only, but with all the heart. The Epistle contains an addition, probably taken from the Gospel according to the Egyptians (no longer extant), to our Lord's charge to His Apostles. In answer to the words, "Behold I send you forth as lambs in the midst of wolves," St. Peter is related to have said, "What then if the wolves shall tear in pieces the lambs?" Jesus said, "The lambs have no cause after they are dead to fear the wolves, and in like manner fear ye not them that kill you, and can do nothing more unto you." Repentance, good works, and the confession of Christ in times of persecution are the chief subjects with which this epistle is occupied.

The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians is quoted in several places by Eusebius, and is thus spoken of by St. Jerome in the fourth century, "Polycarpus, Johannis apostoli discipulus, et ab eo Smyrnæ episcopus ordinatus, totius Asiæ princeps fuit. Scripsit ad Philippenses valde utilem epistolam, quæ usque hodie in Asiæ conventu legitur." The Epistle of Polycarp was written about the middle of the second century, and is mentioned by Irenæus in the same century. No doubt can exist as to its authenticity. St. Irenæus, who speaks of it in terms of high praise [Adv. Hær. iii. 3], was acquainted with Polycarp, and it was publicly used in the churches of Asia at least until the latter part of the fourth century. The Epistle of Polycarp echoes the praise which St. Paul had before bestowed on the Philippians. It contains exhortations to hope in Christ, to virtue, to patience, and to purity, and in this respect its injunctions bear a strong resemblance to those of St. Paul to Timothy. The presbyters are charged to be compassionate and merciful to all, to bring back the wandering, to visit the sick, and not to neglect the widow, the orphan, or the poor. Valens, formerly a presbyter of the Church at Philippi, is singled out by name as one towards whom compassion and mercy were especially to be exercised, and St. Ignatius of Antioch is mentioned with a charge to the Philippians to copy the example of steadfast patience, both in his long journey to the scene of his sufferings at Rome, and in the hour of death. The Epistle of Polycarp is remarkable for simple dignity of expression, and for its tone of unassuming and sincere piety.

The Epistle of Barnabas bears no title. As to its authorship, external and internal evidence are strongly opposed to each other. Eusebius, indeed, ranks it among spurious writings [Hist. Eccl. iii. 25], but almost all other ancient writers ascribe it to Barnabas of Cyprus, the companion of St. Paul. Clemens Alexandrinus says εἰκότως οὖν ὁ ἀπόστολος Βαρνάβας φησίν [Stromat. lib. ii.]. Origen says, γέγραπται δὴ ἐν τῇ Βαρνάβα καθολικῇ ἐπιστολῇ [contra Celsum, lib. i.]. And yet the judgment of later times may be summed up in the words of Cotelerius, who says of this epistle, "Certe vix eredi potest, quod adeo eximius Apostolus, vir plenus Spiritu Sancto et fide, segregatus una cum Paulo a Sancto Spiritu in opus evangelii, et collega ejusdem apostoli in gentium apostolatu, ea scripserit quæ in opusculo præsenti continentur; coactas dico allegorias, enarrationes Scripturarum minus verisimiles, fabulas de animalibus." Such an "enarratio Scripturarum" is that by which the three boys who sprinkle the ashes of the slain heifer are explained to signify Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, or where, after the sacrifice of the goat, the eating by the priests of its inward parts washed with vinegar is said to represent the giving of gall and vinegar to our Saviour on the cross [ch. vii. 7]. The date of the epistle is uncertain. The only clue which is given by internal evidence is in ch. xvi., where we learn that it was written after the destruction of Jerusalem. Hefele assigns the period A.D. 107-120 as the probable date of its composition. Most critics agree in thinking that it is the work of a converted Alexandrian Jew. The writer states that his object is to add perfect knowledge to the faith of those to whom he writes. He points out that while even in former times the Jewish sacrifices were of far less value than mercy and truth, they are now altogether abolished, and that the man himself must be dedicated to God instead of the outward sacrifices of the law. The oldest copy known to exist is contained in the Alexandrine MS. of the Old and New Testament.

The greater part of the epistle is, indeed, directed against the Jews; their fasts are declared to be no fasts, the scape-goat and the ashes of the heifer sprinkling the unclean are shewn to be types of Christ, and a spiritual meaning is given to the sanctity of the temple, to the observance of the Sabbath, to circumcision, and to the precepts of Moses respecting the eating of things clean and unclean. The writer refers several passages from Isaiah and Ezekiel to Christian baptism, explaining for instance Ezekiel xlvii. 12, "We indeed descend into the water full of sins and defilement, but come up bearing fruit in our heart, having the fear of God, and trust in Jesus" [xi.]. The cross of Christ is also shewn to be prefigured by the outstretched arms of Moses, and by the brazen serpent; and since all these things are types and signs of Christianity, the writer concludes that the covenant belongs no longer to the Jews, but to the Christian Church. It will be seen that the aims of the epistle are very similar to those of the Epistle to the Hebrews, but in the treatment of the subject the difference is very great, and the inferiority of the Epistle of Barnabas strongly marked.

Fifteen epistles in all have been ascribed to Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch [martyred A.D. 107 or A.D. 116], namely, two to the Apostle St. John, one to the Virgin Mary, to Mary of Cassobelæ, to the Tarsians, to the Antiochians, to Hero of Antioch, to the Philippians, to the Ephesians, to the Magnesians, to the Trallians, to the Romans, to the Philadelphians, to the Smyrnæans, and to Polycarp. It is universally admitted that the first eight are spurious. Eusebius, who enumerates the other epistles, does not mention them; and their internal evidence, with respect to history and chronology, furnishes full proofs against their genuineness. The remaining seven epistles have in their favour the strongest testimony of antiquity. They are quoted by Irenæus [Adv. Hæres. v. 28], by Origen, by Eusebius, by St. Chrysostom, by St. Jerome, and many others. The genuineness of the Epistle to Polycarp has been called in question more than that of any of the rest; but the evidence which Cotelerius and many others have adduced in its favour is overwhelming. The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, which was read in the churches of Asia, expressly mentions the Epistle of Ignatius (ἐγράψατέ μοι καὶ ὑμεῖς καὶ Ἰγνάτιος). Polycarp survived Ignatius for nearly sixty years, and it is most unlikely that during his life-time an epistle, the original of which was addressed to himself, could be suppressed and a forgery put in its place. Irenæus was a disciple of Polycarp, and had doubtless the same version as his master. He also quotes the epistles of Ignatius, according to the version we possess, and the Epistle to Polycarp among the rest. He is followed by Origen, by Eusebius, by St. Athanasius, by St. Jerome, St. Chrysostom, and Theodoret, who form a continuous chain of witnesses, and whose evidence is generally held to be conclusive in favour of the genuineness of the seven epistles. But here another question arises. There are three versions of these epistles, a longer and a shorter Greek of all, and a very brief Syriac version of three, brought, about 1840, from a monastery in the desert of Nitria. The longer Greek recension was first published in 1557, by Pacæus. Its claims were supported in 1710 by Whiston, but it is now universally considered to be an interpolated version of later times. The shorter Greek version was first edited by Archbishop Usher in 1644. In 1662 was published the work of Daillé, who denied the genuineness of either of the two recensions then known, the longer and the shorter Greek. Daillé was answered in 1672 by the celebrated Vindiciæ Ignatianæ of Bishop Pearson, who wrote in favour of the shorter Greek version, then generally accepted by scholars as the genuine work of St. Ignatius. The question was then set at rest until the discovery of the short Syriac version, which was published by Cureton in 1849, and asserted to be the genuine version, of which the two others were more or less interpolated copies. The Syriac epistles are only three in number, to Polycarp, to the Ephesians, and to the Romans. Against their claims must be set the evidence of Eusebius, who enumerates seven epistles, and also their want of connection, and the abrupt transitions which seem to mark their fragmentary character. In favour of the genuineness of the shorter Greek version may be advanced: [1] The evidence of the Fathers, and especially Eusebius; [2] their natural mode of expression; [3] their utterances of fervent beliefs rather than dogmas; [4] their few quotations from the New Testament, which would indicate an early period, the writings of the later Fathers abounding in such quotations.

The seven epistles present to us the thoughts and feelings of a Christian martyr, and express a heartfelt desire for the maintenance of the unity of the Church. This unity is to be gained by a firm adhesion to the episcopal system of church government, which is strongly advocated in every epistle. St. Ignatius sees in the Church the Body of Jesus Christ, and follows St. Paul in the desire that no schism should be in that Body. In the episcopal system he sees the best means of promoting unity, and avoiding schism, and he therefore urges obedience to the bishop as head of each church, and to the priests and deacons under him. The prominent characteristics of St. Ignatius, as shewn in his epistles, are his deep and fervent love for Christ, and for the Church as the representative of Christ on earth, and his eager desire for martyrdom and rest with Christ. In his Epistle to the Ephesians, Ignatius commends their good order in God, and gives as a rule of Christian conduct towards the heathen, "Be ye meek in response to their wrath, humble in opposition to their boasting, and for their cruelty make manifest your gentleness."

In the Epistle to the Magnesians, their bishop Damas, the presbyters Bassus and Apollonius, and the deacon Sotio, are mentioned by name.

The duty of common prayer is inculcated and the observance of the Lord's Day in opposition to the Jewish Sabbath. In the Epistle to the Trallians Ignatius charges them to do nothing without the bishop, and to be subject to the presbyters as to the Apostles of Jesus Christ. As to the necessity of the three orders of the ministry, he says, "Apart from these there is no church." In the Epistle to the Romans he anticipates the efforts which his friends would probably make to save him, whether by their prayers, or by their intercession with the emperor, and he entreats them to desist, calling himself "the wheat of God, which must be ground by the teeth of wild beasts to become the pure bread of Christ." The Epistle to the Philadelphians contains warnings against schism: "Take ye heed to have but one eucharist, for there is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, and one cup, . . . one altar, as there is one bishop, together with the presbyters and deacons, my fellow-servants." The Epistle to the Smyrnæans contains some passages against the Docetæ, for whom the faithful are bidden to pray to God. Many of its sentiments resemble the epistles of St. Paul, especially those to the Corinthians, Romans, and Philippians. In the Epistle to Polycarp, written from Troas, St. Ignatius speaks of his friend in terms of admiration and deep affection, and describes the duties of a shepherd of the flock.

The seven epistles were written during the journey of St. Ignatius to Rome, whither he was brought from Antioch to receive the crown of martyrdom.

The Epistle to Diognetus was first published in Greek in 1552. It is an eloquent account of Christianity and its effects, written to a Gentile, who was, as the writer tells us, desirous of inquiring earnestly into the Christian faith. Its author is unknown. The preceptor of Marcus Aurelius, whose name was Diognetus, has been supposed to be the person to whom it was addressed, but this would make it of a later date than the evidence of its early origin seems to assign for it. Clemens Romanus, Justin Martyr, and Quadratus, have been named as its authors. The epistle itself furnishes no clue as to its exact date. But its style seems to make a connecting link between the simplicity of the earlier Apostolic Fathers and the culture of the Apologists; and as it yet speaks of Christianity as a new thing, the early part of the second century may be fixed with greater probability than any other period for its date.

The writer begins by ridiculing idol worship, in terms not unlike those of Isaiah. He then shews that the Jews are in error also, because, although they worship the one true God, yet they offer to Him, as if He needed them, the same things which the Gentiles offer to their idols. The writer beautifully describes the condition of Christians in the world, and their manner of life. They live upon the earth, but are citizens of heaven. They love all, and are persecuted by all. They are unknown, and yet they are condemned. They are poor, and make many rich. In short, what the soul is in the body the Christians are in the world. The soul dwells in the body, but it is not of the body; so the Christians dwell in the world, but are not of the world. The flesh hates and wars against the soul, suffering no wrong from it, but because it resists fleshly pleasures, and the world hates the Christians with no reason but that they resist its pleasures. Immortal, the soul dwells in the mortal body; so the Christians dwell in the corruptible, but look for incorruption in heaven. The epistle concludes with the praise of true knowledge.

The Shepherd of Hermas was first published in 1513. Its authorship has been ascribed to the Hermas mentioned by St. Paul [Rom. xvi. 14], and to a Hermas in the second century, brother of Pope Pius I. It is without doubt of a very early date, for it is quoted as scripture by Irenæus and Clemens Alexandrinus. It is also quoted by Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius and others. The opinion of Tertullian is sometimes asserted to be strongly opposed to its morality and high claims. But, as Cotelerius shews, his sentiments respecting it underwent a great change after his fall into Montanism. Before that time his opinion seems to have agreed with the general view, which estimated it so highly that it was read publicly in some churches, and down to the time of St. Jerome was believed to be the work of the Apostolic Hermas.

The book derived its name from one of the visions contained in it, in which a man, clothed as a shepherd, appears to Hermas, bringing the message that he was sent by an angel to instruct him. The work is divided into three books—[1] Visions, [2] Commandments, [3] Parables. In the first book the vision of an aged matron appears to Hermas, and shews him a tower which many persons are engaged in building, and which represents the Church. The second book contains twelve commandments delivered to Hermas by the shepherd from whom the book derives its name. The third book contains parables drawn from trees and vines, and the Church is again represented as a tower.

Papias was the author of a work in five books bearing the title λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις, or Interpretations of the Lord's discourses. These were traditions respecting the sayings of our Lord, and also contained several particulars concerning the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Matthew. The judgment of Eusebius on the merits of Papias as a writer varies in different parts of his history. In one place he calls him "a man well-skilled in all manner of learning, and well-acquainted with the Scriptures" [Euseb. Eccl. Hist. iii. 36], and in another he terms him very limited in comprehension. Papias was a contemporary of Polycarp and Ignatius. His work only exists in fragments, which are found in Irenæus and Eusebius.

The editions of the Apostolic Fathers which will be found most valuable for reference and full information, are those by Cotelerius, Par. 1672, 2 vols. fol.; by Dr. Jacobson, Oxon. 1838, ed. iii. 1847, 2 vols.; and by Hefele, Tubingen, 1839, ed. iv. 1855, 1 vol. The work of Bishop Pearson entitled Vindiciæ Ignatianæ, should also be consulted upon the controversy to which the epistles of St. Ignatius have given rise.

FATHERS. It would be impossible, within the limits of the present work, to give a complete article on a subject so great and important as the Fathers of the Church, or to do more than enumerate briefly the names, writings, and characteristics of those who have been most famous in the history of the Church.

Justin Martyr [A.D. 103-164], a philosopher of Samaritan origin, was converted at about thirty years of age, and became a successful defender of Christianity. [APOLOGY.]

St. Irenæus [A.D. 140-202 or 203], Bishop of Lyons for twenty-four years, was a disciple of St. Polycarp, and also of Papias, according to St. Jerome, who speaks of him as "a man of apostolic times, and a disciple of Papias, the hearer of John the Evangelist." He composed in Greek five books against heresy bearing the title, ἐλέγχου καὶ ἀνατροπῆς τῆς ψευδονόμου γνώσεως βίβλια πέντε. He was also the author of a work against the Gentiles entitled περὶ ἐπιστήμης, and of some smaller treatises. He was extremely well versed in the history and discipline of the Church, and is called for that reason by Tertullian, "Omnium doctrinarum curiosissimus explorator."

St. Clement of Alexandria [died about A.D. 216] is the author of eight books of Stromata, eight books of instructions, and three books, commonly called the Pædagogue. St. Jerome says that no one ever had more knowledge than this Father, whose works abound in stores of learning, both Christian and profane. The work called Stromata, is, as its name denotes (Στρωματεῖς, a patchwork), a miscellaneous collection of learning, and among other subjects contains much information on Egyptian hieroglyphics.

Tertullian, whose full name was Septimius Florens Tertullianus [flourished A.D. 194-216], is the author of treatises on penance, baptism, the public spectacles, the dress and ornaments of women, and of an apology for the Christian religion. In later life he became a Montanist, and then wrote several works, of which the chief is that called De Præscriptionibus Hæreticorum. Lactantius criticizes Tertullian as "in eloquendo parum facilis, et minus comptus, et multum obscurus." Vincent of Lerins, on the other hand, praises his learning and his forcible reasoning. The works of Tertullian abound in figures and metaphors, and he writes with great warmth on almost every subject which he handles.

Origen [born at Alexandria about A.D. 185], was the son of a martyr named Leonidas. He composed the first Hexapla copy of the Scriptures, and was the author of Commentaries on the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John, the books of Genesis and the Lamentations, on the first twenty-five Psalms, and on the minor prophets. One of his most celebrated works is that against Celsus, in eight books. His works shew great richness of thought and facility of invention, qualities which he possessed to such an extent that he is said to have dictated to seven or eight persons at once. His writings abound in allegory, and shew a profound knowledge not only of the Holy Scriptures, but of the Platonic philosophy. Origen died A.D. 252, at the age of sixty-five.

St. Cyprian [A.D. 200-258] was the author of a letter to Donatus, a treatise De Lapsis, treatises on the unity of the Church, on the conduct and apparel of virgins, on the vanity of idols, on the Lord's Prayer, on mortality, on martyrdom, on patience, and on envy. Lactantius says "that St. Cyprian is the first Christian author who possessed true eloquence, and that his writings, distinguished as they are by fertility of invention and great perspicuity of thought, exhibit the three qualities required by an orator, the power to teach, to please, and to persuade." St. Cyprian called Tertullian his master, but his writings much excel those of that Father in clearness and elegance of expression. The chief subjects of which he treats are the power of the priesthood, penance, and original sin. Most of his works seem to have been in the form of letters. St. Augustine calls the treatises respecting Donatus and the books on unity and envy by that name. St. Cyprian was elected Bishop of Carthage A.D. 248.

St. Gregory Thaumaturgus [consecrated Bishop of Neocæsarea about A.D. 240, died A.D. 265] is the author of an address to Origen, celebrated for the rhetorical skill which it displays, and of a paraphrase upon Ecclesiastes.

St. Dionysius of Alexandria [Bishop of Alexandria A.D. 247] was the author of many epistles to contemporary bishops, of several works against heresy, and treatises on doctrine and discipline. His writings are enumerated in the catalogue of St. Jerome.

Lactantius, tutor of Crispus, son of the Emperor Constantine, wrote [A.D. 320], in defence of Christianity, seven books of institutions, which form his most celebrated work. He is also the author of treatises "on the Word of God," and on persecution, two books to Aselepiades, and eight books of epistles. His writings are celebrated for their classical elegance of language, and for their resemblance to the style of Cicero. St. Jerome, however, says of Lactantius that he was better able to confute heathen errors than to support Christian doctrines.

Eusebius, surnamed Pamphilus [died A.D. 338], was Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine. He is the author of six books of Apology for Origen, fifteen books of Evangelical Preparation, twenty books of Evangelical Demonstration, a Chronicle from the Creation down to the reign of Constantine, and an Ecclesiastical History in ten books, the last being his most important work, as it furnishes almost all the information we possess respecting the early history of the Church. The succeeding ecclesiastical historians, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, take up the history at the point where that of Eusebius breaks off, and thereby recognise the important place which the work of Eusebius occupied in their time. His writings are the fruit of great labour and study, and are not only valuable in themselves, but also of great importance on account of the numerous fragments of other writers which they contain. St. Basil calls Eusebius διὰ πολυπειρίαν ἀξιοπίστος, and St. Jerome, even though in common with many others he seems to have suspected him of heresy, uses the words "Vir doctissimus Eusebius, doctissimum dico, non Catholicum." The Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius was first translated by Ruffinus, with the omission of the tenth book, and with such free handling of the text that his work in many places resembles a paraphrase rather than a translation.

Fathers

St. Athanasius [Bishop of Alexandria A.D. 326, died A.D. 373] was the author of many works, almost entirely on controversial subjects. The Eastern Church was at that time greatly harassed by heresy, and St. Athanasius both by word of mouth and by his writings was the foremost worker in contending with it. A letter written to him by St. Basil, at a time of especial danger to the truth, is preserved, in which the latter says, "No one is more able to accomplish this (the suppression of the Arian heresy) than yourself, from sagacity in council and energy in action, and sympathy with the troubles of the brethren, and the reverence felt by the West for your hoary head." The greater part of the works of St. Athanasius are apologies for his own doctrines or conduct, and attacks against the Arians. Of the former class his apology addressed to the Emperor Constantius is most celebrated. Like all his other works it is written in the form of a letter.

St. Cyril of Jerusalem [died A.D. 386] was Bishop of that place. He is the author of eighteen catechetical discourses which explain the doctrines of Christianity with great clearness, and shew signs of deep learning and of a most profound acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures, which he brings to bear on every point of which he treats.

St. Hilary [A.D. 350–367] was Bishop of Poictiers in France. He wrote against the Arians a work on the Trinity in twelve books. At the instance of the Arian party he was banished by the Emperor Constantius to Phrygia, where he wrote a treatise on synods, dedicated to the Bishops of France. He was also the author of addresses to Constantius, and of a treatise against Ursacius and Valens, which contained the history of the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia.

St. Basil [born A.D. 328] was appointed to the Bishopric of Cæsarea after the death of Eusebius. He is the author of works against the heresies of Eunomius, on the Creation, on the Holy Spirit, on Baptism, on Virginity, and also of ascetical writings, and many homilies and epistles. The last are the most interesting of all his writings. They set before us the anxieties and troubles, the hopes and fears, the friendships and daily habits of one of the most prominent and remarkable men among the great Fathers of the fourth century. His friend St. Gregory Nazianzen says of him, "When I read his treatise on the Creation, methinks I am present with the Creator, when I read what he has written of the Holy Spirit I acknowledge the God whom I possess, when I hear his praises of the martyrs I despise my own body."

St. Gregory Nyssen [A.D. 332-396], so called from his Bishopric of Nyssa, was a brother of St. Basil, and wrote, like him, against the heresy of Eunomius. He is also the author of a valuable catechetical discourse, intended more particularly for the instruction of Jews and heathens. St. Gregory Nyssen has followed Origen in his extensive use of allegory. His works also shew great knowledge of the philosophy of Plato and Aristotle.

St. Gregory Nazianzen [born A.D. 329, died A.D. 389], so called from his birthplace near Nazianzus in Cappadocia, is the author of fifty-five extant sermons, a treatise on the book of Ecclesiastes, many letters and poems. The poems of St. Gregory are among the most beautiful productions of Christian antiquity. His thoughts for morning and evening, as translated by Dr. Newman, may speak for themselves.

Morning.

I rise and yield my claspèd hands to Thee,
Henceforth the darkness hath no part in me,
Thy sacrifice this day;
Abiding firm, and with a freeman's might,
Stemming the waves of passion in the fight.
Ah! should I from Thee stray,
My hoary head, Thy table where I bow,
Will be my shame, which are mine honour now.
Thus I set out;—Lord, lead me on my way!

Evening.

O Holiest Truth, how have I lied to Thee
I vowed this day Thy festival should be;
Yet I am dim ere night.
Surely I made my prayer and I did deem
That I could keep in me Thy morning beam
Immaculate and bright.
But my foot slipped, and, as I lay, he came,
My gloomy foe, and robbed me of Heaven's flame.
Help Thou my darkness, Lord, till I am light.

St. Gregory was for three years patriarch of Constantinople, and defended the truth effectively at one of the most perilous epochs in the Church's history. In spite of much opposition and personal danger, he preached and spoke against the Arian heresy with such success in the end that he has been called the Divine.

St. Ambrose [A.D. 340-396], consecrated Bishop of Milan in 374, wrote a treatise on Paradise, two books upon the life of Abraham, works on the Benefits and Advantages of Death, and on the Duties of the Clergy, Expositions of the Psalms, a Commentary on St. Luke, and treatises on Penance and Morality. The text of the works of St. Ambrose has been more corrupted than that of any other Father. His works on Morality are considered the best of his writings, and shew signs of having had most labour expended on them, but his letters, especially those addressed to the emperors, are very celebrated.

St. Chrysostom [born A.D. 347, died A.D. 407]. The number of St. Chrysostom's works is so great that it is hardly possible to give a complete catalogue of them. Suidas says that there is no part of the Bible on which he did not write a commentary. He was the author, for instance, of more than seventy homilies on the book of Genesis alone. Among his other numerous works are a book against the Gentiles and Jews to prove the Divinity of Christ, treatises on the Monastic life, six books on the Priesthood, three books on Divine Providence, and Liturgies.

Fathers

St. Jerome [born A.D. 345, died A.D. 420], is the author of many letters, of which that to Nepotian is perhaps the most remarkable. Its aim is, as St. Jerome himself says, to teach the person to whom it is addressed to be a perfect minister of the Gospel. Another epistle is addressed to Lucinius, and contains these words, "Ecclesiastical traditions, not contrary to the faith, ought to be observed after the same manner that we received them from our ancestors. And I am persuaded that the custom of one church is not to be abolished, because of a contrary one in use in another church." St. Jerome is also the writer of a Catalogue of Ecclesiastical authors, a Latin version of the Bible from the Hebrew text, Commentaries on the Prophets, upon Ecclesiastes, and upon the New Testament. It is a curious fact that St. Jerome's translation of the Holy Scriptures was at first viewed by the Church with considerable suspicion as an innovation, St. Augustine himself saying that it would have been better to have remained satisfied with the Septuagint. St. Jerome frequently calls his translation "the Hebrew truth," to assert its correctness and purity. [VULGATE.]

Ruffinus, a priest of Aquileia, was the author of many translations and original works. Among the former class are his translations of Josephus, the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, the De Principiis of Origen, and many of his homilies. These works are rather paraphrases than translations. The chief original works of Ruffinus are two books of Ecclesiastical History added to the translation of Eusebius, and continuing the history to the death of the Emperor Theodosius, two books called Invectives, written against St. Jerome, an Exposition of the Creed, Commentaries upon the Prophets Hosea, Joel, and Amos, and upon the Psalms, and an apology addressed to Pope Anastasius.

St. Augustine [born A.D. 354, consecrated Bishop of Hippo 395, died 430], was the author of Confessions in thirteen books, a work on Order in two books, works on the Immortality of the Soul, on Free Will, on Christian Doctrine, on the Grace of Jesus Christ, on Original Sin, on Predestination, on Perseverance; treatises against the Jews, controversial works against the Donatists, Manichees, and Pelagians, and of many letters and sermons. His great work De Civitate Dei is divided into twenty-two books. The first ten of these contain answers to the objections commonly made to Christianity, and the remaining part of the work is devoted to establishing its truth.

St. Cyril of Alexandria [consecrated Bishop of Alexandria A.D. 412, died 444] wrote on the adoration and worship of God in spirit and in truth, on Isaiah, on the Pentateuch, and on the Gospel of St. John, Paschal Homilies, treatises against the Nestorians, a work in ten books against the Emperor Julian, and many letters which are valuable for the information they furnish respecting the history of the Council of Ephesus.

Socrates [born about A.D. 380]. He undertook a continuation of the ecclesiastical history of Eusebius to the year 440. His work consists of seven books, which give an account of the great events that had happened between A.D. 309, where the history of Eusebius ends, and 440. It is especially valuable, on account of the care with which Socrates has referred to original records, and the account which he has given of the discipline of the Church.

Sozomen was a contemporary of Socrates, and undertook a similar work somewhat longer than that of Socrates, and dedicated to the younger Theodosius.

Theodoret [born A.D. 386, consecrated bishop of Cyrus in Syria in 420], was the author of a Commentary in questions and answers on the first eight books of the Bible, commentaries on the Psalms, the Prophets, and St. Paul's Epistles, and an ecclesiastical history, which begins where that of Eusebius ends, and carries the history to A.D. 428.

St. Leo [consecrated Bishop of Rome A.D. 440] wrote many treatises and letters on doctrine, discipline, history and morals. His sermons are very valuable.

The Fathers here mentioned are the most illustrious in that roll of great names which begins with the disciples of the Apostles, and ends with St. Bernard, whose learning and sanctity were famous in the earlier half of the twelfth century. Many other names will be found in Dupin's Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, as well as a careful analysis of all their more important writings.

The works of the Fathers form one of the most precious parts of the inheritance of the Church. The words of saints who lived almost in Apostolic times, the words of saints who, from these, received the teachings which the Apostles had given by word of mouth, must be regarded with profound veneration and respect. And herein is indicated the light in which the writings of the Fathers should be viewed by us. So far as they are messengers for the Apostles, as the Apostles were messengers for Christ, their words and sentiments require implicit submission on the part of succeeding generations. But as they speak for themselves as individuals, either in commentaries on the Scriptures, or in expositions of doctrine, we must regard them as witnesses, and not attach to their words a higher honour than would have been given to them in their own day. Many passages in their own writings seem to point to this distinction. Thus Irenæus says of Polycarp: "He always taught what he had learned from the Apostles, what the Church had handed down, and what is the only true doctrine." The early Church appears to have received this sacred charge of apostolic tradition almost as Holy Scripture, but to have considered the private teachings of the Fathers in much the same point of view as we should consider those of great and holy men who have lived during and since the Middle Ages. Tertullian fell into Montanism. The opinions of Origen made him so unpopular that his bishop Demetrius compelled him to leave Alexandria. St. Gregory blames St. Basil; St. Augustine sends word to St. Jerome that the translation of the Scriptures which the latter had undertaken would in his opinion do harm to the cause of the Church. Eusebius was charged, though in all probability unjustly, with heresy by St. Jerome. Ruffinus inveighs against St. Jerome. Each of the Fathers, in short, had to maintain himself against the attacks, not of heretics and schismatics only, but of good men and saints who differed from him. And if such was the view of the early Church, it would be an unjust burden on individual consciences in our own day, to attempt to force on them the acceptance of all the sentiments contained in the writings of the Fathers. They are witnesses, whose testimony is of the highest importance because, living, as they did, very near that Apostolic period, the doctrines and belief of which form our rule of faith, they are able to speak with greater authority and knowledge than men who lived in later times. The Fathers are also not only important witnesses to those councils of the Church which were held in their lifetime, but interpreters from whose writings we may gather the sense in which the decrees of those councils were interpreted in the age, when the men who had composed them were yet living and in the midst of their labours.

To the French Benedictines of St. Maur we owe the best editions of the separate texts of most of the Fathers. The Maxima Bibliotheca veterum Patrum et antiquorum Scriptorum ecclesiasticorum, published at Lyons in 1677 in twenty-seven folio volumes (one of which contains an index of subjects), is the best and latest edition of the Latin collection of the Fathers which was first published at Paris in 1575 by De La Bigne. A supplementary volume, containing an index to the texts of Holy Scripture, was published at Genoa in 1707. Andrea Gallandi, an Oratorian, was the editor of a very valuable Bibliotheca which appeared at Venice in fourteen folio volumes, 1765-81, in which is comprised a fuller collection of the Opuscula of minor writers, with the Christian Apologiæ and the Acta Martyrum sincera; and the original Greek texts are accompanied by Latin translations. A very convenient and cheap series of reprints of Fathers and Mediæval writers, extending over a wide range, is, and has been for some years, in course of publication at Paris, by the Abbé Migne, entitled Patrologiæ Cursus; the series has already reached a great number of large octavo volumes. An account of all the collections of Fathers and ecclesiastical writers published up to the year 1700 is given in Ittigii Tractatus de Bibl. Patr., Lips. 1707; and from that date to the year 1838 in J. G. Dowling's Notitia Scriptorum SS. Patrum &c., Oxon. 1839.

FESTIVALS, or Holy Days. Days set apart by the Church, either for the remembrance of some special mercies of God, such as the Birth and Resurrection of Christ, the descent of the Holy Ghost, &c., or in memory of the great heroes of the Christian religion, the blessed Apostles, and other saints. The system originated under the Old Testament dispensation, it being by direct command of God that the Jewish Church kept festivals to His honour. "Why doth one day excel another, when as all the light of every day in the year is of the sun? By the knowledge of the Lord they were distinguished, and He altered seasons and feasts, some of them hath He made high days and hallowed them, and some of them hath He made ordinary days" [Eccles. xxxiii. 7-9].

Thus also it has been in the Christian Church under the guidance of the Spirit. It was natural that she should ever keep in memory the actions of her Lord. As each Friday was a fast in remembrance of His Death, so was each Sunday a festival to commemorate His Rising. In time each great event of that most precious Life had its memorial day, and to these were added commemorations of those who followed in His train, the saints and martyrs of His Church.

The Christian year naturally divides itself into two parts, the first beginning with Advent and ending with Trinity Sunday, the second consisting of the Sundays after Trinity. In the first the great events of the Gospel are brought before us, in the second the duties resulting therefrom. Advent tells us of the coming of our Lord in glory, and prepares us for the celebration of His coming in humility at Christmas. Then follow in due order His Circumcision, Epiphany (including both His manifestation to the Magi and His Baptism), His fasting and temptation, His Agony, His Passion, His precious Death and Burial, His glorious Resurrection, His forty days' sojourn upon earth with His disciples, and lastly, His "wonderful" Ascension to the right hand of the Father. Then we have the feast of Pentecost, and last of all, fitly closing the series, the festival of the ever Blessed Trinity.

Thus every year the whole Gospel story is as it were enacted before our eyes, and then follow the exhortations to practice, to fulfil in daily life the duties of the Christian religion.

The celebrations of saints and martyrs are distributed throughout the whole year. They are of very great antiquity. At first it was usual for each Church to celebrate those martyrs who had been more immediately connected with it.[1] But in course of time the more eminent were commemorated by the whole Church. The anniversary of a martyr's death was called his "natalitia"[2] or birthday, and was usually observed by a meeting of Christians at the place of burial, by reading the acts of his martyrdom, and by a celebration of the Holy Eucharist. Tertullian [De Coron. c. 3] mentions this practice of yearly celebrating the martyrs' births as being received from the tradition of the Church. St. Gregory Thaumaturgus is said to have enjoined some of these festivals in order to take the place of those heathen festivals which his converts had been wont to keep.[1]

[1] e.g. The Church of Antioch celebrated the memory of St. Ignatius year by year after A.D. 117 (the date of his martyrdom), and the Church of Smyrna [Euseb. iv. 15] that of St. Polycarp.

[2] Cf. the beautiful words of St. Ignatius [Ep. ad Rom.], ὁ δὲ τοκετός μοι ἐπίκειται . . . μὴ ἐμποδίσητέ μοι ζῆσαι, μὴ θελήσητέ μοι ἀποθανεῖν κ.τ.λ.

The festivals of the English Calendar are in all one hundred and forty-nine (including Sundays). Of these, sixty-three are in honour of our Blessed Lord, three of God the Holy Ghost, one of the Holy Trinity, one of the Holy Angels, five of the Blessed Virgin, twenty-two of saints associated with our Lord, and fifty-four of other saints. Of festivals there are two main classes, viz., greater and lesser, or major and minor.[2] The former have proper Collects, Epistles and Gospels, and Lessons. Some have also a "Proper Preface" at Holy Communion, and Proper Psalms. The latter are only named in the Calendar. All should be marked by some change in the services and ritual of the Church; the minor festivals being suitably observed by an office hymn referring to the saints in whose memory they are instituted.

As the date of the observance of Easter varies year by year, it follows that those feasts which depend upon Easter are also "moveable feasts." These are Septuagesima, Rogation Sunday, Ascension Day, Whitsun Day, and Trinity Sunday. The number of Sundays after Epiphany and Trinity, and the date of the Fast of Ash-Wednesday, depend of course upon Easter also. Advent Sunday is the nearest Sunday to the Feast of St. Andrew, whether before or after. [See Cave's Primitive Christianity, part i. c. 7; Bishop Sparrow's Rationale; Blunt's Annotated Book of Common Prayer.]

FETICHISM. Fetich, a term introduced by De Brosses [Culte des Dieux Fétiches, 1760], is a corruption by French traders to the Senegal of the Portuguese word "fetisso," a wooden idol. The origin of the word is obscure. It may be derived from "fatum" [Ersch. u. Gr.], or from "facere" [Herzog.], and if this last be the etymon, it stands in some relation with "fetialis," a "faciendo" [Festus]; though this latter word is more probably a derivative from the pre-Roman language and associations of Latium. The idea conveyed by fetichism is the very lowest form of barbarous superstition and belief in the preternatural; a notion of weird influence attaching to natural objects as the means of propitiating witchcraft and demoniacal malice. The gods of the Mesopotamian contemporaries of Abraham, the teraphim of Laban's household, the Pelasgic ξόανα, the bulls and falcons of Nineveh, the animal worship of Egypt, the Dionysian phallus, all had a fetich cast; for whatever natural object excites interest or dread, as the symbol of any particular form of power, is liable to be regarded with superstition. A stone of unusual shape, a tree of morbid growth, or the more prominent features of a landscape, mountain, forest, and lake, are objects of fetich worship; and, much more, such elements of dread as the storms of the tropics, and its beasts of prey, the lion, tiger, and bear; a fang or claw of which is venerated as the representative of the entire animal. On the Benin coast a negro's own shadow is his fetich as an emblem of the inevitable. At Cape Coast, a rock that runs into the sea from the base of the cliff on which the castle stands, is the "genius loci:" annual sacrifices are made to it, and the fetich priest receives in answer a direction for successful fishery. There are also artificial imitations of natural objects, with which our museums abound, to which the same "uncanny" notions are attached as to the originals; but they are generally copies of inanimate nature, as idolatry forms for itself representations of animal life. It is believed that these objects have life and thought, that they can do good and harm, and that by an influence imparted to the fetich priest he too gains the power of reading the thoughts of men, and nothing is hidden from him. Each tribe on the Guinea Coast, each family and individual, has its own familiar spirit, to which daily offerings are made of meal or honey, brandy or tobacco. Even self-mortifying acts and deeds of painful penance are within the scope of fetichism; and a promise or a declaration made while touching the object of veneration is sacred. Supplications are made to these idols before engaging in a forage or hunting expedition, and on the return it is a matter of indifference whether game from the hunting-ground, or a human victim from the conquered tribe, be the offering that is made. An unsuccessful expedition has a different result, for the fetich object is then insulted, and beaten and burnt as unworthy of any further confidence. Fetichism is the rudest form of Pantheism; it is the Spinozism of the forest and the jungle. The North American Indian worships the spirit of life in the various Manitous of bird, beast, and fish, the enchanted amulets that are to him as safeguards against accident and disease.

In the Shamanism of Tartary and Mongolia fetichism is reduced into something like system. The Shaman professes, by means of his mastery over the powers of nature and by magical incantations, to declare the future and unravel the past, to cure diseases and avert the wrath of evil spirits. Shamanism is a polytheistic belief in gods create and uncreate, existing in the shape of the heavenly bodies, or as animals and idols. It has faith in a future state, in which either earthly objects of interest will be renewed, or man's present condition will be reversed; the strong will become weak, the rich poor, the hunter will be timid, the coward brave. But it is the faith of a metensomatist, that some will live again as brutes. When various states of being have been endured, the supreme bliss of annihilation in the substance of the universal will be attained; and

[1] St. Greg. Nyss. Vita St. Greg. Thaumat., Op. ii. 1007.

[2] Called also "red-letter" and "black-letter" days, from the fact that the former are printed in red, the latter in black, in the Calendar.

in this, as in the worship of the god Fo, it occupies common ground with Brahminism. The systems of Confucius in China and of Zerdusht in Persia superseded these superstitions. Shamanism takes the form of Lamaism among the Mongols and Calmucs, Thibet having given birth to it. Here the highest god is worshipped as Shigemooni, and the Grand Lama as his vicegerent; not merely qua representative, but as the very deity, from whom nothing is concealed. Thus fetichism at times seems to raise itself to something like belief in the unity of the Deity, and the responsibility of man; but in every other respect its history is a dismal picture of the deep degradation into which unaided human nature is sure to fall. [Ritter's Erdkunde, Africa; Tennent's Ceylon; Meiner's Allgem. Gesch. d. Rel.; Sir G. Grey, Polyn. Mythol.; Shortland, New Zealand.]

FILIOQUE. This word represents the inveterate schism that has divided the Church Catholic into two sections, an Eastern and a Western Communion, since the ninth century. It was inserted by the Latin Church in the Nicene Creed, which had only stated the Procession of the Holy Spirit to be from the Father. The Western Church, judging by the analogy of Scripture and certain expressions of doctrine in Fathers of the Greek Church [Harvey on the Creeds, 449, 450], that the procession of the Holy Spirit was from the Father and the Son, inserted the term "Filioque." This insertion was made without any competent authority by the third Council of Toledo [A.D. 589], when it was also determined that the Nicene Creed with this addition should be chanted as a portion of the liturgy for the edification of the people. The first objection taken to this insertion is found in the epistle of the Confessor Maximus, a monk of Constantinople, who challenged the assertion of Martin, Bishop of Rome, for saying that the Holy Spirit proceedeth from the Father and the Son [Max. Conf. tom. iii. p. 62]. This was in the middle of the seventh century, Maximus having died A.D. 662. After the lapse of a century, at a council held at Gentilly in the reign of King Pepin [A.D. 767], the Emperor Constantine being represented by Greek ambassadors, the subject was agitated between the Eastern envoys and the Western divines as an innovation in the matter of doctrinal statement. In A.D. 790 a Council was held by Charlemagne at Frioul, under the presidency of Paulinus, Patriarch of Aquileia, who took the opportunity of denouncing the insertion of the word "Filioque" in the Nicene Creed. The question was next discussed at Aix-la-Chapelle, in the council convoked by Charlemagne [A.D. 809], and referred for Papal decision; Bernard, Bishop of Worms, and Abelard, Abbot of Corby, being sent to Rome for that purpose. Pope Adrian I. found himself in the dilemma of having either to condemn a statement that was in strict accordance with the analogy of faith, or of authorizing the retention of a word in the Nicene symbol that had been inserted by no sufficient synodal authority, and in direct contravention to the prohibition of subsequent councils. The envoys approached in dialectical form; first they extorted the admission that the statements of the Nicene Creed were points of necessary faith; then that it must be taught and embodied in the public services of the Church; here the Pope made a stand, and allowing that the Creed might be chanted in the Liturgy, he denied that any addition could be made to its terms; the envoys allowed that "Filioque" had been so inserted, and declared that many thousands in the Christian Church had become used to the term; but the Pope remained inflexible; it had been well if the Fathers of the Nicene and Constantinopolitan Councils had inserted the word, but they had failed to do this, and it was now inadmissible. If the Spanish Churches since the third Council of Toledo had incorporated the term, it was no guide for others. The envoys urged the danger of removing a term to which the people had become accustomed; it would seem like a virtual denial of the doctrine. The Pope replied, "If my advice had been asked at first, I should have counselled you not to insert the word; as matters now stand, I should wish you to discontinue chanting the Creed in the Palatine service, as it is not the practice to chant it here; and soon all other churches will follow the fashion of the court, when that which has been introduced without authority may be allowed to drop into desuetude." The Conference, however, had no practical result, for the Gallican Church continued to chant the Creed with the doubtful term; the Roman Church merely retained its catechetical use, without the Filioque. But the Creed was engraved in Greek and Latin on two plates of silver, and suspended on either side of the entrance to the sepulchre of St. Peter.

Photius, the schismatical intruder into the see of Constantinople, having been condemned by the Roman See, in retaliation wrote a circular letter to the Patriarch of Alexandria and others, in which he denounced the insertion of "Filioque" in the Nicene Creed by the churches of the West, and inveighed against it as a horrible heresy, introducing a principle of dualism into the Holy Trinity [A.D. 866]. A letter written to him by Pope Marinus I. [A.D. 880] shews that the Church of Rome still held out against the adoption of the term, which was confined to the churches of Spain and France. It was made a point of accusation however by the papal legates, who proceeded to Constantinople to pronounce the sentence of excommunication on Michael Cerularius, Patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 1054; and whereas his opinions were identified with various heresies, he was accused of Macedonian error, in that he denied the Procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son. Michael Cerularius complained that the term was a Western interpolation [Ep. ad Petr. Antioch.]; and the Patriarch of Antioch was of opinion that such an unauthorized tampering with a venerable document deserved to be anathematized. At a council held by the Pope at Bari, A.D. 1098, where Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, was present, the subject was brought up again in the presence of Eastern bishops, and an anathema was pronounced against all who denied the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son. Three years later, Anselm put forth his treatise on the procession of the Holy Spirit, which may still be read with great advantage. In it he carefully distinguishes the attributes of each Person in the Holy Trinity, and shews that the Person which proceeds not from another is its principle; so the Father is the principle of the Son and of the Holy Spirit because He proceeds from neither, and in the same way the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son because the Son proceeds not from the Spirit. The Spirit is God of God as is the Son, and proceeds from the Father, not qua Father, but from the Father as God; whence it follows that He proceeds also from the Son, who is God equally with the Father. He then discusses the scriptural authority for the Latin statement, and denies that the churches of the West had, by their addition, contravened at all the general meaning of this part of the Creed; they adopted the Greek Creed, but translated it for the use of the people; in fact it was a new creed; and in renouncing it, it was neither necessary nor possible to incite the co-operation of the Greek Churches. Their own independent course of action was open to them as of old. Another treatise on the subject was written at Constantinople by Hugh of Eteria, in consequence of a desire expressed by the Emperor Manuel Comnenus to know the authority on which the Latins had inserted their "Filioque" [A.D. 1177]; but it is written in a very different style, is full of Aristotelian subtleties, and wants the order and method of Anselm. On the other hand, at the commencement of the thirteenth century, Michael, Patriarch of Constantinople, expressed the general feeling of the Eastern Church towards the Latins in these terms: "It would be a righteous act to anathematize the Latins and term them heretics. But the orthodox Fathers have passed a lighter sentence; they have cut off and abjured the Latins, but have not actually declared them heretics; neither have they adjudged to them the punishment due to heresy" [Allat. de Consens. Eccl. p. 617]. In A.D. 1234, a conference was held in the Imperial Palace at Nice, whither the Pope sent four nuncios, for the purpose of adjusting, if possible, the differences between the Churches of the East and West. There a new turn in favour of the West was given by the Eastern divines; for when the Nicene Creed had been read, the Latins demanded that the Creed, as enlarged by the Constantinopolitan addition, should also be recited; then it was asked by the Latins "how came those Fathers to add anything to a creed that was guarded by so severe an anathema as the Nicene?" It was answered that the addition was only by way of explanation, that it was virtually no new matter; that the Creed remained integrally the same as before. Then said the Latins, "Neither have we introduced new matter; our 'Filioque' is only a single word of explanation in development of the doctrine already contained in the words of the Creed." The Emperor pronounced an emphatic καλῶς, but both sides remained of the same opinion as before. The Roman envoys, however, agreed to remain for a couple of months, that a council might be assembled before the close of Lent, and a decision taken upon another subject of difference, the use of leavened bread or of the unleavened wafer in the Eucharist. But upon this question also no nearer approach was made at the Council of Nymphæa. The envoys demanded that upon both points the Latin practice should be affirmed, and that all which had been written by the Greeks "per contra" should be anathematized and burnt; in the end, however, they parted, mutually retorting upon each other charges of heresy. Later in the same century, overtures for reconciliation were made by Pope Urban IV., when pressed by demands for internal reforms; Michael Palæologus also, the Greek Emperor, threatened on his side by a combination of the Latin Emperor Baldwin with Charles King of Sicily, and hemmed in by the Turks within the walls of Constantinople, readily listened to the proposal of sending representatives to a Western Council. This was held at Lyons [A.D. 1274] under Gregory X. The Greek bishops were compelled by the Emperor to sign a previous declaration of submission to his will, i.e. to vote as he bade them; those who had the courage to resist were transported to distant isles, and the rest were then despatched to the council. The Pope celebrated mass in the Church of St. John at Lyons, on the Festival of St. Peter and St. Paul; the Epistle and Gospel were read in Latin and Greek, and the Nicene Creed chanted in Greek, the Filioque clause being thrice repeated; this was done also twice again after the Emperor's letter, acknowledging the papal primacy, had been read in council. Serious disturbances were caused in the East on this being known, which were repressed with the utmost cruelty. No real union having been effected, for the assent of the Greek bishops at Lyons had been extorted by fear, Pope Martin IV. excommunicated Michael Palæologus as a dissembler who had profanely trifled with the council. Seven years later [A.D. 1281], Gregory, Patriarch of Constantinople, put forth his tome upon the subject of the Procession of the Holy Spirit, which has always been accepted as a model of sound doctrine in the Greek Church. The statement of John of Damascus that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father by the Son is declared to be inapplicable to the Being of the Holy Spirit, but referable only to His eternal manifestation. The document was read aloud in the church, and at the close of each article those who held any opposite error were anathematized by name. It was then subscribed by the Emperor Andronicus, the patriarch, and bishops. The clergy also were invited to sign the document, but they remembered the disastrous result of the subscription before the Council of Lyons [A.D. 1274], and many preferred deposition to signing what appeared to them a sophistical gloss upon the words of John Damascene. After the lapse of more than a century and a half, the question was reproduced at the Council of Ferrara [A.D. 1438], at which representatives of the Greek Church attended. In the fifteenth session ancient documents referring to the subject were read, viz. the Nicene Creed, the prohibition by the Council of Ephesus of any after additions, with similar decrees of the four next General Councils. It is no matter of surprise that, after so long a controversy, some ingenious hand should have tried to cut the knot by forging the link of evidence that was wanting to make good the position of the West. Such an attempt, in fact, was made at the Council of Ferrara; a document was produced purporting to be a Greek copy of the Acts of the Second Nicene General Council [A.D. 785], in which the Procession of the Spirit was affirmed to be from the Father and the Son. But the Greek envoys were not to be deceived by so flimsy a pretence; and as the Latin Church had never before produced the document, of so much importance to their cause, it was rightly adjudged to be a forgery. The same ground was then taken as before in the conference at Nice [A.D. 1234]; and seeing that the Council of Constantinople had added to the Nicene Creed clauses in explanation of the function of the Holy Spirit; seeing also that both before and after the Council of Ephesus the Greek Church had added words of explanation to certain terms of the Nicene Creed to define its meaning more accurately as against the heresies of the East; so it was argued that the Latin Church had full power to translate for herself the symbol, and to add the single word explanatory, that should express the true faith against heresy in the West: that if the Ephesine Council forbade any addition to the Nicene Creed, it was done to estop the Nestorian party, who had prepared for themselves a false symbol: one Charisius had indicated this creed to the Council, and accompanied it with his own few verbal additions to the Nicene Creed; the heretical form was condemned, but not that of the orthodox delator; which certainly must have been the case if the addition to the Nicene symbol of a few explanatory words, however true and orthodox, had been forbidden; hence, if that Council prohibited for the future all fresh expositions of the faith, this was understood to apply to false symbols only; for the Greek Church knew well that it was competent for any part of the Church Catholic to define the rule of faith in its own language, so that in spirit it agreed with the Nicene "norma credendi." Further, it was contended that not all the Greek MSS. contained the words "from heaven," nor "according to the Scriptures;" also that the Latin Church had added the clause "God of God," and had never been challenged on that score by the Greek Church, as they had been with respect to the "Filioque." In the same way, with respect to the Apostles' Creed, the "Descent into Hell" had been inserted from the Aquileian formula. It was then urged by the Latin party that it was useless to waste further time on the question of prescription, but that discussion should be taken on the scriptural merits of the case. If it was a scriptural truth that the Holy Spirit proceedeth from the Father and the Son, then it was a vital point of faith, and the insertion of "Filioque" was a matter of necessity; but if it should be proved to be an unscriptural statement, then that the "Filioque" must of necessity be cancelled. The Greek party, however, preferred to take their stand on technical authority; and as neither side seemed likely to give way, the council might well have been dissolved. In its eighteenth and last session, however, Pope Eugenius IV. proposed that the council should be transferred to Florence, ostensibly from fear of the plague that was approaching Ferrara, but really, as Fleury states [H. E. cvii. 130], because he found the expense of remaining at Ferrara inconvenient; and a sum of money had been offered to him by the Florentines to effect the transfer. The first session was held there February 26, A.D. 1439. Much of the same ground was gone over again, and time was uselessly taken up in the old topic of discussion on the use of ἐκ and διὰ, "from the Father through the Son;" though after a time the scriptural phase of the discussion received attention; and gradually the Greek party, tired out with a discussion of so many months' duration (for two years intervened between their journey from and return to Constantinople, Feb. 1st, 1440), influenced also by the self-interested defection of Bessarion, Metropolitan of Nicæa, who aspired to the cardinalate, gave way, and at length agreed to a joint profession of faith with the Latins, in which it was declared that "the Holy Spirit is eternally from the Father and the Son, and that from all eternity He proceedeth from the one and from the other as from one sole principle, and by one sole production called spiration;" to which were added several other Latinizing clauses. It may be noted, moreover, that the form ran at first "proceedeth from the Father through the Son," but since the Latins refused to sign this formula, "through" was altered into "and," and the document rewritten. Other points of difference were arranged, as regarded the use of the wafer in the celebration of the Eucharist, Purgatory, and the Papal Supremacy. The synodal decree of union with the Greek Church as the crowning act bore date July 6, 1439, Mark, Bishop of Ephesus alone absenting himself and refusing to affix his signature. "Nil ergo egimus" was the Pope's involuntary exclamation when he was told that Mark held back. Afterwards, when reproached by Eugenius, he declared, "I express not my own opinions, I introduce nothing new into the Church, neither do I defend any errors. But I steadfastly preserve the doctrine which the Church, having received it from Christ the Saviour, has ever kept and keeps" [Syropulus, x. 15, 16].

The words of a learned Latin, Ambrosius Traversari, in the papal retinue may be recorded: "While in Florence I was obliged to hear and see things done which made much impression on me who was wholly unused to such doings. In truth, I had rather pass my time with the peasants about our monastery, than with the pillars of the earth, or even with the Pope of Rome." The Emperor, on his return through Venice, wishing to oblige the Doge, who had a desire to hear the Greek Liturgy, could only prevail on the Metropolitan of Heraclea to officiate in the Church of St. Mark, and that with difficulty; but he performed the service on the Greek antimensia and with the Greek altar utensils. The Pope's name was omitted in the prayers, and the creed was read without the "Filioque." Mark alone was received with honour on his return to Constantinople; while his colleagues were branded with the name of Azymites, in allusion to their sanction of the unleavened wafer; as traitors and apostates from their religion. "With the Latins," said Mark in his encyclical letter, "they think the addition made to the creed lawful and just, and, unlike us, will not pronounce it wrong. With them they say that azymes are the Body of Christ, and, unlike us, they dare to communicate on them. Is not this enough to shew that they came to the Latin Council, not to investigate the truth which they once held and then betrayed, but simply to earn gold, and to effect a false and hollow union. False, because they read two creeds as they did before; they celebrate two different liturgies, one on leavened, the other on unleavened bread; two baptisms they have, one by trine immersion, the other by aspersion; one with the holy chrism, the other without it. What sort of union is this?" [Synod. Flor. ii. 369.]

The monks, who ruled the consciences of the people, were especially embittered against those whom they termed renegades. Many who subscribed the act of union subsequently recanted; and when Constantinople was taken by the Turks [May 29, A.D. 1453], the city was lost rather by the action of internal feud, than won by the tactics of the besiegers; while the calamity was declared throughout the East to be a judicial visitation upon the Greek Church for the weak concessions at Constance; the fact was also noted that Whit-Sunday was the precise day on which the city fell a prey to the enemy. [Fleury, H. E.; Basil Popoff, H. Conc. Flor.; Bishop Browne, art. v.; Bingham, art. X. iv. 16; Pearson; Harvey on Creeds, 449.]

FINAL PERSEVERANCE. The Calvinistic tenet that the elect, though they may for a time, yet cannot finally, fall from grace, but will be preserved by Divine power unto salvation. This opinion arises from an exclusive attention to certain passages of Scripture, other portions being ignored or kept out of sight. The passages referred to, if standing alone, might possibly bear a Calvinistic sense, but we elsewhere find from other declarations of Scripture that the supposed meaning must be erroneous. Thus, we might plausibly argue from God's attributes, as His love, faithfulness, and almighty power, and from certain passages in the Gospel of St. John, and in St. Paul's epistles, that the elect will be preserved unto salvation; but our reasonings on the subject are manifestly erroneous when placed side by side with other passages which clearly and expressly intimate, or imply, the possibility of a final fall from grace. A modern Calvinistic writer quotes Ezekiel iii. 20, xviii. 24; Hebrews iii. 6—the passages which an opponent had alleged as implying in their obvious meaning the possibility of a final fall from grace,—and gives the following totally unsatisfactory explanation, "These passages only shew what would be the consequence if the righteous should fall away, but cannot prove that it ever in fact happens!" He ought to have borne in mind that if the case supposed cannot happen the declarations of Scripture are unnecessary and unmeaning. [CALVINISM. ELECTION.]

FIVE POINTS. A name given to the doctrinal controversies between Calvinists and Arminians, which are usually arranged under five heads; a summary of them will be found under ARMINIANISM: and they are fully given in Latin and English in Heylin's Quinquarticular History. ch. v. See also Whitby's Discourse [A.D. 1710], which is usually called "on the five points."

FLENTES. The first or lowest order of penitents were called mourners or weepers, in the Primitive Church. In the strict discipline then exercised they were indeed those who sought to be admitted to the number of actual penitents rather than penitents themselves, the audientes being the first order admitted within the church. The flentes prostrated themselves in the porch, the outer portion of the NARTHEX, or altogether outside the building, before the gate. Here they besought the prayers of the faithful as they entered the church. After a year of such discipline [Greg. Thaumat. can. xi.; Basil, can. xxii.] they were admitted among the class of AUDIENTES.

FOUNDATIONS, ECCLESIASTICAL. The term implies the establishment of a church or monastery, a college, or special services, and also corporations holding lands and endowments whether aggregate, as a dean and chapter; or sole, as a bishop, a dean, each capitular member, a parson, or a vicar. The law of England now permits persons to make a grant of land in favour of any incumbent or benefice, through the medium of the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty or the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who will apply the benefaction; so an incumbent may annex manorial lands to the benefice as glebe; and in old parishes persons may, under certain restrictions, give a certain number of acres of glebe, and lords of manor give an equal quantity of the waste; or a person may give a house of residence, and by a similar procedure endowments or purchase of glebe or of lands for a house may be secured under fixed conditions, notwithstanding the Statute of Mortmain.

The ancient lands and livings of the Church were all given into the hands of God by their just lords and owners; they transferred to His service their whole interest and right by a form of dotation for ever. In place of alms and offerings, which only were possible at first, churches and holy places were hallowed to the honour of His glorious Name, and then houses and lands were given for their perpetual support, the inheritance being the Lord's.

FREE WILL. This subject will be here considered, without referring to metaphysical discussions, solely in its Christian aspect—in refe-renee to the teaching of Holy Scripture and of the Church.

Man, created by God as a reasonable being, has free will, an inherent power to refuse the evil and to choose the good; this inherent power was strengthened by the gift of supernatural grace to our first parents, by which they were enlightened to know and to desire the best and highest gifts of divine grace and knowledge.[1] By the fall of Adam this gift of grace, which strengthened and exalted the will, was lost; the will became weak, imperfect, averse from, or little inclined to, good. Not that free will was altogether lost by the Fall, or that man became, as Calvinistic theologians assert, a helpless mass of sin—a theory contrary to fact and experience. Man, even in his natural state, has often sincere wishes and desires after good, and may do, in a degree, what is pleasing to God; but the will is in a state of imperfection and bondage, as described by St. Paul in the seventh chapter of the Romans, where he says, speaking as in an unregenerate state, "for what I would that do I not, but what I would not that I do." Some of the heathen did works which were pleasing to God, but we cannot doubt that they were done with the assistance of His grace. In more senses than one, God left not Himself without witness before the coming of Christ [Acts xiv. 17]. The Gentile Cornelius, and others in a heathen state, feared God and worked righteousness, and were accepted of Him [Acts x. 35]: Still, we cannot look at heathenism generally without perceiving, not merely the ignorance of mankind as regards the true knowledge of God, and the vain attempts of the wisest philosophers to attain to this knowledge, but also the powerlessness of man's will, his propensity to sin, and inability to escape from the foullest and most degrading wickedness.[2] But when Christ came, the grace of the Holy Ghost was abundantly given; by the gift of regeneration man's will was restored to its original state. The baptized Christian has not only that free will which ever belonged to man as a reasonable creature, but it is strengthened by the gift of the Holy Spirit, and he is thus enabled to avoid sin and to keep God's commandments. We are clearly taught, and it is always implied in the New Testament, that the Christian has free will through the gift of regeneration; our free will, indeed, is the only foundation on which its promises and threatenings can be supposed to rest. [CALVINISM. ELECTION.] In St. Augustine's words, "Without the grace of God, how does He save the world; without free will how does He judge the world."[3] The doctrine of man's free will has always been maintained by the Church; by the early Fathers writing with especial reference to the Gnostic and Manichæan heresies. An ample catena of authorities on the subject is given by Vossius in his history of Pelagianism.[4]

[1] See Bishop Bull's Sermon on the state of Man before the Fall [English Works, 1844].

[2] The awful state of heathenism before the Coming of Christ is fully described by Dr. Döllinger in the Jew and Gentile in the Courts of the Temple of Christ, translated by Darnell [1862].

[3] Si igitur non est Dei gratia, quomodo salvat mundum? et si non est liberum arbitrium quomodo judicat mundum? [Epistola ccxiv. al 46, Valentino Abbati.]

[4] Historiæ Pelagianæ, lib. vii. pars 11, de Arbitrii libertate [1655].

G

GALLICANISM. [Pragmatic Sanction.]

GEMARA. [Talmud.]

GENUFLECTENTES. The third order of penitents in the Primitive Church, who were also called Prostrati and Substrati. The Greek forms of the name were Γονυκλίνοντες and Ὑποπίπτοντές. They ranked above the Audientes, and below the Consistentes. As soon as the Catechumens, including the Competentes, had been dismissed, the deacon's duty was to bid prayers for these penitents, and the earliest form of the prayer used is preserved in the eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions. They then received the benediction of the bishop, and were dismissed before the celebration of the Holy Eucharist began. These prayers are also mentioned in the nineteenth Canon of the Council of Laodicea, and the penitents themselves in the eleventh Canon of Nicæa. After a year of discipline and probation, the Genuflectentes became Consistentes.

GENUINENESS. [Authenticity.]

GLORIA IN EXCELSIS. This ancient Eucharistic hymn, often called "The Angelical Hymn" and "The Great Doxology," is of primitive antiquity. It exists in MS. in the Alexandrine Codex, one of the three earliest MSS. of the Holy Bible, where it forms part of a morning hymn [προσευχὴ ἑωθινή], of which the remainder is the germ of the Te Deum. But it is mentioned in the Apostolical Constitutions [vii. 47], which are probably of still earlier date, and it is also quoted by St. Athanasius in his Treatise on Virginity, with an injunction respecting its use. St. Chrysostom frequently refers to it, and speaks of it as being used by ascetics for their morning hymn. In an early English psalter, going by the name of Athelstan, it is also called a Sunday morning hymn. The last words of Polycarp are too like some in the hymn to be otherwise than a quotation from it adapted to individual use. They are Διὰ τοῦτο καὶ περὶ παντῶν σὲ αἰνῶ, σὲ εὐλογῶ σὲ δοξάζω [Euseb. iv. 15], those of the Alexandrine MS. being Αἰνοῦμεν σέ, εὐλογοῦμέν σέ, δοξολογοῦμεν σέ.

The ancient liturgical commentators attribute the hymn in its present form to Telesphorus, Bishop of Rome [A.D. 128-138], but it does not appear that he did anything more than order its use in the Liturgy. It seems, however, to have been only definitely adopted as an Eucharistic hymn in the time of Symmachus, Bishop of Rome at the beginning of the sixth century. The first words of it are found in the Liturgy of St. James, and this probably represents the earliest usage of Telesphorus. A phrase of it also appears in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom. But it has never been used at the Eucharist in the East except by the Nestorians, being always, as it still is, used by the Eastern Church as part of a morning canticle. Alcuin attributes the composition of the Gloria in Excelsis to St. Hilary of Poictiers [A.D. 350-367], whose name is also associated with the Te Deum. The two hymns are, as has been shewn, part of one in their original form, so that it is not unlikely St. Hilary's work was that of separating the primitive morning hymn of the Church into two portions, the earlier one of which came shortly afterwards to be generally adopted in the Eucharistic Office. In all Western Liturgies of ancient date, except one used at Luxovium, in Gaul, in the seventh century [Palmer, Orig. Liturg. iv. § 23], the Gloria in Excelsis occurs at the beginning of the office. In 1552 it was moved thence to its present position in the English Liturgy [Daniel, Thesaur. Hymnolog.; Bona, Rer. Liturg.].

GLORIA PATRI. The angelic hymns of Isa. vi. 3, and Luke ii. 13, with the baptismal formula of Matt. xxviii. 19, were very likely to have moulded the thoughts of the early Christians into the form of adoration which we find in the Gloria Patri or "Little Doxology." Such a form is indicated as early as A.D. 167, in the last words of Polycarp, δι' οὗ σοι σὺν αὐτῷ ἐν Πνεύματι Ἁγίῳ δόξα καὶ νῦν καὶ εἰς τοὺς μελλοντας αἰῶνας, ἀμήν [Act. Polyc. xiv.; Euseb. iv. 15], and also in Justin Martyr about the same date. A few years later it is found in the prayer at the end of St. Clement's Pædagogus, Αἰνοῦντες τῷ μόνῳ Πατρὶ καὶ Υἱῷ καὶ τῷ Ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι [Clem. Alex. Pædag. iii. ad fin.], and also in a hymn of about the same date, ὑμνοῦμεν Πατέρα καὶ Υἱὸν καὶ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα Θεοῦ [Routh, Reliq. Sac. iii. 299]. Aëtius is said to have altered the received formula into "by the Son, in the Holy Spirit," words which can be used in an orthodox sense, as they were by St. Leo [Serm. i. de Nativit.], but which were intended by the Arians as an evasion of the direct recognition of our Lord's divinity contained in the orthodox form.

The use of the Gloria Patri in the Divine Service can be traced back as far as the Council of Vaison [can. vi.], which was presided over by Cæsarius of Arles [A.D. 529], and its present position, after the Domine ad adjuvandum, is recognised by the Rule of St. Benedict a few years later. It is found in the oldest offices of the Eastern and Western Churches (though the second clause is used in the East in a rather shorter form, "now and ever, world without end"). It has been used (it need hardly be added) in the Church of England from time immemorial.

The dogmatic form of the Gloria Patri gives it the character of a condensed creed, and a very ancient practice of the Church of England, that of turning towards the altar each time that it is sung, still maintains its hold on some churches, as in the Cathedral of Manchester. This custom is ordered in the Sarum Consuetudinary. An inclination of the head, as in the Creed, is also ordered by an early canon [Wilkins, Conc. iii. 20], and is mentioned in the Mirror of our Lady, printed in 1530.

GLORY. This term has a twofold meaning in Scripture; one sensible and material, the other intellectual and spiritual. [1.] It means that outward brightness cognizable by the sense of sight, whereby it pleased God of old to give a sign of His more immediate presence. [2.] It signifies also the will of God, the deep spring of which is love.

[1.] When Moses was sent as a deliverer to the people of Israel, his attention was first arrested by the bush that burned with fire and was not consumed. It was his preparation for the more dazzling glory that should be revealed to him. A correlative idea also may be noted; for as clouds are associated with the idea of sunlight, and take from it their gorgeous hue; and as the brightest fire throws up smoke, so both of these were accessories of the visible glory of the Lord. When the law was about to be delivered "Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire; and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly" [Exod. xix. 18], which smoke was typified by the incense of the temple worship; so in Isaiah's vision the "world was full of the glory of the Lord," but the temple also "was full of smoke" [Isa. vi. 3, 4; see 1 Kings viii. 10, 11]. Wherever the glory of the Lord appeared to the congregation it was accompanied by a darker nimbus [Exod. xvi. 10, xxiv. 15, 18; Numb. xvi. 42]. The glory of the Lord that followed in the rear of Israel's march, and gave light by night to them, was as a cloud of thick darkness to the Egyptians [Exod. xiv. 20], and a cloud of glory resting on the tabernacle marshalled the daily pilgrimage of Israel through the desert [Exod. xl. 34]. The cloud symbolized the judgment of God upon evil-doers; while the light of God's favour shining upon the righteous was their earnest of a future reward. Daniel beheld in his vision one "like the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven" [Dan. vii. 13], and our Lord declared that thus He should come "in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory" [Matt. xxiv. 30]; and St. John, "Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him" [Rev. i. 7]. It is in both meanings of the word, spiritual and material, that the firmament glowing with stars is said to declare the glory of God; for the heavens are an abiding evidence of the might and majesty of God, and of the omnipotence of His will who said "let there be light, and there was light." Lastly, as the Bath Col, or voice from heaven, ushered in the day of Christ, and angels sung their "Gloria in excelsis," so it was accompanied as of old by a sensible evidence of the present Deity, and "the glory of the Lord shone round about" the shepherds of Bethlehem [Luke ii. 9]. In such passages as these δόξα stands in the same relation to δοκεῖν as our word "sheen" does to its German root "scheinen," to appear. Plotinus, identifying the term with "impulse" as the correlative of φαντασία, derives it from δέχομαι [Enn. V. v. 1]; but δοκεῖν is the received etymon.

[2.] Next, the more spiritual import of the term is best traced out from the Hebrew "cabod," glory. Various organs and component elements of the human frame were supposed by Hebrew anatomists to be the local habitat of the animal soul and of moral qualities. Thus the blood was the life; the lungs were the seat of the breath of life, the soul; the conscience was localized in the reins; the nobler affections in the heart; pity and compassion in the mesentery; and in the same way the similarity of "cabod," glory, and "cabed," the liver [see Gesenius], indicates that as in Latin the choleric principle was associated with this organ, so in Hebrew the whole moral character of man derives its force from the hepatic region. Now the moral character of man is the aggregate result of moral qualities that move the will. Virtue, honour, truth, &c., are negative qualities until volition is exercised upon them. To will and act as a free agent under the direction of a higher law than impulse is the glory of man. To will and act as moved by the love that is His very Being is the glory of the Eternal; as the glory of man, made after the similitude of the All-Perfect, consists in volition quickened by the love of God and man. Hence the soul endowed with free will and independent action came to be designated as man's "glory" [Psa. xvi. 9, xxx. 12, lvii. 9, cviii. 1]; "Unto their assembly, my glory, be not thou united" [Gen. xlix. 6]. Hence also since we exercise volition upon that which seems good to our reflective powers, the term δόξα, as derived from δοκεῖν, is the LXX. translation of "cabod." In this primary sense the prophet said of Him who sought not His own will [John v. 30], "he shall not judge, κατὰ τὴν δόξαν, according to his own determination" ["non judicabit secundum gloriam," Iren. III. ix. 3, Massuet.]. Those whose will is law from their worldly position, are δόξαι, "dignities" [2 Pet. ii. 10; Jude 8], and the angels are the "spear-armed δόξαι that stand about the throne of God" [Philo, de Monarch. ii. 218, Oxf.]. The idea therefore of free and uncontrolled will seems to underlie the meaning of δόξα, and will help to clear the sense in many passages of the Greek Testament. When our Lord said, "I have glorified Thee upon earth," He shews that He means the complete performance of the Father's will, by the words added, "I have finished the work that Thou gavest Me to do" [John xvii. 4]. "Glorify Me with Thine own self with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was" [ib. 5], are words that mark the ὁμονοία of the Father and the Son. "The glory which Thou gavest Me I have given them; that they may be one as We are One: I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be perfect in one" [ib. 22, 23]; the term again indicates unity of will and spiritual communion with the Father and the Son. The very nucleus of that glory is love: "That the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them, and I in them" [ib. 26]. Thus the last words of prayer that are recorded of our Lord lead us back to the conclusion that the determinate will of God, based in love, is that glory in which He has had subsistence from everlasting, and to which we hope to be admitted hereafter, when our wayward will shall be made one with the will of the Absolute.

We thus gain an idea of the term that is eminently practical. The King of Kings and Lord of Lords is neither made more glorious by our praise nor dishonoured by our rebellion. But in some degree the light of His glory may be reflected in the heart and conduct of His people, and so far they are said to "glorify" Him, to "live to His glory," and to be "to the praise of His glory." "Ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God;" do your Master's work. And in proportion as that work is done, and the will of man is assimilated to the will of God, it becomes free: "if the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed" [John viii. 36]. The converse also is true, and man's natural condition is to sin and "come short of the glory of God;" and in the same proportion he loses his freedom and becomes the slave of sin [ib. 34]. To act then according to the will of God, is to glorify Him: "Herein is My Father glorified, that ye bring forth much fruit" [John xv. 8]; and as the glory of God is reflected in the regenerate will and affections, the believer is said by the Apostle to be "changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord" [2 Cor. iii. 18. Elohim. Jehovah. Theism].

GNOSTICISM represents a fusion of the intellectual and religious systems of the East and West, in which, however, the Eastern element considerably predominated. The philosophy of Greece in its first principles had been derived from foreign, and principally Eastern sources. After a time it came in contact once more with Oriental theosophy at Alexandria. Here Neo-Platonism revived old philosophic veins of thought, and Gnosticism was constructed from Oriental theories that are not yet lost among the Parsees of India. Neo-Platonic teaching remained comparatively unaffected by external systems of thought, and did essential service to the cause of Christian truth by its antagonism to Gnostic teaching. Augustine says, "nulli nobis quam ipsi propius accesserunt."[1] But Gnosticism, with an ecleetic expansiveness, embodied Platonic as well as other notions with its Magian tenets, and touched, at various points, Egyptian, Phœnician, and Buddhist religious opinion, as well as Alexandrian, Platonic, and Cabbalistic lore. The clash of these two main systems renewed ancient feuds at Alexandria between East and West, that eventually became merged in the Catholic teaching of Christianity. This thriving centre of commerce received the subtle disputatations of the Greek schools with its Macedonian colonists from its foundation. Eastern adventurers, linking their fortunes with those of the rising city, introduced, as new modes of thought, theories that had long been current in the East, and had a religious rather than a philosophical character for their base. The Isiacal mysteries of Egypt, from whence Greece had borrowed her mythology, formed a third element; and by the joint action of these three main lines of thought, the philosophy of the Museum, as well as the social character of Alexandria, became thoroughly eosmopolitan.[2] The fusion ensued which is known as Eclecticism. Antiochus had already blended together the Academic and Stoic principles; Strabo the Geographer had united the latter with the Peripatetic method; Sotion the younger had combined the ancient theories of Pythagoras with Stoicism; and Ammonius, of the Academy, had brought together the rival teaching of Plato and Aristotle. Potamon, by a bolder generalization, built up his system on an eclectic adaptation of all. But a wider application of the same principle soon followed; the teaching of the East was incorporated with that of the West. The Magianism of Chaldæa and Persia, the arcana of Egyptian hierophants and the Cabbala,[3] derived originally from Babylon, but largely alloyed with peculiar misapplications of Pythagorean and Platonic notions, were all thrown into the crucible, and formed the mixed metal that afterwards ran out into Gnostic moulds. The Neo-Platonist and the Gnostic each laid claim to the prescription of antiquity, and applied unconsciously many fundamental principles which the other adopted. Both were partly of a common stock. For Zoroastrian theories reached Egypt, from whence Plato had them; while Platonic notions were admitted by the Gnostic, and materially assisted him in building up his system and winning acceptance for it. Thus Plotinus charges Gnosticism with having borrowed from The Master the ideas of a First Monad, of Substance, Nûs, the Demiurge, the Mundane Soul, its πάθος, the soul's withdrawal from earthly matters and absorption in heavenly contemplation.[4] This writer, in his second Ennead, and in his own obscure way, attacks the Gnostic, and throws valuable light on the statements of Irenæus, Hippolytus, Tertullian, and other anti-Gnostic Christian writers, while he brings the [1] Civ. Dei, viii. 5, sec. 1.

[2] Philo Judæus is a well-known instance of the syncretic teaching that blossomed so vigorously at Alexandria.

[3] See Ophites ap. Iren. I. xxvii. Cambr. ed.

[4] Enn. ii. 9.

whole force of an unsparing invective to bear upon the object of his scorn. We recognise in this book the following points:—the lapse of the spiritual principle;[1] the origin of matter and its reduction into order by an overflow of Light from above;[2] the origin of evil, and will it be wholly cast out from the future habitation of the blessed?[3] But the creation of the world, he says, and its orderly government, is no work of an ideal emanation, it is the offspring of Supreme Wisdom and Benevolence.[4] Plotinus adds his view of evil, that it is only a lower round in a series of steps from the lowest to the highest good;[5] and with respect to the apparently uneven distribution of riches and poverty, good and bad fortune, they are words without meaning for the wise,[6] who receive either the one lot or the other with equanimity. He then attacks Gnosticism on the moral side, and accuses it of teaching indifference to the moral quality of actions, and of encouraging an Epicurean indulgence of sense.[7] It never speaks out, he says, about virtue and goodness, but boasts of its contemplation of the Deity, leaving unchecked such ill principles as love of the world, hatred, malice, &c.[8] Pretension to supernatural power and healing of the sick are a mere contemptible juggle.[9]

The term γνωστικὸς is a translation of the Oriental equivalent for φιλόσοφος, عالم âlim, and as such is a fit exponent of the fusion of the systems of the East and of the West. It may be compared with the Hebrew and Chaldaic יְדָעוֹנִי[10] The term seems to have subsisted long at Alexandria as a word mediæ significationis; Clement of Alexandria throughout his Stromata speaks of the thoroughly informed Christian as a true Gnostic.[11] But, in general, it designates the heretic who arrogated to himself peculiar means of knowing God from which the rest of the world were cut off. The union of the spiritual principle in man with Divine Substance was the γνῶσις which he claimed as his privilege, representing that contemplative abstraction and ecstatic union with the Divine Principle which has always been the aim of the Eastern devotee, and which formed a marked feature also in the peculiarities of the Neo-Platonic school. But beside this assumption of a higher spiritual development, it meant also a spiritual appreciation of allegory which could only be known to the initiated. Baur produces[12] several instances of this use of the word from the Epistle of Barnabas. The Ophites first adopted the name Gnostic, their notions involving every shade of allegory, and mysticism in its wildest mood. The Ophite hymn preserved by Hippolytus assigns to γνῶσις this mystical sense—

> καὶ τὰ κεκρυμμένα τῆς ἁγίας ὁδοῦ > γνῶσιν καλέσας παραδώσω.[14]

[1] Enn. ii. 4. [2] Ibid. 10. [3] Ibid. 5.
[4] Ibid. 11, 12, [5] Ibid. 13. [6] Ibid. 9.
[7] Ibid. 15. [8] Ibid. 15, 16. [9] Ibid. 14.
[10] The Persian ﻣﻐ, μέγας, corresponds with the Rabbinical רב. [11] Clem. Alex. Strom. v.
[12] Christliche Gnosis, p. 87 ff.
[13] Hippolyt. Philos. v. μετα δὲ ταῦτα ἐκάλεσαν ἑαυτοὺς γνωστικούς, φάσκοντες μόνοι τὰ βάθη γινωσκειν. [14] Ibid.

The word γνῶσις used by St. Paul, and more frequently ἐπίγνωσις, denotes a spiritual perception of evangelic truth, in all the earlier epistles; afterwards, as Paul the aged, he had observed the first rising of the cloud "no bigger than a man's hand" that was soon to spread itself over the whole sky; and he warns Timothy against the babblings and oppositions—τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως.[15] Irenæus makes this expression the text of his work in refutation of Gnosticism in all its phases. Clement of Rome uses the word in its good sense, when he says, in terms of praise of the Corinthian Church, "Who hath not commended your perfect and sure knowledge;"[16] and Ignatius: "Why are ye not all wise who have received the knowledge of God, which is Christ Jesus."[17] In heresiology γνῶσις embodies a complex idea, as being derived from a threefold source, and the systems that it represents have been referred by writers either to Greek philosophy,[18] Oriental mysticism, or Judaism. Mosheim has treated Gnosticism as almost exclusively of Oriental growth. Neander divides it into two families that are respectively Jewish and anti-Jewish; Simon Magus, who first engrafted a Christology on the Gnostic system, being referred to the minor eclectic communities. But, since Neander wrote, the discovery of the Philosophumena of Hippolytus has given invaluable aid towards the classification and arrangement of the Protean forms of Gnosticism. This writer gives long passages of Simon's rhapsodies,[19] and places him at the head and front of the movement. Matter traces out certain Gnostic schools, which he names according to their locality, Syrian, Egyptian, Asiatic. In the following observations the heresy will be treated as either Alexandrian or Syrian.

To make the reception of such gross perversions of truth possible it was given out that the system had been revealed to the Apostles, and reserved by them as esoteric doctrine only to be communicated to those who should be found worthy as being of the spiritual seed. Yet even so the Apostles only had a half knowledge of it, being unable to discriminate between what our Lord said and did as an Æon of the Pleroma, and what as man affected with the attributes of matter. The Parables of our Lord were treated with especial veneration; the free interpretation that they admitted rendering them easily susceptible of an heretical meaning. "Babblings," that to the Oriental mind may have been wisdom, trickery to deceive the ignorant, and riddles that never could have become knowledge, make up the substance of Gnosticism. That such a system should have applied any part of the Christian revelation [15] 1 Tim. vi. 20.

[16] Clem. ad Cor., i.c.: τὴν τελείαν καὶ ἀσφαλῆ γνῶσιν.
[17] Ign. ad Eph. 17: τὴν γνῶσιν τοῦ θεοῦ, ὅ ἐστιν Ἰησοῦς Χριστός.
[18] Hæreses a philosophia subornantur ipsæ. Tertul. Præscr. 7. Philosophi Patriarchæ hæreticorum. c. Hermog. 8, de An. 3. Hippolytus takes very much the same view, tracing Gnostic notions back to the Timæus of Plato as the fountain-head.
[19] Hippolyt. Philosophum. vi. 18. See also the introduction to the Cambr. ed. of Irenæus, p. lxvi.

Gnosticism

only shews the headway made by the Gospel, in that it was able to attract to itself the elements of humanity however discordant, and form circles of attraction however wide in extent. The problem that the Gnostic teacher professed to solve was this. How is the creation of matter, inherently evil, to be accounted for without compromising the Majesty of the Supreme? A separation of good and evil, the final cause of all that has been done for man, a matter also of Parsee belief, was a prominent feature in the Gnostic theory. The Gnostic notion of creation, evil, and redemption, may be thus briefly traced. One Supreme Being existed from all eternity in pro-cosmic silence, having within his own Intelligence the Pleroma of Æons,[1] afterwards to be evolved, as self-consciousness is inseparable from mind.[2] Love[3] was the impulsive principle whereby the "only begotten" Nûs was evolved,[4] and Gnosis was the substance of this first development. There was inseparable also from each successive emanation an ἐνθύμησις, or "intentio animi," whereby every Æon desired a knowledge of Bythus. This Enthymesis was intensified as Gnosis waned, the two moving in inverse ratio. Thus a point was at length gained when Gnosis was at its minimum, and Enthymesis at its maximum, of energy; this point was ὅρος, the boundary of the Pleroma, which the Æon Sophia transgressed in her desire to attain a knowledge of Bythus. This stray light from the Pleroma was causative, first of all inferior spiritual bstance, and eventually of matter, into which principle of intelligence and plastic life. It was in this way that the Alexandrian Gnostic accounted for the creation of matter, which per se was an inert mass without life or energy, such as Plato has described it, but it was not eternal, as he held it to be; the Syrian Gnostic, following the Oriental theory, declared that was eternally the resi of evil (Ahriman). In either point of view it was the dead limit of Divine development. Lubes,[5] an abortive emanation evolved beyond the Pleroma, was the origin of Demiurge, whose mission was to bring into order the hylic mass, and form it, unconsciously to himself, according to the supreme ideas of Bythus. Evil spirits of every grade came to life by his energy from the unmixed principle of evil that he found ready to his hand. But good and evil were variously combined in human souls, which are classed as spiritual, psychic, and carnal. A world so formed was too corrupt for Bythus to govern. Therefore Demiurge was its ruler, and gave to it the Jewish law, whereby it was destined that the ἀποκατάστασις, or restoration of all things, should be worked out. The Syrian differed only so far from the Alexandrian scheme as it made Demiurge an enemy of Bythus, Σοφία; his aim being to detain the stray principle of light, by entangling it in the world of matter. The Law also was his creation, devised for the purpose of enslaving man, but it served in no way for the preparation of any final denouement. The Gnostic, whether of Alexandria or Syria, had his theory of redemption, the effect of which should be a final separation of good from bad, and a liberation of the stray Pleroma principle from its implication with matter. Redemption was from Bythus, who in due course sent an Æon from the Pleroma, variously termed Soter, or Jesus, or Christ. All sects did not allow him to be of the principal Æons, but all denied that he was truly man. His was a twofold nature. There was the being formed of matter that descended in human form into Jordan and was baptized; and there was the heavenly Æon that alighted upon Jesus, and enabled Him to work miracles, but eventually left Him to expire on the cross. The Syrian Gnosis differed in taking an entirely Docetic view of the human nature of Christ. The body of Christ was formed of ideal matter, wholly spectral and unreal. [Docetæ.] The Passion of Christ, whether real or apparent, was brought about by Demiurge hoping that the souls of men, without redemption, might be retained as his vassals. The Passion had no expiatory or restorative power. The whole work of redemption consisted in the purification of the spiritual seed, and in making psychic natures, i.e. Catholic Christians, capable of salvation through γνῶσις. Of the hylic there was no hope, they were foredoomed to destruction, reprobate beyond the possibility of recovery. The Resurrection was denied, or was declared "to be past already." The Æon Christ had done with the crucified body, and man in his bodily nature could not possibly become a denizen of the world of spirits. At the end of all things the seed of the Pleroma should be reabsorbed into realms of light, and matter should relapse into Chaos, or the Brahminical nullity, Nirvána. The doctrine of grace was ignored,[6] where each Gnostic was so true to the spiritual seed as to be free from all fear of lapse. Sacramental life also was an unknown principle, while the juggling deceits connected with the celebration made Gnosticism especially hateful to the Church.[7] With respect to the moral results of such teaching, a difference is observable between the Alexandrian and Syrian systems. In the first, Demiurge was the representative of Bythus; as such his law was treated with something like respect, and the bodily appetites kept under by a certain degree of moral discipline. Marriage being a highly honourable estate among the Jews, was not rejected; it was also the earthly counterpart of the συζυγίαι of the Pleroma. But the Syrian Gnostic flew to wilder extremes. Here the notion that matter was the matrix of evil drove the more spiritual-minded into asceticism, such as the sect of the Encratites, [1] Æons as existing eternally in Bythus; for which the Syriac equivalent is ܐܝܬܘܬܐ, entity.

[2] In the more ancient Persian theosophy there was One Supreme Being antecedently to Ormuzd and Ahriman. Introd. to Iren. Cambr. ed. p. xiii.

[3] τὸ δὲ τῆς ἀγαπῆς πνεῦμα κέκραται τῷ τῆς γνώσεως, ἀγαπὴ γὰρ ἦν ὅλος. κ.τ.λ. Hippol. Phil. vi. 29; Iren. i. 2; Didase. Or. 7.

[4] ὁ μὲν μείνας μονογενὴς υἱὸς . . . τὴν ενθύμησιν διὰ τῆς γνώσεως ἐξηγεῖται τοῖς αἰῶσιν. Diadasc. Or. sec. 7.

[5] ἐκτρῶμα, 1 Cor. xv. 8.

[6] The term, however, had a part assigned to it in the Marcosian imposture. Iren. I. vii. 2, Cambr. ed.

[7] Iren. I. vii.

who forbad to marry, while others of grosser staple gave themselves up to an unbridled licentiousness, and, flinging aside all restraint of law, were known as Antinomians and Antitacti.[1] The Demiurge having only given law for the purpose of holding the spirit of man under bondage, any mode of shewing contempt for it, however gross, was declared to be free from sin. In times of persecution Gnostics held that it was not required of them to suffer martyrdom rather than sacrifice at the altars of Paganism; they were of the true seed, and should be gathered again into the Pleroma, and no act of impiety could disqualify them for their inheritance. And this had a fatal influence on the Church. The vicious Gnostic principle excited hatred in the philosophic heathen. In their contempt for both they cared not to distinguish between the true Christian and the counterfeit; hence the Church was often made to suffer for the ravings of heresy. Gnosticism, vigorously opposed by the Church, had a mortal enemy in the Neo-Platonic School of Alexandria.[2] It flourished throughout the second century; but combated in front by the Church, and taken in flank by the severe logic of the schools, it was already in a state of disintegration when Manichæan notions arose and finally superseded it. Absurd and irrational as the system of Gnosticism may have been, it was not without its use. In Greece and Rome polytheism was upheld as the religion of the body politic, but the Eastern mind recoiled with a hearty abhorrence from polytheism. Philosophy gained a religious element, so far as it was connected with theosophy. As in these wild strayings of the human intellect it is more pleasing to trace the faintest glimmering of reason than to treat them as one unmeaning blank; so there is some satisfaction in the thought that the sudden eradication of these weeds might have endangered the existence of the true seed, over which they had been scattered broadcast. They were sown by the malice of the enemy, but when once sown there was less danger in their toleration than in their precipitate removal. We have to thank this heresy for many valuable writings against them by the earlier Fathers, in which the faith and practice of primitive times have been described with a clearness that, so far as it reaches, leaves little to be desired. The evil has been ephemeral, its antidote is a κτῆμα εἰς ἀεί. [Irenæus, Hær. with the introduction to the Cambridge ed., also the prelim. dissert. in Massuet's ed.; Hippolyti Philosophumena, ed. Miller; Neander, Genet. Entwick.; Matter, H. Critique; Baur, Christliche Gnosis; Herzog's Realencycl. and Kirchen Lexicon, v. Gnosis.]

GOD. [ELOHIM. JEHOVAH. THEISM, &c.]

GOSPELS. Every reader must have noticed the striking relation which subsists among the first three Gospels,—not merely the similarity, but the exact repetition of certain passages. Forty-two sections are common to all three; in addition to which there are twelve sections common to St. Matthew and St. Mark; five to St. Mark and St. Luke; and fourteen to St. Luke and St. Matthew. This fact has been noticed from an early period;[3] and to account for it three principal hypotheses have been proposed in modern times. [1.] That there was an original document (or documents) of which the Evangelists in common made use. This common original was composed in Greek, according to Le Clerc; in Syriac or Chaldaic, according to Lessing; in "Aramaic" (of which there were three particular recensions), according to Eichhorn—an hypothesis adopted with still further complications by Bishop Marsh. [2.] That each Evangelist was acquainted with, and made use of, the Gospel or Gospels which had been written earlier than his own. So Townson and Hug. [3.] The third hypothesis has been suggested by the historian Gieseler; and this hypothesis has prepared the way for the development of the mythical theory by the hand of Strauss. Gieseler maintains that for several years after our Lord's death the Apostles lived together at Jerusalem. The acts and words of Jesus naturally formed the constant subject of their conversation; and thus, as they mutually aided each other's reminiscences, events and doctrines became fixed in their memory. Hence a permanent type of oral teaching, diversified by the private recollection of each Apostle; and from this traditional source, the Gospels, in process of time, were reduced to their present written form.[4] It is unnecessary, perhaps, to add that these speculations are entirely hypothetical.[5] The essential point of difference between the first three or synoptic Gospels and the fourth, consists in this, that St. John had in view the opponents of pure Christianity within the Church, while the synoptical writers addressed themselves either to Jews or to Gentiles. St. Matthew, as his entire Gospel shews, seeks to establish the identity of the New Testament revelation with that of the Old; St. Mark's object is to exhibit the facts of Christianity in opposition to the superstitions of the heathen; St. Luke, if we keep in view what is related in the Acts of the Apostles, plainly desires to trace how the Gospel advanced from Jerusalem to Rome; St. John, as his theme required, supplies the supplement and confirmation of what had been previously written by the other three. Eusebius, in his chapter "On the order of the Gospels" [H. E. iii. 24], ratifies the concurrent voice of earlier history,[6]

[1] "Oppositionists."

[2] The second of the Enneads of Plotinus, πρὸς τοὺς γνωστικούς, though very obscure, is highly interesting as exhibiting Gnosticism from the philosophic point of view.

[3] See art. on CANONS of Eusebius. St. Augustine writes:—"Marcus eum [scil. Matthæum] subsecutus tanquam pedissequus, et breviator ejus videtur. Cum solo quippe Joanne nihil dixit; solus ipse perpauca; cum solo Luca pauciora; cum Matthæo vero plurima; et multa pene totidem atque ipsis verbis." De Cons. Ev. i. 2.

[4] "Ueber die Entstehung der schriftl. Evangelien." Leipzig, 1818.

[5] For a further statement, see Lee on Inspiration. App. O.

[6] Muratori's Fragment [ap. Routh, Rel. Sacr. i. p. 394]; Victorinus [ap. Routh, ib. p. 408]; Clemens Alex. [ap. Euseb., H. E. vi. 14]. St. Jerome thus sums up the earlier authorities: "Joannes Apostolus novissimus omnium scripsit Evangelium . . . adversus Cerinthum aliosque which is to the effect that St. John's narrative was the last in point of time, and that he gave his testimony to the truth of what had been previously written. The result of Tischendorf's investigation in his tract, "Wann wurden unsere Evangelien verfasst?" is that the beginning of what he calls "the Evangelical Canon" must be placed "about the end of the first century" [sec. 67]. That the books composing this "Canon" were neither more nor less than four, is one of the facts most clearly established by ancient testimony. Thus, two writers about the middle of the second century [circ. A.D. 160]—Theophilus of Antioch and Tatian—set themselves expressly to harmonize the writings of the four Evangelists. We are told of the nature of the treatise of Theophilus by St. Jerome;[1] and the title of Tatian's treatise, Diatessaron—i.e. "the Gospel formed out of four"—of itself explains his object. The fact that such works were written soon after the middle of the second century proves that the recognition and use of all four Gospels was established long before that date. The heretics objected that the Church claimed four gospels, while the Apostles taught but one;[2] hence the Fathers are at great pains to shew that their Gospel is always one; presented, nevertheless, under four forms, handed down by four witnesses, divided into four books. St. Irenæus illustrates by the four forms which made up the cherubim [Ezek. i. 10; Rev. iv. 7] this fact of the "quadriforme (τετράμορφον) Evangelium" [Adv. Hær. iii. 11]; St. Cyprian compares the four rivers which encircled Paradise [Ep. 73]; St. Jerome styles the four Evangelists "quadriga Domini, et verum Cherubim" [Ep. 53, Ad Paulinum]. As none but our four Gospels even claim to form part of the Canon of the New Testament, the proof adducible in support of the authenticity of any one is thus indirectly a proof of the authenticity of each of the other three. [CANON.]

GRACE. This term means, in strict propriety, a supernatural gift of God freely bestowed upon man for the merits of Christ. But it is also used in a much wider sense.

First, it includes that original goodness and favour by which God inclines to fallen man; with the consequent steps which in the counsels of God were necessary for man's salvation. God's first will is that all men shall be saved; His second will, that this salvation shall be through His Son. Here is, therefore, the Grace of the Father, His first love and the gift of His Son: the Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, though He was rich, yet for our sakes became poor: and the Grace of the Holy Spirit, through whose overshadowing the Son was conceived and born into the world. This is the Grace of God's undeserved favour.

Secondly, the term Grace includes the revelation of this mystery, the declaring to man the Word of life. Christ, Himself the Word, was the first preacher of the Word. The Holy Spirit speaks by the prophets. And to the Church is committed by the Son, with the agency of the Holy Spirit, the ministry of the Word and Sacraments. This is the Grace of outward instruction.

Thirdly, the term Grace includes that supernatural gift to man whereby he is enabled to embrace the salvation provided and offered, whereby the sufferings and merits of Christ, which are sufficient for the salvation of the whole world, are made available and effectual to the salvation of the faithful. And this is nothing else than the working of the Holy Spirit on the hearts of men. This is the Grace of inward sanctification.

The first is the well-spring of all good: the second, the appointed instrument of good: the third, that which gives effect to the instrument.

Under the first arises the question, If God would have all men to be saved, and if Christ died for all men, why is it that all are not saved? God's principal desire and will touching man's happiness is not always satisfied. The whole history of mankind, the whole narrative of the Bible, is but a long example of God's designs of mercy thwarted by man's negligence, perverseness, and sin. Our Lord's words when He wept over Jerusalem suggest the only answer which can be given. "It is on all sides confessed that His will in this kind oftentimes succeedeth not, the cause whereof is a personal impediment making particular men incapable of that good which the will of His general providence did ordain for all mankind." [Hooker, Append. b. v., Keble's ed. ii. p. 726.]

A second question arises, What has God's grace effected for mankind irrespective of the revelation of the mystery? The answer is that Christ is the Saviour of all men, though especially of them that believe [1 Tim. v. 10]. He has rendered all men salvabiles, capable of salvation; and salvandos, designed to salvation. He has redeemed all mankind. [See Barrow, Sermons on Universal Redemption.] With regard to those who have not the Gospel, the law of nature written in men's hearts, the dictates of reason, the secret whisper of grace and checks of conscience, the ordinary works of creation, the continual expression of Divine beneficence—by these men may seek God, if haply they may feel after Him and find Him. [Acts xvii. 27.] And these are by the grace of God, by the working of the Spirit, in virtue of the Incarnation, no less than the grace of the Gospel. The Spirit strives with all men, and from the first there has been no influence of the Spirit, except in virtue of Christ's mediation.

A third question occurs, Is the revelation of the Gospel an external instruction merely, or is it accompanied by a supernatural work on the heart of the hearer? To this the answer is found in our Lord's words, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me." "As often as ye eat this Bread . . ye do shew forth the Lord's death." The Spirit "when He is come will hæreticos . . . sed et aliam causam hujus scripturæ ferunt. Quod cum legisset Matthæi, Marci, et Lucæ volumina, probaverit quidem textum historiæ, et vera eos dixisse firmaverit," &c. De Vir. Ill. ix.

[1] "Theophilus . . qui quatuor Evangelistarum in unum opus dicta compingens," &c. Epist. 151, ad Algas.

[2] See the words of the Marcionite in the "Dialogus de recta fide," ap. Origen., Opp. i. p. 807.

convince the world of sin," &c. Hence, with an adequate proposal of the Gospel by the Word and Sacraments, there is always exerted upon the hearts of men the great power of the Gospel, the death of Christ, through the influence of the Spirit. Consequently, from this and from the answer to the preceding question, it follows, that, practically, there never has occurred and never can occur the case contemplated in Question 4. Has man power by his own natural strength to turn to God? The case cannot occur, for the influence of the Spirit spoken of in Questions 2 and 3 must be held sufficient for its purpose, that of enabling those to turn to God who are not bent on resisting the supernatural work. The answer is based upon such Scriptures as John vi. 44, 65; Phil. ii. 13; and upon the doctrine of Scripture regarding our original corruption [John viii. 34; Rom. viii. 21; Eph. ii. 1; Col. ii. 13]: all such language shewing the helplessness of the unregenerate man. [1 Cor. ii. 14; comp. Rom. viii. 5-7.]

Regarding this question, Hooker distinguishes between the aptness and ableness of the will: the aptness, freely to take or refuse things set before it, which is so essential to the will, that being deprived of this, it loses the nature and cannot possibly retain the definition of will—and the ableness, which actuates the possibility of the will in that which is good. This ableness has been lost. If we had kept our first ableness, we should not need grace; had aptness been also lost, grace could work in us no more than it does in brute creatures. Freedom of operation we have by nature, but the ability of virtuous operation by grace. [Hooker's Works, Keble, ii. p. 683. FREE-WILL.]

All those, then, to whom the Gospel is adequately proposed are called by God's grace. Many are called: but the grace is not irresistible, and few are chosen.

Hence, again, it may be asked, Is there in those who do obey a more energetic action of God's grace than in those who do not obey? Is there a discriminative calling of some above others, an effectual calling of some not addressed to others? To which it may be answered, That a variety in the measures of outward grace is evident; but there is no proof in Holy Scripture that any difference is made by the Holy Spirit between any two men who are alike subjected to the same measure of outward grace. They who assert that there is such a difference are led to the assertion as an inference from the doctrine of election and predestination. We are not to draw inferences from that doctrine, as if it were within our comprehension, and could possibly be made one of the premisses of a syllogism. The Scriptures, which speak of the calling of the elect, do not deny the calling of others. Rom. viii. 29, 30 asserts that the elect, whosoever and wheresoever they are, in due time are called. It does not assert the superiority of the call which is obeyed over that call [Matt. xx. 16] which is not obeyed. It implies the further grace given to those who obey the first call. That further grace would have been given to all had all alike been obedient.

And thus we arrive at head III. of our original division, the grace of inward sanctification, working in those who are foreknown, predestinated, and called.

Does this Grace of God work in the elect, or with them? Does it require a concurrent action of man's will? The tenth Article of Religion is express upon the point; "preventing us that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will." The Article originally said "working in us," and so the words stand in the Parker MS. Our present wording is based on those Scriptures which, while they speak of God's working in us, require at the same time the work of man. So in Phil. ii. 12, 13, the precept for man's working is given first, and then as a stimulus to and the corrective of the precept, the working of God. Work, for God works with you, and both the will and the work are God's [2 Pet. i. 10; Heb. xii. 15; 1 John iii. 24]. And all the varied precepts of Scripture given to those who have received the grace of God, shew the same; that we are to work, because God worketh in us. "For let the Spirit be never so prompt, if labour and exercise slacken, we fail. The fruits of the Spirit do not follow men, as the shadow doth the body, of their own accord. If the grace of sanctification did so work, what should the grace of exhortation need? It were even as superfluous and vain to stir men up unto good, as to request them when they walk abroad not to lose their shadows. Grace is not given us to abandon labour, but labour required lest our sluggishness should make the grace of God unprofitable" [Hooker, ii. p. 697]. These considerations give also the answer to—

Neither is God's grace in the elect irresistible? So long as the concurrence of man's will and man's work is required, so long will a failure in man defeat God's mercy, so long may he quench the Spirit, so long may he depart from grace given, and draw back unto perdition [Heb. x. 39]. God's grace is sufficient, but grace, excluding possibility to sin, was neither given to angels in their first creation, nor to man before his fall, but reserved for both, till God be seen face to face in the state of glory. Grace is not therefore given here in that measure which taketh away possibility of sinning, and so effectually moveth the will as that it cannot [Hooker, ii. p. 688].

To sum up. The grace of the Father is the gift of His Son, who of God is made unto us wisdom and righteousness, sanctification and redemption. Accordingly, salvation in the whole [Eph. ii. 8], and in all its parts, election [Rom. xi. 5], calling [2 Tim. i. 9], justification [Rom. iii. 24], adoption [Eph. i. 5, 6], sanctification [2 Cor. ix. 8] are said to be by grace. The work is carried on in the Church, and operates in the heart of each man by the power of the Holy Spirit's agency. His are the words of life and the sacraments of life, and the manner of God's operation through grace is to make heavenly mysteries plain to the dark understanding of man; to add motive efficacy to that which there presents itself as the object of man's will.

A general definition, then, of grace, as comprehending all the kinds above enumerated, can only be, that Grace is the free favour of God by which He has in Christ provided a way of salvation, and enables man in Christ to embrace that way. But as the third kind is often spoken of as grace distinctively, in that sense grace may be defined as: A supernatural gift of God to man, given for supernatural purposes, and bestowed freely for the sake of Christ's merits, including all supernatural powers and abilities by which the work of Christ is carried on in the Church, and in the heart of man, and comprehending within the sphere of its operation all the powers and affections of man.

A further question is often asked, or implied, namely, Who are in a state of grace? Referring again to our threefold division of the term, in the first degree the whole world is in a state of grace. God so loved the world that He sent His only Son. The benefits accruing to mankind in general through the Incarnation cannot be overrated. Secondly, in a higher degree all are in a state of grace, to whom is come the word which preaches peace by Jesus Christ. But the words "state of grace" are commonly used, as is natural among Christian men, with reference to the third degree, the grace of inward sanctification.

Now, it is by baptism that men are put into a state of grace [Tit. iii. 5]. The Holy Spirit then imparts a new principle, by which the mind and will of man, before weighed down, become τὸ πνεῦμα, and by which the ψυχή or animal soul is purified and elevated. Further grace is added to sustain the new life, that the whole body, soul, and spirit, may be preserved blameless unto the coming of Jesus Christ. They, then, are in a state of grace who live and walk in the Spirit, and the measure and test of their state are the fruits of the Spirit that they bear. And the Spirit of God witnesses with our spirits that we are the children of God, not by oracle, or voice, or whisper within us, but, first, by those gracious fruits and effects which it has wrought in us; and, secondly, by enlightening our understandings and assisting the faculties of our souls, as need requires, to discern those gracious fruits and effects [Bull, Discourse on the Testimony of the Spirit in the Faithful, Works, vol. ii.]. The testimony of a renewed conscience is the witness of the Spirit that we are in a state of grace. [Spirit. Assurance. Indefectible Grace.]

GRADUAL. A psalm or portion of a psalm sung between the Epistle and Gospel, represented in the Anglican rite by "Glory be to Thee, O Lord." The name is associated with the steps of the Ambon, now represented by the steps of the sacrarium, and it is found in old English in the form grail. The book containing these anthems was called Gradale, but the term was loosely employed, as the Gradale was generally an Antiphonar, or Antiphonarium, as well; containing in fact everything that was sung antiphonally at the celebration of the Holy Eucharist [Zacchar. de Latin. libr. liturg. disquisitio].

GUARDIAN ANGEL. There has been a pious belief among many in all ages of the Church that besides the general ministrations of angels, as the servants of God in carrying out His Providence towards men, there are also particular ministrations of individual angels, appointed to guard, guide, and comfort the individual persons to whom they are assigned. Such an opinion was common among the Jews, and was not unknown [Bull, Serm. xii.] even among the Greeks. This general belief of the pre-Christian world receives some countenance from the New Testament. Our Lord declares respecting little ones that believe on Him, "For I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of My Father which is in heaven" [Matt. xviii. 10], where the pronoun αὐτῶν is thought to shew that each such little one has its own proper guardian angel. "His angel" is also spoken of in the case of St. Peter, though only as a supposition of the Apostles and disciples, or some of them [Acts xii. 15]. Bishop Bull concludes "it highly probable that every faithful person, at least, hath his particular good genius or angel, appointed by God over him, as the guardian and guide of his life" [Bull, Serm. xii.], and such is the opinion of many good theologians, as well as of many saintly Christians. [Angels.]

H

HADES. [INTERMEDIATE STATE. HELL.]

HAGGADAH. The lighter illustrations, gnomes and folk-lore of the Talmud are known as "Haggadoth" narratives. If the Halacoth [HALACAH] are the judicial ballast that give steadiness to the Midrash or exposition [MIDRASH], the Haggadah is the "popularis aura" that bears the Rabbinical craft along; but it is of no real authority, and serves merely the purpose of illustration. These Haggadic narratives are found principally at the close of the Mishnic portions of the Gemara, as well as interspersed in its substance, indicating so far a later origin. Frankel, in rather hyperbolical terms of praise, says of them, "They are as vivid flashes; or as those spirits of light in Jewish myth, that flow forth in daily myriads from God's throne, and then vanish again to make way for others" [Vorstud. z. LXX.]. The Samson riddle and the fable of the trees [Jud. ix. 8, xiv. 14] are instances of Scriptural Haggadah; as are the proverbs of the Son of Sirach and the fables of the Old Testament Apocrypha. Professor Hurwitz has collected a few of these Haggadoth in his volume of Hebrew tales, the introduction of which contains valuable observations on Talmudic lore in general. There is often a deeper philosophic meaning underlying the allegory and myth, the parable and fable, that form the texture of the Haggadah. But "beware," says Maimonides, "that you take not these words of the wise in their literal acceptation; for this would debase and contradict at times the sacred teaching. Seek rather the esoteric meaning; if you cannot discover the kernel let alone the husk, and confess, I do not understand this." [Perush hammishn.; Jost, Gesch. d. Jud.; Zunz, Gottesd. Vortr.; Hurwitz, Hebr. Tales; Etheridge, Jerus. and Tiberias.]

HALACAH. Halacoth, or decisions of the highest rabbinical authority, adjusted the bearings of the law in the minds and consciences of the Jewish people after the Captivity. They accumulated gradually, and may be compared with the constitutions of our Canon Law. The rapid progress which Greek civilization made after the period of the Captivity, the last year of which coincided with the first dramatic representation of Thespis, the cosmopolitan character that the Jews had acquired at Babylon, and their commercial dispersion throughout the world, rendered it necessary that they should be hedged in, wherever they might be, from surrounding heathen practices and ways of thought. They had suffered so severely as a nation for their acquiescence in idolatry, that no precaution against a relapse could be excessive. The precepts of the law therefore were carefully weighed, and decisions framed "pro re nata," that were in agreement with the law, and also harmonized with the altered requirements of the people. These decisions were termed Halacoth from "halac" to go, being the guide to be followed for the future in practice. There was nothing cramped or narrow-minded in their general spirit. Moses himself is said to have enounced some of these Halacoth to define the action of certain precepts of the law by a contemporaneous exposition. And there is no antecedent improbability in the idea. The "lex talionis" of an "eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," was converted into a money fine at so early a period as to be very likely an instance in point. The injunction that a palm branch should mark the house in which a dead body lay, is very possibly as old as the contraction of uncleanness by touching a corpse, and the Talmud makes it Mosaic. The deductions of the Gospel law, contained in the Creeds of the Church, are of older date to us than Mosaic Halacoth would have been to Judah the Holy, the compiler of the Mishna. Hillel, who became head of the Sanhedrin in the fifth year of Herod the Great, is the reputed author of the great bulk of the Halacoth [HILLEL]. He probably collected the scattered fragments of traditionary dicta and decisions, and added others of his own. Maimonides classes them under five heads:—[1] Mosaic and scriptural; [2] Mosaic and traditional; [3] generally received though questionable; [4] decisions of the wise as "hedges of the law," e.g. to pledge a heathen in a cup of wine was forbidden as leading possibly to idolatrous libation; [5] counsels of prudence; well to follow but not having the force of law. By means of these Halacoth the precepts of the law have been made closely binding on the Jews in their wanderings by a literal interpretation where possible, otherwise on the "cy-près" principle; and more rarely by following the spirit rather than the letter of the law, to which a new direction is given, as in some of Hillel's decisions. A similarly liberal interpretation may yet remove the principal stumbling-blocks in the way of Israel's return from the Babel of unbelief. An authoritative Halacah is generally the end of controversy in the scholastic disputations on the Mishnic text with which the Gemara abounds. The Halacoth stood altogether on different grounds from the lighter Haggadoth [HAGGADAH], in that they were received with reverence as authoritative conclusions. The latter, as being merely amusing illustrations, had no kind of authority. [Jost, Gesch. d. Jud.; Zunz, Gottesd. Vortr. d. Jud.; Frankel, Vorstud. z. LXX.; Fürst, d. Jud. in Asien; Geiger, d. Judenth.; art. on Talmud in Chr. Remembr. Oct. 1868; Quart. Rev. Oct. 1867.]

HALLEL. The Hallel Psalms, or "Lauds," comprise the six Psalms from cxiii. to cxviii. inclusive, and have their name from the initial word of the first of the series. They were used on the three principal feasts of the Jewish Church —Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles; as also at every new moon, and on the Maccabæan Feast of the Dedication. The Hallel Hymn was divided into two portions at the close of Psa. cxiv. It had a liturgical, a sacrificial, a festal, and a processional use. On the three great feasts it formed part of the Temple service. It was chanted by the Levites while the Paschal lambs were being slain in the court of the Temple. The sacrificants being admitted in three detachments, the Hallel was repeated again and again; though in the case of the third or "laggard" detachment, the numbers being now few, the Hallel never reached the commencement of Psa. cxvi. [Tr. Pesach. and Tosaphta]. The festal use of the Hallel consisted in its being chanted at the Paschal Feast of each household; as far as the break at the close of Psalm cxiv. before the feast, and the remainder while the guests were partaking the fourth or final cup. It appears from the Tosaphta, or appendix, of the Tr. Pesachim, that the Hallel was chanted: "The Egyptian passover was with music, then must the Passover of the (after) generations be with music." There can be little doubt that our Lord and His disciples, ὑμνήσαντες, sung the latter part of this hymn, or Psa. cxviii., in concluding the Last Supper. The Syriac expresses this by saying "having sung lauds," using the Chaldee equivalent for Hallel, Psa. cxiii. The processional use of the Hallel Hymn is implied in the account of the Dedication of the Temple after its profanation by Antiochus Epiphanes; the ritual followed being that of the Feast of Tabernacles [2 Macc. x. 7], and "they bare branches and fair boughs, and palms also, and sung psalms unto Him that had given them good success in cleansing His place." "Gave good success" here represents τῷ εὐοδωσάντι in the original, a not very usual verb, whereby the LXX. express "send us now prosperity" in the Hallel Psalm, εὐοδώσον δή.

The Hallel was a principal feature of the services in the Feast of Tabernacles; and this word in the Book of Maccabees indicates a processional use. That it had this use is shewn under HOSANNA. It may be noted here that Psalm cxviii. has had an antiphonal character ascribed to it from very early days. The Chaldaic paraphrase distinctly expresses this, and apportions it among different "dramatis personæ." The exposition of the Psalms, "Midrash Teh" Hillim follows in the same track, though it gives a different cast of character. Aben Ezra, in his commentary, observes the same method, and says, "Let it not displease the reader that they who sustain the parts are not defined; for such is the way in sacred hymns." Rashi makes the amœbean portion to commence from verse 21. Hence Psa. cxviii. seems to have long had an antiphonal character; and it was chanted in procession; the Hosanna verse being a popular refrain. This Psalm, then, must have been much on the lips of the people during the Paschal season; and for this reason our Lord made pointed allusion to it in the last few days that preceded the Sacrifice of the Cross. "Did ye never read in the Scriptures, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner: this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes" [Psa. cxviii. 22, 23; Matt. xxi. 42]. "I say unto you, Ye shall not see Me henceforth until ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the Name of the Lord" [Matt. xxiii. 19; Psa. v. 26. See HOSANNA]. The proper Psalms for Easter Evensong are the two opening and the last Psalms of the Hallel collection. They formed, as it seems, the closing service of praise from Scripture used by our Lord before He suffered. [See Buxtorf, Lex. Rabb. Hallel, Talmud, Tr. Pesach, with Tosaphta to Tr. Succoth.]

The Hallel Haggadol, or great Hallel, comprised Psalms ending with Psa. cxxxvi., but commencing according to varying Talmudic authorities, with Psa. cxviii., cxx., and cxxxv. 4. Wherever the Talmud speaks of Hallel it means the six.

HARMONY. [DIATESSARON. ANALOGY OF FAITH.]

HEAD [κεφαλή, πρόσωπον, LXX.] = in Holy Scripture the whole man as an external object or phenomenon; and is thus the correlative of "HEART," as the manifestation of that which takes place in the internal nature of man considered as a whole [Isa. i. 5].

In the Book of Daniel Head and Heart are synonymous; thus in ii. 28, iv. 5, 10, vii. 1, 15, dreams are called the "visions of thy head;" in ii. 20 "the thoughts of thy heart." But this identity occurs in no other part of Holy Scripture; it may serve, however, to explain the use of head, as = the whole man, body and soul, whence the common expression "per head." So of the distribution of the spoil [Judg. v. 30], where the LXX. has οἰκτίρμων οἰκτειρήσει εἰς κεφαλὴν ἀνδρός; and Exod. xvi. 16, κατὰ κεφαλὴν κατ' ἀριθμὸν ψυχῶν ὑμῶν. [Cf. use of πρόσωπον in 2 Sam. xvii. 11.]

The general sense of head, as = the whole man, may be seen in two special aspects of its meaning: [a] the whole man as an external object, and [b] the culmination of the organism.

[a] External acts affecting the whole man done on the head, e.g.: Blessing [Gen. xlviii. 14, xlix. 26], consecration [Lev. viii. 12]. So, although not expressly stated, the Pentecostal tongues clearly descended upon the head [Acts ii. 3]. In the same sense, covering the head is a sign of subjection, in Rebekah's servant before Isaac [Gen. xxiv. 65], and in women generally as a sign of ἐξουσία of their husbands [1 Cor. xi. 10]. Compare the case of Moses, who takes the veil off when he goes into the presence of God, but keeps it on before the people [Exod. xxxiv. 35]. So a person is honoured by being anointed on the head [Mark xiv. 3].

[b] As the culmination of the spiritual organism. The worshippers of angels are said "not to hold the head, from which all the body," &c., "increaseth" [Col. ii. 19]. As the culminating point of a spiritual relation, the "head" of the woman is said to be the man; of the man, Christ; of Christ, God [1 Cor. xi. 3; cf. Eph. v. 23].

Throughout Holy Scripture there is not a trace of the attribution of intellectual operations to the head, and therefore none of the modern opposition of head as the seat of thought, and heart as the seat of emotion. [Delitzsch's Biblical Psychology, in Clark's For. Theol. Lib.]

HEART. A word of very various applications in Holy Scripture, which may be classified as follows:—

[1] The bodily organ proper [2 Sam. xviii. 14], which on the occasion of strong emotion is said to melt [Josh. v. 1], to be "poured out like water" [Lam. ii. 19], to make a noise [Jer. iv. 19], to pant [Ps. xxxviii. 10], to "tremble and move out of its place" [Job xxxvii. 1], to faint [Deut. xx. 8], to ferment (gähren, Delitzsch); "be grieved," A.V.; [ηὐφράνθη, LXX. Ps. lxxiii. 21], to glow [Ps. xxxix. 3, cf. Luke xxiv. 32], to be heavy [Prov. xii. 25], to be "smitten and withered like grass" [Ps. cii. 4], to be broken, either with indignation at others [Jer. xxiii. 9], or with contrition [Ps. li. 17], to be "as a burning fire shut up in the bones," i.e. with impatience and vexation [Jer. xx. 9].

[2] The body generally, which is comforted by food [Gen. xviii. 5], "filled with food and gladness" [Acts xiv. 17, Ps. civ. 15], or "overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness" [Luke xxi. 34, cf. Judg. xix. 5]. More vaguely, for the life of sensuality [James v. 5]; of the sense of smell [Prov. xxvii. 9].

[3] The ideal seat of the affections, without localization in any bodily organ; of joy and sorrow [Isa. lxv. 14]; of longing [Ps. lxxxiv. 2], and satisfaction [Acts ii. 46]; of envy [Prov. xxiii. 17]. and strife [James iii. 14]; of exasperation [Acts vii. 54], and vengeance [Deut. xix. 6]; of charity [1 Tim. i. 5], and hatred [Lev. xix. 17]; of despair [Eccles. ii. 20], desolation [Ps. cxliii. 4], and "astonishment," i.e. extreme terror [Deut. xxviii. 28], &c.

[4] The seat of the intellectual operations; of memory [Isa. lxvi. 17, A.V. "mind," cf. Deut. xi. 18], and imagination [2 Chron. vii. 11, 1 Cor. ii. 9]; of attention [Deut. xxxii. 46]; and consideration [Luke ii. 19]; of dissimulation [Neh. vi. 8]; of common sense [Isa. xliv. 19, Prov. x. 21, A.V. "wisdom"], and analogical reasoning [Deut. viii. 5]; of experience [Josh. xxiii. 14], and perception [Deut. xxix. 4]; of understanding [Prov. viii. 5], and discussion [Luke v. 22]; of errors [Jer. xiv. 14], and hallucinations [Jer. xxiii. 16]; of meditation [Ps. xix. 14]. When the king's dream is interpreted to him, he is said "to know the thoughts of his heart" [Dan. ii. 30], where the "heart" represents that hidden source out of which dreams arise before they take shape and form in the imagination. In Exod. xxviii. 2, xxxi. 6, xxxv. 25, &c., "wise-hearted" appears to mean possessed of artistic taste and skill, as it is applied to those who are to make Aaron's priestly vestments, the coverings of the Tabernacle, &c. [cf. the Greek use of σοφός]. Similarly "heart" means the instructed, as opposed to the uninstructed intellect [Job xii. 3, Prov. xv. 32, A.V. in both places transl. "understanding;" cf. Hos. iii. 11, where sensual excess is said "to take away the heart"].

As the origin of the feelings and thoughts, the "heart" is also the source of language [Job viii. 10, Matt. xii. 34, &c.]. Conversely, "heart" is never attributed in any spiritual sense to the lower animals, and in Dan. iv. 16, where Nebuchadnezzar has his heart "changed from man's," and "a beast's heart" given to him, the beast's heart clearly means the privation of all those characteristics which make man a rational being. [Cf. "Ephraim is like a silly dove, without heart," Hos. vii. 11].

[5] The source of desire and volition, of the natural inclinations as opposed to the commandments [Num. xv. 39], of the sensual lusts [Rom. i. 24], of evil imaginations leading to sin [Matt. xv. 19, cf. Mark vii. 21-23]; of any impulse, good or bad [Acts vii. 23], of any intention, e.g. to make David king [1 Chron. xii. 38]; of voluntary action in general [Rom. vi. 17, cf. Lam. iii. 33, where A.V. has "willingly"], of indecision [Judg. v. 15], rashness [Isa. xxxii. 4], and deliberation [1 Kings xii. 33, cf. Neh. v. 7, where A.V. has "I consulted with myself"]; of adaptation of means to ends [Prov. xvi. 9], and of deliberate purpose [2 Cor. ix. 7, Isa. x. 7, &c.]; of steadfast resolve in the government of the passions [1 Cor. vii. 37]; of permanent habits, e.g. pride [Ezek. xxviii. 2], folly [Rom. i. 21], obstinacy ["make the heart of this people fat," Isa. vi. 10], insincerity, "a double heart" [Ps. xii. 2]. Less commonly, of good habits, e.g. of purity [Prov. xxii. 11], of honesty and goodness [Luke viii. 15], of singleness [Col. iii. 22], and uprightness [2 Chron. xxix. 34]. Generally, the formation of habit is expressed by such words as "prepared" [2 Chron. xii. 14], "fixed," or "established" [Ps. cxii. 7, 8], "set" or "set aright" [Ps. lxxviii. 8], applied to the "heart;" conversely, where habit is imperfectly formed, the heart is said to be "weak" [Ezek. xvi. 30]. The heart is also the seat of the law of nature [Rom. ii. 15], and of a good or evil conscience [Heb. x. 22], and of self-reproach [1 John iii. 19-21].

[6] The internal state of man, in general, as opposed to his overt acts. "As he thinketh in his heart, so is he: eat and drink saith he to thee; but his heart is not with thee" [Prov. xxiii. 7, cf. 1 Cor. 4, 5]. As the inward correlative of the eye or ear [Deut. xxix. 4], of the mouth as the organ of speech [Rom. x. 9, 10], or of the outward life generally [Ps. xxxiii. 15]. [See HEAD.]

[7] "Heart" stands sometimes merely in the sense of "self" along with a possessive pronoun; or in place of the corresponding personal pronoun [1 Kings xii. 33, cf. Exod. ix. 14, "I will send all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people," where the sequel shews "upon thine heart" = "upon thee"].

[8] More definitely for the self-consciousness whether [a] natural, or [b] moral. [a] As the principle of self-assertion. "That sayest in thine heart I am, and none else beside me" [Isa. xlvii. 8]. So false prophets are said to prophesy "out of their own hearts," which is explained in the next verse as "following their own spirits" [Ezek. xiii. 2]. In this sense the "pride," "naughtiness," "idols," "covetousness" of the heart are spoken of. More vaguely, merely of consciousness, e.g. Nabal's heart is said to die when he loses consciousness [1 Sam. xxv. 37]. [b] Of the moral or expanded self-consciousness. "I will give them one heart and one way [Jer. xxxii. 39, cf. Acts iv. 32]; similarly, of the collective political self-consciousness [2 Chron. xxx. 12, cf. Col. ii. 2].

The above comparison of passages seems to lead to the following results:—First, That "heart" in Holy Scripture is the scene and subject of every class of operation, emotional, intellectual, active, incident to the spiritual nature of man. Secondly, That it is at once identical with the sum of them, and yet distinct from any of them; that it is the whole man, both extensively and intensively. Thirdly, That it represents the internal self as opposed to the overt act, and as opposed to the body, but yet as correlative to, and finding its expression in these. Fourthly, That it is a source both of good and evil.

[9] These conclusions throw light on the significance of the heart, as the subject of the Divine operations in man, as the soil in which the Divine seed is sown [Matt. xiii. 19], or, with a change of metaphor, as the scene upon which the Divine Day-star arises [2 Pet. i. 19], or, under another image, as the vessel into which the Divine love is poured out, ἐκκέχυται [Rom. v. 5]. Again, God is said to be the strength and eternal portion of the heart [Ps. lxxii. 26], to search or try it, δοκιμάζειν [1 Thess. ii. 4], &c. to give to it the earnest of the Spirit [2 Cor. i. 22]. Conversely, the heart is described as the capacity in man for recognising the Divine presence [Jer. xxiv. 7], of self-surrender to God [Prov. xxiii. 26]; as the organ of faith "unto righteousness" [Rom. x. 10], and of immediate approach to God [Lam. ii. 18, Hos. vii. 14, Eph. v. 19]; as a hidden depth which God alone penetrates [Ps. xliv. 21, Rom. viii. 27], and in which Christ dwells by faith [Eph. iii. 17]; are the centre of peace [Col. iii. 15], and of love to God [Matt. xxii. 37]. By a more external image, God is said to hold the heart (i.e. the springs of action) in His hand, like a water-pipe, and to turn it different ways at will [Prov. xxi. 1].

For the distinction "omnium longe difficillimum," as Olshausen calls it, between heart and soul, see Oehler's article on "Herz" in Herzog's Real-Encyclopedie; and for the modern limitation of "heart" to the emotions, see AFFECTIONS; for the application of the term to God, see THEISM, PERSONALITY.

[10] The centre of anything; of the burning bush [Exod. iii. 2], or of the sky [Deut. iv. 11], in both of which A.V. has "midst," or, lastly, of the sea [Exod. xv. 8].

The writer is mainly indebted to Oehler's article above mentioned, and Delitzsch's Biblical Psychology.

HEAVEN. In popular language this word is used, in general, for all the infinite space which lies beyond the accessible world; and in particular, for the visible portion of it, the "firmament" or "sky" in which the fixed stars and planets are situated. It is often used in a similar way in the Holy Scriptures, more especially in the Old Testament, where the region of clouds and the region of the stars are each so designated,[1] as well as the abode of God and His glorified servants. [e.g. Dan. iv. 12, vii. 2, 13, the "fowls," "winds," and "clouds;" Gen. xxii. 17, the "stars;" Isa. lxvi. 1, the "throne" of heaven.] There seems to have been indeed a habit among Jewish writers of distinguishing these several regions as the first, second, and third heavens; and the language of St. Paul when he speaks of "one caught up to the third heaven" [2 Cor. xii. 2], is probably an illustration of this habit. Latin theologians have adopted the same classification, distinguishing the three, as "Cœlum Aqueum," "Cœlum Sidereum," and "Cœlum Empyreum." Another classification is also observable in Holy Scripture, that of two regions, "the heaven and the heaven of heavens" [Deut. x. 14; 1 Kings viii. 27; Ps. cxv. 16]. A third was adopted by Rabbinical writers, that of seven, in which the abode of God is the "seventh heaven," while four intermediate ones, the abode of different orders of spiritual beings, are interposed between the Cœlum Empyreum and the Cœlum Sidereum. This classification is recognised by several of the Fathers and by many imaginative writers of later date, and it has also been adopted by the Mohammedans, but it has no ground in Holy Scripture, nor is it known that it is built on any more ancient tradition than that of later Judaism in the Cabbala.

The "heaven" of Christian theology may be separated from all such classifications, and defined as the place of Beatific Vision, where the Divine Glory of Illimitable Deity is sensibly manifested. We may therefore view heaven first, as the abode of God, and secondly, as the abode of angels and saints.

[I.] Heaven as the abode of God. In what manner an Omnipresent Person can be truly spoken of as in any sense localized is beyond comprehension; yet the words of Holy Scripture so speak of God in relation to heaven, and the expressions used cannot be wholly explained by supposing them to be used in a metaphorical sense, or by way of accommodation. Thus heaven is called God's throne. St. Stephen, while declaring that "the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands," yet quotes the Prophet Isaiah as saying "Thus saith the Lord, heaven is My throne" [Acts vii. 49; Isa. lxvi. 1], plainly implying that it is the place of His dwelling. So also David says, "The Lord's throne is in heaven" [Psa. xi. 4]; and our Lord Jesus, "Swear not . . . by heaven, it is God's throne" [Matt. v. 34], "and he that shall swear by heaven, sweareth by the throne of God, and of Him that sitteth thereon" [Matt. xxiii. 22]. Although there is undoubtedly an element of metaphor in these expressions, there is also an element of reality in them, quite apart from anything like anthropomorphism, and also from the idea of God Incarnate.

[1] St. Thomas Aquinas calls these two the firmament. [Summ. Theol. qq. 68, 71.]

Of a similar kind is the evidence given by the visions sometimes vouchsafed to prophets and saints. Isaiah saw "the Lord, sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up," and said "Woe is me, for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts" [Isa. vi. 1, 5]. Ezekiel describes the glory which surrounded the Person of God, and afterwards speaks of "the likeness of a throne as the appearance of a sapphire stone; and upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of a Man above upon it;" and after describing the effulgence of His personal glory, adds: "This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord" [Ezek. i. 26-28]. Almost identical was the glory made visible to St. John when "a door was opened in heaven . . . and behold, a throne was set in heaven, and One sat on the throne, and He that sat was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone," to Whom the four living creatures gave the continual praise of a never-ceasing Ter Sanctus, Whom the four and twenty elders adored as the Creator of all things, and before Whom stood the "Lamb, as It had been slain" [Rev. iv. v.]. Such also was the vision that gladdened the eyes of the protomartyr who "looked steadfastly up into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God" [Acts vii. 55]; and such seems to have been that of which St. Paul spoke when he mentioned "visions and revelations of the Lord," in association with his being "caught up to the third heaven" [1 Cor. xii. 1-4].

All these appearances might be explained, partly on the same principle as the Theophanies by which God manifested Himself to our first parents, to Abraham, and to others [THEOPHANY], and partly by the words of St. John, "These things said Esaias, when he saw His glory, and spake of Him" [John xii. 41], that is, of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Incarnate Person of the Blessed Trinity. But these explanations are only partial; and to whatever extent they go they intensify the idea of a local abode of Deity, by shewing that there is in heaven a visible Presence of the Second Person of the Godhead.

But the habitual language of Holy Scripture is of a still more direct character. "Is not God in the height of heaven?" asks Job, a place above "the height of the stars" or of "the thick clouds" [Job. xxiii. 12-14]. "Hear Thou from heaven Thy dwelling-place" [2 Chron. vi. 21]; "Art not Thou God in heaven" [ibid. xx. 6]; "Whom have I in heaven but Thee" [Psa. lxxiii. 25]. "God is in heaven and thou upon earth" [Eccles. v. 2], has been the continual instinctive utterance of the saints of old, witnessing to a mystery deeply graven in the human mind, that although the Deity is everywhere, yet there is a place where His abode is especially fixed, or especially manifested. But, most of all, such language proceeded from the lips of our Lord, who spoke over and over again of "My Father which is in heaven;" and left to His people those words which have stamped the idea for ever on the Christian mind, "Our Father, Which art in heaven."

It must, therefore, be concluded, that however mysterious and inexplicable the fact may be, yet it is a fact made certain by Divine revelation, that there exists a region which may be properly called the "abode" even of the Omnipresent; the dwelling-place of Him Whom yet the Heaven of Heavens cannot contain.

II. Heaven as the abode of angels and saints. The souls of the righteous are, ordinarily, dwelling in Paradise until the time of the general Judgment, and myriads of the holy angels are doing their work on earth as "ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation." But the home of angels is heaven, and there also in the end will those saints dwell, to whom will be vouchsafed the Beatific Vision. Whenever holy seers have beheld the heavenly glory of God, they have seen it associated with what we should call, in speaking of earthly sovereigns, a "court" of celestial beings. Isaiah saw the seraphim about the throne, and heard them singing in antiphonal strains the praises of the Blessed Trinity [Isa. vi. 3]: Ezekiel beheld there "the likeness of four living creatures" who went "whithersoever the Spirit was to go" [Ezek. i. 5, 20]. Daniel looked upon "The Ancient of Days," and saw that "thousand thousands ministered unto Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before Him" [Dan. vii. 9, 10]. St. John "heard the voice of many angels round about the throne" [Rev. v. 11], worshipping God, and singing praises to His glory [Rev. vii. 11]. So also the Lord Jesus speaks of angels which "do always behold the face of My Father which is in heaven" [Matt. xviii. 10]: declares that "in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" [Matt. xxii. 30]; and promises to him that overcometh, "I will confess his name before My Father and His angels" [Rev. iii. 5]. The numerous passages in Holy Scripture which speak of the saints in heaven it is not necessary to quote, as it is abundantly clear that Christ and His Apostles set it before Christians as their chief hope that they should be received into the Presence of God, and "see His face" [Rev. xxii. 7], and "ever be with the Lord" [1 Thess. iv. 17].

But more will be found on this subject under the words RESURRECTION and BEATIFIC VISION.

III. As regards the local situation of heaven, one uniform language is maintained throughout Holy Scripture, which invariably represents it as a region above us. Jacob saw "a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. And behold the Lord stood above it" [Gen. xxviii. 13]. When Elijah was translated, he "went up by a whirlwind into heaven" [2 Kings ii. 1, 11]. When the Beatific Vision was permitted to St. Paul, he was "caught up to the third heaven" [2 Cor. xii. 2]. When St. John was to see the things which are to be hereafter, and "a door was opened in heaven," a voice said, "Come up hither" [Rev. iv. 1]; and when the same St. John saw the vision of the "holy city," the "new Jerusalem," it was "coming down from God, out of heaven" [Rev. xxi. 2].

Such language can scarcely be considered as destitute of literal significance. But its significance is much strengthened by the fact that the advent of angels upon earth is frequently represented as a descent from above; that our Lord thus speaks of Satan falling from heaven [Luke x. 18, cf. Isa. xiv. 12]; and that He also speaks of Himself as "He that came down from heaven" [John iii. 13, vi. 33]. St. John Baptist, again, declares "I saw the Spirit descending from heaven" [John i. 33]; and St. Peter writes of "the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven" [1 Pet. i. 12]. But, above all other evidence is that of our Lord's actual Ascension in the body, when "He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God" [Mark xvi. 19]; "was parted from them, and carried up into heaven" [Luke xxiv. 51]; "was taken up, and a cloud received Him out of their sight" [Acts i. 9]; and was witnessed to by angels and apostles that He should so come again as He had gone into heaven [Ibid. 11]; "descending from" thence [1 Thess. iv. 16] to complete His work in a Second Advent.

Such revelations shew us that the abode of God, of the holy angels, and of the beatified saints stands to our present abode in some such local relation as the stars of which we speak as being "above our heads," although they are all around us in infinite space. Whether or not there is a limited region, or a particular celestial sphere, which God has separated from the rest, as the garden of Eden was separated, to be the place of His visible manifestations and of eternal happiness, it is certain that there is such a place, altogether apart from the world in which we now live; that any who approach us thence descend from heaven to earth, that any who go hence thither ascend from earth to heaven; and that, wherever it be, there God dwells as He does not dwell on earth, so that angels and beatified saints may adore His visible Presence and Glory.

HELL. In the English version of the Old Testament, this word is used as the equivalent of the Hebrew word Sheol (שְׁאוֹל), which sometimes means, indefinitely, the grave, or place or state of the dead, and at others, definitely, a place or state of the dead into which the element of misery and punishment enters: but never a place or state of happiness, or good, after death.

In the English New Testament "hell" represents three Greek words, and it will be useful to set out in detail the places in which it is used, with the corresponding equivalents of the original.

[1.] Ἅιδης. "Thou Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to Hades" [Matt. xi. 23, Luke x. 15]. "Upon this rock will I build My Church, and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it" [Matt. xvi. 18]. "And in Hades he lifted up his eyes, being in torments" [Luke xvi. 23]. "Thou wilt not leave My Soul in Hades" [Acts ii. 27]. David "spake of the resurrection of Christ, that His Soul was not left in Hades" [Acts ii. 31]. "O death, where is thy sting? O Hades, where is thy victory?" [1 Cor. xv. 55.] "I am He that liveth and was dead, . . . and have the keys of Hades and of death" [Rev. i. 18]. "And his name . . . was Death, and Hades followed with him" [Rev. vi. 8]. "And death and Hades delivered up the dead which were in them" [Rev. xx. 13]. "And death and Hades were cast into the lake of fire (εἰς τὴν λίμνην τοῦ πυρός). This is the second death" [Rev. xx. 14].

[2.] Τάρταρος. "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to Tartarus, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment" [2 Pet. ii. 4].

[3.] Γέεννα. "Whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of the Gehenna of fire" [Matt. v. 22]. "And not that thy whole body should be cast into Gehenna" [Matt. v. 29, 30]; "into Gehenna, into the fire that never shall be quenched" [Mark ix. 43, 45]; "into the Gehenna of fire" [Matt. xviii. 9; Mark ix. 47]. "Fear Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna" [Matt. x. 28; Luke xii. 5]. "Ye make him twofold more the child of Gehenna than yourselves" [Matt. xxiii. 15]. "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of the Gehenna?" [Matt. xxiii. 33]. "The tongue . . . is set on fire of Gehenna" [James iii. 6].

So classified, these passages speak for themselves. It is quite evident that although the English word "hell" is used promiscuously, a distinction of great importance is observable in the original Greek. In every place where Hades is used, it is consistent with a meaning that may be expressed at length as the state and place of the dead, that meaning being associated with the idea of privation and punishment, but not of finality. Gehenna, on the other hand, is used respecting unmixed evil, and a punishment distinctly associated with the idea of finality, from which there is no recovery. As, moreover, the name "Gehenna" was taken from the Hebrew word by which the Valley of Hinnom was known, a valley near Jerusalem, in which perpetual fires consumed the bodies of criminals, of unclean beasts, and the refuse of the city, it seems to follow that the "lake of fire" [Rev. xx. 9-15, xxi. 8] is only another way of expressing the idea intended to be conveyed by "Gehenna," especially after the manner in which the latter term is several times used by our Lord.

"Hell," therefore, in the sense of Gehenna, is the place provided for the final punishment of evil angels and unpardoned men after the day of judgment, the intermediate "Hades" of the wicked and the "Tartarus" of the fallen angels already anticipating the horrors of Gehenna as Paradise anticipates the joys of Heaven. [INTERMEDIATE STATE. EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT.]

HELLENISTS. These are mentioned three times in the New Testament, viz.: in Acts vi. 1, ix. 29, and xi. 20. In the last named passage the Alexandrine MS. and some others read Ἕλληνας, but the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS. read Ἑλληνιστὰς. The English version uses the word "Grecians" in these places as distinguished from "Greeks;" but this distinctive use of the word "Grecian" is only found in the New Testament. The Hellenists were Grecianized Jews, living habitually out of Judæa, using the Greek language as their vernacular, and adopting such Greek customs as were not inconsistent with the Jewish religion. These Grecianized Jews formed an important element in the Christian Church from the beginning; and there were, no doubt, a large portion of them among the converts made upon the Day of Pentecost. Several of the seven deacons were Hellenists, including St. Stephen: so also were the earliest Christians of Antioch, who had been converted by "men of Cyprus and Cyrene," themselves Hellenists, "scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen" [Acts xi. 19, 20]; and before the Church had as yet been initiated among the Gentiles by the conversion of Cornelius (who was a heathen "proselyte of the gate") and his household.

The Hellenist Christians were the principal persons concerned in the plantation of Christianity among the Gentiles at large; the prejudices of the Jewish race being less firmly rooted in them than in the Jews of Judæa; and the sympathies of language and habits giving them special advantages for the purpose of winning over Gentiles to the faith of Christ. It was the Hellenist Church of Antioch, and not the Hebrew Church of Jerusalem, that became the first centre of Gentile Christendom: and it was the Hellenistic dialect (or Hebraized Greek), not Hebrew, which was the language chosen as that of the New Testament.

HERESY. The word heresy in its origin is a word "mediæ significationis," αἵρεσις meaning simply "choice" [Tert. de Præscr. 6]; ἡ ἁπλῶς βούλησις [Hesych.] as the choice of a profession; "hæresis navalis" is the "shipping business" [Cod. Theod. XIII. vi. 9, 10]; the various schools of philosophy are expressed by it, "Cato perfectus Stoicus . . . in ea est hæresi" [Cic. Paradox.], Pythagoræ hæresin sequi [Vitruv.], δι τῆς στοϊκῆς αἱρέσεως ἡγέμονες [Diog. Laert.]. The word came into general use through the Macedonian Greek of Alexandria, and designated the rival shades of opinion among the Jews. Thus Josephus says that he began life in the Pharisæan heresy, answering to the Stoic philosophy of the Greeks [vi. 2]; he names the three Jewish heresies, as Pharisæan, Sadducæan, and Essene [Ant. xiii. 5, 9; B. J. ii. 8, 2]. Elsewhere he terms these sects φιλοσοφίαι, answering to the Syriac equivalent in the New Testament [ܗܘܕܝܐ] "doctrine." Hence the fusion of philosophy with Magian and Jewish notions, that caused so much trouble to the infant Church, was termed "heresy;" and from thenceforth the word was used to denote any kind of erroneous notion concerning the faith, as being "the opinion of a body of men agreeing among themselves, but differing from all others" [Phavorinus]. It is not a very easy matter to define heresy; the shades of error darken so imperceptibly. Augustine confesses the difficulty [de Hær., præf.]. At the close of his catalogue of heresies he says that they are to be classed as heretics who err in some one or two points of faith, as Macedonius; but that dealers in fiction (fabulones) who string together monstrous and intricate fables are not worthy even of the name of heresy. He distinguishes also between those who for some private end strike out new lines of error, and the simple whom they lead astray [de Util. Cred. i.]. Heresy is clearly a very different matter from infidelity; it upholds the Scripture that it misinterprets [Aug. Ep. cxx. sec. 13; Ambrosiaster, in Tit. iii. 10]. It professes to be of that household of faith which it troubles with its strife. It claims to pay reverence to Apostolical tradition as seeing the immense power that the Church derives from it for the maintenance of truth; but it substitutes traditions of its own for those that have been from the beginning. Jerome, and after him the Canon Law [Can. 24, q. 3, c. 26], has drawn this line of distinction between heresy and schism. "Heresy," he says [in Tit. iii. 10], "involves perverse doctrine; schism separation by reason of episcopal variance" [see Basil, Ep. Canon. ad Amphiloch, can. 1]. Rival bishops may be schismatical, and yet hold sound doctrine; but a bishop who teaches false doctrine is heretical. No false teachers of old could be condemned for heresy without due warning first given. Therefore there must also be an obstinate persistency in error to constitute heresy. The rule given from the beginning was invariably applied, failing which the condemnation even of a general council would be null and void: "A man that is an heretic (Syr. "heresiota") after a first and second admonition reject" [Tit. iii. 10]; "If he neglect to hear the Church let him be as an heathen man and a publican" [Matt. x. 17].

Heresy is the spirit of Antichrist of which St. John speaks [1 John ii. 18, 19, 22; iv. 3; 2 John 7]. The form of the beast in the vision of Daniel [vii. 8], having "eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things," "whose look was more stout than his fellows" [20], "thinking to change times and laws" [25], is a foreshadowing of the spirit of heresy. The Apostle speaks of this false principle at one while as ὁ ἀντίχριστος, at another collectively, as many Antichrists, coming forth as they did from the various intellectual systems, the schools of Greece, the theosophy of the Magian, and the Cabbalistic mysticism of the Jew. The heresies that arose from these sources were either never of the Church, as the Ebionite and Cerinthian, or they were devised by those who went forth from the Christian community, as Simon the Mage, Hymenæus, and Philetus [2 Tim. ii. 18]; belonging indeed externally to the Church, but having nothing of its inward spirit. The Church from the first has been as the net cast into the sea, that draws within its meshes shells and weeds and worthless refuse, as well as that which is serviceable and good. It rejects none where there is any hope that the defective may be presented perfect through faith in Christ at the last day. These heresies, in general, were so entirely alien from the Spirit of Christ as to have no power to pervert the "children of the kingdom;" but at times error has shewed itself as the two-horned lamb [Rev. xiii. 11], with voice of serpentine guile, deceiving "the very elect."

Faith in the Holy Trinity, and in the two perfect Natures of Christ, is the foundation upon which the whole superstructure of Christian doctrine is built. Error upon either of these two points is heresy. [1 John ii. 22; iv. 3; 2 John 7.] The old canon law made everything to be heretical that militated against Roman doctrine, and was persistently maintained [Can. xxiv. q. 3, c. 31]. The law of England, in restoring to the crown its ancient supremacy over the "estate ecclesiastical" [1 Eliz. c. 1], has declared that to be heresy which has been so determined heretofore "by the authority of the canonical Scriptures, or the four first General Councils, or any of them, or by any other general council, wherein the same was declared heresy by the express and plain words of the said canonical Scriptures; or such as shall hereafter be determined to be heresy by the High Court of Parliament of this realm, with the assent of the clergy in their Convocation." This purview of the matter limits the idea of heresy to unsound teaching upon the Holy Trinity; the twofold nature of Christ; and Pelagianism, which was condemned in Celestius at Ephesus. The inherent authority of the Church to determine what is true and what is false in matters of religion dates from the first moment of her corporate existence, when Christ breathed on the Apostles, and said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost, whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained" [John xx. 23]. It formed the first germ of the Church that had the promise of being led into all truth, in whose decision upon matters of faith every member was bound to acquiesce, or to be held "as an heathen man and a publican." The Church has ever since possessed the same authority in matters of faith that she received at first. The power of binding and loosing has never been revoked; of condemning false doctrine; of visiting it with censures and penal infliction; and of conferring upon the penitent absolution for the past. In spiritual matters the Church is the minister and vicegerent of the Most High upon earth, as the State is in temporal matters; but the State from its first connection with the Church has enforced spiritual censure. By the common law of the Church any bishop was empowered to take single-handed cognizance of heresy, and punish it canonically [Constit. Arundel, A.D. 1408; Gibson's Codex, tit. xvi. c. 2.] By the Statute Law [5 Rich. II. c. 5, A.D. 1381], bishops were ordered to certify to the Lord High Chancellor the preachers of heretical doctrines, who should commission the sheriffs to arrest and imprison. This statute was repealed by 1 Edw. VI. c. 12; revived by 1 Mar. c. 6; and finally annulled by 1 Eliz. 1. W. Sawtrey, clerk, was burnt for heresy [A.D. 1400], on the king's writ, issued with the advice of the Lords temporal in Parliament to the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London. In the same year, though apparently at a later period, the terrible statute "de Hæretico Comburendo" was passed [2 Hen. IV. c. 15], which empowered the bishop to arrest all preachers of heretical doctrine, to canonically judge, "and them do to be kept in his prison, and pay a fine to the King's exchequer." On contumacy or relapse, the bishop was directed to deliver the offenders to the secular arm, and the sheriff "them before the people in an high place, do to be burned." This Act was repealed by 25 Hen. VIII. c. 14, though obstinate heretics were still to be "committed by the King's writ to the lay power, to be burned in open places." In the Proclamations Act [31 Hen. VIII. c. 8], offences against the tenor of any royal proclamation in matters of heresy, are made penal "in estate and life;" and the Act for abolishing diversity of opinion in matters of religion [31 Hen. VIII. c. 14], adjudges that all who impugn the doctrine of Transubstantiation shall be deemed heretics, and as such "suffer judgment and execution by way of burning." These Acts were also repealed by 1 Edw. VI. 12. In 35 Hen. VIII. c. 5, there is some relaxation of severity, inasmuch as any indictment for heresy must be by oath of twelve men. The Breve or writ "de Hæretico Comburendo" was finally annulled by the Act 29 Car. II. c. 9. The last writs issued were in 9th of James I., when Bartholomew Legate was burned in Smithfield for Arianism; and in the next month Richard Neile was burned at Coventry for the heresies of "Ebion, Cerinthus, Valentinus, and Arius, and several others, all of which he obstinately held and maintained." [Gibson's Cod. f. 353.] A.D. 1414, the Act [2 Hen. V. c. 7] against "Lollardy" was passed, whereby the lands and chattels of any convicted Lollard were escheated; the University of Oxford being especially tainted with the error [Constit. Arund., A.D. 1408]. This Act was also repealed by 1 Edw. VI. c. 12, revived by 1 Mar. c. 6, and finally annulled by 1 Eliz. c. 1.

The Act 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 13, having made it a part of the vow of bishops and priests that they will "banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrines, contrary to God's Word," it remains to be seen what power they have for so doing. By the first Act passed in Queen Elizabeth's reign, the cognizance of heresy was formally "united and annexed to the Crown;" and in the same Act the statutable definition of heresy occurs, to which reference has already been made, viz. as so adjudged heretofore by the Canonical Scriptures; by the four first General Councils, or any one of them; by the scriptural judgment of any other General Council; or that shall be so adjudged hereafter by Parliament with consent of Convocation; i.e. by the Church of England as fully represented by the clergy and laity. If such a court of delegates could be constituted at the present day from the élite of the clergy, and a lay element of Churchmen elected by bona fide members of the Church of England, the question of heresy might perhaps be left to its judgment. But the day has gone by for such a combination, so far as the constitution of Parliament is concerned. Desuetude has swept away the ancient prerogative of Convocation to punish heresy as a synodal act. The old penal acts of Parliament also having happily been abrogated, the cognizance of heresy in theory has returned into its ancient channel, and bishops doubtless still have the power of inflicting ecclesiastical censure. But the resumption of full penal powers by bishops appointed by "pro tem." ministers of the Crown who may or may not be members of the Church of Christ, is scarcely to be desired, for an hierarchy so constituted would not always be agreed in its definition of heresy. The only courts that can take cognizance of heresy practically are the Courts of Westminster and the Courts of Assize, under 9 & 10 Will. III. c. 32, "for the more effectual suppression of blasphemy and prophaneness." Heresy has so completely evaporated as an ecclesiastical offence, that it is not even mentioned in modern books of ecclesiastical law. Yet it should be noted that the Act 13 Eliz. c. 12 makes it an offence to maintain or affirm any doctrine contrary to the Thirty-nine Articles, which Act, according to Lord Stowell's decision in R. v. Stone, is still in viridi observantiâ, though as temporal judge he had no power to inflict sentence of deprivation; which therefore the Bishop of London, coming into court for that purpose, did [Hagg. Cons. 424; Cripps, Eccles. Law, p. 585, ed. 1845]. Such, then, is the position in which the question of heresy has been left by modern changes.

Taking the standard of Catholic doctrine as τὸ ὀρθὸν, heresy as often oscillated in opposite direction by neutral repulsion as it arose in the way of mutual sequence from heretical antecedents. The Gnosticism of the two first centuries lies at the root of nearly every aftergrowth. The Arian heresy and its offshoots may be traced back to the Gnostic Soter. Manichæism and Pelagianism had their origin—the one by attraction, the other by repulsion, as from opposite poles. The anatomist is not led back to the brain by following the course of the nerves more certainly than the heresiology of after centuries may be traced back to the Gnosticism of the first.

It was essentially an eclectic system. In theory professing to abhor the polytheism of Greece and Rome, it devised an entire Theogonia of Æons. It was an attempt to amalgamate the theosophy of the East with that faith in the Divine Unity which the sages of the West held in common with the Jew. Matter, the matrix of all evil, was, in one form or other, supposed by the Gnostic to be co-eternal with the Deity. From the one Supreme Being, existing eternally in procosmic silence, a succession of personified attributes went forth as a creative energy, whereby the arrangement of the world of matter was effected without bringing the Supreme Bythus into contact with the source of all evil. So far as names venerable among Christians were introduced into the Gnostic system, they reflect light upon the teaching of the Church in the very infancy of our religion; and it is worthy of note that, with the exception of the Ebionite offshoot, which was virtually Jewish, these sects, one and all, believed in the personal Divinity of Christ. It was the true human nature of our Lord that was denied by them [Theodoret, Dial. ii.]. Credit might be given to them for linking their fortunes in any way with the "sect" of Christians, so continually the object of persecution, if it were not known that to sacrifice at the idol altar was a painless ordeal. [Gnosticism. Hippolyt. Philosoph.; Irenæus, Cambr. ed. Introd.; Tertull. c. Valentin, c. Marcion, c. Gnosticos; Neander, Genet. Entw.; Matter, Gnost.; Beausobre, Hist. Manich. pt. II. iii. 9, 10.]

Gnosticism, as originated by Simon Magus, had nearly died down by A.D. 200, [Origen, tom. i. p. 45]. But the Oriental principle of heresy was not dead, it lived in Manes, the originator of the Manichæan heresy [A.D. 270], who derived it from Basilides [Acta Archelai, 55]. This system was based on the Diarchic assumption of two eternal principles, light and darkness, one good, the other evil. So far it had common ground with Cerdon and Marcion among the Gnostics. The doctrine of the Trinity was explained by him on Zoroastrian principles; the Father dwelt in unapproachable light [Beausobre, Hist. Manich. i. 164; Aug. c. Faust.; Kleuker's Zend Avesta, iii. 343]. The Word, as the Persian Mithras, had his dwelling in the sun, the Holy Spirit in mid air. It was another form of Pantheism. The souls of the elect were purged from baser particles, and after death dwelt for ever in the presence of God. Like the Gnostics, the Manichæans looked for a final restoration of all things to their primitive condition, when the kingdoms of light and darkness should be once more eternally separated. They forbad marriage, and denied the resurrection of the body. The souls of the reprobate, after lustration by fire, passed into other bodies, and were tried in a new state of existence, and in default of purification were finally abandoned to the fire of torment. The Manichæans made a great profession of squaring everything to the reason of their followers, and of demanding nothing upon faith [Aug. de Util. Cred. i.].

The vitality of this sect is remarkable. That it continued to flourish in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries, is evident from the severe laws that were passed against it by the Roman emperors [Cod. Theod. xvi. 5, de Hær.; Cod. Justin. i. 5, de Hær.]. Writers of the Roman communion have always traced the principles of the Vaudois and Albigenses back to Manichæism. [Beausobre, Hist. de Manich.; Bayle, Manich.; Cave, Hist. Lit. s. v. Manich.; Waleh, Hist. Hær. i. 685; Basnage, Præf. gen. ad Cai. L. Ant. i. p. 1.; Tillemont, Mem. iv. 367; Fabric, B. Gr. vii. 310; Maii Coll. Nov. vii. 17; Cacciari, Exercit. in Leon. M. op.; Neander, Kirch. G. i. 2, 817; Cyr. Jer. Catech. vi.; Epiphan. Hær. 66; Theodoret, H. Fab. i. 26, v. 9; Augustine, c. Faust. xx., Hær. 36, c. Felic. Manich., Op. Imperf., c. Jul. De U. Cred. 1, de Fide inter Opp. Aug., &c.; Acta Archelai.]

The next phase of heresy was that of Montanus, who, like Mahomet, had his ecstatic trances, and affirmed that he possessed the spirit of prophecy; but there is not sufficient reason for believing that the worst blasphemy with which he has been charged was ever brought home to him [Mosheim, de R. Chr. ante Const. p. 413]. Montanus himself was never heretical on points of faith. Matters of ascetic practice, and his pretension to a new revelation, were sufficient to separate him from the body catholic. [Kaye's Tertullian; Wernsdorf, de Mont.; Mosheim, de Reb. Chr. ante Const. 410-425; Waleh, Hist. Hær. i. 611-666; Kirchner; Münter; Schwegler, de Montanistis.] But there came a division, and one half of his followers, under Proclus, continued orthodox in faith [Tertull. Præscr. Hær. 52], while the rest, under Æschines, adopted a notion which was Gnostic, inasmuch as it held the emanative principle, though unity should be restored again when the purpose of a complex manifestation had been served. Brahminism had already become known to Europe as an intellectual system [Hippolyt. Philos.] that held the doctrine of Divine emanation put forth for a time, and retracted as the tortoise draws back his limbs within the testudo; or as the spider was believed to recover into itself its line of web [Beausobre, Hist. de Manich. pt. II. iii. 6].

Praxeas first, and then Sabellius shortly after the middle of the third century, obtained the appellation of Patripassians, as teaching the Unity of the Godhead in such a way as to assert that the Father in the Person of the Son suffered upon Calvary. The inevitable reaction set in. Paul of Samosata, Bishop of Antioch, and protegé of the Jewess Zenobia, "that God the Father might be one" [Athanas. de Sal. Adv. Jes. Chr. 3], affirmed that the Son was not pre-existent from all eternity, but had His beginning both in His intelligent and in His sentient nature from the Virgin; that the Word was as the Mind existing in certain states, memory, hope, fear, &c. [Athanas. de Inc. c. Apoll. 20; Ruffin. de Symb. 39]. He was condemned by the Council of Antioch [A.D. 272], and a misunderstanding unfortunate in its after consequences arose from the discredit thrown by the Council on the theological term ὁμοούσιον in consequence of its application by Paul [see HOMOOUSION]. The name of Paul long lingered in the Hæresiologia, though without any considerable following; yet the "Publicans" of the Middle Ages were said to be a corruption from "Paulicians." The Paulicians are represented by the modern Unitarians.

Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, in combating the Patripassian tenets, had laid himself open to a charge of resolving the μοναρχία of the Deity. That Dionysius, in his dislike of Sabellianism, may have used faulty expressions which were popularly afloat, is very possible; but he easily rebutted the charge of lax doctrine, and the term homoousios, though not new, first assumed a prominent position in his vindication. The anti-Sabellian reaction continued; and at length Arius appeared and enounced the distinctive formula of his heresy, that there was a time when the Son was not [ἦν ὅτε οὐκ ἦν], and that He was created of that which before was not [ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων]; higher than the angels, but a mere κτίσμα καὶ ποίημα [Ep. Conc. Nic. ad Æg.]. "Non Deus verus, sed quem fecit Deus verus" [Aug. Tr. in Joh. vi. 44]. By His agency the worlds were made, and in due course the Word took the place of a human soul in Christ [Ath. de Sal. Adv. Chr. 3]. The Gnostic Soter was reproduced. The well-established theological term homoousios [Harvey on the Creeds, p. 234] was made the test of truth and error by the Council of Nice, and Arius refusing to subscribe, was ejected from the Church by usual process [Bull, Def. Fid. Nic.; Waterland's Vindic.; Beausobre, Hist. de Manich. pt. II. iii. 7; Newman's Arians; Kaye's Athanasius]. Court influence kept Arianism alive throughout the fourth century, until the semi-Arian distinction divided the party into the ὁμοιούσιον, and the Anomœan or pure Arian sections of Arianism. The semi-Arians construed οὐσία to mean, not substance in the Catholic sense, but substantial individuality, and incommunicable to any other being; it was the "idiosynerasy" of modern philosophy. Therefore, they argued, to say that the Son is ὁμοούσιος with the Father is Sabellianism; it is a confusion of Son and Father in one Individuality; and thus τὸ ὁμοιούσιον became the watchword of the semi-Arian, and distinguished him from the Anomœan. The first trace of this notion is to be detected in the epistle of Eusebius from the Council of Nice to his flock at Cæsarea; but the semi-Arian party dates its existence from the Council of Ancyra [A.D. 358], which condemned the Anomœan Arianism of Aëtius, and declared its complete faith in the perfect equality of the Son with the Father. A better definition of the term οὐσία would have shewn that they held a common ground of belief with the Catholic Church; but as things stood, they concluded their anathemas of the Anomœan party by a formal rejection of the Homoousion as tantamount to a confession of Sabellianism [Epiphan. Hær. lxxiii. 11], though they still held as complete faith in the Divinity of the Son as Athanasius himself [Athan. de Synod. 41]. Another shade of Arianism was next developed. The ambiguous term οὐσία was cancelled by Aeacius in the next year [A.D. 359], at Seleucia, who declared that the Son was ὅμοιος simply, in relation with the Father. He was like, but there was no substantial unity. The semi-Arians were deluded into the idea that the new formula was virtually their own, and they symbolized with it. But seven years later they condemned it at Lampsacus, and the Catholic meaning of οὐσία having at length been accepted, the Nicene Symbol was subscribed by fifty-nine semi-Arian bishops. Macedonius, Patriarch of Constantinople, who had passed from the Anomœans to the semi-Arian party, extended the Arian perversion of doctrine to the Holy Spirit, affirming that He was neither of the same nor of similar substance with the Father and the Son. The heresy was an extension of the Anomœan or pure Arian, rather than of the Homœan or semi-Arian notions. From this time the semi-Arian party ceased to exist; its members either returned to the orthodox faith, or were absorbed in the new heresy of the Macedonians, more generally known as the Pneumatomachi. This heresy was condemned by the Council of Constantinople [A.D. 381], when the final clauses were added to the Nicene Creed which express faith in the Divinity of the Holy Spirit; the clauses, however, being before in existence, for Epiphanius appends them to the form that had been learned by heart by catechumens for fifty years, from the very time of the Nicene Council [Epiph. Ancorat.]. The Macedonian heresy had a bare existence in the beginning of the fifth century; the Arians also survived only among the fierce hordes of Northern Europe, and in Spain, from whence they passed over into Africa. The destruction of the Vandal rule in Africa brought the Arian party back to the Church Catholic, and about the middle of the seventh century it became finally extinct. The reappearance of Arianism in Poland in the fifteenth century scarcely amounted to a revival.

Arianism gave place to two heresies of an equally obstinate character—Pelagianism and Nestorianism. Pelagius in the East, Marigena at Rome, and Morgan in Britain, were the same individual British monk, who at Rome imbibed his errors from a Syrian, Ruffinus (not to be confounded with Ruffinus of Aquileia). From the time of Origen the seeds of evil had been slowly germinating in the East, where Theodore of Mopsuestia preserved their vitality. Origen, in opposing the Diarchic principle of Valentinus and Marcion, and the old Gnostic notion that evil is inherent in matter, maintained the existence of one eternal good Principle, and affirmed that evil was the result of man's imperfect moral nature acting under an uncontrolled freedom of will. He denied that the souls of men were naturally divided into a good and a bad seed, but declared that all might be good if they would, by free will acting in a right direction. The Manichæans having succeeded to many of the Gnostic notions, Pelagius also followed in the steps of Origen, and declared that man by his own innate power might be virtuous without the grace of God, that there was no original sin, neither was death brought in by Adam's fall. These opinions were condemned in his companion Cœlestius at Carthage [A.D. 412, 418, and Eph. A.D. 431]. The antagonism to Manichæism is evident in the fact that Pelagius charged the Catholic teaching with that error [Aug. ad Bonif. ii. 5]. Augustine points out that the Church kept, as usual, the via media between the two extremes [ad Bonif. ii. 2, 3; iii. 3, 4; see Beausobre, Hist. de Manich. vii. 1, 2].

Pelagius having passed into Palestine, Cassian imported his error from thence into Gaul, in the modified form of semi-Pelagianism, or the Massilian error [A.D. 428]. He allowed the fall of man, also that man can neither work out his own deliverance, nor begin any good work, nor complete it without Divine grace, yet that his own goodwill must anticipate the working of grace, as the Schoolmen afterwards declared that man's own effort brought in the merit de congruo. He further asserted that the question of Divine predestination was thus resolved, each individual's happiness or misery having its first germ in human free-will. This heresy was condemned [A.D. 529] by the second Arausican Council. [See Augustine, tom. x. ed. Bened. Epp. 145-225; tom. v. Serm. 170, 174, 176, 293, 294; tom. viii. Hær. 88, ad Quod vult deum. Vossius, Hist. Controv. Pelag.; Noris, H. Pelag.; Garner, Diss. de Pelag. II.; Mar. Merc.; Neander, Kirch. G. ii.]

The mystery of an hypostatic union of two Natures in one Christ was impugned by Nestorius, while Cassian was importing semi-Pelagianism into Gaul. Nestorius, Patriarch of Constantinople, professing to uphold the faith against Arius and Pelagius, taught the Homoousion, and maintained the doctrine of original sin with its consequences; but he affirmed at the same time that the Son of Mary was simply man, though raised to the dignity of the Son of God through union with the Word after birth; thus that the Person of Christ was twofold, the human and Divine Personalities existing separately until they were united in the Saviour. The distinctive test of Nestorianism was whether the Blessed Virgin might be correctly named Θεοτόκος, a term used by Alexander, Patriarch of Alexandria, in his first Epistle against Arius [A.D. 324], and by Athanasius [de Inc. 13]. Nestorius commenced the propagation of his error on the Feast of the Nativity [A.D. 428], in the first year of his episcopate, and was condemned in the third General Council, at Ephesus [A.D. 431]. Being a man of noble bearing and popular manners, a violent schism ensued, which gradually spread and still exists in the northern provinces of Syria. [NESTORIANISM. Field, On Church, iii. 1; Assemann, Bibl. Orient. iv. 69, 76; Fleury, Hist. Eccl.; Palmer's Treatise, I. xiv.]

Again the heretical pendulum oscillated in an exactly opposite direction. Eutyches, in his opposition to Nestorius, maintained the Personal unity of Christ as the Word Incarnate, but he erred in saying that one mixed nature was the result, as electrum is the alloy of silver with gold

[A.D. 448]. The author having been excommunicated by a Council at Constantinople, the sentence was reversed by a false Council (Latronum) at Ephesus in the following year, but confirmed by the fourth General Council at Chalcedon [A.D. 451]. The Eutychians, like their rivals, formed a strong schism, spreading into Palestine, Egypt, and Ethiopia, where they were known as Jacobites and Copts (= Αἰγυπτίοι). Thus the Eastern Church was harassed by the two rival factions of, Nestorius in the north, and Jacobites or Eutychians in the south. [Le Quien, Diss. ii. in Damasc.; Salig. de Eutmo. ante Eut.; Assemann. B. Or. i. 219.]

One more heresy remains to be described, the Monothelite, of which Sergius, Patriarch of Constantinople, was the author [A.D. 630]. Confessing the two natures in Christ, he declared that the Divine and human will in Him were one, as implied by unity of Person (ἓν θέλημα καὶ μίαν ἐνέργειαν). He was condemned in the Lateran Council [A.D. 649]; but the error still existing, the condemnation was confirmed in the sixth General Council at Constantinople [A.D. 680, 681]. The Maronites of Mount Lebanon, so called from a Syrian monk, Maro, were of this party till the twelfth century, when they were admitted into communion with the Church of Rome [A.D. 1182], in the time of the Crusades. It was an important acquisition, as they were a warlike population of 40,000 souls, and formed a most useful barrier against the Saracens. They are wholly attached to the Roman discipline, using Syro-Chaldaic as their liturgical, and Arabic as their vernacular language. They number now about 150,000. Assemann, the deeply learned compiler of the Bibl. Orient. was of this race. [MARONITES. Assemann, Bibl. Or. ii. Diss. de Monoth.]

HERMENEUTÆ. Special interpreters were appointed in some of the early Churches, whose duty it was to translate the Holy Scriptures and the sermons of the clergy vivâ voce to those who did not understand the language in which they were read and spoken. These Ἑρμενευταὶ are mentioned by Epiphanius [Expos. Fidei, n. 21], and in the Acts of Procopius the Martyr [Valesius, Notes to Eusebius' Martyrs of Palestine]. They do not appear to have been a separate order in any sense, but as Procopius is said to have held three offices in the Church of Scythopolis, being reader, exorcist, and interpreter of Syriac, so it is probable that those were appointed interpreters who were already (if such could be found) ordained to one of the minor orders.

HERMENEUTICS. A scientific term by which the principles of Biblical interpretation are distinguished from EXEGESIS, or the practice of interpretation. [INTERPRETATION.]

HERMIT. ἐρημίτης, ὁ ἐν ἐρήμῳ διάγων [Suidas], though ἐρημία does not necessarily imply withdrawal into an actual desert ἀλλὰ καὶ οἰκίσκος κραυγῆς ἀπηλλαγμένος, "any chamber remote from clamour" [Chrysostom]. Although commonly used in opposition not only to citizen but also to cenobite, the word hermit in strictness (both etymologically and historically) includes the latter; for the dwellers in the desert lived both in companies and in individual seclusion [ANCHORITES]. Hermit thus = monk, but indicates also the earlier and Eastern as contrasted with the later and Western stage of Monasticism, when religious houses began to be founded in inhabited localities, in villages, or in cities.

The first great migration to the desert of the Egyptian Thebaïd took place under the leadership of Paul of Thebes beneath the stress of the Decian persecution. "Primo genuit necessitas fugæ (says Suicer, Thes. Eccl.) propter persecutiones gentilium; postmodum auxit superstitio et opinio sanctitatis." In the Decian persecution, which was unusually severe, many Christians apostatized, many more rushed upon martyrdom unsought: but between these classes those who, whilst ready to die for their faith, as many of them were, simply evaded persecution by retiring beyond the area covered by the imperial religion, must bear the palm at once for consistency and sobriety. They were following the example of the holy family [Matt. ii. 13], as well as the precept of Christ [Matt. x. 23] and His apostle [1 Cor. x. 14].

An asylum once established in Egypt, many sought refuge there who fled rather from the widespread misery of ordinary provincial life in the decline of the Empire, than from religious persecution. The desert thus became to the Roman very much what the English colonies are to the European world, the receptacle of those who (mainly in the middle, lower middle, agricultural and industrial classes) found living difficult. This circumstance may account for some at least of the extravagance of idea which infected the religion of the hermits, as it does for that of the Mormon and the Shaker in America.

Alexandria, moreover, through which the population flowed into the desert, was itself fast becoming a "colluvies gentium," in which the illimitable ideas of the East came into contact with the decaying culture, the luxury, and the misery of the West. Popular Neo-Platonism was the result, and it was this rather than Christianity which seems to have been the parent of the Egyptian eremitic life. The Therapeutæ, e.g., were not Christians at all [v. Gibbon, Decline and Fall, vol. ii. p. 210, n.].

Into the midst of such influences did the Christian emigrants and refugees enter when they retired from imperial society; by such circumstances was the Christian ascetic ideal modified, debased; against such deterioration was the rule of St. Antony (solitary) and of Pachomius (cenobitic) directed. But notwithstanding these attempts at reform and sobriety, extravagance and fanaticism, idleness and a constant tendency to insanity, have always been the charges brought against the hermits or desert-monks. In Syria, and throughout the whole tract of country between Egypt and the Black Sea, bands of hermits were found by Cassianus during his tour of inquiry (fourth and fifth centuries), roaming about, or dancing, or given over to perpetual inward prayer, or, in fine, in some cases, to the grossest licentious-ness. Attempts were made to encourage the hermits to grow corn, and to make clothes for the poor in the great cities. But their bad character still continued. And the 42nd Canon of the Trullan Council (at the end of the seventh century) was compelled to forbid the entrance or sojourn of hermits in the cities.

From the eremitic stage of Monasticism taken by itself, it is obvious that nothing can be inferred as to the value or propriety of Christian asceticism; [1] because that form of the movement was not in its origin a product of the Christian spirit, but of the circumstances of the times; [2] because the Pagan element in it always tended to predominate; and, lastly, because the extravagances of it were condemned by men like Jerome and Augustine, who approved of Monasticism.

The Christian hermits of Egypt espoused the cause of Athanasius against the Arians, and as the adherents of the orthodox faith some of them were brought by him to Rome, and the ascetic life propagated in a new region under new conditions. Athanasius' Life of St. Antony [Opp., Bened. Ed. vol. ii.] is one of the best authorities for the eremitic life in Egypt, and was one of the principal instruments of its propagation in the West. [Asceticism. Monasticism.]

HIERARCHY. A Greek term signifying a sacred principality instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ in His Church, and consisting of an order of persons consecrated to God, who all, in divers degrees of order and power, contribute to the observance of the law of God and the greater glory of His Name. Our Lord, the chief Bishop, chose out twelve apostles and seventy disciples, corresponding to the twelve princes of tribes and the seventy elders, who with Moses governed God's ancient people, in order to shew that His Church is the true spiritual Israel of God. St. Paul gave authority to Timothy and Titus to constitute bishops and deacons; St. Paul exercised visitation over the priests summoned to Ephesus; with St. Barnabas he ordained priests [Acts xiv. 23]; St. Peter gave charge to priests and deacons [1 Pet. v. 1-5]; and St. John received Divine commission to exercise authority over the seven angels or bishops of the churches of Asia. In order to preserve the unity of the Church, Christendom was divided into dioceses, each with a number of priests and deacons under one head, the bishop, to regulate the faith and manners of the people, and to minister to them in God's Name. The hierarchy embraces the power of jurisdiction and of order, considered as a principality; and in respect of being an order, it represents the spiritual Church set in an array as an army with banners, and composed of different ranks [1 Cor. xii. 28; Ephes. iv. 11], for even the extraordinary members of the Church, as prophets, were under the Apostolical authority [Acts xv. 22, 32]. The subordination of ministers amongst themselves, and the variety of their functions, produce a concord and unity which constitute the distinctive character of the Church of God. The hierarchy of order was established to sanctify the Body of Christ, and is composed of all persons in orders. The hierarchy of jurisdiction was established for the government of the faithful and to promote their eternal holiness, and is composed of prelates. The hierarchy of order by ministration of the Sacraments and preaching the Gospel aims at elevating and hallowing the spiritual life; the hierarchy of jurisdiction is for the promotion of exterior discipline. The hierarchy of order confers no jurisdiction, but simply power to perform ecclesiastical functions and administer sacraments, whereas the other hierarchy bestows jurisdiction, and consequently the right of making ordinances concerning the faith and ecclesiastical discipline, and to correct offenders. The principal duty of ministers of the Church is to lead men to the knowledge and worship of God, and the Church therefore requires laws and rules for the guidance of her ministers. The hierarchy of order, that of the ministration of the Word and Sacraments, appertains to all clergy according to the measure of their power; the hierarchy of jurisdiction, which is in fact the hierarchy, being the chief power of the Church, pertains to prelates alone, but cannot exist without the other hierarchy, although the latter can be without jurisdiction, which it presupposes, and is its foundation. In the one the clerical character or order, i.e. the ecclesiastical office, only is regarded, in the other the degree, the rank in jurisdiction of a prelate, is alone considered. Both have one origin and one object, and both flow from the clerical character; but order is of divine right, jurisdiction an ecclesiastical necessity, with its differences of chief bishops, prelacies, and ranks of ministers. [Jurisdiction.]

HILLEL, of ennobled Babylonian family, came as a very poor youth to Jerusalem, in the time of Shemaia and Abtalion, the Sameas and Pollio of Josephus. He died at the advanced age of an hundred and twenty years [A.D. 8], and was father of Simeon, who received the infant Saviour in his arms on the Presentation. The Talmud [Joma, 35 b] quotes the case of Hillel to shew that poverty does not exempt a man from a deep study of the law; for when Hillel arrived at Jerusalem he was glad to earn the lowest daily wages for his living, the half of which he paid at the door of the Beth-Midrash for daily instruction. One day he had earned nothing, and was repulsed by the doorkeeper; he climbed to the roof therefore, and lying down by the skylight opening, listened to the words of wisdom beneath. A snow-storm came on, but still he listened, until he became drowsy, and at length sunk into a state of coma, and so remained all night. The next morning two rabbin on entering observed that the opening above was darkened unaccountably, and on examination found Hillel senseless. By unguents and other rabbinical remedies they at length restored life. It is the Talmudical instance of the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties. Hillel became known to fame when in a particular year the Paschal day coincided with the ordinary Sabbath. No lunar cycle had been laid down, and the fact came suddenly upon the authorities on the "birth" of the new moon. It was an old difficulty; which was to take precedence, the feast or the Sabbath? Hillel by this time had become known as a favourite scholar of Abtalion, lately dead; and the Temple conclave, hoping that the young Rab could declare the opinion of the late Nasî, sent for him, and he at once pronounced in favour of the festival as a tradition received from his master. After a lengthy discussion, it was decided that the feast should take precedence, and Hillel was appointed Nasî, just one hundred years before the destruction of the second temple. It was a common saying[1] that three times the observance of the Law had received its adjustment from Babylon; under Ezra, from Hillel, and from Chija. The Nasîship was hereditary in the family of Hillel for four hundred and fifty years, down to as late as A.D. 415. Hillel's scholars, during his long tenure of office, were numbered by thousands, of whom eighty are noticed in the Talmud; the last of them was Jonathan ben Zachai, who is said to have predicted the accession of Titus to the imperial purple, and the destruction of the Temple forty years before the occurrence; for which, however, a tolerably acute political vision would suffice [Gittim. 56]. Hillel first framed hermeneutical rules for the scientific exegesis of the Law, which are to be found in the introduction to the Talmud, imitated evidently from the Greek grammarians. They were, in the first instance, seven, but increased afterwards to thirteen, and eventually to thirty-two canons. The Rulers of the Tanaite series, from Simon the Just [B.C. 320], run in pairs, and Hillel, as president, had Shammai associated with him as his vice-president, or Ab Beth Dîn. The two men were completely antagonistic in their character; Hillel courteous, and genial, and charitable in his opinions; Shammai, the harsh, dogmatic, unbending Pharisee. The rival dicta of the two schools are for ever placed in apposition by the Talmud, and the liberality of Hillel's views stand in favourable contrast with the moroseness of Shammai. The decisions of the two, however, were accepted as equally orthodox; Hillel was right, yet Shammai was no heretic; the two made one many-sided man; and the difference of opinion only caused cases, as they offered themselves, to be considered in every possible point of view. The pupils, however, of the two teachers took more vehement action, and the Talmud says that even blood was spilled by them in honour of the rival masters.

These opposite characters are contrasted in frequent Talmudic examples, and more especially in their bearing towards proselytes. Shammai often repulsed them with a rough answer, while Hillel always gave a fair hearing; and if they approached in a wrong spirit, he took a Socratic method of convincing them of their error. "I wish to become a Jew," said one man to Shammai, "because I should like to be high priest." On meeting with a rude repulse, he tried the colleague. Hillel took him in hand, and, after a little preliminary instruction, led him on to the constitution of the priesthood in the Law, and shewed him that any but a descendant of Aaron who attempted to exercise priestly functions was punishable with death. The proselyte at once said, "If this is the case with a son of Israel, how would it fare with me?" Another wished to make short work of preliminary instruction, and insisted on its being communicated in the briefest terms [Shabbath, 16]. "Good," said Hillel, "the whole substance of Judaism is to do nothing to others that you dislike yourself [Tobit iv. 13], all else is comment on this text." He soon became a promising candidate. A third would hear nothing of tradition, which he entirely repudiated. Hillel taught him the Hebrew alphabet; the next day he went through the letters in a broken order. "But how is this?" said the Gentile, "you taught it me yesterday as it was written." "You had faith in my teaching yesterday," said his master; "place the same confidence in me now when I teach the same truths in an unwritten but no less necessary order for the development of knowledge." It was thus that Hillel practised his own maxim, "Be a scholar of Aaron, a peace-maker, a friend of all men, and draw them on to the Law." As another example of difference of disposition, it is said that discussion having arisen with respect to the future condition of the good, the bad, and those of mixed moral character, Shammai pronounced that the first would be blessed, the next infallibly punished, and the third punished also, but purified by suffering, and that there was hope for them in the end. Hillel agreed with respect to the two first, but of the latter he said, "the Divine balance will incline to mercy, for God is gracious." The school of Shammai adopted the Hindû notion that life is a penal condition, and that it were better never to have been born. That of Hillel took the sounder view, and said "it is good for us to have lived, the world is our scene of trial, and activity is our happiness." Hillel had renounced all hope of a coming Messiah [Sanhedrin]; but stood forth as the leader of learned opinion in the way of reform, and advocated a liberal construction of precepts that were no longer suited to the altered condition of the people. That he should meet with opposition was only certain, and he seems to allude to his difficulties in the dark saying: "If I am not for mine own self (i.e. care not for my soul's health by obeying the dictates of conscience), who will be for me? If for myself alone (if I keep my plans of improvement pent up in my own bosom), what am I? And if not now (if I listen to those that say that time is not ripe for action), when? Time is ever on the move, the present is the seed-time of futurity, and we are posterity's debtors." His decisions were all of a practical cast. Lev. xxv. 29, 30 ordains that if a man sell his house in a walled town, he might redeem it before the expiration of the year. It had become the practice for the purchaser to make this impossible by absenting himself from the town and locking up the house towards the expiration of the year. Hillel decided that a forcible entry might be effected by the vendor, and the purchase-money lodged in the chancery of Israel, the Temple, in trust for the purchaser. "He hath a constructive right, said the judge, and he must not be debarred of his right because the other useth cunning." So again, which was a more hazardous reform, as involving a change in the very law itself; all debts, by Lev. xxv. 35-37, were to be free of usury, and to be remitted in the seventh year, "the year of release" [Deut. xv. 9]. Such a provision could only be operative in a very inartificial state of society. But money, like everything else, became a marketable commodity; to borrow no longer implied the pressure of poverty, commerce requiring its loans; to lend no longer shewed a large-hearted liberality, it became a matter of business. If now it were to be within the power of the debtor in every seventh year to repudiate loans, business would be brought to a standstill, and social progress effectually checked. Therefore Hillel ruled that the Mosaic precept was only for a time; that a new state of things had been called into existence, and the precept must be modified. The law must be made no cloak for roguery, and all money transactions must thenceforth be completed in open court, under covenant that the "year of release" was to be no acquittance for the debt. All after ages have declared that Hillel was right. What should prevent a like modification of both law and Talmud now to suit the altered condition of society? The more characteristic features of the law, repeated also in the Talmud, have become inoperative from desuetude and impossibility of practice; the sacrifices, the Temple worship, and the priesthood. Is time to be the only innovator, and nothing left to the reason with which God has endowed His children? "Elias shall yet come," say the Jews: they rather need Hillel.

[1] Seder Haddoroth, 91 c; Juchasin, 56 a.

Hillel first led the way for a complete digest of the traditional Halacoth, or decisions, that had accumulated from the days of Ezra. He arranged them under the six heads that were retained by Judah the Holy, compiler of the Mishna at the end of the second century [Juchasin, 56 A; Seder Haddoroth, 91 c.]. Of the lost works of Hillel mentioned in the Talmud, those most to be regretted are a Mishnic treatise on the Feasts of the Jewish Church; to which the Taanith Rabbinical treatises have been probably indebted; and a history of the Maccabees, which survived for so considerable a time that its reappearance is not absolutely "præter spem." Among the sayings attributed to Hillel may be quoted from the Aboth: "Separate not thyself from the congregation, and have no confidence in thyself till the day of thy death." "Judge not thy neighbour till thou hast been in like position." "Where a man is wanted, be thou the man." "More meat, more maggot; more wealth, more care; more maids, more sauciness; more helps, more pilfering. But more Torah, more life; more schools, more wisdom; more reflection, more reason; more kind acts, more union."

Such was the first truly large-hearted man that we meet with in the Talmud. As an earnest reformer of all that needed reform, he indicated principles that may yet bear fruit; the hope of Israel is bound up in them. [TALMUD.]

HOMILY [Ὁμιλία]. This word was originally analogous to our English word "discourse," and, like it, meant a converse between two or more persons. But in ecclesiastical language it seems never to have had any other meaning than that of a religious address, founded on some longer or shorter passage of Holy Scripture. Collections of such homilies are very numerous. Those of primitive times are our great treasuries of patristic doctrine, and appear sometimes to have been preached from written notes, while at others they were given extempore, and taken down by some of the hearers. The earliest known are those of Origen; the Clementine Homilies, named after St. Clement of Rome, being of later date. The Homilies of St. Clement of Alexandria, St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, St. Athanasius, St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. Gregory the Great, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, St. Cyril of Alexandria, and others of the Fathers, are expositions of Holy Scripture of the very highest value, and some, as those of St. Chrysostom, have never been surpassed as examples of pulpit eloquence.

In mediæval times Homiliaria, or books of homilies, were widely circulated among the clergy. The Festivale, or Liber Festivalis, was such a collection, and was printed by Caxton as early as A.D. 1482. Those issued in the reign of Edward VI. and Queen Elizabeth are too well known to need more than a passing mention. [POSTIL. Griffith's ed. of Homilies.]

HOMOIOUSION. Of "a like, or similar, substance" with the Father. A term devised after the rise of the Arian controversy as a sort of middle theory between the Catholic doctrine of Homoousion and the extreme opinion of Arius, who believed that Christ was wholly unlike the Father, or a mere created Being. [ARIANISM.]

HOMOOUSION, i.e. "of the same substance." The word adopted by the Council of Nice to express the reality of our Lord's Sonship, or that He is of the same Divine Nature with the Father, in opposition to the heretical teaching of Arius. [ARIANISM.]

HOSANNA. Hosanna, the well-known refrain of the Jewish Processional, taken from the close of the Hallel Collection [HALLEL. Psa. cxviii. 25]. Its more especial use appears to have been connected with the Feast of Tabernacles. The Talmud [Tr. Succoth, iii. 9], says, "There is a place beneath Jerusalem named Motza; thither the people went, and gathered boughs of willows, which they brought back and set them up on the side of the altar, so that their heads were bent over the altar. . . . They went round about the altar and said, 'Hosanna Lord; we beseech thee, O Lord, send us now prosperity.'" Maimonides also [Halac. Lulab. vii. 23] says, with respect to the Feast of Tabernacles, "On each day they went about the altar, holding in their hands bunches of palm twigs [Lulab], saying 'Hosanna,' &c. On the last day they made seven circuits." It was therefore called the "Great Hosanna" day. The branches of willow and palm were also known by the name Hosanna, and children were expected to take their part in waving them [Succoth, iii. 15]. Hence the "children crying in the Temple, and saying, Hosanna to the Son of David," and our Lord's allusion to them, "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise" [Matt. xxi. 15, 16. See Lightfoot, Temp. S. xvi. 2; Buxtorf, Lexic. Talm. 992, 1143; Maimonides, Halac. Succah, vii.; Talmud, Tr. Succoth].

HOURS. By this term is signified the daily round of prayer and praise. The ancient order of the Canonical Hours is as follows:—

[1] Nocturns or Mattins.—Before daybreak (properly a night service).

[2] Lauds.—At daybreak, closely following mattins, if not actually joined on to it.

[3] Prime.—About six o'clock, "the first hour."

[4] Tierce or Terce.—At 9 A.M., "the third hour."

[5] Sexts.—At noon, "the sixth hour."

[6] Nones.—At 3 P.M., "the ninth hour."

[7] Vespers.—In the early evening.

[8] Compline.—The last evening service; at bedtime.

But as the office of lauds was very rarely separated from that of mattins, these eight "hours" of prayer were practically seven. At what time in the history of the Church they were settled in the form above mentioned is very uncertain. There is no doubt whatever that some of the "hours" are of most venerable antiquity. Tertullian [De Jejuniis, cap. 10, Opp. p. 708, ed. Paris, 1641], mentions the third, sixth, and ninth hours as "horas insigniores, Apostolicas." The Apostolical Constitutions [viii. 34] mention the hours as follows: "Ye shall make prayer in the morning, giving thanks because the Lord hath enlightened you, removing the night, and bringing the day; at the third hour, because the Lord then received sentence from Pilate; at the sixth, because He was crucified; at the ninth, because all things were shaken when the Lord was crucified, trembling at the audacity of the impious Jews, not enduring that their Lord should be insulted; at evening, giving thanks, because He hath given the night for rest from labour; at cockcrowing, because that hour gives glad tidings that the day is dawning in which to work the works of light."

To this early mention of various hours of prayer it must be added [1], that the Eastern offices for daily worship were introduced into the West in the fifth century, and the Western offices bear testimony to their influence[1]; and [2], that in the time of St. Benedict [A.D. 530], a complete system of such offices was in existence, and adopted by the national Churches of the West, though differing in particulars of structure and arrangement.

This unanimity of practice can only be satisfactorily accounted for by the supposition that the custom of observing the hours of prayer was very ancient, if not apostolic. Perhaps the best explanation is that of Archdeacon Freeman,[2] viz., that these offices, "though neither of apostolic nor early post-apostolic date as Church services, had nevertheless probably existed in a rudimentary form, as private or household devotions, from a very early period, and had been received into the number of recognised public formularies previous to the reorganization of the Western Ritual after the Eastern model."

The example of the Psalmist [Ps. cxix. 164], "seven times a day do I praise Thee," would naturally have great influence upon the mind of the Church. But most of all did the Church of old time commemorate mystically, in the seven canonical hours, the sufferings of her Lord—

> "At mattins bound, at prime reviled,
> Condemned to death at tierce,
> Nailed to the Cross at sext, at nones
> His blessed side they pierce.
>
> They take Him down at vesper-tide,
> In grave at compline lay:
> Who thenceforth bids His Church observe
> Her sevenfold hours alway."[3]

The derivation of the names of the hours is in most cases obvious; viz. from the time of day at which they were said. Mattins (from "matutinæ"), the early morning office; prime, terce, sext, nones, at the first, third, sixth, and ninth hours respectively, and vespers at eventide. Compline, or completorium, is said by Archdeacon Freeman to signify the completion of the day's services. The same author quotes from St. Basil[4] [A.D. 370] the expression πληρῶσαι τὴν ἡμέραν as referring to this service. St. Benedict, also, we are told [Rule, ch. 42], "places compline expressly after supper-time, thus recognising the Eastern nomenclature of ἀπόδειπνον."

In practice these services were very often accumulated, much as mattins, Litany, and the Holy Communion or the Ante-Communion office are accumulated now. At the time of the English Reformation they were used as distinct offices only by the stricter religious and the clergy. Hence it was thought better to have two solemn services of public worship in the day; viz. Mattins, compiled from mattins, lauds, and prime; and Evensong, from vespers and compline. And this is in fact a very general practice in the Church throughout the world. Neale says that "there are in the Greek Church eight canonical hours; prayers are actually, for the most part, said three times daily—mattins, lauds, and prime, by aggregation, early in the morning; tierce, sexts, and the Liturgy (Communion) later; nones, vespers, and compline, by aggregation, in the evening."

And so, also, is it in the West. "Except in monastic bodies," says the same writer,[5] "the breviary as a Church office is scarcely ever used as a whole. You may go, we do not say from church to church, but from cathedral to cathedral

[1] Freeman's Principles of Div. Serv. i. 223.

[2] Principles of Div. Ser. p. 219.

[3] Neale, Essays on Liturgiology, &c., p. 6.

[4] St. Basil, Regul. ix. 37, ap. Bon.

[5] Essays on Liturg. &c. p. 46.

of Central Europe, and never hear mattins, save at high festivals. In Spain and Portugal it is somewhat more frequent, but there, as everywhere, it is a clerical devotion exclusively. . . . Then the lesser hours are not often publicly said except in cathedrals, and then principally by aggregation, and in connection with mass. . . . In no national Church under the sun are so many mattin services daily said as in our own."

It is right to add that the seven hours formed the basis of what are called the "Primers." English editions of these set forth by authority in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and of Queen Elizabeth, shew that the English Reformers did not wish to discourage the observance of the ancient hours of prayer. And so late as 1627, by command of Charles I., Dr. (afterwards Bishop) Cosin published a "Collection of Private Devotions, in the practice of the Ancient Church called the Hours of Prayer; as they were after this manner published by authority of Queen Elizabeth, 1560," &c. [Freeman, Princ. of Div. Serv., vol. i.; Neale, Essays on Liturgiology and Church History, Essay I.; Procter on Prayer Book, chap. i.]

HUGUENOTS. The Protestants of France have been generally known by the name of Huguenots, which denotes confederates, although the term has been applied to those of other countries as well. The doctrines of the Reformation were first preached in France by Calvin in 1536, and gained ground so rapidly in spite of the persecutions of Francis I., that a synod was held in 1559, and in 1561 the Venetian ambassador, Micheli, reported to his government that no province in France was free from them. In the sixteenth century the French nobility more especially embraced the Calvinist doctrines, while the peasantry for the most part adhered to the Roman Catholic faith. The Protestant party was, in fact, in that age mostly identified with the factious struggles of the nobles of France, and its cause mostly meant the cause of one or other of the great families against its rivals, or especially against the ascendancy of the powerful house of Guise.

The first edict which recognised the legal existence of the Huguenots was issued in 1562, by Catherine de Medicis, regent during the minority of her son Charles IX. This edict, which granted the Calvinists liberty of worship outside the towns, was, however, followed by war. In 1570 the peace of St. Germain produced a temporary calm, terribly disturbed in 1572, by the massacre of St. Bartholomew, planned by Catherine de Medicis, and sanctioned by Charles IX. It was intended by that butchery to effect the extermination of the Huguenots, but the war was nevertheless continued during the reigns of Charles IX. and Henry III. It assumed a new character at the accession of the Huguenot king of Navarre, known as Henry IV., to the throne of France in 1589. The Catholic League refused to acknowledge the authority of a Protestant king, and thus found themselves in arms against the throne. Henry IV. gained over the League the battle of Arques in 1589, and Ivry in 1590; but in 1593 renounced his religion in the hope of ending the conflicts by which France was desolated. The celebrated Edict of Nantes was granted to the Huguenots by him in 1598. By this edict they were not only allowed to enjoy liberty of worship, but to retain possession of all the churches then in their hands, to share in the benefits of all institutions for public instruction, and to stand on a footing of equality with their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects as regarded the chambers of parliament. In the reign of Louis XIII., son of Henry IV., an edict (issued in 1617) restored the property of the Roman Catholic Church in Bearn, which had become almost a Huguenot province. When the power of Richelieu was firmly established, he determined to crush the Huguenots, not so much on account of their religion as because he looked on them in the light of a political party, opposed to the royal power, which he desired to render absolute. With this view, in 1628, he reduced La Rochelle, their stronghold, after a most determined resistance; and carrying out his policy of treating the Huguenots as a political party, he granted the Rochelois liberty of worship while he utterly destroyed their political privileges. The loss of La Rochelle was the deathblow of the Huguenot party as a power in the state. In 1629, the Duc de Rohan, the last of their leaders, made his submission, and by the peace of Alais, signed on the 28th of June in that year, an amnesty and the free exercise of their religion was granted to the Huguenots on condition that they should destroy their fortifications, lay down their arms, and take the oath of allegiance to the king. This peace formally terminated the wars of religion in France, and from that time the history of the Huguenots is that of a party suffering for religion alone. The reign of Louis XIII. ended in 1643. From the peace of Alais in 1629, to the death of Mazarin in 1661, the Huguenots enjoyed comparative freedom from persecution, but a gradual defection of noble families went on unceasingly from their ranks.

The death of Mazarin forms an epoch in their history. In the following year, A.D. 1662, an edict was published, which forbad them to inter their dead except at daybreak or at nightfall. In 1663 another decree excused new converts from payment of debts previously contracted with their fellow-religionists. In 1665 it was decreed that the children of Huguenots should be allowed to declare themselves Roman Catholics, if boys, at fourteen, and if girls, at twelve years of age; and also have in their power to demand an income from their parents proportioned to their position in life. In 1679 a decree ordered that converts who had relapsed into Protestantism should be banished, and their property confiscated. In 1680 all Huguenot clerks and notaries were deprived of their employments, marriages between Roman Catholics and Huguenots were forbidden, and the issue of such marriages declared illegitimate and incapable of succession. In 1681 a royal declaration granted permission to Huguenot children to declare themselves converts at the age of seven years. One of these children describes her conversion as follows :—"Je pleurai d'abord beaucoup ; mais je trouvai le lendemain la messe du roi si belle, que je consentis à me faire catholique, à condition que je l'entendrois tous les jours, et qu'on me garantiroit du fouet. C'est là toute la controverse qu'on employa, et la seule abjuration que je fis." [Souvenirs de Mad. de Caylus.] Other edicts forbade Huguenot physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries to exercise their profession. In 1681 and 1684 regiments of soldiers were sent into Poitou and Bearn to be quartered on the inhabitants, and this was made a means of harassing the Huguenots by the unjust method in which the distribution of the soldiers into their quarters was made, and by the insolent violence of the soldiers themselves. The instructions given to the provincial authorities were—"Si, suivant une répartition juste, les religionnaires en devoient porter dix, vous pouvez leur en faire donner vingt" [Rhulière, Eclaircissements Hist.]. The greatest possible brutalities on the part of the soldiers towards the Huguenots were practised and encouraged, and these military missions became known by the name of "dragonnades," from the dragoons who bore the chief part in them.

Finally, at the instance of the Chancellor Le Tellier, then at the point of death, the Edict of Nantes was revoked on the 2nd of October 1685. This revocation enacted that all edicts of tolerance should be null and void, that all Huguenot churches should be destroyed, and their pastors, if found in France after fifteen days, sent to the galleys ; that all Huguenot schools should be abolished ; and lastly, that a term of four months should be allowed to refugees, during which time they might return to France and abjure their religion, but that after that time all their goods should be confiscated. In consequence of this revocation of the Edict of Nantes, many thousands of merchants, manufacturers, and artizans left their homes and carried their industry and skill into Holland, England, Denmark, and other countries. Not less than three hundred thousand persons are said to have left France in 1685-6, and from the confiscation of their property not less than seventeen millions of livres passed into the hands of the crown. At the death of Louis XIV. in 1715, the Huguenots entertained hopes of relief from persecution, but the edicts still continued in force, although, in 1717, a proposition was made in the Council of State to grant Douai to them as a free town for the exercise of their religion. The proposition was never carried into effect, and additions were made to the persecuting edicts. Sismondi remarks : "On vit avec étonnement dans siècle incrédule, lorsque ce pouvoir était aux mains d'un prince sans foi et sans probité, et d'une courtisane sans pudeur, renouveler une persécution que la foi rigide de Louis XIV. pouvait à peine faire comprendre." Even in 1746, when decency was banished from the Court of France, the galleys were filled with Huguenot pastors, and Huguenot women were imprisoned for no crime but their religion. It was not until the teachings of Voltaire had almost destroyed, for a time, the faith of the country, already rendered utterly corrupt in morals by the scandalous example of the court, and until the growing principles of the Revolution had made themselves felt, that the sect enjoyed tranquillity and freedom from persecution.

It must not be forgotten, however, in recording the sufferings of the Huguenots, that the spirit of the age was one of persecution, and that the martyr for his own faith, if he had possessed the power, would have inflicted the same punishment he himself suffered on those who differed from him. While the sons of Catherine de Medicis were pursuing their cruel measures in France, all priests of the Roman sect were ordered by the English Parliament to quit the country within forty days, under pain of death if they remained or returned, and all who gave them shelter or relief were made subject to the penalties of felony. While Richelieu was granting liberty of worship to the conquered Huguenots of La Rochelle, Sir Robert Cotton was balancing the arguments : "Whether it be more expedient to suppress Popish practices against the due allegiance to his Majesty by strict execution touching Jesuits and seminary priests ;" or, as the more merciful alternative, "to restrain them to close prisons during life, if no reformation follow ;" and the Puritans were clamouring against the king for his hesitation about putting the laws against Roman Catholics into effect. If Huguenot schools were abolished, it was the opinion of a celebrated Englishman, "Whosoever shall send his children to be popishly brought up in foreign parts, I think that for punishment both one and the other worthily might be disfranchised of the privilege due to Englishmen, so far forth as any good by the laws may descend to them, but not to be exempted from the penalties thereof." While Louis XIV., in after times, was sending to the galleys and imprisoning his Huguenot subjects, the English nation was blindly led by the infamous Oates, and his fellow-impostors, and the aged Lord Stafford was being beheaded.

We cannot afford to speak of the barbarity of the dragonnades, when we remember that only two years before, when an unjust sentence of death was given against the Roman Catholic lawyer Langhorne, the court was filled with shouts of joy from the spectators, while the witnesses for the defence were cruelly ill-treated and intimidated by the people of London ; or when we recall the fact that in the same year five Jesuits were condemned to death and executed. The records of the past shew too plainly that the stigma of persecution attached itself in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to all creeds and parties without distinction.

HYMNS, or divine songs sung with musical cadence, are of the highest antiquity in the Church.[1] We find no period of the Church, whether before or after the day of Christ, in which hymns were not used as handmaids to devotion. The earliest on record is that which Miriam and her choir of damsels sung with timbrels, when Israel came out of Egypt [Exod. xv.]. The song of Deborah was such an hymn [Judg. v.]. The hymn sung in honour of David, and accompanied with "tabrets and instruments of music," was an antiphonal hymn, the women answering one another as they played [1 Sam. xviii. 6]. The Psalms of David were written for the most part as hymns to be sung with musical accompaniments [1 Chron. vi. 31, xvi. 5]; and were so sung [2 Chron. xx. 21, xxix. 30]. In the Captivity, the songs of Zion were still vocal, though in sorrow and sadness [Psa. cxxxvii.]; and two hundred singing men and singing women returned again to Jerusalem [Ezra ii. 65], or as Nehemiah says, with greater precision, two hundred and forty-five [Neh. vii. 67]. When the temple was re-dedicated after its desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was "with songs and citherns and harps and cymbals" [1 Macc. iv. 54], and one of the songs used would seem to have been the Hosanna Psalm; the word ἐυοδήσαντι [v. 55], having been suggested by εὐόδησον δή in Psa. cxviii. 25. The same Psalm was a portion of the Hallel group [Psa. cxiii.-cxviii.] appointed to be sung at the Feast of Tabernacles, and also at the Paschal feast, both in the Temple when a lamb was slain for every household, and at the subsequent solemnity held under every roof [HALLEL. HOSANNA]; and to this custom allusion was doubtless made when our Lord and His disciples are said, ὑμνήσαντες, to have gone forth from the room where the Last Supper had been celebrated [Matt. xxvi. 30]. The services of the Christian Church were derived in all their principal features from the Temple and the synagogue, and on Easter Sunday the Proper Psalms for the afternoon are the beginning and ending of the Hallel Hymn [cxiii. cxiv. cxviii.], which formed the last solemn words of devotion used by our Lord before He suffered. In the New Testament the "Magnificat," the "Song of Simeon," and the inspired utterance of Zacharias, are holiest hymns. St. Paul also bids the Colossians [iii. 16] teach and admonish "one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs." In the account of the martyrdom of Ignatius we read of funeral hymns [sec. 25]. In the Clementine De g. Petri, whose authority on such a point may be allowed, hymns are seen to have had a precatory form,[1] ἱερῶν ὕμνων εὐχήν, and to have formed an invariable element in divine worship [sec. 152, 153]. Similarly the Apostolical Constitutions are of high antiquity, and preserve to us the morning and evening hymn used in primitive times—the first draught of the angelic hymn of the Eucharistic service. The hymn itself has descended to us, as the greater doxology, from the earliest ages;[2]

[1] Si sit laus, et Dei laus, et non cantetur, non est hymnus. Oportet, ut sit hymnus, habeat hæc tria, et laudem, et Dei, et canticum. [Aug. in Psa. lxxii.]

[1] So Hannah "prayed and said" a hymn of praise. [1 Sam. ii.]

[2] Among the remains of Cyril Lucarius, edited by T. Smith; also towards the end of the Treatise de Virginit. ascribed to Athanasius. It is found in the third volume of Mr. Harvey's Vindex Catholicus at p. 317.

and was apparently used by Polycarp at the very moment that fire was applied to the pile.[3] Innocent III. ascribes it to Telesphorus.[4] Polycarp therefore may have learned it at Rome. Allusion is made to it by Origen [c. Cels.],[5] by Pliny doubtless as the "carmen" that Christians sung to Christ as God;[6] and it was very possibly the πολυώνυμος ὠδή that provoked the scoffs of Lucian.[7] [Compare also Basil, de Sp. S. sec. 73]. Gregory Nazianzen and Synesius have left many hymns. It is to be hoped that closer communion with the Eastern branch of the Church Catholic will before long put us in possession of their entire hymnology, of which for the present our knowledge is very partial. The τρισάγιον of the Greek Church is the Sanctus of the West.[8] The Western Church has always been particularly rich in its hymnal; some of its most noble hymns descend from Ambrose, Archbishop of Milan, in the fourth century,[9] remarkable for their terse yet delicate beauty, also for their correctness as dimetre iambics. Gregory the Great has left hymns also in the same metre, one which is very much better adapted to his noble intonement than the versification "solute fluens" of the Psalms.[10] His is the noble Pentecostal Hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus" ascribed by Daniel to Charlemagne, who was scarcely equal to the elegancies of Latin composition. The hymn, according to Mone, occurs in MSS. older than the Carlovingian period. "Salve Mundi Salutare" is a noble hymn by Bernard; "Pange lingua Gloriosi" is the work of Venantius Fortunatus or Mamertus Claudianus in the fifth century. The two, "Stabat Mater" and "Dies Iræ" were written in the fourteenth century; the first by Jacopone da Lodi, the last by T. di Celano.[11] Prudentius was the most prolific writer of sacred poetry and hymns in the Middle Ages. Some we have also of the Venerable Bede[12] and Thomas Aquinas. Successful

[3] Martyr. Polyc. sec. 14.

[4] Innoc. de Myst. Miss. ii. 20.

[5] viii. p. 422, ed Cantab.

[6] Ep. Plin. Sec. ad Trajanum Imp.

[7] Philopatris.

[8] Ἅγιος ὁ Θεός, ἅγιος ὁ ἰσχυρός, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς.

[9] Such as "Te Deum Laudamus," but the authorship is not absolutely certain. By many it is ascribed to Hilary. "Intende qui regis Israel" on the Advent; "Illuminans Altissimus" on the Theophany; "Illuxit orbi jam dies" on the Epiphany; "Hic est dies verus Dei," Vesper hymn from Easter to Holy Thursday; "Jam Christus astra ascenderat" for Whitsunday; "Splendor paternæ gloriæ," quoted by Hincmar of Rheims as Ambrosian.

[10] e.g., "Ex more docti mystico" for Lent, of which the following is a verse:—

> Utamur ergo parcius
> Verbis, cibis, et potibus,
> Somno, jocis, et arctius
> Perstemus in custodia.

"Primo dierum omnium" for the first day of the week, mattins; and for the next "Immense cœli Conditor," vespers; "Telluris ingens Conditor," vespers; "Rerum Creator optime," nocturns; "Nox atra rerum contegit," nocturns; "Tu Trinitatis Unitas," nocturns.

[11] See a highly interesting passage on Latin Hymnology in Dean Milman's Lat. Chr. vol. vi. p. 491.

[12] e.g., "Primo Deus cœli globum," on the Hexaëmeron.

vernacular translations were made at an early date, e.g., the Norman version of the Horæ Canonicæ (Compline)—

A l'oure deregne de complye le corps est enterrée
De mon tres noble seignour, par qi la vie est expirée
Et en mort de douche odours les escriptours sount consummée
En memoire continuelment me soit la mort, dont sumes curée.

The romance of the Cid has scarcely a more majestic flow. Compare also the old German "Passions lied"—

Da daz eruez wart ufgericht
Da hing er also jemerlich
Mit uszgespanten armen.
Ach menseh, sieh an die grosse noth
Und losz dich es erbarmen.

Der Herr erlitt so maneh dorechten
Von rittern, von fuersten, und von kneehten,
Iz gespoett was so manigfaltig
Sie sprachen ; Bist du Christus Gottes Son,
So maeh dich selbs behalten.

Der Herr der bat vuer sine fynd,
Er verzieg dem scheeher alle sine suend
Der scheeher bat in mit flisse,
Der Herr gab im me dan er begert,
Er verhiez ym daz paradisze.

Mone, pp. 106, 109.

Our modern hymnals have long been a standing proof of the difficulty of writing good hymns. The best are some of the latest. And they are the best because they have caught something of the spirit of the hymns of the mediæval period, solemn and majestic in the thoughts conveyed, and most sweet in their musical cadence. A good hymn, apart from its accessory of music, should be full of melody, so as to win its way to the heart of a people; but it should convey at the same time grand and solemn thoughts, far removed as well from familiarity as from severity of tone. Each hymn also should have its own musical notation, so as to rest upon the memory complete in all its parts, in its rhythm, its holy guidance of the thoughts, and its harmonic sympathy with the world of sense. [See Cassander, Hymni Eccl.; Geo. Fabricius, Poet. vet. Eccl.; Daniel, Thes. Hymnol.; Mone, Lat. H.; R. C. Trench, Sacred Lat. Po.; Neale, Hymni Eccles.]

HYPERDULIA [ὑπερδουλεία]. A term used in Roman theology for a degree of worship between Latria, which is offered to God only, and Dulia, which is offered to ordinary saints. Hyperdulia is that degree of worship which is offered to the Blessed Virgin Mary alone, as the most exalted in grace and honour of all created beings. It needs hardly to be added that the theoretical distance between Latria and Hyperdulia is as infinite as that between the Uncreated and the created. It is a disputed point whether this theoretical difference is generally recognised in the practical worship of the Romanized churches.

St. Thomas Aquinas makes a subtle distinction between the Human Nature of Christ contemplated in union with His Divine Nature, and as contemplated per se, and decides that in the latter case hyperdulia and not latria is to be offered [Summa Theol. iii. 9, xxv. 2].

HYPOSTASIS. To meddle with philosophical terms, on the force and meaning of which all parties are not agreed, is to play with double-edged tools. An unskilled use of the Hegelian terms "objective" and "subjective" may easily shew the defender of orthodoxy as a Pantheist. And almost throughout the Arian controversy one half of the Christian world regarded the other half with suspicion, because the precise meaning of the theological term "hypostasis" had never been clearly defined; this would have been done by the Council of Alexandria [A.D. 324] if the advice of Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, had been followed. The Greek Church, according to Grotius [John i. 2; Heb. i. 3], having received the term through Origen from the Greek philosophy, understood by it a real personal subsistence; "reality" being the fundamental idea involved in the word. So in Aristotle [de Mundo, iv. 21] καθ' ὑπόστασιν, "in reality," is the correlative of κατ' ἔμφασιν, "in appearance." In Heb. i. 3, "the express image of His Hypostasis" is rendered "Person" by our translators, after the Vulgate. The word occurs elsewhere in the New Testament, but in the sense, adopted from LXX., of "confident expectation," as the translation of the Hebrew term "Tikvath," &c. And no better term than "hypostasis" in the sense of "reality" could have been chosen to give theological expression to that which is so far beyond our power to conceive; the distinct individuality, and relative bearing of the Three Persons in the Holy and Undivided Trinity each to other; τὸ ἴδιον παρὰ τὸ κοινόν as Suidas expresses it; self-existent and incommunicable, and altogether distinct from the intercommunicated substance of the Deity. Before the time of Arius the term "hypostasis" had that meaning and that only which is here assigned to it, viz., a "real personal subsistence." But the idea of "reality" also applies to substance and being, and this was the application that Arius gave to it. "There are three hypostases," he said, but he meant natures, substances, and that the Nature of the Son and Spirit were different from each other and different from the Nature of the Father [Arius, ad Alex. A.D. 324, ap. Athanas. de Synod. and Tomus ad Antiochenos, sec. 5]. The Nature of the Son is one with the Nature of the Father; the Hypostasis of the Son is derived from the Hypostasis of the Father, as Sonship is a derivative from Paternity. This Arius denied, and affirmed that the Son was ἐξ ἑτέρας οὐσίας and ἐξ ἑτέρας ὑποστάσεως. Therefore the Council of Nice anathematized in him all who said that the Son was quâ Nature ἐξ ἑτέρας οὐσίας, of any other substance but the One Godhead, or quâ Person ἐξ ἑτέρας τινος ὑποστάσεως, of any other person save the person of the Father. Up to this point the language of the Church had always been the same. But the clamorous assertion of three hypostases in an heretical sense by Arius introduced confusion. The Latin Church had hitherto continued free from error. In any case of difficulty the eyes of the Catholic reverted to the "See of the Apostles." In this instance, however, it only increased the confusion. "Persona," the equivalent for πρόσωπον, was the term that expressed to the Western Church the Catholic meaning of ὑπόστασις. There was no Latin word for οὐσία until Hilary coined the term "essentia" [de Synodis]; in the meantime the language of theology could not remain incomplete, and the want was supplied by taking ὑπόστασις, the philosophical equivalent for οὐσία [Jerome, Ep. 57 ad Damasum.], and translating it sometimes as "substantia," sometimes as "subsistentia." Both of these words seem to express with equal accuracy the force of the Greek term; but there is a clear distinction to be observed between them. "Substantia" means the essence of a thing, the very root and foundation of its being, whereas in "subsistere" is contained the inherent idea of "check," "making a stand" as we should say. And there is the idea of "limitation" in "personality;" it has an "idiosyncracy" that is wholly its own. The limitation involved in "subsistentia" is the definition that marks the distinction of each Person in the Holy Trinity. The idea of Father is limited by Paternity; that of the Son by Filiation; that of the Holy Spirit by Procession from both Father and Son. So Hooker; "The substance of God with this property, to be of none, doth make the Person of the Father; the very self-same substance in number with this property to be of the Father, maketh the Person of the Son; the same substance having added to it the property of proceeding from the other two, maketh the Holy Ghost. So that in every Person there is implied both the substance of God which is one, and also that property which causeth the same Person to be really and truly to differ from the other two. Every Person hath his own subsistence which no other besides hath, although there be others beside that have the same substance" [Eccl. Pol. v. 51]. Hence from poverty of language [Basil, Ep. 349, ad Terent.] the terminology of the Western Church became confused, "substantia" being held to be the equivalent for ὑπόστασις, and the confusion did not fail to react upon the East. Thus Athanasius, as standing in close communication with the Roman Church, adopted its mode of speaking, and makes ὑπόστασις to be synonymous with οὐσία [Or. iii. c. Ar. c. 65]; though elsewhere he speaks of three hypostases [c. Ar. iv. 1]. The great council held at Sardica [A.D. 347] allowed the use of ὑπόστασις in the sense of οὐσία, for whereas Ursacius and Valens, as Arians, affirmed three hypostases, in the sense of substance, the council declared that in that sense the Divine Hypostasis was One. In the Meletian schism both that and the Eustathian party were orthodox in their faith, but while the latter adopted the Roman mode of speaking, and held that there was only one ὑπόστασις, meaning substance, in the Deity, the former used the language of primitive antiquity, and declared that there were three ὑποστάσεις, meaning Persons. The Council of Alexandria [A.D. 362], on examining the two parties, affirmed both to be equally orthodox, and that the difference was only verbal; though for the future it ruled that the words as well as the faith of the Nicene Council were to be held binding. Jerome [Ep. 57, ad Damasum. A.D. 376] deprecates the use of the expression "three hypostases" as savouring of Arianism. Perhaps, however, the time from whence uniformity of expression is to be dated is the Council of Alexandria [A.D. 362], where the term οὐσία was applied to "substance," and ὑπόστασις restricted once more to personal subsistence. The first synodal definition of "hypostasis" as "person" in contradistinction to substance was at the Council of the Dedication at Antioch [A.D. 341; Hilary, de Syn. 334]; and the writer who enforced the accurate distinction between οὐσία and ὑπόστασις was Basil [Ep. 349, ad Terent.].

I

ICONOCLASM is the name given to the religious struggle by which the Eastern Church was distracted in the eighth century, and which, as the name denotes, had for its object the destruction of images, under which term were included not only statues, but mosaics and paintings.

The contest is remarkable for owing its origin, not to the people or the rulers of the Church, but to the Emperor alone,[1] in the year A.D. 726, when an imperial edict suddenly appeared prohibiting the worship not only of statues but of paintings and mosaics. It was followed within a short time by another and more severe edict, which commanded the destruction of these objects of veneration. The edicts were very unfavourably received by the people of Constantinople, and by many provinces of the empire. One of the imperial officers, while carrying out an order he had received for the destruction of a famous image of the Saviour, was beaten to death by the populace; and in Greece an insurrection broke out, which, at one time, assumed so serious an aspect, that a rival emperor was proclaimed, and a fleet fitted out to support his pretensions. The patriarchs of the East and West, Germanus of Constantinople and Gregory of Rome, made common cause against Leo, but in vain. The appeals of Gregory were disregarded, and Germanus was driven from the patriarchal throne.

Constantine Copronymus succeeded Leo, his father, and inherited the same views. In his reign was held the third Council of Constantinople, at which three hundred and forty-eight bishops appeared. In this council image-worship was condemned, its principal supporters being anathematized; while it was declared that the only image of the Saviour which might lawfully be adored was in the Eucharist. None of the great patriarchs appeared at this council, and its enemies seem to have ground for pronouncing it to have been completely subservient to the Emperor's will, from the fact, that just before it assembled Constantine from the pulpit proclaimed the new patriarch of Constantinople, whose punishment came when, a few years later, the imperial will resolved on the extirpation of monasticism, and the patriarch, himself a monk, was compelled to break his oaths to God and the Church. The tyranny of Constantine Copronymus, and his cruel persecutions of the defenders of images, are almost incredible. In Thrace, the monks were allowed to choose between the renunciation of their vows and exile, accompanied by the loss of their eyesight. The patriarch himself, having offended the Emperor, was scourged and publicly degraded from his office; then, with shaved head and beard and eyebrows, was led in mockery on an ass before the rabble of the city, who spat on him and trampled him under their feet. A few days later he was beheaded by the Emperor's orders. Leo the Chazar succeeded Constantine, and distinguished himself by moderation and clemency. His wife, Irene, in secret favoured the cause of the image-worshippers, and when, at the death of her husband, she assumed the regency during the minority of her son Constantine, her sentiments were openly avowed, and under her protection the second Council of Nicæa assembled [A.D. 787]. The decision of this council was as follows:—"It enjoined that bowing and an honourable adoration (ἀσπασμὸν καὶ τιμητικὴν προσκύνησιν) should be offered to all sacred images, but that this external and inferior worship must not be confounded with the true and supreme worship (τὴν κατὰ πίστιν ἡμῶν ἀληθινὴν λατρείαν) which belongs exclusively to God." [Hardwicke, p. 82; Mansi, xiii. 377. A good summary is in Carranza, Summa Conc., A.D. 1655, p. 676.] Even after making every allowance for this reservation, and granting that a decree for deifying images, as asserted by some extreme advocates of image-worship, does not exist, there remains in the acts of the council a very great amount of superstition. This council is undoubtedly received as œcumenical by the Eastern and Latin Churches. But its decrees have not been ratified by any council confessedly œcumenical. Neither the Eastern nor the Western Church was fairly represented in it, and the Council of Frankfort immediately protested against it. In answer to this last particular, it is alleged that the Fathers of Frankfort proceeded upon a falsified document; it was represented to them that the Nicene decree ran thus: "That they who will not pay the same worship and adoration to the images of saints that they do to the Deific Trinity, shall be excommunicated." This is true; but the falsified document was only one out of the writings against which the Frankfort protest was directed. [See Neale, ii. 132, note. For the character of both the Nicene and Constantinople Councils, see Milman, iv. 7 and 8.]

[1] Philippicus Bardanes, Emperor of the Greeks, a Monothelite, ordered [A.D. 712] the removal from the church of St. Sophia of a picture of the Sixth General Council, which had condemned the Monothelites, and sent an order to Rome for the removal of all similar pictures. Pope Constantine protested against the edict, and commanded pictures of all the six councils to be placed in the porch of St. Peter's. [F. Spanheim, Op. ii. p. 721.] His dethronement interrupted the controversy, which slumbered under the two succeeding emperors, but broke out again.

Charlemagne took a decided part in the controversy, and procured a reply, perhaps by Alcuin, to the acts of the Nicene Council. The reply was sent to Adrian, who answered it. Charlemagne then called a council at Frankfort [A.D. 794], in which the Caroline books were confirmed, the worship of images condemned, but their use allowed. [Mansi, xiii. 909; Goldastus, 61.]

In A.D. 825 a council at Paris rejects Adrian's letter, adhering to the decrees of Frankfort, and censuring the Nicene Council. [Mansi, xiv. 424; Goldastus, 623.] The synod collected at great length the opinions of the Fathers concerning the use and abuse of images, and with more caution than had been shewn in the former council.

The English Church appears to have united with the Frankish in passing its protest, so that very few of the Western Christians outside of Italy were committed to the principles of Nicæa. [Spelman, i. pp. 218, 306, 363.]

Returning to Constantinople, in A.D. 815, Leo the Armenian assembled a council which abolished the decrees of the Nicene Council, but without enacting any penal laws against the image-worshippers. [Mansi, xiv. 135.] Michael tolerated the image-worshippers. Theophilus persecuted them; but his widow Theodora, regent during the minority of her son, called another council in A.D. 842, and restored the decrees of Nicæa. [Mansi, xiv. 787.] In A.D. 843 the use of images was reintroduced, and the event has been commemorated ever since by an annual feast called the Feast of Orthodoxy. The proper office for the day answers nearly to our Commination. The anathema against the Iconomachi asserts that "what the Jews and Greeks spake in blasphemy immediately against the Prototype, these, by means of His icons, blush not audaciously to say against Him that is represented." [Neale, i. part 2, pp. 745, 868.]

The Greek Church has never again been disturbed by the iconoclastic contest, which, however, both during its continuance and after it had ceased, was fraught with the most important consequences. In the East the strength of the empire was wasted on the internal dissensions which it caused, and the Mohammedans were enabled to advance almost unchecked. The spirit of the Gospel seems to have been completely lost sight of in these religious contests, and the most barbarous cruelties were perpetrated. Hatred of images became a fanaticism, but, as Milman says, "it could never become a religion" [Latin Christ. iv. 7]. It became, in fact, a political fanaticism, in which the element of Christianity was reduced to the very lowest term, and which exhausted the strength that might have resisted errors of greater consequence.

IDIOTÆ. The name of ἰδιῶται was given to all Christians who were not κλῆροι (that is, who had not received any ordination) in the early Church. It is used by St. Paul in a passage [1 Cor. xiv. 16] where it is translated "unlearned" in our English version, but St. Chrysostom and Theodoret in their commentaries explain that the word there means "laymen," and probably the same sense was intended by the English translators.[1] Origen uses it when speaking of laymen who had power, as well as clergy, to act as exorcists [Origen, Contr. Cels. vii.]; and ἰδιῶται are opposed to ἱερεις by Synesius [Ep. ad Theoph. liv.]. The "place" of the ἰδιῶται, and the Eucharistic response of Amen, are thus to be understood of that part of the Church not set apart for the clergy, and of the participation of the congregation in the highest act of Christian worship. [LAITY.]

IGNORANCE OF CHRIST. In the loving condescension of our Lord Jesus Christ He became Man to the extent of partaking in the weakness of human nature. By the ordinary processes of bodily growth and development He "increased in stature" from infancy to childhood, and from childhood to the full maturity of manhood. He was entirely like unto His brethren in all things except those which belong to the region of sin; was susceptible of hunger, thirst, weariness, mental sorrow, bodily tears, full human suffering, and death. He had also a human will, which desired that if it were possible the cup of His Passion might pass from Him.

This entire affinity of our Lord's human nature with the nature of men extended also to the understanding, at least in some degree. It is recorded that the child Jesus "increased in wisdom" as well as in "stature" [Luke ii. 52], not attaining the one any more than the other without passing through the ordinary stages of development. Although, therefore, in His childhood the wisdom of the child Jesus far surpassed that of ordinary children, it was not the wisdom of His mature manhood, but a very perfect form of that knowledge which belongs to the time of childhood; and the very expression that He "increased in wisdom" makes it necessary to believe that there were some things which did not yet form part of His knowledge. Thus in His childhood, the human knowledge of our Lord was not identical with the Omniscience or Divine Knowledge of the Godhead. His Divine Nature and His human nature were hypostatically united, and we may predicate much of the one nature which belongs properly only to the other [COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM], but there was yet a certain independence of operation by which, as the human will could act in a manner entirely human, so also could the human understanding.

That such should be the case is a consequence naturally following the statement of the Athanasian Creed that our Lord is "equal to the

[1] It is also used in Acts iv. 13 respecting the Apostles by the Sanhedrim. In both places Luther's translation recognises the ancient and not the modern sense of ἰδιῶται, rendering it by the German word "laien."

Father as touching His Godhead, but inferior to the Father as touching His Manhood." The Manhood which is "inferior to the Father" must also be "inferior" to that Divine Nature of Christ which is "equal to the Father;" and one portion of that inferiority while He was on earth, with His Manhood yet unglorified, was that limitation of knowledge which is theologically called the "Ignorance" of Christ. Things which were known to Him in the Omniscience of His Godhead were unknown to Him in the humiliation of His Manhood, so that He was able truly to say respecting the day of His own Second Coming, "But of that day and of that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father" [Mark xiii. 32].

This characteristic of Christ's condescending sympathy is referred to by several of the Fathers. In writing against the Gnostics, St. Irenæus says, "Unreasonably inflated, you presumptuously profess yourselves to be acquainted with the unspeakable mysteries of God, whereas, even the Lord, the Son of God Himself, allowed that the day and hour of the judgment was known to the Father alone. . . . If then the Son was not ashamed to ascribe the knowledge of that day to the Father only, but said that which is true, neither let us be ashamed to reserve for God those greater subjects which are in dispute among us. For no man is greater than his Master" [Irenæus, adv. Hær. ii. 28, vi.]. St. Athanasius, in his orations against the Arians, says that our Lord "shews Himself to know the end of all things as the Word, but as man is ignorant of it. For it belongs to man to be ignorant, especially of such things as these. So that this expression springs from His goodness towards man's nature, inasmuch as, becoming man, He is not ashamed, so far as His ignorant flesh goes, to say, 'I know not'" [Athanas. Orat. contra Arian. viii. 43]. "We who reverence Christ are assured that He did not say He was ignorant in that He was the Word, for in that relation He knew well; but shewing His human Nature, because it belongs to humanity to be ignorant, and He had put on ignorant flesh, speaking in reference to this He said that as man He was ignorant" [ibid. 45]. So also St. Ambrose writes, "There was increase of age and increase of wisdom, but it was of human wisdom. . . . If He advanced as a man in age, He must have advanced as a man in wisdom; the advance in wisdom must have been proportionate to that in perception, from which it is derived" [Ambr. de Incarn. vii. 72].

It is obviously difficult to understand in what manner the Omniscience of God and the ignorance of man could co-exist in our Lord, but it is equally difficult to understand the co-existence of His suffering Manhood and His Impassible Godhead. "If Jesus, as man, could be without the Divine attribute of perfect blessedness without prejudice to His full possession of it as God; why could He not in like manner, as man, be without the Divine attribute of perfect knowledge. The difficulty is common to all the contrasts of the Divine Incarnation; but these contrasts, while they enhance our sense of our Lord's love and condescension, do not destroy our apprehension of the Personal Unity of the incarnate Christ. His single Personality has two spheres of existence; in the one it is all blessed, undying, and omniscient; in the other it meets with pain of mind and body, with actual death, and with a correspondent liability to a limitation of knowledge. No such limitation, we may be sure, can interfere with the completeness of His redemptive office; but at least it places Him as Man in perfect sympathy with the actual conditions of the mental life of His brethren" [Liddon's Bampton Lect. 695].

It must be strongly enforced in conclusion, that [1] this limitation of the knowledge of Christ during the time of His humiliation must on no account be supposed to extend to His knowledge as the glorified Son of Man, for it was a part of that temporary discipline by which He learned sympathy as He "learned obedience" [Heb. iv. 15, v. 8], and for which there was no need when the work of His humiliation had been perfected. [2] Nor must it be imagined that such limitation of knowledge entailed the possibility of error; for although relatively to Omniscience the temporal knowledge of Christ's human Nature was Ignorance, relatively to ordinary human knowledge it was all but omniscience; and there is not a shadow of ground in Holy Scripture for supposing that, as far as it extended, such knowledge was otherwise than infallible.

ILLUMINATI [φωτιζόμενοι]. A name given to the baptized in the early Church. St. Paul writes of those who were ἅπαξ φωτισθέντας in two places with an evident reference to baptism [Heb. vi. 4, x. 32], and the Council of Laodicæa [A.D. 372], in its third canon, calls the newly-baptized προσφάτως φωτισθέντας. The name is explained by Justin Martyr in his second Apology as referring to the spiritual knowledge acquired by those who were baptized, and there was probably an association between the term and the ritual use of lights in the Baptismal service. [Illumination. Lights.]

ILLUMINATI. The name has been assumed by four sects of enthusiasts, in Spain, France, Belgium, and Germany. [1] The Alombrados arose in Spain about the year 1575. They were mystics of a very extreme form, who cast aside altogether the assistance of sacraments, and the duty of good works, believing that perfectibility of religious life was to be attained by contemplation. The original sect was suppressed, but it revived again about 1623, and was formally condemned by the Spanish Church. [2] Shortly afterwards the Guerinets arose in France, a sort of Illuminati similar to the preceding, but who added to their mysticism the belief in a special revelation of perfectibility made to one of their number, a friar named Bocquet. [3] A sect of the same kind of mystics existed in Belgium under the same name, in the latter half of the last century. [4] The "order" of the Perfectibilists, or Illuminati, was originated at Ingol-stadt by a professor of Canon Law, named Weishaupt, in 1776. It was an association of deists and republicans, and was largely supported by the freemasons. It was suppressed by the Elector of Bavaria in 1786, but its influences had spread very widely, and they probably contributed towards the overthrow of the Church in France, and its danger in other countries, during the terrible epoch of the French Revolution. [MYSTICS. Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

ILLUMINATION. The spiritual enlightenment of the understanding and the conscience which proceeds from the indwelling of Christ, "the true Light which lighteth every man" [John i. 9].

That Presence being brought about first of all by Holy Baptism, illumination is primarily a result of that sacrament. This was so keenly recognised in the early Church, when numbers were baptized as adults, and the effects of regeneration were thus made evident by contrast, that baptism was often called φωτισμὸς, as by Justin Martyr, who wrote, "This washing we call illumination, because the understanding of those who learn these things is enlightened" [Apolog. II. lxi.]. The expression is common among the Fathers, and appears also to have been used familiarly by St. Paul, who is evidently writing of Baptism when he speaks of "those who were once enlightened" (τοὺς ἅπαξ φωτισθέντας) [Heb. vi. 5], and speaks of the time "after ye were enlightened" [ibid. x. 32], and tells those who were once heathen, but had been made Christians, that "ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light" [Eph. v. 8]; "ye are all children of the light and of the day" [1 Thess. v. 5]. St. Peter also uses the same language, speaking to Christian Jews as those whom Christ has called "into His marvellous light" [1 Pet. ii. 9], and St. John speaks of an active, loving Christianity as "abiding in the light" [1 John ii. 10].

Illumination is not, however, the effect of Baptism only, though that sacrament is the instrumental cause of its first entrance into the soul. Every increase of grace by which Christ and the Christian are drawn into more close union brings to the latter some increase of spiritual intelligence and moral perception from the presence of the former. "In Thy Light shall we see light" [Ps. xxxvi. 9]. The spiritual intelligence thus gained brings truth within the range of mental apprehension by a kind of intuition, faith being quickened so as to supply to a certain extent, and for the spiritual necessities of the individual person himself, the place of acquired knowledge. Thus holy persons, who would be justly accounted ignorant in secular things, have a clear vision of God and of spiritual truth. Holy living and sacramental grace bring them the Presence of Christ, and with it comes an illumination of the mind, such as makes them quickly apprehend the practical force of spiritual truth. They thus arrive by supernatural means at a terminus which could only be intellectually reached, if reached at all, through an atmosphere of doubt, which would have to be dissipated by processes of reasoning. They have "the eyes of their understanding enlightened, that they may know what is the hope of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints" [Eph. i. 18]. But such illumination must not be confused with the confident assumption of spiritual knowledge which is often found among sectarians, which is not associated with spiritual purity and holy living, and which mostly betrays itself to the keen observer as mere ignorant speculation and guesswork.

The illumination thus produced by the Light of Christ's Presence extends also to the conscience. Hence the mystical language of the Book of Proverbs speaks of "the candle of the Lord searching all the inward parts" of the spiritual man [Prov. xx. 27]. Hence it is found by daily experience that those who live simple Christian lives, depending, unconsciously perhaps, on God rather than on intellectual discernment for moral guidance, are quick in their moral perceptions. Women and children are thus said to know right and wrong by instinct, not by reasoning; and such knowledge is of the highest order, because it is derived from union of the human conscience with the Supreme Conscience, an union to a great extent unopposed, through simple submission of will, and the simple reception of grace.

Illumination is, therefore, the initiation of a spiritual condition which will develope into perfection in that life where the Presence of God will be unveiled, and where no other light will be needed than the glory of God and the light of Christ [Rev. xxi. 23]. Consequently, every increase of it that can be obtained during the present life is to be regarded as among the best of those good and perfect gifts which proceed from above, coming down from the Father of Lights [James i. 17]. It is to be sought as a gift of high value even to the most intellectual, and its presence is to be reverenced even in the most ignorant.

IMAGE OF GOD. This is the term by which Holy Scripture denotes the perfection of human nature in its original condition. When the Blessed Trinity determined to crown the work of Creation with the noblest work of all, "God said, Let us make man in our Image, after our likeness" [Gen. i. 26]; and of the act of Creation when it was past, it is said, "So God created man in His own Image, in the Image of God created He him" [Gen. i. 27]; "In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made He him" [Gen. v. 1]. After the Deluge God once more refers to this glory of man's nature, saying, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the Image of God made He man." [Gen. ix. 6; cf. 1 Cor. xi. 7 and James iii. 9.]

But although the Creator thus made man theomorphic, we are not to think of God as anthropomorphic; and we must look for the likeness of man to God in such qualities as can be justly predicated of God on the one hand, and of man on the other. Since God is a Spirit, His Image in man cannot relate to the human body [ANTHROPOMORPHISM; BODY, NATURAL], but must consist in certain spiritual and mental qualities or capacities, the perfection of which is found only in God, but of which an impress or image was communicated to man. We cannot limit the extent or nature of Divine qualities by the capacities of human nature; but, on the other hand, we have no right to limit the communication of those qualities to human nature except so far as its essential limitability for their reception requires.

1.] Human Nature, then, in its original perfection was the Image of God because of the communication to it of the Divine quality of Indestructibility. Divine Nature itself is characterized by what is called "necessary existence." Not being created, it cannot be otherwise than immortal; and hence the mysterious but yet partly revealed name by which God has designated Himself, "I AM," "Jehovah," an Eternally Present Existence. To suppose that original human nature had such an immortality would be to suppose it to be not the Image of God, but God; we must therefore understand that the communicated indestructibility of the one was rather analogous to, than identical with, the inherent indestructibility of the other. Such a difference may be deduced from the known constitution of the organic part of our nature. We have no reason to suppose that any great change has taken place in this since its first creation, and may undoubtedly conclude that it needed to be renewed day by day from the first by means of food; but no such necessity can belong to the Eternal Divine Nature. Such, however, on the other hand, is the wonderful character of our existing nature in its physical structure, that it is a machine which is continually being renovated by its use as well as by food. The friction which destroys every other machine is, in the body, a source of perpetual reproduction of its particles, and the use of the muscular system actually developes its substance. Hence it is scarcely so much an effort of the imagination as a conclusion of the reason to suppose this renovating process going on for ever under the influence of food exactly adapted to the requirements of nature, and circumstances of life from which the many elements of deterioration induced by mental care were absent. The communicated indestructibility of our original nature was plainly of this character. "God," says the author of the Book of Wisdom, "created man to be immortal;" that is, for the state of immortality, "and made him the Image of His own propriety" [ἰδία ἰδιότης. Wisd. ii. 23, 24]. He gave to him a nature capable of enduring for ever in all its parts, body as well as soul, under certain conditions; these being represented to us—so far as they were different from those under which human nature now exists—by the literal or figurative expression (let it be considered in either way the result is the same for the present argument), "eating of the tree of life." What the classical mythology predicated of ambrosia and nectar, that they were food and drink capable of giving immortality to mortals, was doubtless a tradition of a far more ancient primeval truth told us in this opening page of the history of human nature. Provided with physical structure identical with that known to all subsequent generations, and which is, in itself, liable to degeneration through the wear and tear of life, human nature had access originally to some restorative aliment which did the work of an elixir vitæ, continually counteracting the process of degeneration, and maintaining the animal tissues as well as the vital energies in perennial vigour.

The original immortality of human nature was so far an image of Divine incorruptibility, that the constitution of our physical structure was of a self-reproductive character, as it still is; was animated by some communication of the nature of divinity, the "breath of life," by which it is still animated; and had access to a perpetually recuperative power in the "tree of life," which represents a food of immortality of a supra-natural character.

